California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans

FINAL REPORT

California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans

FINAL REPORT

This document may be commonly referenced as

"The California Reparations Report"

CALIFORNIA REPARATIONS TASK FORCE MEMBERS

From left to right, Jovan Scott Lewis, Senator Steven Bradford, Lisa Holder, Councilmember Monica Montgomery Steppe, Cheryl Grills, Donald K. Tamaki, Amos C. Brown, Assemblymember Reginald Byron Jones-Sawyer, Sr., Kamilah V. Moore (2023)

Acknowledgments

Task Force Members

Senator Steven Bradford
Amos C. Brown, Th.D., Vice Chair
Cheryl Grills, Ph.D.
Lisa Holder, Esq.
Assemblymember Reginald Byron Jones-Sawyer, Sr.
Jovan Scott Lewis, Ph.D.
Kamilah V. Moore, Esq., Chair
Councilmember Monica Montgomery Steppe
Donald K. Tamaki, Esq.

The Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans would like to thank the following staff from the California Department of Justice for their assistance and contributions to this report:

Executive Staff

Venus D. Johnson,
Chief Deputy Attorney General

Danielle F. O'Bannon,
Chief Assistant Attorney General, Public Rights Division

Damon M. Brown,
Special Assistant Attorney General

Catherina Nou,
Director, Office of Community Awareness, Response, and Engagement (CARE)

Bethany Lesser,
Director, Office of Communications

Amy Alley,
Director, Office of Legislative Affairs

Management and Supervision

Michael L. Newman,
Senior Assistant Attorney General, Civil Rights Enforcement Section

Sarah Belton,
Supervising Deputy Attorney General, Civil Rights Enforcement Section

Christine Chuang,
Supervising Deputy Attorney General, Civil Rights Enforcement Section

Randie Chance, Ph.D.,
Director, Department of Justice Research Center

Tiffany Jantz-DesOrmeaux, Ph.D.,
Research Data Supervisor, Department of Justice Research Center

Writers and Editors

Robin L. Goldfaden,
Deputy Attorney General, Lead Editor

Anthony V. Seferian,
Deputy Attorney General, Lead Editor

Xiyun Yang,
Deputy Attorney General, Lead Editor

Francisco V. Balderrama,
Deputy Attorney General

Jesse Basbaum,
Deputy Attorney General

Brian Bilford,
Deputy Attorney General

Lisa Ehrlich,
Deputy Attorney General

Danielle Elliott,
Deputy Attorney General

Laura Faer,
Deputy Attorney General

Vince Ghazzawi,
Deputy Attorney General

Jennifer Gibson,
Deputy Attorney General

Newton Knowles,
Deputy Attorney General

Tanya Koshy,
Deputy Attorney General

Clarissa Limón,
Deputy Attorney General

Edward Nugent,
Deputy Attorney General

Srividya Panchalam,
Deputy Attorney General

Mirelle Raza,
Deputy Attorney General

James Richardson,
Deputy Attorney General

Lee Sherman,
Deputy Attorney General

Donghyuk Shin,
Deputy Attorney General

Jasleen Singh,
Deputy Attorney General

Kanwalroop Singh,
Deputy Attorney General

Deylin Thrift-Viveros,
Deputy Attorney General

Delbert Tran,
Deputy Attorney General

Meena Visvanathan,
Deputy Attorney General

Caroline Wilson,
Deputy Attorney General

Tatyana Kaplan, Ph.D.,
Research Data Specialist

Tom Leigh, Ph.D.,
Research Data Specialist

Jannie Scott, Ph.D.,
Research Data Specialist

Supporting Contributors

Christina Bull Arndt,
Supervising Deputy Attorney General

Kathleen Boergers,
Supervising Deputy Attorney General

David Pai,
Supervising Deputy Attorney General

James E. Stanley,
Supervising Deputy Attorney General

James Zahradka,
Supervising Deputy Attorney General

Justin Rausa,
Deputy Legislative Director

Rishi Khalsa,
Press Secretary

Shawna Tosten,
Legislative Fiscal Director

Jessica Barclay-Strobel,
Deputy Attorney General

Kelly M. Burns,
Deputy Attorney General

Nimrod Elias,
Deputy Attorney General

Alex E. Flores,
Deputy Attorney General

Rebekah Fretz,
Deputy Attorney General

Martha Gomez,
Deputy Attorney General

Ketakee Kane,
Deputy Attorney General

Joseph Lake,
Deputy Attorney General

Katherine Lehe,
Deputy Attorney General

Marisol León,
Deputy Attorney General

Scott Lichtig,
Deputy Attorney General

Gabriel Martinez,
Deputy Attorney General

Kristin McCarthy,
Deputy Attorney General

Kendal Micklethwaite,
Deputy Attorney General

Caitlan McLoon,
Deputy Attorney General

Jeanelly Orozco Alcala,
Deputy Attorney General

Roma Patel,
Deputy Attorney General

April Powell-Willingham,
Deputy Attorney General

Anna Rich,
Deputy Attorney General

Elizabeth Sarine,
Deputy Attorney General

Jennifer Soliman,
Deputy Attorney General

Christine Start,
Deputy Attorney General

Callie Wilson,
Deputy Attorney General

Catherine Ysrael,
Deputy Attorney General

Theresa Zhen,
Deputy Attorney General

Kendall Hutchings,
Research Data Analyst

Sean Puttick,
Senior Legal Analyst

Jeremy Payne,
Associate Governmental Program Analyst

Angelique Ajala,
Law Clerk

Anita Alem,
Law Clerk

Callie Bruzzone,
Law Clerk

Katy Chu,
Law Clerk

Luke Churchill,
Law Clerk

Kyle DaSilva,
Law Clerk

Elizabeth Gorman,
Law Clerk

Mara Greenwald,
Law Clerk

Hanna Kim,
Law Clerk

Courtney Linzner,
Law Clerk

Megan Nakao,
Law Clerk

Sarah Nealon,
Law Clerk

Khadijah Omerdin,
Law Clerk

Alex Ramsey,
Law Clerk

Alexandra Reyna,
Law Clerk

Danielle Roybal,
Law Clerk

Mary-Claire Sei,
Law Clerk

Jake Seidman,
Law Clerk

Jennifer Smith-Eisenberg,
Law Clerk

Ruby Strassman,
Law Clerk

Elleasse Taylor,
Law Clerk

Jenna Waldman,
Law Clerk

Hunter Wolff,
Law Clerk

Administrative and Technical Support

Caitlyn Brekke,
Associate Governmental Program Analyst

Yanci Bumanlag,
Digital Print Operator II

Daniel Cook,
Digital Composition Specialist

Amanda Cuevas,
Staff Services Manager

Lupe Zinzun Diez,
Associate Governmental Program Analyst

Shonise Flowers,
Associate Governmental Program Analyst

Oscar Estrella,
Audio-Visual Specialist

Noel Garcia,
Legal Analyst

Justin Gourley,
Audio-Visual Specialist

Trini Hurtado,
Associate Governmental Program Analyst

Doreathea Johnson,
Parliamentarian

Mike Kimsey,
Staff Services Manager II

Ben Lin,
Digital Print Operator

Joseph Lopez,
Digital Print Operator I

Cynthia Montoya,
Legal Analyst

Tricia Morgensen,
Graphic Designer III
Aisha Martin-Walton,
Department of Justice Administrator III
Megan Sullivan,
Audio-Visual Specialist
Christopher Taylor,
Audio-Visual Specialist
Brittany Torgerson,
Digital Print Operator
Alecia Turner,
Senior Legal Analyst
Steve Wiley,
Digital Composition Specialist I
Department of Justice WebTeam Staff

Expert Consultants

Travis J. Bristol, Ph.D.
Tolani Britton, Ed.D.
Kaycea T. Campbell, Ph.D.
Marne Campbell, Ph.D.
Thomas Craemer, Ph.D.
William A. Darity Jr., Ph.D.
Eric Miller, L.L.M.
A. Kirsten Mullen
Stacey Smith, Ph.D.
William E. Spriggs, Ph.D.
Michael A. Stoll, Ph.D.

Testifying Witnesses

California Secretary of State
Shirley N. Weber, Ph.D.
Enola Aird
Jessica Ann Mitchell Aiwuyor
Adjoa Aiyetoro
Erika Alexander
Samone Anderson
Brett Andrews
Bruce Appleyard, Ph.D.
Deborah Archer
Paul Austin
Mehrsa Baradaran
Rachel Barkow
Ishmael Bartley
Dawn Basciano
Mary Frances Berry
Douglas Blackmon
Jalen Blocker
Roy Brooks
Chad Brown
Dorothy A. Brown
Kevin Brown
Jon Burgess
Tony Burroughs
Susan Burton
Jonathan Bush
Gregory Carr, Ph.D.
Ruben Carranza
Cerise Castle
Marcus Champion
Erwin Chemerinsky
Maisie Chin
C.N.E. Corbin, Ph.D.
Joy De Gruy, Ph.D.
Terrance Dean, Ph.D.
Marshé Doss
Arianne Edmonds
Deadria Farmer-Paellman
Kellie Farrish
Margaret Fortune, D.H.L.
Hollis Gentry
Joseph Gibbons, Ph.D.
Damien Goodmon
Debra Gore-Mann
Bertha Gorman
Brandon Greene
Kevin J. Greene
Kristee Haggins, Ph.D.
Darrick Hamilton, Ph.D.
Antonette Harrell
Aaron Harvey
Thomas Harvey
Tasha Henneman
Dorothy Hines
Etta Hollins, Ph.D.
Kamm Howard
Katherine Hubbard
Lynn Hudson
Darnell Hunt, Ph.D.
Sylvia Drew Ivie
Miya Iwataki
Theopia Jackson, Ph.D.
Jacob Jackson
Alison Rose Jefferson, Ph.D.
Rucker Johnson, Ph.D.
Geneviéve Jones-Wright
Jacqueline Jones, Ph.D.
Melissa Jones
Zerita Jones
Helen Kang
Joan Kauffman, Ph.D.
Kika Keith
Joyce King, Ph.D.
Michael Kochin
Chris Kuzawa, Ph.D.
Virginie Ladisch
Vinhcent Le
Lawrence Lucas
Mitchell Maki, Ph.D.
Isaac Martin, Ph.D.
Max Markham, Ph.D.
Jennifer Mason McAward
Evelyn McDowell, Ph.D.
Stephen Menendian
Jon Michaels
Yeshimabeit Milner
Sarah Moore Johnson
Nkem Ndefo
Safiya Noble, Ph.D.
Pedro Noguera, Ph.D.
Raymond Odom
Darrell Owens
John Parman, Ph.D.
James Pitts, Ph.D.
Nicole Porter
John Powell

David Price
Price
Daina Ramey Berry, Ph.D.
Charles Ramsey
Carolyn Roberts, Ph.D.
Anthony Rogers-Wright
Cynthia Roseberry
Tina Sacks, Ph.D.
Robin Semple
Kawika Smith
Howard Stevenson, Ph.D.
Nkechi Taifa
Mau Trejo
Shawn Utsey, Ph.D.
Marilyn Vann
Kavon Ward
Ron Wakabayashi
Isabel WilkersonD.Litt.
Angelo Williams, Ed.D.
Joseph Williams
Brendon Woods
Darris Young

Witnesses Appearing on Behalf of Local Governmental Initiatives

County of Alameda
The Hon. Nate Miley
City of Berkeley
The Hon. Ben Bartlett
City of Culver City
Onyx Jones and Helen Chin
City of Hayward
Regina Youngblood
County of Los Angeles
D'Artagnan Scorza
City of Los Angeles
Michael A. Lawson and Khansa T. Jones-Muhammad
City of Oakland Darlene Flynn
City of Richmond
Demnlus Johnson III, Trina Jackson-Lincoln, and LaShonda White
City of Sacramento
Kelly Fong Rivas and Chinua Rhodes
City and County of San Francisco
Sheryl Davis and Brittni Chicuata
City of Vallejo
Kerby Lynch, Ph.D., and Patrice L. Taranji

Additional Acknowledgements

Erin Bair
Bryce Bakewell
Jolie Brownell
Clarence Caesar
Shawna Charles
Mitchell Christopher Virginia Dickson
Garrett Garberich
Chris Garmire
Ariel Gibbs
Christian Glover
Nick Fletcher
Henry Foster III
Sarah Harrington
Maria Hernandez-Reyes
Sofie Jackson
Natasha Karam
Michael Lucien
Tamara Martin
Carolyn McIntyre
Chris Morales
Hoang Nguyễn
Justin Pal
Myla Rahman
Kipchoge Randall
Darlene Roberts
Monica Stam
Teja Stephens
Brenda Stevenson
Michala Storms
Jordan Velosa
Dominick Williams
Rickelle Williams

GRAPHIC CONTENT WARNING

This report contains discussions of racial discrimination, sexual assault, torture, lynching and other forms of extreme violence. The report contains unedited historical quotations and photographs of white supremacist hatred, torture, lynching, autopsy, and other forms of graphic violence.

Table of Contents

PART I: RECOUNTING THE HISTORICAL ATROCITIES

PART II: INTERNATIONAL PRINCIPLES OF REPARATION AND EXAMPLES OF REPARATIVE EFFORTS

PART III: RECOMMENDATION FOR A FORMAL APOLOGY

PART IV: METHODOLOGIES FOR CALCULATING COMPENSATION AND RESTITUTION

PART V: POLICY RECOMMENDATIONS

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

"THE CALIFORNIA REPARATIONS REPORT"

PART I: RECOUNTING THE HISTORICAL ATROCITIES

I. Introduction and Background

The African American story in the United States is marked by repeated failed promises to right the wrongs of the past—both distant and recent—and failure to acknowledge and take responsibility for the structural racism that perpetuated these harms. This report, crafted by the Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans pursuant to its mandate under Assembly Bill 3121 (2020), seeks to change this story with incontrovertible evidence of the harms requiring reparations and meaningful recommendations designed to redress them. The historical information and recommendations in this report are supported by extensive research and analysis, expert witness testimony, and testimony from those who have lived through the horrors and pursued the solutions that are addressed in this report. Taken together with the substantive analysis regarding international standards; local, state, federal, and international examples of reparations; methods for educating the public regarding the critical issues addressed herein; and a catalogue of the racist laws and policies that cumulatively created this nation, this report is intended to satisfy the requirements of AB 3121 in an accessible and comprehensive manner that will facilitate progress towards—finally—enacting meaningful reparations for African Americans in California and the United States.

In 1863, President Abraham Lincoln signed the Emancipation Proclamation, and in 1865 the states ratified the 13th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which commanded that "[n]either slavery nor involuntary servitude . . . shall exist within the United States."[1] In supporting the passage of the 13th Amendment, its co-author Senator Lyman Trumbull of Illinois said that "it is perhaps difficult to draw the precise line, to say where freedom ceases and slavery begins . . . ."[2] The United States then experienced a 12-year period after the Civil War called Reconstruction, during which the federal government tried—with some success—to give newly freed African Americans access to basic civil rights.[3] As just one example of the many ways in which this period reflected an expansion of rights, by 1868, more than 700,000 African American men were registered to vote in the former Confederate states.[4] These advancements came to an abrupt end after the presidential election of 1876, when federal political leaders reached a compromise which resulted in the withdrawal of federal troops from key locations in the South, effectively ending Reconstruction.[5]

COURTESY OF JOHN PARROT/STOCKTREK IMAGES VIA GETTY IMAGES

More Than 50 percent of U.S. Presidents from 1789 to 1885 enslaved African Americans

The first twenty-one Presidents seated together in The White House. The enslavers are shaded in red.

Later, in 1883, the United States Supreme Court interpreted the 13th Amendment as empowering Congress "to pass all laws necessary and proper for abolishing all badges and incidents of slavery in the United States."[6] However, other than during Reconstruction, instead of abiding by the Supreme Court's and the Constitution's mandates to abolish "badges and incidents of slavery," the United States federal, state, and local governments, including California, perpetuated and created new iterations of these "badges and incidents." The resulting harms have been innumerable and have snowballed over generations.

In 2020, through the enactment of Assembly Bill No. 3121 (AB 3121, 2019-2020 Reg. Sess.), California began the process of addressing its role in accommodating and facilitating slavery, perpetuating the vestiges of enslavement, propagating state-sanctioned discrimination, and tolerating persistent, systemic structures of discrimination on living African Americans across its systems of government at the local and state level. AB 3121 acknowledged that, as a result of this historic and continued discrimination, African Americans in California, especially those whose lineage can be traced to an enslaved person, continue to suffer economic, educational, and health hardships that have prevented them as a people from achieving equality.[7] AB 3121 established the Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans, with a Special Consideration for African Americans Who are Descendants of Persons Enslaved in the United States (Task Force), and directed the Task Force to study and develop reparation proposals for African Americans, taking into account:

a. the institution of slavery, including the federal and state governments that constitutionally and statutorily supported the institution of slavery;

b. the legal and factual discrimination against freed slaves and their descendants from the end of the Civil War to the present, including economic, political, educational, and social discrimination;

c. the lingering negative effects of the institution of slavery on living African Americans and on society in California and the United States;

d. how instructional resources and technologies deny the inhumanity of slavery and the crime against humanity committed against people of African descent in California and the United States;

e. the role of Northern complicity in the Southern-based institution of slavery; and

f. the direct benefits to societal institutions, public and private, including higher education, corporate, religious, and associational.[8]

AB 3121 also required the Task Force to recommend appropriate ways to educate the California public of the Task Force's findings; recommend appropriate remedies in consideration of the Task Force's findings; and submit to the Legislature a report of its work.[9] This is the Task Force's final report, incorporating and updating the contents of an interim report issued in June 2022.

