IDENTITY AND INTEREST OF AMICI STATES

The amici States of Illinois, Delaware, New Jersey, California, Colorado, Connecticut, the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, New Mexico, New York, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Washington submit this brief in support of Defendant-Appellee the Commissioner of the Pennsylvania State Police’s (“Pennsylvania”) rehearing petition pursuant to Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 29(b)(2).

The amici States have a substantial interest in the public health, safety, and welfare of their communities, which includes protecting their residents from the harmful effects of gun violence and promoting the safe use of firearms. See Drake v. Filko, 724 F.3d 426, 437 (3d Cir. 2013) (States have, “undoubtedly, a significant, substantial, and important interest in protecting [their] citizens’ safety”). To serve that interest, a substantial majority of States have historically implemented measures that regulate the sale and use of, and access to, firearms for individuals under the age of 21. Although the States have reached different conclusions on how best to regulate in this area, they share an interest in protecting their right to address gun violence in a way that is consistent with the Second Amendment’s text as well as the Nation’s historical tradition and is tailored to the specific circumstances in their States.

The panel’s renewed opinion threatens this important State interest. The panel held once more that a Pennsylvania statute that restricts young adults from carrying firearms during states of declared emergency violates those individuals’ Second Amendment rights. Op. 36. That conclusion is incorrect, as Pennsylvania explains, and, as set out below, its reasoning threatens the amici States’ ability to protect public safety in their States. This proceeding thus “involves a question of exceptional importance,” Fed. R. App. P. 35(a)(2), warranting rehearing en banc or, at minimum, a remand for further development of the historical record.

ARGUMENT

The Case Should Be Reheard En Banc Or Remanded.

As Pennsylvania explains, en banc review of the panel opinion is urgently needed. The panel opinion holds unconstitutional a state law that is broadly consistent with the manner in which 30 or more other States regulate firearms, and in doing so refuses to consider 150 years of historical support for such statutes. Op. 28. Both the panel's holding about the challenged statute and the methodological premise on which it rests have the potential to be profoundly disruptive to amici States, and both should be revisited en banc. At minimum, as Pennsylvania suggests, the Court should remand the case to the district court to permit the parties to develop a more robust historical record before invalidating this important public-safety measure.

A. The panel opinion raises questions about the constitutionality of state laws nationwide.

The Court should rehear this case en banc or remand it because the panel opinion will raise questions about the constitutionality of statutes in dozens of States that, like the challenged law, protect public safety by limiting young people's access to firearms. These laws are ubiquitous: Over 30 States, from Alaska to Louisiana to Wyoming, ensure firearms are used responsibly by imposing restrictions governing access to firearms by those under the age of 21. And such statutes are constitutional, as Pennsylvania and amici States explained to the panel, at least in part because States have enacted similar laws for over 150 years. The panel's contrary conclusion thus raises serious questions about the constitutionality of laws enacted by a substantial majority of States and enforced for well over a century.

As the Supreme Court has explained, States have substantial “latitude under their police powers to legislate as to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons,” Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 U.S. 470, 475 (1996), an authority that encompasses protecting their communities against gun violence. Nothing about the Court’s opinion in New York State Rifle & Pistol Ass’n v. Bruen, 597 U.S. 1 (2022), is to the contrary. Even as the Court held unconstitutional the statute at issue in that case, see id. at 38 n.9, it emphasized its intent to preserve States’ substantial authority to regulate the possession, sale, and use of firearms, explaining among other things that a State need not point to identical historical statutes to shoulder its burden at Bruen’s second step, see id. at 30 (States need only “identify a well-established and representative historical analogue, not a historical twin” (emphases in original)). The Court reiterated that point in United States v. Rahimi, chastising lower courts for “misunderst[anding] [Bruen’s] methodology” and imagining “a law trapped in amber.” 602 U.S. 680, 691 (2024). Even after Bruen and Rahimi, then, States retain meaningful authority to regulate access to firearms.

And although States have reached different conclusions about how best to regulate firearms, a substantial majority of States—at least 34, including every State in this circuit—have made a judgment similar to Pennsylvania’s: Imposing age-based restrictions on the sale or use of firearms is necessary to promote public safety and curb gun violence. Fifteen jurisdictions, including the two other States in this Circuit—Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Illinois, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New Jersey, New York, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, South Carolina, and the District of Columbia—prohibit people under the age of 21 from carrying certain firearms in public at all (subject, in some States, to exceptions).¹ An additional 19 States—firearms³ or from possessing them.⁴ Congress, too, has enacted restrictions that are unique to individuals under 21, prohibiting them from purchasing handguns from federally licensed firearms dealers.⁵ The restriction the panel opinion holds unconstitutional, in other words, is not an outlier; it is consistent with the way a substantial majority of States and the federal government have chosen to handle this issue.

The panel opinion raises questions about the constitutionality of all these statutes. The panel majority held that individuals under the age of 21 are entitled to full protection under the Second Amendment, notwithstanding its agreement that they would not have been considered part of “the People” at the time the Amendment was ratified, Op. 16-17, and held that Pennsylvania could not shoulder its historical burden under Bruen because it had not identified a statute in or around 1791 that restricted the rights of young adults to carry firearms, Op. 21-32. Although many of amici States’ own laws are distinguishable in multiple respects, including in the specific limitations they place on those under the age of 21, supra pp. 5-7, the panel’s broad reasoning could be read to call into question any statute that burdens the Second Amendment rights of individuals in that age range. The panel opinion thus at minimum will raise questions about statutes enacted by over 30 States and the federal government that protect public safety by limiting young people’s access to firearms.