Today, 160 years after the abolition of slavery, its badges and incidents remain embedded in the political, legal, health, financial, educational, cultural, environmental, social, and economic systems of the United States of America.

Part I of this report summarizes the harms caused by slavery and the lingering negative effects of the institution of slavery on descendants of persons enslaved in the United States and, more broadly, on living African Americans and on society in California and the United States.[10] So thoroughly have the effects of slavery infected every aspect of American society over the last 400 years, that it is nearly impossible to identify every "badge and incident of slavery," include every piece of evidence, and describe every harm done to African Americans, and particularly to freed slaves and their descendants. In order to address this practical reality, Chapters 1-13 describe a sample of government actions and the compounding harms that have resulted, organized into specific areas of systemic discrimination.[11]

In order to maintain slavery, government actors adopted white supremacist beliefs and passed laws to create a racial hierarchy and control enslaved and free African Americans.[12] After the end of slavery, although the federal Constitution recognized African Americans as citizens on paper, the government failed to give them the full rights of citizenship[13] and failed to protect African Americans from widespread terror and violence.[14] Along with a dereliction of its duty to protect its African American citizens, direct federal, state and local government actions continued to enforce the racist lies created to justify slavery. These laws and government-supported cultural beliefs have since formed the foundation of innumerable modern laws, policies, and practices across the nation.[15]

Today, 160 years after the abolition of slavery, its badges and incidents remain embedded in the political, legal, health, financial, educational, cultural, environmental, social, and economic systems of the United States of America.[16] Racist, casteist, untrue, and harmful stereotypes created to support slavery continue to physically and mentally harm African Americans today.[17] Without a remedy specifically targeted to dismantle our country's racist foundations and heal the injuries inflicted by colonial and American governments, the "badges and incidents of slavery" will continue to harm African Americans in almost all aspects of American life.

Part II of this report discusses international standards for remedying the wrongs and injuries discussed in Part I. This well-established framework has guided the Task Force in the formulation of its recommendations so that they comport with the five elements of reparations as set by international standards: restitution, compensation, rehabilitation, satisfaction, and non-repetition. Part II also provides examples of prior international and domestic efforts to provide reparations for human rights violations, such as apartheid, incarceration, and forced sterilization. In keeping with the legal framework for reparations, Part III discusses the required components of a formal apology and recommends how the State of California should offer a formal apology on behalf of the People of California for the perpetration of gross human rights violations and crimes against humanity against African enslaved people and their descendants.

In Parts IV and V, the Task Force recommends appropriate remedies in consideration of the Task Force's findings, including (a) how any form of compensation to African Americans, with a special consideration for African Americans who are descendants of persons enslaved in the United States, should be calculated; (b) what form of compensation should be awarded, through what instrumentalities, and who should be eligible for such compensation; and (c) whether any other forms of rehabilitation or restitution to African descendants are warranted and what form and scope those measures should take. The latter includes recommendations that the Legislature enact a range of policies needed to guarantee restitution, compensation, rehabilitation, satisfaction, and non-repetition.

Part VI of the report contains a summary of the Task Force's findings and recommendations regarding implementation of the California Racial Justice Act (Assem. Bill No. 2542 (2019-2020 Reg. Sess.)), and Part VII summarizes findings from community engagement and community input regarding reparations and the work of the Task Force. Part VIII recommends appropriate ways to educate the California public about the Task Force's findings and of the legacy of enslavement and legal discrimination in California. Finally, Part IX contains a compendium of California laws and policies that have had a significant impact in the development of the state and nation's unjust legal systems, including those that have subjugated and continue to disproportionately and negatively affect African Americans as a group and perpetuate the lingering material and psychosocial effects of slavery.

Taken together, the components of this report are not only intended to satisfy the requirements the Legislature set out in AB 3121, but also to serve as a blueprint for other states and, eventually, the federal government when they perform the critical task of atoning for this nation's victimization of African Americans, especially those who are descendants of persons enslaved in the United States. While California's first-in-the-nation effort is an important step, and the Task Force eagerly anticipates the Legislature's enactment of the recommendations contained herein, this national shame can ultimately be comprehensively redressed only through national reparations.

AB 3121 authorized the Task Force to hold public hearings to pursue its mission.[18] In order to inform the contents of its report, the Task Force held 16 public meetings, during which it considered public comments, expert, and personal witness testimony, in addition to considering the voluminous materials submitted to the Task Force via email from those unable to attend the meetings. In total, the Task Force heard over 48 hours of testimony from 133 witnesses, as well as over 28 hours of public comment in the course of its meetings, and received approximately 4,000 emails and 150 phone calls.

COURTESY OF CAROLYN COLE/LOS ANGELES TIMES VIA GETTY IMAGES

Lisa Holder is a member of the California Reparations Task Force which gathered to hear public input on reparations at the California Science Center in Los Angeles CA. (2022)

When discussing issues as complex as race and reparations, precision is paramount. Precision helps ensure that the writers and the reader begin in the same place, to arrive at the same understanding. As described later in this report, words have been weaponized throughout American history to dehumanize African Americans. Words can also be used to mend—to acknowledge, to respect, and to uplift. To that end, this report defines and adopts the following terms throughout its pages.

The N-word—the word "nigger" has been used for centuries to dehumanize African Americans.[19] The terms "Negro" and "Colored person" (as opposed to "person of color"), although adopted by African American communities for periods of time, have since been recognized as derogatory terms.[20] When quoting historical documents, this report will quote these words—not to condone the words or their vicious meanings—but to present them in the context in which these slurs were used. The California Legislature enacted AB 3121, recognizing that the lasting wounds of enslavement and discrimination cannot begin to mend until those wounds are first addressed. In that same spirit, this report quotes these terms recognizing that reparations or any other answer to racism cannot be complete until this report squarely faces the horrors of enslavement and the systemic discrimination that followed and persists today.

White supremacy—white supremacy is a system of belief and power that white people are superior to other races.[21] This report confronts the idea of white supremacy and the various forms that it takes. When discussing the concept of white supremacy, the report uses the term to refer to two concepts.

First, this report uses the terms "white supremacy" or "white supremacists" to identify groups or individuals who believe that white people are superior to people of other races. When used this way, "white supremacy" describes individual prejudice. Examples of white supremacist groups—including groups that exist to this day—include, for example, the Ku Klux Klan.[22]

Second, this report uses the term "white supremacy" in the American context to describe the racist premise upon which social and legal rules and practices are formed with the intention of discriminating or enacting violence against African Americans, among other marginalized groups.[23] This report also uses it to describe cultural images and stereotypes that reinforce prejudices against African Americans and others.[24] When used this way, white supremacy describes forms of racism that extend beyond individuals or organizations, a form of racism often described as structural or systemic racism.[25] As this report demonstrates, the fundamental political, social, and economic system of our country negatively impacts African Americans regardless of the intent of any one person to be racist.

This report does not use the term "white supremacy" to describe white people as a group, white Americans, or white Californians. Not all white people are white supremacists. Anyone, regardless of race, with or without intent, consciously or unconsciously, can engage in acts of white supremacy, or be a part of a racist system. A racist system harms all who live in it, even those who may have historically reaped the benefits of the system.[26]

Throughout the report, we use words that center the people discussed.

Rather than refer to "slaves," this report refers to "enslaved persons." Most historians now refer to "enslaved persons" instead of "slaves" because the term "slave" reduces the enslaved person to an object.[27] Instead, historians use "enslaved person" to grant agency and recognition to the enslaved individual and to remind us about the violence and inhumanity of slavery.[28]

For similar reasons, this report refers to "enslavers," rather than "owners" or "masters."[29] The words master or owner suggests a false sense of natural authority and suggest that the enslaved person is less capable than the enslaver.[30] It also hides the fact that these individuals actively chose to enslave other human beings who are—as they were then—entitled to the same human rights as themselves.

Instead of "fugitive," this report refers to "freedom-seekers" when describing enslaved persons or other people seeking to escape enslavement and other forms of captivity. The term "fugitive" was commonly used with laws such as the Fugitive Slave Laws of 1793 and 1850 passed by Congress, which used the term to reinforce the system of enslavement and criminalize those who sought freedom from it.[31]

Rather than refer to "felon" or "ex-offender," this report uses terms such as "formerly incarcerated" and "returning citizen." Similarly, this report uses terms such as "person in prison" or "incarcerated person," rather than "inmates." Like the term "fugitive," the terms "felon," "ex-offender," and "inmate" have stigmatized people who are or have once been in jail or prison.[32] By labeling people as nothing more than their criminal justice status, these words deny people their full personhood and reinforce a stigma that prevents people from fully participating in society.[33]

Instead of referring to people without homes as "the homeless," this report uses terms such as "unhoused people" or "people experiencing homelessness." This follows the practice of the Associated Press Style Guide, which recognized that the phrase "the homeless" dehumanizes people by collectively reducing them to a label based on housing status, rather than their status as people.[34]

African American—The Task Force voted to generally use "African American," rather than "Black" or "Black American" when discussing racial classifications. This term includes the descendants of enslaved people who were abducted from their African homelands by force to be enslaved in North America. This report uses "African American" instead of "Black" to refer to such persons, unless "Black" is in a quotation or the source cited or data being relied upon in the text exclusively uses "Black."

Descendant—The Task Force voted that eligibility for monetary reparations should be limited to those who are able to establish that they are a lineal descendant of an African American Chattel enslaved person or of a free African American person living in the United States prior to the end of the 19th Century.[35] When this report refers to "descendants," it refers to that group of eligible people as defined by the Task Force in that vote.

Though the report uses person-centered terms, the report may sometimes quote historical documents or statements that do not. This report presents these quotations unaltered to present them unfiltered and to provide historical context.

In using person-centered words, this report recognizes that words alone may not cure the wounds that people have suffered.[36] While words may not fix the systems they describe, this report uses these words, recognizing that they are the beginning—not the end—of what must be done to redress racism, past and present.

II. Enslavement

Nationally

America's wealth was built by the forced labor of trafficked African peoples and their descendants who were bought and sold as commodities.[37] American government at all levels allowed or participated in exploiting, abusing, terrorizing, and murdering people of African descent so that mostly white Americans could profit from their enslavement.[38]

After the War of Independence, the United States built one of the largest and most profitable enslaved labor economies in the world.[39]

The federal government politically and financially supported enslavement.[40] The United States adopted a national Constitution that protected slavery and gave pro-slavery white Americans outsized political power in the federal government.[41] Half of the nation's pre-Civil War presidents enslaved African Americans while in office,[42] and, throughout American history, more than 1,800 Congressmen from 40 states once enslaved African Americans.[43] By 1861, almost two percent of the entire budget of the United States went to pay for expenses related to enslavement,[44] including enforcing fugitive slave laws.[45]

Enslavers made more than $159 million between 1820 and 1860 by trafficking African Americans within the U.S.[46] Charles Ball, an enslaved man who was bought by slave traffickers in Maryland and forced to march to South Carolina, later remembered: "I seriously meditated on self-destruction, and had I been at liberty to get a rope, I believe I should have hanged myself at Lancaster. . . . I had now no hope of ever again seeing my wife and children, or of revisiting the scenes of my youth."[47]

Historians have argued that many of today's financial accounting and management practices developed among enslavers in the U.S. South and the Caribbean.[48] In order to continually increase production and profits, enslavers regularly staged public beatings and other violent acts and maintained deplorable living conditions.[49]

The American colonial Slave Codes created a new type of slavery that was different from the slavery which existed in pre-modern times.

- Babies were enslaved at birth, for their entire lives, and for the entire lives of their children, and their children's children.
- These laws denied political, legal, and social rights to free and enslaved Black people alike in order to more easily control enslaved people.
- These laws divided white people from Black people by making interracial marriage a crime.

Some of these laws survived well into the 20th century. The Supreme Court only declared that outlawing interracial marriage was unconstitutional in 1967.

Historians have also found evidence that enslavers raped and impregnated enslaved women and girls and profited from this sexual violence by owning and selling their own children.[50] President Thomas Jefferson, who enslaved four of his own children, wrote that the "labor of a breeding [enslaved] woman" who births a child every two years is as profitable as the best enslaved worker on the farm.[51]

In the census of 1860, the last census taken before the Civil War, of the about 12 million people living in the 15 slave-holding states, almost four million were enslaved.[52] In order to terrorize and force this enormous population to work without pay, the colonial and American governments created a different type of slavery.

Unlike slavery in some other locations, slavery in America was based on the idea that race was the sole basis for life-long enslavement, that children were enslaved from birth, and that people of African descent were naturally destined to be enslaved.[53] Colonists in North America claimed and passed laws[54] to maintain a false racial hierarchy where white people were naturally superior.[55] Colonial laws effectively made it legal for enslavers to kill the people they enslaved.[56] In some states, free and enslaved African Americans could not vote or hold political office.[57] Enslaved people could not resist a white person, leave a plantation without permission, or gather in large groups away from plantations.[58]

After the War of Independence, the American government continued to pass laws to maintain this false racial hierarchy which treated all African Americans as less than human.[59] After the Civil War, the federal government failed to meaningfully protect the rights and lives of African Americans.[60] When Andrew Johnson became president after the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, he proclaimed in 1866, "[t]his is a country for white men, and by God, as long as I am President, it shall be a government for white men[.]"[61]

The Slave Codes were reborn as the Black Codes and Jim Crow laws segregating African Americans and white Americans in every aspect of life.[62] Although many of these laws were most prominent in the U.S. South, they reflected a national desire to reinforce a racial hierarchy based in white supremacy.

California

Although California technically entered the Union in 1850 as a free state, its early state government supported slavery.[63] Proslavery white southerners held a great deal of power in the state legislature, the state court system, and among California's representatives in the U.S. Congress.[64]

Some scholars estimate that up to 1,500 enslaved African Americans lived in California in 1852.[65] Enslaved people trafficked to California often worked under dangerous conditions,[66] lived in unclean environments,[67] and faced brutal violence.[68]

In 1852, California passed and enforced a fugitive slave law that made California a more proslavery state than most other free states.[69] California also outlawed nonwhite people from testifying in any court case involving white people.[70]

California did not ratify the Fourteenth Amendment, which protected the equal rights of all citizens, until 1959 and did not ratify the Fifteenth Amendment, which prohibited states from denying a person's right to vote on the basis of race, until 1962.[71]

III. Racial Terror

Nationally

After slavery, white Americans, sometimes aided by the government, maintained the badges of slavery by carrying out violence and intimidation against African Americans for decades.[72] Racial terror pervaded every aspect of post-slavery life and prevented African Americans from building the same wealth and political influence as white Americans.[73]

African Americans faced threats of violence when they tried to vote, when they tried to buy homes in white neighborhoods, when they tried to swim in public pools, and when they tried to assert equal rights through the courts or in legislation.[74] White mobs bombed, murdered, and destroyed entire towns.[75] Federal, state, and local governments ignored the violence, failed to prosecute offenders, or participated in the violence themselves.[76]

Racial terror takes direct forms, such as physical assault, threats of injury, and destruction of property. It also inflicts psychological trauma on those who witness the harm and injury.[77] Many African Americans were traumatized from surviving mass violence and by the constant terror of living in the U.S. South.[78] Lynchings in the American South were not isolated hate crimes committed by rogue vigilantes, but part of a systematic campaign of terror to enforce the racial hierarchy.[79]

Racial terror targeted at successful African Americans has contributed to the present wealth gap between African Americans and white Americans.[80]

While lynching and mob murders are no longer socially acceptable, scholars have argued that its modern equivalents continue to haunt African Americans today in the form of extrajudicial killings by the police and vigilantes.[81] Racial terror remains a tool for other forms of discrimination and control of African Americans, from redlining and segregated schools to disparate healthcare and denial of bank loans.

California

Supported by their state and local governments, Californians also terrorized and murdered African Americans in Californian.[82] The Ku Klux Klan (KKK) established chapters all over the state in the 1920s.[83] During that time, California sometimes held more KKK events per year than even Mississippi or Louisiana.[84] Many of California's KKK members were prominent individuals who held positions in civic leadership and police departments.[85]

For example, in Los Angeles in the 1920s, numerous prominent residents and city government officials were KKK members or had KKK ties, including the mayor, district attorneys, and police officers.[86] Violence against African American homeowners in California peaked in the 1940s, as more African Americans bought—or attempted to buy—homes in white neighborhoods across California.[87]

Today, police violence against and extrajudicial killings of African Americans occur in California in the same manner as they do in the rest of the country.[88]

IV. Political Disenfranchisement

Nationally

African Americans have pursued equal political participation since before the Civil War, but the federal, state, and local governments of the United States have suppressed and continue to suppress African American votes and political power.[89] After the Civil War, the United States protected the voting rights of African Americans on paper, but not in reality.[90] During the 12-year period after the Civil War called Reconstruction, the federal government tried to give newly freed African Americans access to basic civil rights,[91] and by 1868, more than 700,000 Black men were registered to vote in the South.[92] During Reconstruction, over 1,400 African Americans held federal, state, or local office, and more than 600 served in state assemblies.[93] However, progress was short lived.

COURTESY OF LOS ANGELES EXAMINER/USC LIBRARIES/CORBIS VIA GETTY IMAGES

Rayfield Lundy, Republican candidate for the California 55th Assembly District inspects a burnt cross at 1816 East 122nd Street, Los Angeles, California. (1952)

During the contested presidential election of 1876, Republicans and Democrats agreed to withdraw federal troops from key locations in the U.S. South, effectively ending Reconstruction.[94] Southern states then willfully ignored the voting protections in the U.S. Constitution, and passed literacy tests, poll taxes, challenger laws, grandfather clauses, and other devices to prevent African Americans from voting.[95] States also barred African Americans from serving on juries.[96]

This targeted government action stripped African Americans of the political power they gained during Reconstruction. For example, in 1867, African American turnout was 90 percent in Virginia.[97] After Virginia's voter suppression laws took effect, the number of African American voters dropped from 147,000 to 21,000.[98] During Reconstruction, 16 African American men held seats in Congress.[99] From 1901 until the 1970s, not a single African American served in Congress.[100]

These government actions returned white supremacists to power in local, state, and federal government.[101] Historians have argued that racist lawmakers elected from the Southern states blocked hundreds of federal civil rights laws[102] and rewrote many of the country's most important pieces of legislation to exclude or discriminate against African Americans.[103]

For example, the New Deal, a series of federal laws and policies designed to pull America out of the Great Depression, created the modern white middle class and many of the programs that Americans depend upon today, such as Social Security.[104] But the New Deal excluded African Americans from many of its benefits.[105]

Historians have argued that Southern lawmakers ensured that the GI Bill was administered by states instead of the federal government to guarantee that states could direct its funds mostly to white veterans.[106] Similarly, in order to secure the support of white southern lawmakers, Congress included segregation clauses or rejected anti-discrimination clauses in the Hill Burton Act of 1946, which paid for our modern healthcare infrastructure, and in the Housing Act of 1949, which helped white Americans buy single family homes.[107] These federal legislative decisions perpetuated the racial hierarchy which continues today.

California

California also passed and enforced laws to prevent African Americans from accumulating political power.[108]

California's law prohibiting non-white witnesses from testifying against white Californians protected white defendants from justice.[109] The California Supreme Court warned that allowing any non-white person to testify "would admit them to all the equal rights of citizenship, and we might soon see them at the polls, in the jury box, upon the bench, and in our legislative halls."[110]

California did not allow African American men to vote until 1879.[111] The state also passed many of the voter suppression laws that were used in the South.[112] California prohibited individuals convicted of felonies from voting,[113] added a poll tax,[114] and put in place a literacy test.[115]

V. Housing Segregation

Nationally

America's racial hierarchy was the foundation of a system of segregation in the United States after the Civil War.[116] The aim of segregation was not only to separate, but also to force African Americans to live in worse conditions in nearly every aspect of life.[117]

Government actors, working with private individuals, actively segregated America into African American and white neighborhoods.[118] Although this system of segregation was called Jim Crow in the South, it existed by less obvious, yet effective, means throughout the entire country, including in California.[119]

During enslavement, about 90 percent of African Americans were forced to live in the South.[120] Immediately after the Civil War, the country was racially and geographically configured in ways that were different from the way it is segregated today.[121] Throughout the 20th century, American federal, state, and local municipal governments expanded and solidified segregation efforts through zoning ordinances, slum clearance policies, construction of parks and freeways through the middle of African American neighborhoods, and public housing siting decisions.[122] Courts enforced racially restrictive covenants and prevented homes from being sold to African Americans until the late 1940s.[123]

The federal government used redlining to deny African Americans equal access to the capital needed to buy a single-family home at the same time that it subsidized white Americans' efforts to own the same type of home.[124] As President Herbert Hoover stated in 1931, single-family homes were "expressions of racial longing" and "[t]hat our people should live in their own homes is a sentiment deep in the heart of our race."[125]

The passage of the Fair Housing Act in 1968 outlawed housing discrimination, but did not fix the structures put in place by 100 years of discriminatory government policies; residential segregation continues today.[126]

The average urban African American person in 1890 lived in a neighborhood that was only 27 percent African American.[127] In 2019, America is as segregated as it was in the 1940s, with the average urban African American living in a neighborhood that is 44 percent African American.[128] Better jobs, tax dollars, municipal services, healthy environments, good schools, access to health care, and grocery stores have followed white residents to the suburbs, leaving concentrated poverty, underfunded schools, collapsing infrastructure, polluted water and air, crime, and food deserts in segregated inner city neighborhoods.[129]

California

In California, the federal, state, and local governments created segregation through redlining, zoning ordinances, school and highway siting decisions, and discriminatory federal mortgage policy.[130] California's "sundown towns," like most of the suburbs of Los Angeles and San Francisco, prohibited African Americans from living in towns throughout the state.[131]

The federal government financed many whites-only neighborhoods throughout the state.[132] The federal Home Owners' Loan Corporation maps used in redlining described many Californian neighborhoods in racially discriminatory terms.[133] For example, in San Diego there were "servant's areas" of La Jolla and several areas "restricted to the Caucasian race."[134]

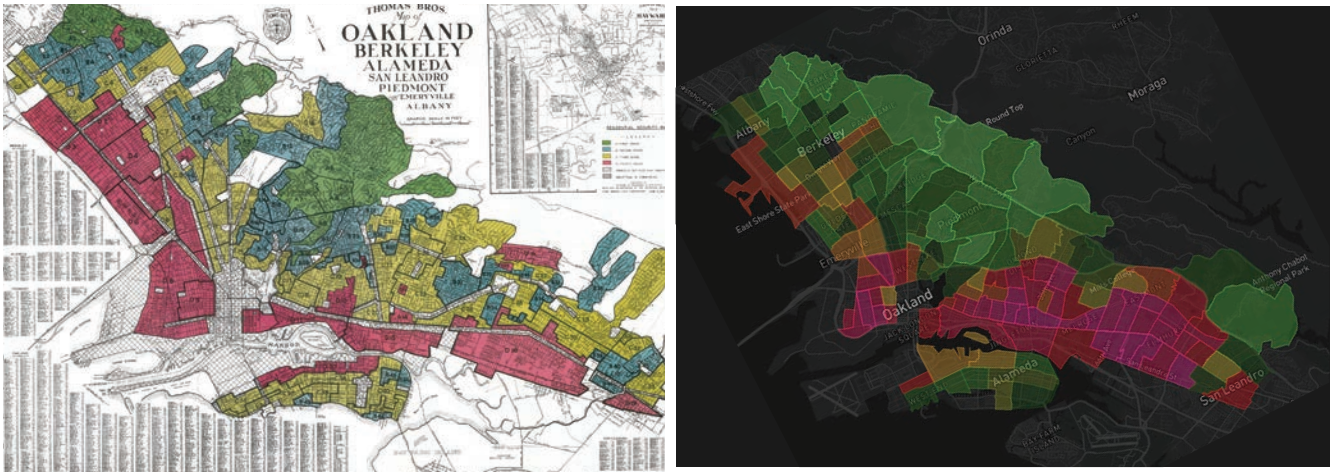
During World War II, the federal government paid to build segregated housing for defense workers in Northern California.[135] Housing for white workers was more likely to be better constructed and permanent.[136] While white workers lived in rooms paid for by the federal government, African American war workers lived in cardboard shacks, barns, tents, or open fields.[137]

Racially-restrictive covenants, which were clauses in property deeds that usually allowed only white residents to live on the property described in the deed, were commonplace and California courts enforced them until at least the 1940s.[138]

Numerous neighborhoods around the state rezoned African American neighborhoods for industrial use to keep out white residents[139] or adopted zoning ordinances to ban apartment buildings to try and keep out African American residents.[140]

State agencies demolished thriving African American neighborhoods in the name of urban renewal and park construction.[141] Operating under a state law for urban redevelopment, the City of San Francisco declared that the Western Addition, a predominately African American neighborhood, was blighted, and destroyed the Fillmore, San Francisco's most prominent African American neighborhood and business district.[142] In doing so, the City of San Francisco closed 883 businesses, displaced 4,729 households, destroyed 2,500 Victorian homes,[143] and damaged the lives of nearly 20,000 people.[144] It then left the land empty for many years.[145]

COURTESY OF "NOT EVEN PAST: SOCIAL VULNERABILITY AND THE LEGACY OF REDLINING"/ HTTPS://DSL.RICHMOND.EDU/SOCIALVULNERABILITY



The image on the left shows a redlining map of Oakland, CA, made by the Home Owners Loan Corporation during the 1930s. The red portions are non-white neighborhoods deemed by the federal agency to be a credit risk. The map on the right shows the Center for Disease Control's Social Vulnerability Index scores for census tracts today. The Social Vulnerability Index is widely used to assess a community's capacity to prepare for, respond to, and recover from human and natural disasters. The red portion indicates the highest level of vulnerability to disasters.

VI. Separate and Unequal Education

Nationally

Through much of American history, enslavers and the white political ruling class in America falsely believed it was in their best interest to deny education to African Americans in order to dominate and control them.[146] Enslaving states denied education to nearly all enslaved people, while the North and Midwest segregated their schools and limited or denied education access to freed African Americans.[147]

After slavery, southern states maintained the racial hierarchy by legally segregating African American and white children, and white-controlled legislatures funded African American public schools far less than white public schools.[148] In 1889, an Alabama state legislator stated, "[e]ducation would spoil a good plow hand."[149] African American teachers received lower wages, and African American children received fewer months of schooling per year and fewer years of schooling per lifetime than white children.[150]

Contrary to what most Americans are taught, the U.S. Supreme Court's landmark 1954 case Brown v. Board of Education, which established that racial segregation in public schools is unconstitutional, did not mark the end of segregation.[151]

Nationally, nonwhite school districts get

$23 Billion LESS

than predominantly white districts

After Brown v. Board, many white people and white-dominated school boards throughout the country actively resisted integration.[152] In the South, segregation was still in place through the early 1970s due to massive resistance by white communities.[153] In the rest of the country, including California, education segregation occurred when governments supported residential segregation coupled with school assignment and siting policies.[154] Because children attended the schools in their neighborhood and school financing was tied to property taxes, most African American children attended segregated schools with less funding and resources than schools attended by white children.[155]

In 1974, the U.S. Supreme Court allowed this type of school segregation to continue in schools if it reflected residential segregation patterns between the city and the suburbs.[156] In part, as a result of this decision and other U.S. Supreme Court decisions that followed, many public schools in the United States never integrated in the first place or were integrated and subsequently re-segregated.

California

In 1874, the California Supreme Court ruled that segregation in the state's public schools was legal,[157] a decision that predated the U.S. Supreme Court's infamous "separate but equal" case, Plessy v. Ferguson, by 22 years.[158]

In 1966, as the South was in the process of desegregating, 85 percent of African American students in California attended predominantly minority schools, and only 12 percent of African American students and 39 percent of white students attended racially balanced schools.[159] Like in the South, white Californians fought desegregation and, in a number of school districts, courts had to order districts to desegregate.[160] Any progress attained through court-enforced desegregation was short-lived. Throughout the mid- to late-1970s, courts overturned, limited, or ignored desegregation orders in many California districts, as the U.S. Supreme Court and Congress limited methods to integrate schools.[161] In 1979, California passed Proposition 1, which further limited desegregation efforts tied to busing.[162]

In the vast majority of California school districts, schools either re-segregated or were never integrated, so segregated schooling persists today. California is the sixth-most segregated state in the country for African American students.[163] In California's highly segregated schools, schools mostly attended by white and Asian children receive more funding and resources than schools mostly attended by African American and Latino children.[164]

VII. Racism in Environment and Infrastructure

Nationally

Due to residential segregation, African Americans have lived in poor-quality housing throughout American history, exposing them to disproportionate amounts of lead poisoning and increasing their risks of infectious disease.[165] Segregated African American neighborhoods have more exposure to hazardous waste, oil and gas production, and automobile and diesel fumes, and are more likely to have inadequate public services like sewage lines and water pipes.[166] African Americans are more vulnerable than white Americans to the dangerous effects of extreme weather patterns like heat waves, worsened by the effects of climate change.[167]

California

National patterns are replicated in California. African Americans in California are more likely than white Californians to live in overcrowded housing and near hazardous waste.[168] African American neighborhoods are more likely to lack tree canopy[169] and suffer from the consequences of water[170] and air pollution.[171] For instance, African American neighborhoods in the San Joaquin Valley were historically denied access to clean water.[172]

VIII. Pathologizing the African American Family

Nationally

Government policies and practices have destroyed African American families throughout American history. After the Civil War, southern state governments re-enslaved children by making them "apprentices" and forcing them to labor for white Americans, who were sometimes their former enslavers.[173] In the past century, both financial assistance and child welfare systems have based decisions on racist beliefs about African Americans, which continue to operate as badges of slavery.[174]

Government-issued financial assistance has excluded African Americans from receiving benefits. In the early 1900s, state governments made support payments every month to low income single mothers to assist them with the expenses incurred while raising children.[175] African American families were generally excluded, despite their greater need.[176]

Scholars have found that racial discrimination exists at every stage of the child welfare process.[177] Comparing equally poor African American and white families, studies have found that even with families considered to be at equal risk for future abuse, state agencies are more likely to remove African American children from their families than remove white children from their families.[178]

As of 2019, African American children make up 14 percent of American children, but 23 percent of children in foster care.[179] Studies have shown that this is likely not because African American parents mistreat their children more often, but rather due to poverty and racist systems.[180]

Meanwhile, the criminal and juvenile justice systems have intensified these harms to African American families by imprisoning large numbers of African American youth and separating African American families.[181]

California

Trends in California match those in the rest of the country. Recent California Attorney General investigations have found several school districts that punished African American students at higher rates than students of other races.[182] A 2015 study ranked California among the five worst states in foster care racial disparities.[183] African American children in California make up approximately 22 percent of the foster population, while making up only six percent of the general child population,[184] a disparity far higher than the disparity in national percentages.[185] Some counties in California—both urban and rural—have much higher disparities compared to the statewide average. In San Francisco County, which is largely urban and has around 800,000 residents, the percentage of African American children in foster care in 2018 was over 25 times the rate of white children.[186]

IX. Control Over Creative, Cultural, & Intellectual Life

Nationally

During slavery, state governments controlled and dictated the forms and content of African American artistic and cultural production.[187] After the Civil War, governments and politicians embraced minstrelsy, which was the popular racist and stereotypical depiction of African Americans through song, dance, and film.[188] Federal and state governments failed to protect African American artists, culture-makers, and media-makers from discrimination and simultaneously promoted discriminatory narratives.[189]

Federal and state governments allowed white Americans to steal African American art and culture with impunity—depriving African American creators of valuable copyright and patent protections.[190] State governments denied African American entrepreneurs and culture-makers access to leisure sites, business licenses, and funding for leisure activities.[191] State governments memorialized the Confederacy as just and heroic through monument building, while suppressing the nation's history of racism and slavery.[192] States censored cinematic depictions of discrimination against and integration of African Americans into white society.[193]

California

In California, city governments decimated thriving African American neighborhoods with vibrant artistic communities, like the Fillmore in San Francisco.[194] Local governments in California have discriminated against, punished, and penalized African American students for their fashion, hairstyle, and appearance.[195] State-funded California museums have excluded African American art from their institutions.[196] California has criminalized African American rap artists, as California courts have allowed rap lyrics to be used as evidence related to street gang activity.[197] California has also been home to numerous racist monuments and memorials for centuries.[198]

X. Stolen Labor and Hindered Opportunity

Nationally

During slavery, the labor of enslaved African Americans built the infrastructure of the nation, filled the nation's coffers, and produced its main agricultural products for domestic consumption and export.[199] Since then, federal, state, and local government actions directly segregated and discriminated against African Americans.[200] In 1913, President Woodrow Wilson officially segregated much of the federal workforce.[201] While African Americans have consistently served in the military since the very beginning of the country, the military has historically paid African American soldiers less than white soldiers and often deemed African Americans unfit for service until the military needed them to fight.[202]

Federal laws have also protected white workers while denying the same protections to African American workers, setting up and allowing private discrimination.[203]

According to one meta-study, from 1989 to 2014, employment discrimination against African Americans had not decreased.