The amici States are committed both to defending the constitutionality of their statutes and to protecting their communities from the dangers of gun violence. But the panel opinion could threaten their ability to do so, in that it may prompt litigants and even other courts to adopt a flawed and expansive view of the Second Amendment that could impair the amici States' ability to enforce their longstanding and effective public-safety statutes. Those consequences are likely to be most acutely felt in amici States Delaware and New Jersey, which will be governed directly by the panel opinion. New Jersey prohibits individuals under the age of 21 from obtaining permits to purchase or publicly carry handguns, N.J. Stat. §§ 2C:58-3(c)(4), 2C:58-4(c), and likewise prohibits such individuals from possessing handguns except in specific circumstances, id. § 2C:58-6.1(b). Delaware prohibits the sale of handguns to people under the age of 21, Del. Code Ann. tit. 24, §§ 901, 903, and will soon prohibit people under 21 from possessing handguns, id. tit. 11, § 1448(a)(5). In both States, too, the panel opinion will raise serious questions about the constitutionality of the federal restriction on commercial sales of handguns to individuals under 21. See 18 U.S.C. § 922(b)(1), (c)(1). Again, these statutes are distinguishable from the Pennsylvania law challenged here, but the majority's reasoning nevertheless casts a cloud over these important public-safety measures.

B. The panel opinion sets out a methodological rule that is out of step with Supreme Court precedent and will threaten state firearm regulations in other contexts.

The panel opinion should be reheard en banc for a second reason: It resolves a significant methodological question left open by Bruen and Rahimi in a manner that is out of step with Supreme Court precedent and with approaches taken by other courts. If left uncorrected, the panel’s approach will threaten amici States’ ability to defend all manner of firearms regulations. That, too, warrants rehearing en banc or, at minimum, remand.

Under Bruen, if a plaintiff establishes that a state firearms regulation covers conduct that is protected by the Second Amendment, the State must show that the regulation “is consistent with the Nation’s historical tradition of firearm regulation.” 597 U.S. at 24. But neither Bruen nor Rahimi resolved whether a State could rely on historical evidence from the Reconstruction Era—when the Second Amendment was formally incorporated against the States—as opposed to evidence from the Founding, when there is evidence of conflict between the two periods’ understanding of the scope of the right. See id. at 37-38 (“We need not address this issue today”); accord Rahimi, 602 U.S. at 692 n.1. The panel opinion appears to resolve this open question, holding that, in such cases, the Second Amendment “should be understood according to its public meaning in 1791.” Op. 26.

That holding is enormously consequential. It excludes from consideration centuries’ worth of history, limiting the scope of courts’ review to those laws passed by the time of the Founding. In this case, as the panel acknowledged, it excluded from view 20 Reconstruction Era statutes identified by Pennsylvania—statutes enacted by over half of the States in the Union—directly analogous to the challenged statute, concluding that they were enacted too late to be relevant at all. Op. 28 & n.28. And the panel’s rule will apply in any Second Amendment case arising in this circuit in which a panel identifies a supposed conflict between Founding Era evidence and Reconstruction Era evidence—foreclosing States’ ability to advance (and future panels’ ability to adopt) a more nuanced view of the historical evidence supporting a challenged firearm regulation. That decision should be made by the en banc court, not by two members of a divided panel—or, at minimum, on the basis of a fuller historical record.

En banc review is also warranted because the panel majority’s methodological holding—that only Founding Era historical evidence is relevant to the Second Amendment analysis and that Reconstruction Era evidence can accordingly be ignored when there is evidence of any supposed conflict between those two periods—is seriously out of step with Supreme Court precedent and the decisions of the other courts of appeals. As Bruen observed, the States are “bound to respect the right to keep and bear arms because of the Fourteenth Amendment, not the Second.” 597 U.S. at 37. And the Supreme Court has, in each of its major Second Amendment opinions, considered Reconstruction Era evidence alongside Founding Era evidence—including most recently in Rahimi, which upheld the challenged federal law based in large part on laws passed between 1836 and 1868. See 602 U.S. at 695-96 (citing 1836 statute); id. at 696 (citing Bruen’s reference to nine other statutes from the Reconstruction Era). And the courts of appeals have generally all considered Reconstruction Era history in their post-Bruen opinions, “look[ing] to the understanding of the right to bear arms both at the time of the ratification of the Second Amendment in 1791 and at the time of the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868.” Wolford

v. Lopez, 116 F.4th 959, 980 (9th Cir. 2024) (emphasis added); accord, e.g., Antonyuk v. James, 120 F.4th 941, 988 n.36 (2d Cir. 2024); Bianchi v. Brown, 111 F.4th 438, 471 (4th Cir. 2024) (en banc). We are aware of no other court of appeals that has held that Reconstruction Era evidence can be wholly disregarded in a Second Amendment challenge to a state law. The Court should grant rehearing en banc to reconsider the panel’s methodological rule, which is out of step with other courts, or, at minimum, remand the case to the district court for development of the historical record.

CONCLUSION

The Court should grant the petition for rehearing en banc.