Approximately 85 percent of all African American workers in the United States at the time were excluded from the labor protections passed in the 1938 Fair Labor Standards Act—protections like federal minimum wage, the maximum number of working hours before overtime pay is required, and limits on child labor.[204] The Act essentially outlawed child labor in industrial settings, where most white children worked at the time, and allowed child labor in agricultural and domestic work, where most African American children worked.[205]

Although federal and state laws like the Federal Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the California Fair Employment and Housing Act of 1959 prohibit discrimination, enforcement is slow and spotty.[206] Federal and state policies like affirmative action produced mixed results and were short lived.[207] African Americans continue to face employment discrimination today.[208]

California

Several California cities did not hire African American workers until the 1940s, and certain public sectors continued to avoid hiring African American workers even in 1970.[209] The San Francisco Fire Department, for example, had no African American firefighters before 1955, and by 1970, when African American residents made up 14 percent of the city's population, only four of the Department's 1,800 uniformed firefighters were African American.[210] During the New Deal, several California cities invoked city ordinances to prevent African American federal workers from working within their cities.[211] Labor unions excluded African American workers in California.[212] Today, by some measures, two of California's major industries, Hollywood and Silicon Valley, employ disproportionately fewer African Americans.[213]

XI. An Unjust Legal System

Nationally

American government at all levels criminalized African Americans for the purposes of social control, and to maintain an economy based on exploited African American labor.[214]

After the Civil War, and throughout legal segregation, states passed numerous laws that criminalized African Americans when they performed everyday tasks, like stepping into the same waiting rooms as white Americans at bus stations or walking into a park for white people.[215]

In the South, until the 1940s, African American men and boys were arrested on vagrancy charges or minor violations, fined, and forced to pay off their fine in a new system of de facto enslavement called convict leasing.[216] In the words of the Supreme Court of Virginia, they were "slaves of the state."[217]

COURTESY OF THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

The convict leasing system in the South re-enslaved thousands of African American men and boys through the use of trumped up charges. (1903)

During the "tough on crime" and "War on Drugs" era, politicians continued to criminalize African Americans to win elections. President Richard Nixon's domestic policy advisor explained that by "getting the public to associate the hippies with marijuana and blacks with heroin, and then criminalizing both heavily, [the Nixon White House] could disrupt those communities. . . . Did we know we were lying about the drugs? Of course we did."[218]

The criminalization of African Americans is an enduring badge of slavery and has contributed to the over-policing of African American neighborhoods, the school to prison pipeline, the mass incarceration of African Americans, and other inequities in nearly every corner of the American legal system.[219]

It has also led to a rejection by police and mainstream media of accepting African Americans as victims. Law enforcement poorly investigates or ignores crimes against African American women.[220] African American children on average remain missing longer and are more likely to be missing than non-African American children.[221]

The American criminal justice system overall physically harms, imprisons, and kills African Americans more than other racial groups relative to their percentage of the population.[222] While constitutional amendments[223] and federal civil rights laws[224] have tried to remedy these injustices, scholars have argued that the U.S. criminal justice system is a new iteration of legal segregation.[225]

California

Like the rest of the country, California police stop, shoot, kill, and imprison more African Americans than their share of the population.[226] Police officers reported ultimately taking no action during a stop most frequently when stopping a person they perceived to be African American, suggesting there may have been no legitimate basis for the stop.[227] Additionally, a 2020 study showed that racial discrimination is an "ever-present" feature of jury selection in California.[228] The lingering effects of California's punitive criminal justice policies, such as the state's three-strikes law, have resulted in large numbers of African Americans in prisons and jails.[229]

XII. Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect

Nationally

The government actions described in this report have had a devastating effect on the health of African Americans. Compared to white Americans, African Americans live shorter lives and are more likely to suffer and die from almost all diseases and medical conditions than white Americans.[230] When they are hospitalized, African American patients with heart disease receive older, cheaper, and more conservative treatments than their white counterparts.[231]

Researchers have found that by some measures, this health gap has grown and cannot be explained by poverty alone,[232] as middle- and upper-class African Americans also manifest high rates of chronic illness and disability.[233] Researchers have linked these health outcomes in part to African Americans' unrelenting experience of racism in our society.[234] Research suggests that race-related stress may have a greater impact on health among African Americans than diet, exercise, smoking, or income status.[235]

In addition to physical harm, African Americans experience anger, anxiety, paranoia, helplessness, hopelessness, frustration, resentment, fear, lowered self-esteem, and lower levels of psychological functioning as a result of racism.[236] These feelings can profoundly undermine African American children's emotional and physical well-being and their academic success.[237]

California

These measures are similar in California. The life expectancy of an average African American Californian was 75.1 years, six years shorter than the state average.[238] African American babies are more likely to die in infancy, and African American mothers giving birth die at a rate almost four times higher than the average Californian mother.[239] Compared with white Californians, African American Californians are more likely to have diabetes, die from cancer, or be hospitalized for heart disease.[240]

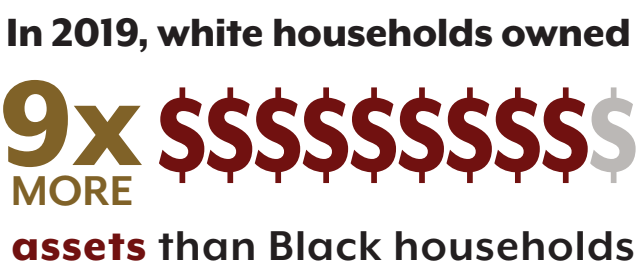
African American Californians suffer from high rates of serious psychological distress, depression, suicidal ideation, and other mental health issues.[241] Unmet mental health needs are higher among African American Californians, as compared with white Californians, including lack of access to mental healthcare and substance abuse services.[242] African American Californians have the highest rates of attempted suicide among all racial groups.[243]

XIII. The Wealth Gap

Nationally

As described in further detail throughout this report, government policies perpetuating badges of slavery have helped white Americans accumulate wealth, while erecting barriers which prevented African Americans from doing the same.

Federal and California Homesteading Acts essentially gave away hundreds of millions of acres of land almost for free, mostly to white families.[244] Today, as many as 46 million of their living descendants, approximately one-quarter of the adult population of the United States, reap the wealth benefits of these laws.[245] In the 1930s and 1940s, the federal government created programs that subsidized low-cost loans, which allowed millions of average white Americans to own their homes for the first time.[246] Of the $120 billion worth of new housing subsidized between 1934 and 1962, less than two percent went to nonwhite families.[247] Other bedrocks of the American middle class, like Social Security and the GI Bill, also mostly excluded African Americans.[248] The federal tax structure has in the past and continues today to discriminate against African Americans.[249]



These harms have compounded over generations, resulting in an enormous wealth gap that is the same today as it had been two years before the Civil Rights Act was passed in 1964.[250] In 2019, the median African American household had a net worth of $24,100, 13 percent of the median net worth of white households at $188,200.[251] This wealth gap persists regardless of education level and family structure and across all income levels.[252]

California

The wealth gap exists in similar ways in California. A 2014 study of the Los Angeles metro area found that the median value of liquid assets for native born African American households was $200, compared to $110,000 for white households.[253]

California's homestead laws similarly excluded African Americans before 1900 because they required a homesteader to be white.[254] Throughout the 20th century, federal, state and local governments in California erected barriers to African American homeownership and supported or directly prohibited African Americans from living in suburban neighborhoods.[255] Californians passed Proposition 209 in 1996, which prohibited the consideration of race in state contracting.[256] One study has estimated that, as a result of Proposition 209, minority- and women-owned business enterprises have lost about $1 billion.[257]

Key Findings of Part I

- In order to maintain slavery, colonial and American governments adopted white supremacist beliefs and passed laws in order to maintain a system that stole the labor and intellect of people of African descent. This system was maintained by and financially benefited the entire United States of America and its territories.

- This system of white supremacy is a badge of slavery and continues to be embedded today in numerous American and Californian legal and social systems. Throughout American history, this system has been upheld by federal, state, and local laws and policies and by violence and terror. All over the country, but particularly in the South during the era of legal segregation, federal, state, and local governments directly engaged in, supported, or failed to protect African Americans from the violence and terror aimed to subjugate African Americans.

- These government actions and derelictions of duty caused compounding physical and psychological injury for generations. In California, racial violence against African Americans began during slavery, continued through the 1920s, as groups like the Ku Klux Klan permeated local governments and police departments, and peaked after World War II, as African Americans attempted to move into white neighborhoods.

- After the Civil War, African Americans briefly won political power during Reconstruction. In response, southern states responded by systematically stripping African Americans of their power to vote. Racist lawmakers elected from southern states blocked hundreds of federal civil rights laws and edited important legislation to exclude or discriminate against African Americans, harming African American Californians.

- Government actors, working with private individuals, actively segregated America into African American and white neighborhoods. In California, federal, state, and local governments created segregation where none had previously existed through discriminatory federal housing policies, zoning ordinances, school siting decisions, and discriminatory federal mortgage policies known as redlining. Funded by the federal government, the California state and local government also destroyed African American homes and communities through park and highway construction, urban renewal, and by other means.

- Enslavers denied education to enslaved people in order to control them. Throughout American history, African American students across the country and in California have attended schools with less funding and resources than white students. After slavery, southern states passed laws to prevent African American and white students from attending the same schools. Throughout the country, children went to the school in their neighborhoods, so education segregation was created by residential segregation. Many public schools in the United States never integrated in the first place or were integrated and then re-segregated. Today, California is the sixth most segregated state in the country for African American students, who attend schools with less funding and resources than white students.

- Due to residential segregation, African Americans—compared to white Americans—are more likely to live in worse quality housing and in polluted neighborhoods with inadequate infrastructure. African American Californians face similar harms.

- Government-issued financial assistance has historically excluded African Americans from receiving benefits. The current child welfare systems in the country and in California operate on harmful and false racial stereotypes of African Americans. This has resulted in extremely high rates of African American children removed from their families, even though African American parents generally do not mistreat their children at higher rates than white parents.

- Federal and state governments, including California, failed to protect African American artists, culture-makers, and media-makers from discrimination and simultaneously promoted discriminatory narratives. State governments memorialized the Confederacy as just and heroic through monument building, while suppressing the nation's history of racism and slavery.

- Federal, state, and local government actions, including in California, have directly segregated and discriminated against African Americans at work. Federal and state policies like affirmative action produced mixed results and were short lived. African Americans continue to face employment discrimination today in the country and in California.

- American government at all levels, including in California, have historically criminalized African Americans for the purposes of social control, and to maintain an economy based on exploited African American labor. This criminalization is an enduring badge of slavery and has contributed to the over-policing of African American neighborhoods, the school to prison pipeline, the mass incarceration of African Americans, a refusal to accept African Americans as victims, and other inequities in nearly every corner of the American and California legal systems. As a result, the American and California criminal justice system physically harms, imprisons, and kills African Americans more than other racial groups relative to their percentage of the population.

- The government actions described in this report have had a devastating effect on the health of African Americans in the country and in California. Compared to white Americans, African Americans live shorter lives and are more likely to suffer and die from almost all diseases and medical conditions than white Americans. Researchers have linked these health outcomes in part to African Americans' unrelenting experience of racism. In addition to physical harm, African Americans experience psychological harm, which can profoundly undermine African American children's emotional and physical well-being and their academic success.

- Government laws and policies perpetuating badges of slavery have helped white Americans accumulate wealth, while erecting barriers which prevented African Americans from doing the same. These harms compounded over generations, resulting in an enormous gap in wealth today between white Americans and African Americans in the nation and in California.

PART II: INTERNATIONAL PRINCIPLES OF REPARATION AND EXAMPLES OF REPARATIVE EFFORTS

XIV. International Reparations Framework

AB 3121 requires the recommendations from the Reparations Task Force to "comport with international standards of remedy for wrongs and injuries caused by the state, that include full reparations and special measures, as understood by various relevant international protocols, laws, and findings."[258]

COURTESY OF JOHANNES SIMON VIA GETTY IMAGES

The United Nations emblem is seen in front of the United Nations Office (UNOG) in Geneva, Switzerland. (2008)

The United Nations Principles on Reparation set forth a legal framework for providing full and effective reparations to victims of gross violations of international human rights law and serious violations of international humanitarian law.[259] The framework takes an expansive view of what it means to be a victim. The framework does not define the violations it covers, but the International Commission of Jurists has explained that they are the "types of violations that affect in qualitative and quantitative terms the most basic rights of human beings, notably the right to life and the right to physical and moral integrity of the human person."[260] Examples include genocide, slavery and slave trade, murder, enforced disappearances, torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, and systematic racial discrimination.[261] The Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide separately defines "genocide."[262]

According to the international legal framework established by the United Nations Principles on Reparation, a full and effective reparations program must include all of the following: (1) Restitution; (2) Compensation; (3) Rehabilitation; (4) Satisfaction; and (5) Guarantees of non-repetition.[263] The Task Force has sought to ensure that each of these components is addressed in its recommendations to the Legislature in this report, and reiterates to the Legislature that recommendations addressing each component would need to be implemented in order to achieve a reparations plan that complies with the international standard for reparations.

Restitution

"Restitution should, whenever possible, restore the victim to the original situation before the gross violations of international human rights law or serious violations of international humanitarian law occurred. Restitution includes, as appropriate: restoration of liberty, enjoyment of human rights, identity, family life and citizenship, return to one's place of residence, restoration of employment and return of property."[264]

According to the International Commission of Jurists' (ICJ) interpretation of the U.N. Principles on Reparation, where the state can return a victim to the status quo, the state has "an obligation to ensure measures for its restoration."[265] However, even though restitution is considered the primary form of reparation, the ICJ acknowledges that "in practice," restitution "is the least frequent, because it is mostly impossible to completely return [a victim] to the situation [they were in] before the violation, especially because of the moral damage caused to victims and their relatives."[266] So, the ICJ specifies that where complete restitution is not possible, as will often be the case, the state must "take measures to achieve a status as approximate as possible."[267] In situations where even this is not feasible, "the State has to provide compensation covering the damage arisen from the loss of the status quo ante."[268]

In order to satisfy this component of the international standards for an effective reparations program, the Task Force offers recommendations to the Legislature in Part IV of this report regarding how to appropriately calculate restitution for the whole class of individuals determined to be eligible for reparations.

Compensation

Compensation should be provided for any economically assessable damage, as appropriate and proportional to the gravity of the violation and the circumstances of each case, resulting from gross violations of international human rights law and serious violations of international humanitarian law, such as:

a. Physical or mental harm;

b. Lost opportunities, including employment, education and social benefits;

c. Material damages and loss of earnings, including loss of earning potential;

d. Moral damage;

e. Costs required for legal or expert assistance, medicine and medical services, and psychological and social services.[269]

According to the ICJ's interpretation of the U.N. Principles on Reparation, compensation is to be understood "as the specific form of reparation seeking to provide economic or monetary awards for certain losses, be they of material or immaterial, of pecuniary or non-pecuniary nature."[270] The ICJ highlights how compensation has been awarded by claims commissions for claims of "material and immaterial damage" and especially those involving "wrongful death or deprivation of liberty."[271] The United Nations has recognized a right to compensation "even where it is not explicitly mentioned" in a particular treaty, and the Human Rights Committee "recommends, as a matter of practice, that States should award compensation."[272] The basis for this recommendation comes from Article 2(3)(a) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.[273] International jurisprudence divides compensation into "material damages" and "moral damages."[274] Material damages include, among other types, loss of actual or future earnings, loss of movable and immovable property, and legal costs.[275] Moral damages include physical and mental harm.[276]

"Rehabilitation should include medical and psychological care as well as legal and social services."

In order to satisfy this component of the international standards for an effective reparations program, the Task Force offers recommendations to the Legislature in Part IV of this report regarding how to appropriately compensate those who are able to demonstrate that they have suffered specific compensable injuries.

Rehabilitation

"Rehabilitation should include medical and psychological care as well as legal and social services." [277] According to the ICJ's interpretation of the U.N. Principles on Reparation, "victims are entitled to rehabilitation of their dignity, their social situation and their legal situation, and their vocational situation."[278] The ICJ also highlighted the Convention Against Torture's assessment on what constitutes rehabilitation.[279] Accordingly, "rehabilitation must be specific to the victim, based on an independent, holistic and professional evaluation of the individual's needs, and ensure that the victim participates in the choice of service providers."[280] Furthermore, "the obligation to provide the means for as full rehabilitation as possible may not be postponed and does not depend on the available resources of the State."[281] Finally, rehabilitation "should include a wide range of inter-disciplinary services, such as medical and psychological care, as well as legal and social services, community and family-oriented assistance and services; vocational training and education," and "rectification of criminal records" or "invalidation of unlawful convictions."[282]

In order to satisfy this component of the international standards for an effective reparations program, the Task Force offers recommendations to the Legislature in Part V of this report regarding a wide variety of statutory and regulatory changes that the Legislature should enact in order to support rehabilitation of those eligible for the recommended programs.

Satisfaction

Under the U.N. Principles on Reparation, satisfaction should include, where applicable, any or all of the following:

a. Effective measures aimed at the cessation of continuing violations;

b. Verification of the facts and full and public disclosure of the truth to the extent that such disclosure does not cause further harm or threaten the safety and interests of the victim, the victim's relatives, witnesses, or persons who have intervened to assist the victim or prevent the occurrence of further violations;

c. The search for the whereabouts of the disappeared, for the identities of the children abducted, and for the bodies of those killed, and assistance in the recovery, identification and reburial of the bodies in accordance with the expressed or presumed wish of the victims, or the cultural practices of the families and communities;

d. An official declaration or a judicial decision restoring the dignity, the reputation and the rights of the victim and of persons closely connected with the victim;

e. Public apology, including acknowledgment of the facts and acceptance of responsibility;

f. Judicial and administrative sanctions against persons liable for the violations;

g. Commemorations and tributes to the victims;

h. Inclusion of an accurate account of the violations that occurred in international human rights law and international humanitarian law training and in educational material at all levels. [283]

According to the ICJ's interpretation of the U.N. Principles on Reparation, satisfaction is a "non-financial form of reparation for moral damage or damage to the dignity or reputation" that has "been recognized by the International Court of Justice."[284] Satisfaction can take the form of a condemnatory judgment, or the acknowledgment of truth, as well as the acknowledgment of responsibility and fault.[285] The ICJ also held that satisfaction includes "the punishment of the authors of the violation."[286] Furthermore, "the U.N. Updated Principles on Impunity recommend that the final report of truth commissions be made public in full."[287] This is supported by the U.N. Human Rights Commission's resolution on impunity which recognizes that "for the victims of human rights violations, public knowledge of their suffering and the truth about the perpetrators, including their accomplices, of these violations are essential steps towards rehabilitation and reconciliation."[288]

Another important factor for satisfaction is a "public apology" and a "public commemoration."[289] A public apology helps "in restoring the honour, reputation or dignity of a [victim]."[290] The public commemoration "is particularly important in cases of violations of the rights of groups or a high number of persons, sometimes not individually identified, or in cases of violations that occurred a long time in the past."[291] A public commemoration "in these cases has a symbolic value and constitutes a measure of reparation for current but also future generations."[292]

Satisfaction can take the form of a condemnatory judgment or the acknowledgment of truth, as well as the acknowledgment of responsibility and fault.

In order to satisfy this component of the international standards for an effective reparations program, the Task Force offers recommendations to the Legislature in Part III of this report, regarding the manner and scope of a formal apology, and in Part V of this report, regarding a variety of statutory and regulatory changes that should be enacted by the Legislature to achieve satisfaction. These recommendations are based on the fulsome accounting in Part I of this report, that addresses the need for a "full and public disclosure of the truth."[293] Additionally, Part VII of this report serves as a first step toward a more comprehensive program of a "full and public disclosure of the truth"[294] by bringing forward data and elevating the stories regarding the harms suffered by the community. Part VIII of this report offers recommendations to the Legislature that would ensure that the public is educated about, and the steps needed to collectively redress, the harms. And finally, Part IX of this report offers a detailed accounting of the legal methods used to perpetuate a system of unequal justice, which the Task Force recommends the Legislature dismantle in order to ensure satisfaction.

Guarantees of Non-Repetition

Under the U.N. Principles on Reparation, guarantees of non-repetition should include, where applicable, any or all of the following measures:

a. Ensuring effective civilian control of military and security forces;

b. Ensuring that all civilian and military proceedings abide by international standards of due process, fairness and impartiality;

c. Strengthening the independence of the judiciary;

d. Protecting persons in the legal, medical and health-care professions, the media and other related professions, and human rights defenders;

e. Providing, on a priority and continued basis, human rights and international humanitarian law education to all sectors of society and training for law enforcement officials as well as military and security forces;

f. Promoting the observance of codes of conduct and ethical norms, in particular international standards, by public servants, including law enforcement, correctional, media, medical, psychological, social service and military personnel, as well as by economic enterprises;

g. Promoting mechanisms for preventing and monitoring social conflicts and their resolution;

h. Reviewing and reforming laws contributing to or allowing gross violations of international human rights law and serious violations of international humanitarian law.[295]

According to the ICJ's interpretation of the U.N. Principles on Reparation, the guarantee of non-repetition derives from general international law.[296] A guarantee of non-repetition is an aspect of "restoration and repair of the legal relationship affected by the breach."[297] According to the International Law Commission, "[a]ssurances and guarantees are concerned with the restoration of confidence in a continuing relationship."[298] A guarantee of non-repetition overlaps with international human rights law because "States have a duty to prevent human rights violations."[299] A guarantee of non-repetition is "required expressly" as part of the "legal consequences of [a state's] decisions or judgments."[300] This express requirement is supported by the U.N. Commission on Human Rights, the Human Rights Committee, the Inter-American Court and Commission on Human Rights, the Committee of Ministers and Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, and the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights.[301] Another measure that falls under the guarantee of non-repetition is "the necessity to remove officials implicated in gross human rights violations from office."[302] Finally, a guarantee of non-repetition can and often must involve "structural changes" that must be "achieved through legislative measures" to ensure that the violations cannot ever happen again.[303]

While the U.N. Principles on Reparation are primarily based on the notion of government responsibility, the negotiators also reached a consensus that "non-State actors are to be held responsible for their policies and practices, allowing victims to seek redress and reparation on the basis of legal liability and human solidarity, and not [just] on the basis of State responsibility."[304] Principle 3(c) provides for equal and effective access to justice, "irrespective of who may ultimately be the bearer of responsibility for the violation."[305] Additionally, Principle 15 states, "[i]n cases where a person, a legal person, or other entity is found liable for reparation to a victim, such party should provide reparation to the victim or compensate the State if the State has already provided reparation to the victim."[306]

According to the international legal framework laid out by the UN Principles on Reparation, victims of gross violations of international human rights law and serious violations of international humanitarian law should be provided with full and effective reparations.[307] Victims are "persons who individually or collectively suffered harm, including physical or mental injury, emotional suffering, economic loss or substantial impairment of their fundamental rights, through acts or omissions that constitute gross violations of international human rights law, or serious violations of international humanitarian law."[308] Furthermore, "the term 'victim' also includes the immediate family or dependents of the direct victim and persons who have suffered harm in intervening to assist victims in distress or to prevent victimization."[309] Additionally, "[a] person shall be considered a victim regardless of whether the perpetrator of the violation is identified, apprehended, prosecuted, or convicted and regardless of the familial relationship between the perpetrator and the victim."[310]

Also, the ICJ has specified that for purposes of the UN Principles on Reparation, the definition of "victim" is meant to be broad.[311] According to the ICJ, a "victim is not only the person who was the direct target of the violation, but any person affected by it directly or indirectly."[312] The ICJ cited how certain authorities "disfavor the distinction between direct and indirect victims," so "[r]eparations programmes should use a wide and comprehensive definition of 'victim' and should not distinguish between direct and indirect victims."[313] A comprehensive definition of the word "victim" should include family members who have endured "unique forms of suffering as a direct result" of what happened to their families.[314]

While the UN Principles on Reparation do not formally define "gross violations of international human rights law" or "serious violations of international humanitarian law," the ICJ defines "gross violations" and "serious violations" as the "types of violations that affect in qualitative and quantitative terms the most basic rights of human beings, notably the right to life and the right to physical and moral integrity of the human person."[315] Examples of these types of violations include "genocide, slavery and slave trade, murder, enforced disappearances, torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, prolonged arbitrary detention, deportation or forcible transfer of population, and systematic racial discrimination."[316] The ICJ also held that "harm should be presumed in cases of gross human rights violations"[317]

Victims of gross violations of international human rights law and serious violations of international humanitarian law are entitled to certain remedies under international law:

- Equal and effective access to justice;
- Adequate, effective and prompt reparation for harm suffered; and
- Access to relevant information concerning violations and reparation mechanisms. [318]

According to the UN Human Rights Committee, "the right to an effective remedy necessarily entails the right to reparation."[319] An effective remedy refers to procedural remedies whereas the right to reparation refers to restitution, compensation, rehabilitation, satisfaction, and guarantees of non-repetition. Also, victims "shall have equal access to an effective judicial remedy as provided for under international law."[320] This would require a state to "establish functioning courts of law or other tribunals presided over by independent, impartial and competent individuals exercising judicial functions as a prerequisite to ensuring that victims have access to an effective judicial remedy."[321] This would also require the state to have "competent authorities to enforce the law and any such remedies that are granted by the courts and tribunals."[322]

In order to satisfy this component of the international standards for an effective reparations program, the Task Force offers recommendations to the Legislature in Part V of this report regarding a wide variety of statutory and regulatory changes to ensure non-repetition of the identified historical injustices. Additionally, Part VIII of this report offers recommendations to the Legislature that would ensure that the public is educated about and understands these harms. And finally, Part IX of this report offers an accounting of the legal methods used to perpetuate a system of unequal justice, which the Task Force recommends the Legislature dismantles in order to ensure non-repetition.

XV. Examples of Other Reparatory Efforts

International Reparatory Efforts

In carrying out the Legislature's direction to address how the Task Force's recommendations comport with international standards of remedy, the Task Force has considered and addressed worldwide examples of past and present attempts to remedy wrongs and injuries caused by state and private actors in other contexts, including attempts that have included full reparations. The Task Force examined the following initiatives:

International

Germany-Israel

This reparations program was intended to address the harms inflicted on Jewish people who lived in Germany or in territories controlled by Germany during the Third Reich, the regime that ruled Germany from 1933 to 1945.[323] Beginning in 1933, the Third Reich implemented several provisions to control and limit the citizenship and freedom of its Jewish citizens.[324] Initially, the laws

excluded Jewish citizens from certain positions, schools, and professions.[325] Eventually, these acts culminated in the "Final Solution," the Holocaust, which was the genocide of the Jewish people through systematic killing inside and outside of concentration and extermination camps throughout Germany and territories controlled by Germany.[326] In addition to these atrocities, about $6 billion in property was stolen from the Jewish people in Germany and territories controlled by Germany.[327] Those that survived the concentration and extermination camps, and those who survived outside of camps in slave labor programs or by hiding, suffered significant physical and psychological injuries.[328]

In September 1952, representatives of the newly established State of Israel and the newly formed Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) met in Luxembourg and signed an agreement that required the FRG to pay reparations to Israel for the material damage caused by the criminal acts perpetrated by Germany against the Jewish people in the Holocaust.[329] Although the 1952 Luxembourg Agreement predates the United Nations General Assembly's Principles on Reparation, which identify the five requirements for a full and effective reparations scheme,[330] the Agreement comes close to fully embodying those principles. The 1952 Agreement consisted of three parts, two of which were protocols.[331] The first part of the Agreement required the FRG to pay Israel three billion Deutschemarks (DM)[332] to help resettle Jewish refugees in the new State of Israel.[333] The DM3 billion sum would be paid in annual installments.[334] The second part, Protocol 1, required the FRG to enact laws to compensate individuals.[335] And the third part, Protocol 2, required the FRG to pay the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany (Claims Conference) DM450 million.[336]

In 1965, the FRG enacted the Federal Compensation Final Law. The Final Law made the following changes to the Agreement:

- It created a hardship fund of DM1.2 billion to support refugees from Eastern Europe who were previously ineligible for compensation, primarily emigrants from 1953 to 1965;[337]
- It included compensation for health by easing the burden on claimants to prove damages to their health were caused by their earlier persecution, by including a presumption that if the claimant had been incarcerated for a year in a concentration camp, subsequent health problems could be causally linked to their persecution under the Nazi regime;[338]
- The category for loss of life was expanded to include deaths that occurred either during persecution or within eight months after;[339]
- The ceiling for education claims increased to DM10,000;[340]
- And claims already adjudicated were to be revised based on the new law. [341]

COURTESY OF BETTMANN VIA GETTY IMAGES

Emaciated survivors of one of the largest Nazi concentration camps, at Ebensee, Austria, entered by the 80th division, U.S. Third army on May 7, 1945.

The Luxembourg Agreement was unique in many ways. It was the first reparations agreement that required a country to compensate another country that was not the victor in a war.[342] Further, it was the first reparations program where the perpetrator paid reparations "on its own volition in order to facilitate self-rehabilitation."[343] And the Agreement was formed by two states that were "'descendent' entities of the perpetrators and the victims."[344]

The program was also the largest reparations program ever implemented.[345] The German government received over 4.3 million claims for individual compensation, of which two million were approved.[346] It is estimated that by 2000, Germany had paid more than DM82 billion ($38.6 billion) in reparations.[347]

Moreover, the Agreement had significant economic and political consequences for Israel and the FRG.[348] The treaty enabled a substantial trade relationship between the countries.[349] During the period of enforcement for the treaty, they did not have political or diplomatic relations.[350] But when reparations payments ceased in 1965, Israel and the FRG gradually initiated political relations.[351]

The 1953, 1956, and 1965 Compensation Laws excluded compensation for forced and slave labor.[352] But in 2000, Germany and seven other countries—including the United States—enacted the Forced and Slave Labor Compensation Law.[353] Former slave laborers[354] received DM15,000 ($7,500).[355] Former forced laborers received DM5,000 ($2,500).[356] Payments were limited to claimants only and not extended to descendants.[357] However, heirs of anyone who died after February 1999, the date negotiations over compensation began, could file a claim.[358] The Law also allowed for compensation of all non-Jewish survivors living outside the five Eastern European countries that signed the law.[359] The International Organization for Migration processed those claims.[360] By the claims deadline, it had received 306,000 claims.[361]

Chile

Under the dictatorship of General Augusto Pinochet, from 1973 to 1990, the people of Chile experienced systematic state torture and violence: approximately 2,600 to 3,400 Chilean citizens were executed or "disappeared," while another estimated 30,000 to 100,000 were tortured.[362] In 1988, a plebiscite was held to determine whether General Pinochet should remain president of the country, and Pinochet lost.[363] However, it was not until March 1990 that Patricio Aylwin was sworn in as President of the Republic of Chile.[364]

COURTESY OF BETTMANN VIA GETTY IMAGES

Chile's Presidential Palace burns at the height of bombardment during the coup d'etat by the nation's armed forces. (1973)

One month after his inauguration, Aylwin created the National Truth and Reconciliation Commission.[365] This eight-member commission was tasked with disclosing the human rights violations that occurred under the previous dictatorship, gathering evidence to allow for victims to be identified, and recommending compensation in a legal, financial, medical and administrative capacity.[366] In February 1991, the Commission delivered its first report to the President, the Retting Report.[367] President Aylwin sent a draft bill on victim compensation to Congress; the bill used the recommended measures of compensation from the Retting Report.[368] The bill was approved and signed into law (Law 19.123) on February 8, 1992.[369]

Law 19.123 established the National Corporation for Reparation and Reconciliation with the purpose of coordinating, carrying out, and promoting actions needed to comply with the recommendations contained in the Report of the National Truth and Reconciliation Commission.[370] As written in Law 19.123, the Corporation was tasked to achieve all of the following:

- Promoting reparations for the moral injury caused to the victims of the Pinochet regime and providing the social and legal assistance needed by their families to access the benefits of the law;[371]
- Promoting and assisting actions aimed at determining the whereabouts and circumstances surrounding the disappearance or death of people at the hands of the Pinochet regime;[372]
- Serving as repository for the information collected by the National Truth and Reconciliation Commission and the National Corporation for Reparation and Reconciliation, and all information on cases and matters similar that may be compiled in the future. The Corporation was authorized to request, collect, and process information in the possession of public or private institutions regarding human rights violations or political violence during the Pinochet regime;[373]
- Conducting research and making decisions in certain cases, regarding whether the person was a victim of human rights violations or political violence.[374]
- Entering into agreements with nonprofit institutions or corporations to provide the professional assistance needed to carry out the aims of the Corporation, including medical benefits.[375]
- Making proposals for consolidating a culture of respect for human rights in the country.[376]

Law 19.123 also established a monthly pension for the families of the victims of human rights violations or political violence as identified in the report by the Truth and Reconciliation Commission.[377] The Institute of Pension Normalization was placed in charge of paying the pensions throughout the country.[378] Article 24 of the law established that the pension was compatible with any other benefits that the beneficiary was receiving at the moment, or would receive in the future, as well as any other social security benefits.[379] In 1996, the monthly pension amounted to 226,667 Chilean pesos, or around $537.[380] This figure was used as a reference for estimating the different amounts provided to each type of beneficiary as defined in Law 19.123.[381]

In the years since its enactment, there have been public criticisms of the restitution or compensation measures enacted. For example, some have objected to allowing compensation based on the presumed death of some victims, while others have expressed a mistrust in the creation of a public interest corporation with little oversight and limited ability to investigate the whereabouts of disappeared detainees.[382] Others have criticized the single pension model that does not take into account the number of members in each family in determining the amount of restitution.[383] Law 19.123 also excluded certain beneficiaries (unmarried partners, victims without children, and mothers of children of unknown parentage).[384]

In 2005, the Chilean government decided to provide 28,459 registered victims or their relatives with lifelong governmental compensation (approximately $200 per month) and free education, housing, and health care.[385]

South Africa

Apartheid was an institutional regime of racial segregation and systemic oppression, implemented in South Africa to deprive the majority Black South African population of basic rights and secure the white minority's power over the country.[386] Similar to the United States's system of segregation, de jure racial segregation was widely practiced in South Africa since the first white settlers arrived in the region.[387] When the National Party gained control of the government in 1948, it expanded the policy of racial segregation, naming the system apartheid.[388] This system of "separate development" was furthered by the Population Registration Act of 1950, which classified all South Africans as either Bantu (all Black South Africans), "Coloured" (those of mixed race), or white.[389] Another piece of legislation, the Group Areas Act of 1950, established residential and business sections in urban areas for each race, and barred members of other races from living, operating businesses, or owning land in areas designated for a different race.[390] The law was designed to remove thousands of "Coloureds," Black South Africans, and Indians from areas classified for white occupation.[391] As a result of several laws, specifically, the Population Registration Act, the Group Areas Act, and several "Land Acts" adopted between 1913 and 1955, more than 80 percent of South Africa's land was set aside for the white minority.[392]

COURTESY OF CENTRAL PRESS VIA GETTY IMAGES

Anti-apartheid marchers (1969)

To enforce the segregation of the races and prevent Black South Africans from encroaching on white areas, the government strengthened existing "pass" laws, requiring "nonwhites to carry documents authorizing their presence in restricted areas."[393] Many private companies, including some based in the United States and Europe, enabled apartheid by manufacturing the military and police vehicles[394] used to enforce segregation, or by creating the document system that stripped Black South Africans of their citizenship and rights.[395]

In 1995, following the election of Nelson Mandela as the country's first non-white president, the South African government passed the Promotion of National Unity and Reconciliation Act (Act) to help transition South Africa out of the apartheid era and into a democracy in which Black South Africans would have full participation.[396] To make that transition, the Act created the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (Commission), which operated through three committees: the Committee on Human Rights Violations, which investigated the gross human rights violations committed during the apartheid regime; the Committee on Reparations and Rehabilitation (CRR), which developed final compensation policy recommendations to address the harms suffered by the victims of the gross human rights abuses committed to uphold apartheid; and the Amnesty Committee, which was responsible for determining which perpetrators of gross human rights violations would receive amnesty for civil and criminal liability for their crimes.[397]

In its final policy recommendations, the CRR recommended financial and symbolic compensation reparations as well as community rehabilitation programs and institutional reforms.[398] To ensure successful implementation, the CRR also recommended that the government appoint a national body to implement the programs and a secretariat within the office of the President or the Vice President to oversee implementation.[399] The government adopted some of the CRR's symbolic reparation recommendations, community rehabilitation program recommendations, and institutional reforms.[400] The government paid reburial expenses to 47 families of disappeared persons whose remains were found and reburied, and enacted regulations to integrate institutions. There were also improvements made in housing, education, and access to medical care for Black South Africans.[401]

The South African government did not adopt the CRR's financial recommendations nor its recommendation to appoint a national implementing body.[402] In 2003, five years after the CRR submitted its final reparations policy recommendations, the South African government paid a one-time payment of 30,000 Rand (R) to some of the 22,000 victims.[403] The payment was about one-fifth of the amount the CRR recommended that the government pay in individual reparations grants to adequately compensate victims for their suffering.[404] By 2004, about 10 percent of the confirmed victims had still not received their payment.[405]

The Commission's CRR was also responsible for developing both the Urgent Interim Reparations policy program (UIR) and making final policy recommendations to the President.[406] The UIR was an interim financial compensation program.[407] The UIR regulations required referrals and financial assistance to access services necessary to meet urgent medical, emotional, educational, material, and symbolic needs to applicants whose requirements the CRR deemed urgent.[408] The UIR payments were calculated based on need and the number of the victim's dependents, ranging from a maximum of R2000 ($250) for a victim with no dependents to a maximum of R5705 ($713) for those with five or more dependents.[409] The first UIR payments were made in July 1998.[410] The UIR "process was mostly completed in April 2001."[411] The President's Fund paid out about R44,000,000 ($5.5 million) in cash payments to 14,000 victims for three years.[412]

Some critics of the UIR program criticize the lack of information shared with victims about the Commission.[413] Specifically, victims were not given information about how the Commission was organized or how it functioned.[414] Thus, they were not empowered to engage with the Commission, nor were they knowledgeable about the next steps in the restitution process.[415] And they received little information regarding the perpetrators the Amnesty Committee was considering for amnesty.[416]

Canada

Indigenous children in Canada were sent to residential schools from the 1600s until the mid-1990s, where they suffered severe abuses.[417] First established by Roman Catholic and Protestant churches, and based on claimed racial, cultural, and spiritual superiority, residential schools were an attempt to separate Indigenous children from their traditional cultures and convert them to Christianity.[418] The passage of the Indian Act in 1876 formally gave the federal government the power to educate and assimilate Indigenous people in Canada, and the Act's 1894 amendment made attendance at residential schools mandatory.[419] Starting in the 1880s, the Canadian government established and expanded the residential school system, ostensibly to assimilate Indigenous peoples into settler society and to reduce Indigenous dependence on public assistance.[420]

COURTESY OF LIBRARY AND ARCHIVES CANADA/NATURAL RESOURCES CANADA FONDS/A023095

Indian residential school.

There were 130 residential schools in Canada between 1831 and 1996.[421] During this time, more than 150,000 First Nations, Métis, and Inuit children were forced to attend these schools.[422] Thousands of Indigenous children died at school or as a result of their experiences in school, while many remain missing.[423] Children were forced to leave their homes, parents, and often their siblings, as the schools were segregated based on gender.[424] Indigenous culture was disparaged from the moment the children arrived at school, where they were required to give up their traditional clothes and wear new uniforms, the boys had their hair cut, and many students were given new names.[425] At some schools, children were banned from speaking their native language, even in letters home to their parents.[426] The Christian missionary staff at these schools emphasized Christian traditions while simultaneously denigrating Indigenous spiritual traditions.[427] Physical and sexual abuse were common.[428] Many children were underfed, and malnutrition and poor living conditions led to preventable diseases such as tuberculosis and influenza.[429]

Indigenous communities struggled to heal the harm done by these residential schools, and starting in 1980, former students campaigned for the government and churches to acknowledge the abuses of this system and provide some compensation.[430] In 1996, a group of 27 former students filed a class action lawsuit against the Government of Canada and the United Church of Canada.[431] Thousands of other former students began to sue the federal government and churches.[432] The federal government issued a Statement of Reconciliation in 1998 that recognized the abuses of the residential school system and established the Aboriginal Healing Foundation.[433] In 2001, the federal government created the Office of Indian Residential Schools Resolution Canada to manage the abuse claims filed by former students through the alternative dispute resolution process.[434]

In 2006, the Canadian government entered into the Indian Residential Schools Settlement Agreement.[435] It acknowledged the damage Canada inflicted on its Indigenous peoples through the residential school system and established a multibillion-dollar fund to help former students recover.[436] The Agreement has five main components: the Common Experience Payment; Independent Assessment Process; the Truth and Reconciliation Commission; Commemoration; and Health and Healing Services.[437] The Settlement Agreement allocated $1.9 billion to the Common Experience Payment for all former students of the residential schools.[438] Every former student was given $10,000 for the first year at school and $3,000 for each additional year.[439] By the end of 2012, 98 percent of the 80,000 eligible former students received payments.[440]

The Independent Assessment Process provided a mechanism to resolve sexual and serious physical and psychological abuse claims.[441] By the end of 2012, it had provided more than $1.7 billion to former students.[442]

The Settlement Agreement also allocated $60 million to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission for five years so that individuals, families, and communities could tell their stories, and the Commission held national events to bring public attention to this issue.[443] The Commission issued a report in December 2015 entitled, Honouring the Truth, Reconciling for the Future, that documented the experiences of the 150,000 survivors.[444] The Settlement Agreement also allocated $20 million for commemorative projects and $125 million for the Aboriginal Healing Foundation.[445] It also established the Indian Residential Schools Resolution Health Support Program, which provides former students with mental health resources provided by elders, Indigenous community health workers, psychologists, and social workers.[446]

In January 2023, Canada also agreed to pay $2.8 billion to settle the latest in a series of lawsuits seeking compensation for the harm to Indigenous communities through the residential schools.[447] This settlement is a resolution of a class action lawsuit initially filed by 325 First Nations in 2012 seeking compensation for the destruction of their languages and culture.[448] Under this settlement, the federal government agreed to establish a trust fund for Indigenous communities to use for educational, cultural, and language programs.[449] A federal court judge approved the $2.8 billion settlement in March 2023, noting that it was "fair, reasonable, and in the best interests" of the plaintiffs.[450] The agreement allows the First Nations communities themselves to decide what to do with these funds based on the "four pillars" principles outlined in the agreement: the revival and protection of Indigenous language; the revival and protection of Indigenous culture; the protection and promotion of heritage; and the wellness of Indigenous communities and their members.[451] The settlement was to go to an appeal period, after which the money would be managed by a board of Indigenous leaders through a nonprofit fund.[452] The settlement does not release the federal government from future lawsuits involving children who died or disappeared at the residential schools.[453]

Domestic Reparatory Efforts

History of the Reparations Movement in the United States

The earliest calls for reparations for African Americans precede the Civil War, with enslaved people demanding compensation for their labor and bondage.[454] In 1783, Belinda Sutton, a formerly enslaved woman in Massachusetts, petitioned the Massachusetts General Court for a pension from the estate of her enslaver, Isaac Royall, Jr.[455] Sutton's petition is one of the first examples of African Americans demanding reparations.[456] The court granted her petition, partially due to Royall's resistance to American independence and allegiance to King George III.[457]

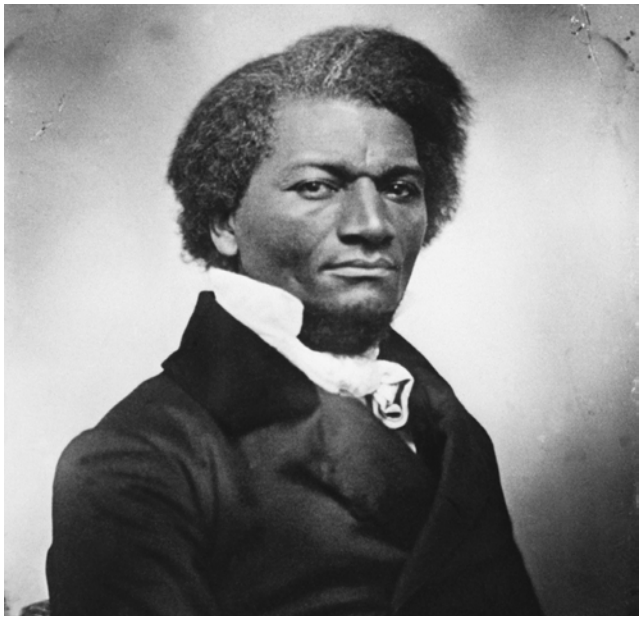
COURTESY OF BETTMANN VIA GETTY IMAGES



Born into slavery, American writer and abolitionist Frederick Douglass (1817-1895) bought his freedom with income earned from lecturing abroad. (c. 1855)

Calls for reparatory justice gained momentum at the end of the Civil War, after the federal government failed to fulfill General William T. Sherman's promise to give forty acres and a mule to those who were formerly enslaved.[458] African American abolitionist Frederick Douglass demanded land distribution for the formerly enslaved, comparing their plight to the Russian serfs who received land grants following their emancipation.[459]

In the late 1800s, African American freedmen led the call for reparations. Callie House and Isaiah Dickerson chartered the first national reparations organization, the National Ex-Slave Mutual Relief, Bounty, and Pension Association (MRBPA), in Nashville, in 1898.[460] The MRBPA grew to 300,000 members by 1916.[461] Their mission included: (1) identifying the formerly enslaved and adding their names to the petition for a pension; (2) lobbying Congress to provide pensions for the nation's estimated 1.9 million formerly enslaved—21 percent of all African Americans by 1899; (3) starting local chapters and providing members with financial assistance when they became incapacitated by illness; and (4) providing a burial assistance payment when a member died.[462] MRBPA filed a lawsuit against the federal government on behalf of African American freedmen and their ancestors for the value of the cotton that had been grown and harvested by persons "subject to a system of involuntary servitude" in the South between 1859 and 1868.[463] The MRBPA petitioned for $68 million—the money the government collected from the "Internal Revenue Tax on Raw Cotton" on the cotton they produced.[464] The claim was denied based on government immunity.[465] The U.S. Supreme Court affirmed.[466]

The MRBPA faced strong opposition from the U.S. government.[467] In 1916, the government indicted Callie House for fraud, claiming that the leaders of MRBPA obtained money from the formerly enslaved by fraudulent circulars advertising that reparations from the government were forthcoming.[468] House was convicted and served time in a penitentiary in Missouri.[469]

Another reparations trailblazer was "Queen Mother" Audley Moore, known as the "Mother" of the modern reparations movement.[470] Moore founded several organizations, including the Committee for Reparations for Descendants of U.S. Slaves, dedicated to fighting for land and other reparations for African Americans.[471] In the 1950s she formally petitioned the U.N. for reparations for African Americans.[472]

In the 1960s, many civil rights and Black Nationalist groups also demanded reparatory justice, in addition to legal equality. For example, the Black Panther Party's Ten-Point Program called for the "end to the robbery by the [w]hite man of our Black community" and demanded the debt owed of forty acres and two mules.[473] In a speech to students at Michigan State University in 1963, Malcolm X called for reparations:

> The greatest contribution to this country was that which was contributed by the Black man . . . Now, when you see this, and then you stop and consider the wages that were kept back from millions of Black people, not for one year but for 310 years, you'll see how this country got so rich so fast. And what made the economy as strong as it is today. And all that, and all of that slave labor that was amassed in unpaid wages, is due someone today.[474]

The reparations movement surged in the 1980s.[475] The National Coalition of Blacks for Reparations in America was founded in 1987,[476] and with its help, U.S. Rep. John Conyers in 1989 introduced H.R. 40, a bill to establish a federal Commission to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans.[477] Rep. Conyers introduced the bill 20 times without success.[478]

The publication of the 2014 essay, The Case for Reparations, by Ta-Nehisi Coates in The Atlantic,[479] refocused the country's attention on reparations.[480] And in the summer of 2020, the murder of George Floyd by police in Minneapolis sparked racial justice protests across the country that further pushed demands for reparations to the forefront of public conversation.[481] Reparations was also an issue in the 2020 Democratic presidential primary.[482] In April 2021, H.R. 40, sponsored by U.S. Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, was voted out of the House Judiciary Committee for the first time, but failed to receive consideration by the full House of Representatives in the 117th Congress (2021-2022).[483]

In the absence of federal action, states, cities, and municipalities have taken calls for reparations into their own hands. For example, California, with AB 3121, the Task Force, and this report, has begun the process of developing a reparations program specific to our state's experience. Nevertheless, this Task Force trusts that the federal government will develop a national solution to what is ultimately a national responsibility.

U.S. Indian Claims Commission

The United States Indian Claims Commission (Commission or ICC) was established in 1946 through federal legislation.[484] The ICC was ostensibly established to redress the harms inflicted on native populations during the campaign of colonization and relocation of the late 18th and 19th centuries.[485] The government's inhumanity and the atrocities committed during this period were diverse and devastating.[486] The government's actions included the widespread killing of Native Americans that many, including California Governor Gavin Newsom, have called a genocide, and a staggering theft of Native American land.[487] Spurred by the doctrine of Manifest Destiny, the government acquired nearly two billion acres of land from Indigenous peoples, leaving just 140 million acres under Native control.[488] This dispossession was accomplished by various means, including outright conquest, treaty, executive order, and federal statute.[489] Although the government's abuses during this period were far-reaching, the ICC's focus was solely on land transactions, mostly notably the treaty process.[490]

The ICC was authorized to adjudicate tribal land claims, but it was limited to awarding monetary relief and did not have jurisdiction to restore title to land.[491] The authorizing legislation permitted various claims, including those premised on "fraud, duress, [and] unconscionable consideration" as well as those based on "fair and honorable dealings."[492] The congressional Committee on Indian Affairs stated that the bill was "primarily designed to right a continuing wrong to our Indian citizens for which no possible justification can be asserted."[493] Indeed, the majority of claims alleged that "the United States acquired valuable land for unconscionably low prices in bargains struck between unequals."[494] Another large swath of claims alleged that the government had failed to abide by treaty provisions and called for an historical accounting, including in instances where the government was alleged to have mismanaged tribal funds.[495]

The Commission initially comprised three members, all appointed by President Harry Truman.[496] The ICC acted as a "quasi-judicial branch of the legislature" that considered voluminous documentary and testimonial evidence, rendered rulings on motions, and presided over trials.[497] Claims could be filed only during the first five years of the Commission, and within that filing period 370 petitions were submitted and later divided into more than 600 dockets.[498] Neither the statute of limitations nor doctrine of laches could be raised as a defense to tribal claims, but all other defenses were available to the government.[499]

The ICC was initially set to terminate ten years after its first meeting,[500] but its lifespan was repeatedly extended until its termination in 1978.[501] Individual cases often took several years to complete,[502] and the appeal process alone typically took between eight months and three years.[503] During its tenure, the Commission adjudicated more than 500 claims and issued tribal awards in over 60 percent of matters.[504] It awarded approximately $800 million in total compensation to tribal claimants.[505] At its termination in 1978, the Commission had not fully cleared its docket, and the remaining matters were transferred to the Court of Claims.[506]

COURTESY OF BETTMANN VIA GETTY IMAGES

President Truman and tribal leaders gather to sign bill creating the Indian Claims Commission. (1946)

Historians and legal scholars have argued that the Commission did not go nearly far enough to address the centuries-long slaughter, displacement, and oppression of Native Americans.[507] The Commission was not empowered to convey land back to tribes,[508] yet its rulings have barred all subsequent claims, including those to repossess land.[509] Nor did the Commission address issues such as the suppression of Native languages, religions, and forms of government.[510] And even where a tribe was able to secure a financial award, the amounts were significantly reduced in various ways. For example, the awards were whittled down by offsets for monies purportedly spent by the government on behalf of the tribes, but those monies had often been spent to promote governmental rather than tribal interests.[511] Moreover, except in the rare claim premised on a Fifth Amendment "taking," the Commission ruled that interest on amounts owed was not recoverable.[512] The unpaid interest was estimated by the U.S. Solicitor General to have been several billion dollars.[513]

A core defect in the ICC's structure and practice was the adversarial rather than investigative nature of the proceedings.[514] One scholar has observed that "the Commission, submissive to the requests of the lawyers who practice before it, has provided for a bewildering series of hearings on title, value offset, attorneys [sic] fees and all the motions that any party chooses [to] present."[515] Moreover, the government's role as an adversary to the claimants meant that government attorneys often aggressively fought against proper compensation for tribal claimants, and as a matter of policy the Attorney General did not pursue settlement.[516] Finally, the Native Americans' obligation to retain counsel at their own cost diminished any eventual financial award.[517] In light of these and other inefficiencies, many have argued that the Commission should have operated as an investigative rather than quasi-judicial body.[518] Indeed, the Commission was statutorily authorized to conduct its own investigations,[519] but it rarely employed these powers and instead consistently acted as a tribunal.[520]

Tuskegee Study of Untreated Syphilis in the Negro Male

The Tuskegee Study of Untreated Syphilis in the Negro Male (Study) was conducted in Macon County, Alabama between 1932 and 1972 on the campus of the Tuskegee Institute.[521] The Study was intended to observe the natural history of untreated syphilis in African American men.[522] A total of 600 African American men[523] were enrolled in the Study and told by researchers that they were being treated for "bad blood," which colloquially in the region referred to a number of diagnosable ailments including, but not limited to, anemia, fatigue, and syphilis.[524] The African American men in the Study were only told they were receiving free health care from the federal government of the United States.[525] Although there were no proven treatments for syphilis when the study began, penicillin became the standard treatment for the disease in 1947; however, the medicine was withheld from those enrolled in the study, resulting in blindness, deteriorating mental health, severe health issues, and sometimes death.[526]

Following a leak of the Study and subsequent reporting by the Associated Press in July 1972, international public outcry led to a series of actions taken by U.S. federal agencies.[527] The Assistant Secretary for Health and Scientific Affairs appointed an Ad Hoc Advisory Panel that concluded that there was evidence that the Study routinely ignored scientific research protocols necessary to ensure the safety and well-being of the human subjects involved.[528]

Although there were no proven treatments for syphilis when the Tuskegee study began, penicillin became the standard treatment for the disease in 1947; however, the medicine was withheld from those enrolled in the study, resulting in blindness, deteriorating mental health, severe health issues, and sometimes death.

Following the Advisory Panel's findings in October 1972, a class-action lawsuit was filed on behalf of the men in the Study—as well as their wives, children, and families—resulting in a nearly $10 million settlement in 1974.[529] Under the settlement, 70 living syphilitic participants received $37,500 each.[530] The 46 living men in the control group received $16,000 each.[531] The family members of the 339 deceased syphilitic participants received $15,000 per participant.[532] The family members of the deceased members of the control group received $5,000 per participant.[533] The settlement included free healthcare for life for the participants still living, as well as healthcare for their infected wives, widows, and children.[534]

The federal government in 1974 enacted legislation to study and write regulations governing studies involving human participants and to implement policy changes to protect human subjects in biomedical and behavioral research.[535]

Following a 1994 symposium studying the Tuskegee Syphilis experiments, the Tuskegee Syphilis Study Legacy Committee was formed[536] and issued its final report in 1996, seeking to: (1) persuade President Bill Clinton to apologize to the surviving Study participants, their families, and to the Tuskegee community; and (2) develop a strategy to redress the damages caused by the Study and to transform its damaging legacy.[537]

In 1997, President Clinton formally apologized and held a ceremony at the White House for surviving Tuskegee Study participants.[538] Along with the apology, President Clinton pledged a $200,000 planning grant to help Tuskegee University build a Center for Bioethics in Research and Health Care.[539] President Clinton also announced the creation of bioethics fellowships for minority students and extended the life of the National Bioethics Advisory Commission to 1999.[540] Additionally, the President directed the Health and Human Services Secretary to draft a report outlining ways to better involve all communities—especially minority communities—in research and health care.[541]

In 2022, the Milbank Memorial Fund—the foundation that paid the funeral expenses of the deceased Study participants as an incentive for their participation—publicly apologized to descendants of the Study's victims for its role in the Study.[542]

Japanese American Incarceration

On February 19, 1942, President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed Executive Order 9066, which ordered the incarceration of Japanese Americans and created a zone "from which any or all persons may be excluded," at the discretion of the Secretary of War or appropriate military commander, from the whole of California, the western halves of Washington State and Oregon, and the southern third of Arizona.[543] By the fall of 1942, all Japanese Americans were evicted from California and sent to one of ten incarceration camps that were built to imprison them.[544] Many incarcerated persons lost their property and assets as they were prohibited from taking more than what they could carry with them, and what remained was either sold, confiscated, or destroyed in government storage.[545] Over a hundred thousand Japanese Americans were incarcerated in desolate camps, for up to four years.[546]

In 1980, the United States Congress and President Jimmy Carter approved the Commission on the Wartime Internment and Relocation of Civilians (CWRIC).[547] The CWRIC was established to: (1) review the facts and circumstances surrounding the relocation and incarceration of thousands of American civilians during World War II under Executive Order 9066 and the impact of that order on American citizens and resident aliens; (2) review directives of United States military forces requiring the relocation and incarceration of American citizens, including Aleut civilians and permanent resident aliens of the Aleutian and Pribilof Islands; and (3) recommend appropriate remedies.[548] In December 1982, the Commission released a 467-page report, Personal Justice Denied, detailing the history and circumstances of the wartime treatment of people of Japanese ancestry and the people of the Aleutian Islands.[549]

COURTESY OF UPI/BETTMANN ARCHIVE VIA GETTY IMAGES

The Manzanar War Relocation Center in Owens Valley, CA, where Japanese Americans were incarcerated under Executive Order 9066 during World War II. (1942)

The findings and recommendations of the CWRIC, among other events, helped bring about the passage of the Civil Liberties Act of 1988 to acknowledge and provide redress for the incarceration of Japanese Americans in the United States between 1942 and 1946.[550] The federal government's plan included a cash payment of $20,000 for each surviving incarcerated person and a program to fund public education of the events.[551]

Under the Act, the United States Attorney General was charged with locating eligible individuals,[552] and by 1999, redress payments had been distributed to approximately 82,220 claimants.[553]

The Civil Liberties Act of 1988 also established the Civil Liberties Public Education Fund within the U.S. Treasury, administered by the Secretary of the Treasury, and available for disbursements by the Attorney General and by the newly established Civil Liberties Public Education Fund Board of Directors.[554] The trust totaled $1,650,000,000, and the fund would terminate once the money was exhausted or 10 years after the enactment of the Civil Liberties Act of 1988.[555] The Act also called upon each department and agency of the U.S. Government to review with liberality, giving full consideration to the findings of the CWRIC, any application by an eligible individual for the restitution of any position, status, or entitlement lost because of any discriminatory act of the U.S. Government against those of Japanese ancestry during the period of incarceration.[556] Finally, along with the Act's payments, the Government offered a formal apology to each surviving incarcerated person.[557]

September 11, 2001

The militant network al-Qaeda carried out four coordinated terrorist attacks against the United States on September 11, 2001, commonly known as 9/11.[558] The incineration of the Twin Towers and the crashed aircrafts released clouds of noxious toxins in Lower Manhattan.[559] First responders, volunteers, and residents near Ground Zero inhaled harmful dust, smoke, toxic chemicals, and particle remnants.[560] This toxic exposure subsequently caused various illnesses, including more than 60 types of cancer, respiratory conditions, and digestive disorders.[561] Thousands of survivors and first responders have been diagnosed with 9/11-related illnesses, and thousands more have died.[562]

COURTESY OF CHIP SOMODEVILLA VIA GETTY IMAGES

Senate and House Democrats hold a news conference with first responders from New York and members of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America to announce their support for the permanent reauthorization of the James Zadroga 9/11 Health and Compensation Reauthorization Act (2015)

Almost immediately after the September 11 attacks, Congress passed the Air Transportation Safety and Stabilization Act, which enacted the September 11th Victim Compensation Fund (VCF).[563] This bill sought to bring financial relief to any individual, or relative of a deceased individual, who was physically injured or killed as a result of the terrorist attacks.[564] The claims window for VCF closed in 2004.[565]

The VCF was reopened on January 2, 2011, when President Barack Obama signed the James Zadroga 9/11 Health and Compensation Act of 2010 (Zadroga Act).[566] While the original VCF only covered the victims (or their heirs) who were either killed or injured as a direct result of the 9/11 terrorist attacks, the Zadroga Act expanded the VCF to compensate victims for injury or death related to the debris removal process conducted in the aftermath of the terrorist attacks, and exposure to the toxic air in Lower Manhattan and the other attack sites.[567] The new claim filing deadline was October 2016.[568] The Zadroga Act also established the World Trade Center Health Program to provide medical monitoring and treatment for responders and survivors with chronic health conditions arising from the 9/11 attacks.[569] In contrast to the World Trade Center Health Program, the VCF does not cover mental health conditions.[570]

In 2015, the Zadroga Act was reauthorized and extended until December 2020.[571] Certain award calculations were changed.[572] The original VCF paid an average death claim award of over $2 million[573] and awarded anywhere from $500 to over $8.6 million in personal injury claims.[574] Due to budgetary considerations, the 2015 reauthorization of the Zadroga Act limited the maximum amounts individuals could receive as compensation.[575] It capped awards for non-economic loss from cancer conditions at $250,000, awards for non-economic loss from non-cancer conditions at $90,000, and awards for loss of annual income at $200,000.[576]

The VCF was designed to be a compensation scheme in lieu of tort litigation for the economic and noneconomic losses incurred by victims who were physically injured and families of victims whose lives were taken as a result of the 9/11 attacks.[577] Claimants who participated in this compensation scheme waived their right to sue for damages for injury or death as a result of the attacks.[578] A compensation fund was chosen as an alternative to potential class action toxic tort litigation because it was determined to be a more efficient and effective solution for compensating victims.[579] It was enacted to relieve victims and their families from navigating through the legal system and possibly having their claims failing due to government immunity or other potential bars.[580]

The VCF has received inconsistent funding. In the two decades since the 9/11 attacks, the Fund has struggled to meet rising medical costs and cancer rates.[581] Many exposure symptoms and 9/11-related diseases took years to manifest.[582] The VCF's most recent five-year extension only lasted until 2020.[583] In February 2019, a Special Master determined that the then-current funding was insufficient to pay the remaining pending and projected VCF claims, and announced that award amounts would need to be reduced.[584] In response to public outrage, the VCF was permanently authorized in July 2019, ensuring that the VCF has sufficient funding to pay all pending claims and all future claims filed by October 1, 2090.[585] It also allows for supplemental compensation to any victim whose previous award had been reduced due to the previous budgetary restrictions.[586]

The VCF's efficacy has also been impacted by some claimants providing inadequate documentation for their claim or filing premature claims. According to the VCF's 2022 Annual Report, 54 percent of claims are deactivated for failure to provide the minimum required information, 41.9 percent of all claims are submitted with insufficient proof of presence documents, and 32.3 percent do not have a certified physical condition at the time the claim is filed.[587]

Sandy Hook Elementary School

On December 14, 2012, a gunman shot and murdered 20 children and six adult staff members at Sandy Hook Elementary School in Newton, Connecticut, after killing his own mother.[588] The gunman used two high-powered rifles, two semi-automatic pistols, as well as several hundred rounds of ammunition stored in high-capacity magazines; his mother had lawfully purchased several of the guns.[589] When he arrived at the school, he shot and killed the school's principal and school psychologist.[590] Teachers, who heard the gunshots, entered lockdown procedures, but he was able to enter a classroom where he killed the teacher and fourteen children.[591] He entered a second classroom and killed the teacher and six students; he also killed a special education aide and a behavioral therapist.[592] When police arrived at the school, they discovered that the gunman had killed himself.[593] It is the deadliest mass shooting at an elementary school in U.S. history and the second deadliest school shooting overall.[594] The school was demolished in 2014 and replaced by a new building in 2016.[595]

In 2013, Connecticut Governor Dannel P. Malloy established the Sandy Hook Advisory Commission and directed it to review current policy and make specific recommendations in the areas of public safety, with particular attention paid to school safety, mental health, and gun violence prevention.[596] The Commission concluded that the shooter acted alone, but did not identify a motive.[597] The Commission made several recommendations, including investment in mental health professionals, funding for short-term and long-term recovery plans, and behavioral health and education responses to crisis events.[598]

After the shootings, the federal government gave the town of Newton and several agencies related to Sandy Hook over $17 million in aid, used primarily to enhance mental health services and school security.[599] Much of the money from the grants went directly to opening the new Sandy Hook Elementary.[600]

In 2013, the federal Department of Justice's Office for Victims of Crime granted to the Connecticut Judicial Branch $1.5 million to reimburse organizations and agencies that provided direct support to victims, first responders, and the Newton community.[601] The grant was distributed through the Antiterrorism and Emergency Assistance Program, which grants awards for crisis response, and is funded by the Crime Victims Fund for the Antiterrorism Emergency Reserve Fund.[602] The federal DOJ also provided $2.5 million in funding for Connecticut and Newtown law enforcement agencies through the Bureau of Justice Assistance.[603]

In 2014, the federal DOJ issued another grant for $7.1 million through its Office for Victims of Crime.[604] This grant was for victim services, school safety efforts, and new mental health services.[605] Additionally, the town of Newton and the state received $2.5 million from the federal DOJ for police overtime costs.[606]

COURTESY OF SPENCER PLATT VIA GETTY IMAGES

Youth at a rally for National Gun Violence Awareness Day in Newtown, CT. (2022)

School Emergency Response to Violence Grants from the Department of Education totaled $6.4 million; $1.3 million was earmarked for mental-health providers working with student survivors.[607] The remainder was used to hire teachers, security guards, and other personnel.[608]

Iranian Hostages

On November 4, 1979, roughly 3,000 Iranians stormed the U.S. embassy in Tehran and took 63 American men and women hostage, including diplomats.[609] The seizure took place shortly after the Iranian Revolution.[610] In early 1981, Algerian diplomats brokered an agreement, the Algiers Accords, and the hostages were released on January 20, 1981, minutes after the inauguration of Ronald Reagan as U.S. President.[611] The Algiers Accords included, among other items, a provision preventing the freed hostages from seeking compensation from Iran in U.S. courts.[612] As a result, former hostages and their families have never successfully won court judgments to collect damages for the harms of the hostage crisis.[613]

COURTESY OF EXPRESS/EXPRESS VIA GETTY IMAGES

United States hostages returning from Iran after being held for 444 days. (1981)

On the same day that the Algiers Accords were signed, then-U.S. President Jimmy Carter created the President's Commission on Hostage Compensation, with the goal of providing recommendations on financial compensation to former hostages.[614] The commission issued a report that the United States, as the employer of the former hostages, should not be held liable in a "tort sense" but that the former hostages should receive a payment of tax-exempt detention benefits in the amount of $12.50 per day of captivity, similar to benefits paid to Vietnam War prisoners of war.[615] These recommendations were debated in Congress, but ultimately not adopted.[616]

In 2015, Congress passed the Justice for United States Victims of State Sponsored Terrorism Act, establishing a fund through the Consolidated Appropriations Act of 2016 to compensate the American diplomats and staff who had been held hostage at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran for 444 days between 1979 and 1981.[617] The Fund initially included an appropriation for $1.025 billion for Fiscal Year 2017.[618] Further funding has been provided by proceeds of federal enforcement actions.[619] At the time of passage, 37 former hostages were still alive.[620] Each hostage is entitled to receive $10,000 per day of captivity, and spouses and children are each entitled to a lump sum of $600,000.[621] Some of the appropriated money came from a $9 billion penalty assessed on Paris-based bank BNP Paribas, for violating sanctions against Iran, Sudan, and Cuba.[622]

In November 2019, Congress enacted the United States Victims of State Sponsored Terrorism Fund Clarification Act, amending the original legislation by extending the life of the Fund and expanding eligibility to receive payments from the Fund—by including, for example, 9/11 victims who had won judgments against Iran.[623] The Consolidated Appropriations Act of 2021 again amended the legislation.[624]

The Fund has distributed $3.3 billion since its creation.[625] As of the latest report, $93.5 billion in compensatory and statutory damages remained unpaid for the former hostages, judgement holders, and 9/11 victims eligible for compensation from the fund.[626] The Fund is scheduled to terminate in 2039, and the Special Master plans to authorize future payments if sufficient funds are available.[627]

State and Local Reparatory Efforts

Rosewood, Florida

The decimation of Rosewood started on January 1, 1923, when a white woman named Fannie Taylor reported an attack by an unidentified African American man in the town next to Rosewood.[628] Many African American descendants of Rosewood contend that the "attack" was a cover-up for a visit from her white lover.[629] Hearing the report from Taylor, a white vigilante mob led by Levy County Sheriff Robert Elias Walker descended upon Rosewood.[630] The mob tortured and killed Sam Carter, an African American.[631]

For the next week, hundreds of white vigilantes, consisting of KKK members and other deputies from neighboring counties, arrived in Rosewood.[632] They burned every home and building, including churches and schools, murdered six African American residents, and wounded dozens more.[633] Two white men also died in a shootout.[634] News of the "race war" traveled quickly throughout the state and country,[635] but the Florida Governor never sent the National Guard to protect African American residents and end the violence.[636] Many of Rosewood's African American residents fled to the nearby swamps and hid during the riots.[637] A rescue train evacuated fleeing residents to Gainesville.[638] At the end of the violence, only the house of John and Mary Jane Hall Wright, the white residents of Rosewood, remained standing.[639]

In February 1923, a grand jury convened in Bronson, Florida, to investigate the Rosewood massacre.[640] Four days later, the grand jury found insufficient evidence to prosecute.[641] African American residents never returned to Rosewood.[642]

After weeks of sensation in the news following the violence in January 1923, the story of the Rosewood massacre disappeared from public media, as survivors largely never spoke of the event.[643] In 1982, the St. Petersburg Times unraveled the history of Rosewood in a comprehensive article that later became a story on CBS's 60 Minutes.[644] Doctor was the driving force behind Rosewood becoming a public issue.[645] He secured pro bono counsel to help descendants and victims seek compensation from the state for the violence and destruction of Rosewood.[646]

In 1993, an academic report substantiated the claims of Rosewood descendants.[647] Chaired by Dr. Maxine Jones of the Florida State University Department of History, the team issued A Documented History of the Incident Which Occurred at Rosewood, Florida, in January 1923.[648]

Then in 1994 the Florida Legislature passed a claim bill to acknowledge and provide redress for the destruction and massacre of Rosewood.[649] Florida's restitution to victims included approximately $2.1 million in compensation and a state scholarship fund for direct descendants.[650] The bill "recognized an equitable obligation to redress the injuries as a result of the destruction of Rosewood" and consisted of: (1) a finding of facts; (2) a direction to the Florida Department of Law Enforcement to conduct a criminal investigation in and around the destruction of Rosewood; (3) $500,000 to be distributed from the General Revenue Fund to African American families from Rosewood to compensate for demonstrated property loss; (4) compensation up to $150,000 from the General Revenue Fund for each of the nine living survivors; (5) the establishment of a state scholarship fund for direct descendants of Rosewood families; (6) a direction to the state university system to continue researching the destruction of Rosewood, the history of race relations in Florida, and to develop educational materials about the destruction of Rosewood.[651]

The Rosewood Family Scholarship Program is codified in the state's Education Code[652] and the Florida Department of Education promulgated the criteria to receive an award.[653] The Rosewood Family Scholarship provides student financial assistance to a maximum of 50 students annually and currently pays up to $6,100 per student per academic year.[654] To be eligible, applicants must: be direct descendants who complete a Florida financial aid application; provide documentation of ancestry such as a birth certificate, marriage license, death certificate, church record, or obituary; and enroll in a state university, Florida College System institution, or career center authorized by law.[655] Applicants are selected based on need.[656]

COURTESY OF BETTMANN VIA GETTY IMAGES

An African American home in flames, the work of a mob of whites during the race riots in Rosewood, FL. (1923)

In 2004, a Florida Historical Marker co-sponsored by the state and the Real Rosewood Foundation, a non-profit dedicated to preserving the history of Rosewood, was placed on State Road 24 to note where the community once was.[657] It states: "Those who survived were forever scarred."[658]

North Carolina Sterilization

In 1919, North Carolina passed its first forced-sterilization law, which was amended in 1929 to allow the head of any penal or charitable institution that received some state support to "have the necessary operation for asexualization or sterilization performed upon any mentally defective or feeble-minded inmate or patient thereof."[659] The North Carolina Supreme Court invalidated the law in 1933 because it failed to provide any notice or opportunity for appeal.[660] In response, the North Carolina Legislature created the North Carolina Eugenics Board, to implement the newly amended forced-sterilization law with very limited appeal rights.[661]

The five members of the Board heard petitions brought by heads of state institutions, county superintendents of welfare, next of kin, or legal guardians arguing that individuals should be sterilized due to being epileptic, "feebleminded," or mentally diseased.[662] There was a very limited appeal process, but the board approved about 90 percent of the petitions.[663] The state ultimately sterilized around 7,600 persons, the third-largest number in the country.[664] The program was somewhat unique in that it also sterilized non-institutionalized individuals, not just those residing in penal or mental facilities.[665] Moreover, the vast majority of sterilizations took place after World War II.[666]

In 2002, Governor Mike Easley apologized for forced sterilizations performed under the purview of the State of North Carolina's Eugenics Board.[667] In 2010, Governor Bev Perdue established the North Carolina Justice for Sterilization Victims Foundation as part of the North Carolina Department of Administration, to function as a clearinghouse to help victims of the former state Eugenics Board.[668] During 2011 and 2012, the Foundation also supported the separate Gubernatorial Task Force on Eugenics Compensation established under Executive Order 83.[669] This effort culminated in the State Legislature creating the Eugenics Asexualization and Sterilization Compensation Program in 2013.[670] North Carolina was the first state to pass legislation to compensate victims of state-sponsored eugenic sterilizations.[671] The law set aside a $10 million pool for compensation payments, and 220 victims received $20,000 in 2014, $15,000 in 2015, and a final payment of around $10,000 in 2018.[672]

The statute compensates individuals who were asexualized or sterilized involuntarily under the authority of the Eugenics Board of North Carolina under either the 1933 or 1937 version of the laws, and who were still alive at the time the statute was enacted.[673] The limitation of compensation to those sterilized by the State Eugenics Board limited the state's ability to remedy much of the involuntary sterilization that occurred in the state, as many individuals were ultimately sterilized at the county level without the involvement of the State Board.[674]

Virginia (Eugenics)

In 1924, Virginia passed its Eugenical Sterilization Act, which authorized the sexual sterilization of inmates at state institutions.[675] The Act authorized the superintendent of the Western, Eastern, Southwestern, or Central State Hospital or the State Colony for Epileptics and Feeble-Minded to impose sterilization upon any patient when he had the opinion that doing so was for the best interest of the patients and of society.[676]

The Eugenical Sterilization Act was passed on the same day alongside the Racial Integrity Act, which banned interracial marriage by requiring marriage applicants to identify their race as "white," "colored," or "mixed," with "white" being defined as a person "who has no trace whatsoever of any blood other than Caucasian."[677] Scholars have observed that the two acts, passed together, aimed to purify the white race.[678] One inmate, Carrie Buck, appealed her order of sterilization, but the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the Virginia state law in Buck v. Bell (1927) 274 U.S. 200.[679] The controversial ruling was never overturned, but the law was repealed in 1974.[680] Between 1927 and 1972, Virginia sterilized about 8,300 people.[681]

The Act provided that the superintendent of the Western, Eastern, Southwestern, or Central State Hospital or the State Colony for Epileptics and Feeble-Minded could impose sterilization when he had the opinion that it was for the best interest of the patients and of society that any inmate of the institution under his care should be sexually sterilized and the requirements of the Act were met.

In 2002, 75 years after Buck v. Bell, Virginia Governor Mark R. Warner issued an apology for the state's embrace of eugenics and denounced the state's practice that involuntarily sterilized persons confined to state institutions from 1927 to 1979.[682] In 2015, the Virginia Legislature voted to enact the Virginia Victims of Eugenics Sterilization Compensation Program (VESC) and allocated $400,000 from the state general fund for compensation to individuals who were involuntarily sterilized pursuant to the Virginia Eugenical Sterilization Act and who were living as of February 1, 2015.[683] As written in the budget, the funds were to be managed by the Department of Behavioral Health and Developmental Services and limited to $25,000 per claim[684] instead of the proposed $50,000 per claim.[685] Furthermore, should the funding provided for compensation be exhausted prior to the end of fiscal year 2016, the Department was directed to continue to collect applications.[686] The Department was mandated to provide a report to the Governor and the Chairs of the House Appropriations and Senate Finance Committees on a quarterly basis on the number of additional individuals who applied.[687] As of the enactment, there were only 11 surviving victims.[688]

An individual or lawfully authorized representative is eligible to request compensation under this program if the individual was: (a) involuntarily sterilized pursuant to the 1924 Virginia Eugenical Sterilization Act; (b) living as of February 1, 2015; and (c) sterilized while a patient at Eastern State Hospital; Western State Hospital; Central State Hospital; Southwestern State Hospital; or the Central Virginia Training Center (formerly known as the State Colony for Epileptics and Feeble-Minded; now closed).[689]

California Sterilization Compensation Program

California's eugenic sterilization program began in 1909 and authorized medical superintendents in state homes and state hospitals to perform "asexualization" on patients.[690] This allowed medical personnel to perform vasectomies on men and salpingectomies on women who were identified as "afflicted with mental disease which may have been inherited and is likely to be transmitted to descendants, the various grades of feeblemindedness, those suffering from perversion or marked departures from normal mentality or from disease of a syphilitic nature."[691]

California maintained 12 state homes and state hospitals that housed thousands of patients who were committed by the courts, family members, and medical authorities.[692] While many sterilizations included the use of consent forms, such consent was often a condition for release from commitment, and this along with other conditions prevented true consent.[693] Moreover, though the law did not target specific racial or ethnic groups, in practice, "labels of 'mental deficiency' and 'feeblemindedness' were applied disproportionately to racial and ethnic minorities, people with actual and perceived disabilities, poor people, and women."[694]

California's eugenic sterilization law was repealed in 1979, but sterilization without proper consent continued in state institutions.[695] In 2003, the State of California formally apologized for California's eugenic sterilization program up to 1979, including apologies from Governor Gray Davis, Attorney General Bill Lockyer, and a resolution passed by the State Senate expressing profound regret for the program.[696]

California's eugenic sterilization program began in 1909 and authorized medical superintendents in state homes and state hospitals to perform "asexualization" on patients.

In 2014, the California State Auditor released an audit of female inmate sterilizations that occurred in the state prison system's medical facilities between fiscal years 2005-2006 and 2012-2013.[697] The auditor discovered 144 women imprisoned by the state were sterilized through bilateral tubal ligation, which was medically unnecessary and used solely for female sterilization.[698] Following this report, the Legislature prohibited the sterilization for the purpose of birth control of any individual under the custody of the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation.[699] There are an estimated 244 survivors of illegal prison sterilization.[700]

The California Legislature passed, and Governor Gavin Newsom signed, Assembly Bill No. 137 in the 2021-2022 legislative session, apologizing for sterilizations at state prisons, ordering the creation of memorial plaques, and allocating $4.5 million for compensation to those sterilized by the state.[701] AB 137 created the California Forced or Involuntary Sterilization Compensation Program (Program), which financially compensates survivors of state-sponsored sterilization.[702] The California Victim Compensation Board administers the Program.[703]

Each approved applicant receives an initial payment of $15,000 within 60 days of notice of confirmed eligibility.[704] After all applications are processed and all initial payments are made, any remaining program funds will be disbursed evenly to the qualified recipients by March 31, 2024.[705]

Chicago Police Department

Jon Burge was a high ranking Chicago Police Department officer who, from 1972 to 1991, led a group of detectives and officers who tortured and abused over 120 African Americans, causing many victims to issue coerced confessions.[706] Burge led operations of cruelty that included physical and psychological abuse such as "trickery, deception, threats, intimidation, physical beatings, sexual humiliation, mock execution, and electroshock torture."[707] Moreover, evidence suggests judges and some city officials were complicit in these abuses for many years.[708] As a result, many African American victims were convicted of crimes due to coerced confessions, and some were sentenced to the death penalty.[709] There was an effort to hold Burge specifically accountable for his actions, but the statute of limitations had expired on many of the cases of torture.[710] Community members started to seek alternative methods of repair, which eventually led to a reparations ordinance.[711]

Community activists in Chicago, including those in the Chicago Torture Justice Memorial and attorney Joey Mogul of People's Law Office, sought compensation for years.[712] Activists petitioned the Inter-American Commission for Human Rights (IACHR) and the United Nations Committee Against Torture (UNCAT).[713] Although the IACHR did not take official action, the UNCAT issued a report affirming the advocates' position and urged the United States to provide redress to the survivors of torture, "by supporting the passage of the Ordinance entitled Reparations for the Chicago Police Torture Survivors."[714] The UNCAT also noted that, although Burge was later convicted for perjury and obstruction of justice, investigations did not gather sufficient evidence for a constitutional rights violation prosecution, so no police officer has been convicted for their crimes and the majority of victims still did not receive "compensation for the extensive injuries suffered."[715]

In 2015, the Chicago City Council "approved a municipal ordinance giving reparations to Burge torture survivors," and the $5.5 million package awarded claimants $100,000 in financial payments.[716] In addition, the ordinance included a formal apology; the creation of a commission to administer financial reparations; free tuition at the City Colleges of Chicago and free access to job training and placement programs for survivors;

COURTESY OF SCOTT OLSON VIA GETTY IMAGES

Demonstrator outside federal courthouse where Chicago Police Commander Jon Burge was arranged for perjury during trial on police torture. (2008)

psychological counseling and healthcare for survivors; priority access to other support services for survivors; the inclusion of the Burge case in U.S. history curriculum for eighth and tenth grade students; and a memorial site.[717] The intended recipients of the compensation included all torture survivors who have a credible claim of "torture or physical abuse" at "the hands of Jon Burge or his subordinates..." between May 1, 1972 and November 30, 1991; intended recipients also included immediate family members of victims, and "in some cases . . . their grandchildren."[718]

As of 2021, the only portion of the ordinance remaining unfulfilled is the memorial.[719] While the memorial has still not been built, individuals at the Chicago Torture Justice Memorial continue meeting with the Mayor and remain hopeful the process will start soon, though the city's ordinance and resolution did not specify a timeline or specific funding for the memorial.[720]

Evanston, Illinois

The City of Evanston passed the Restorative Housing Program in March 2021 to redress the city's discriminatory practices in housing, zoning, and lending that created a wealth and opportunity gap between white and African American Evanstonians.[721] Before enacting the program, the City Council's Reparations Subcommittee had commissioned a report, entitled, Evanston Policies and Practices Directly Affecting the African American Community, 1900-1960 (and Present).[722] According to the report, "the City of Evanston officially supported and enabled the practice of segregation,"[723] with specific actions such as: passing a zoning ordinance in 1921 that implicitly condoned race-based housing segregation; the demolition of homes owned by African American families for economic development, on the grounds that they were "unsanitary" or "overcrowded"; providing permits to Northwestern University to develop temporary, segregated housing for veterans after World War II; segregating other post-World War II temporary housing for veterans; and failing until the late 1960s to enact a fair housing ordinance to outlaw housing discrimination.[724]

Under the city's Restorative Housing Program, African American Evanstonians, their descendants, or other residents who experienced housing discrimination by the City of Evanston are provided $25,000 to either purchase a home, conduct home improvements, or pay down their existing mortgage.[725] The Restorative Housing Program was the first such repair program enacted by the city, but Evanston has also studied its discriminatory past, created an Equity and Empowerment Commission, created a City Reparations Fund, honored local historical African American sites, and issued an apology.[726]

The Restorative Housing Program aimed to increase African American homeownership in order to revitalize and preserve African American owner-occupied homes in Evanston.[727] To be eligible, the home must be located in Evanston and be the applicant's primary residence.[728] The program will eventually extend funds to all intended recipients: Evanston residents of African American ancestry who are at least 18 years old, and, in order of priority, either: (1) an Ancestor, a resident who lived in Evanston between 1919 and 1969, was at least 18 years old at the time, and experienced housing discrimination due to the city's policies or practices; (2) a Direct Descendant of an Ancestor (e.g., child, grandchild, great-grandchild); or (3) a resident who does not qualify as an Ancestor or Direct Descendant, but experienced housing discrimination due to a city ordinance, policy or practice after 1969.[729]

At the close of the first round of applications, 122 Ancestor-applicants were verified by the city, and 16 were randomly selected in January 2022 via the city's lottery to receive the first round of payments.[730] In March 2023, Evanston voted to expand the form of compensation to include direct cash payments[731] and announced plans to disburse 35 to 80 additional grants.[732]

Providence's reconciliation principles underscored action, emphasizing a community-owned but institutionally-supported process, and the principle that reconciliation cannot be accomplished without reparations.

In November 2022, the City Council passed a resolution to dedicate up to $1 million annually to the City Reparations Fund, for a period of 10 years, taken from the graduated real estate transfer tax collected from all property purchased above a price of $1.5 million.[733] More funding came in December 2022 when the City Council passed Resolution 125-R-22 to transfer $2 million from the City's General Fund to the Reparations Fund.[734] Evanston Mayor Daniel Biss launched a survey to assess Evanston residents' views on the reparations program on February 16, 2023.[735]

Asheville, North Carolina

In June 2021, the City Council of Asheville, North Carolina voted to allocate $2.1 million of the city's proceeds from the sale of city-owned land to support a Reparations Commission.[736] A portion of this land had been purchased by the city in the 1970s through urban renewal, a policy that "resulted in the displacement of vibrant Black communities and the removal of Black residents and homeowners, many into substandard public housing."[737] The city anticipates that of the $2.1 million, $200,000 will fund the Reparation Commission's planning and engagement process, leaving approximately $1.9 million in initial funding for compensation.[738] The city's Reparations Commission is working on a report that is scheduled to be completed by October 31, 2023.[739]

The Commission is required to consider ways to make amends for the city's participation in and sanctioning of the enslavement of African Americans, its enforcement of segregation and accompanying discriminatory practices, its implementation of an urban renewal program that destroyed multiple successful African American communities, and many other actions it took inflicting harms upon African Americans living in Asheville.[740] The Commission is charged with making short-, medium-, and long-term recommendations to "make significant progress toward repairing the damage caused by public and private systemic racism," so that the City of Asheville and local community groups may incorporate these recommendations into their short- and long-term priorities and plans.[741] The resolution states that the "report and the resulting budgetary and programmatic priorities may include but not be limited to increasing minority homeownership and access to other affordable housing, increasing minority business ownership and career opportunities, strategies to grow equity and generational wealth, closing the gaps in health care, education, employment and pay, neighborhood safety and fairness within criminal justice."[742]

Providence, Rhode Island

After the murder of George Floyd by Minneapolis police in May 2020, the mayor of Providence, Rhode Island signed an executive order to launch a truth-telling, reconciliation, and restitution process to "eradicat[e] bias and racism" against its African American and Indigenous residents and other people of color.[743] Following that three-part process, the city issued a formal apology and enacted a 2023 city budget that includes $10 million earmarked for programs recommended by the city's Municipal Reparations Commission, but does not include direct cash payments to descendants.[744]

Beginning with a truth-telling phase, the Rhode Island Black Heritage Society collaborated with city and state historical institutions to publish a 200-page report, A Matter of Truth: The Struggle for African Heritage and Indigenous People Equal Rights in Providence, Rhode Island (1620-2020).[745] The report documents the history of harm that Providence sought to remedy, including the lasting wounds caused by slavery, the genocide of Indigenous people, and the ongoing racial discrimination from 1620 to 2020 throughout the City of Providence and the State of Rhode Island.[746]

In the reconciliation phase, the Providence Cultural Equity Initiative and Roger Williams University published a report detailing their efforts to survey Providence community members, develop guiding principles for reparations, and develop a model and proof of concept to continue reconciliation in perpetuity, including through a multimedia initiative.[747] For its guiding principles on reconciliation, the Reconciliation Report noted the need for ongoing, communal learning, a focus on particular people and places, and the importance of efforts to cross barriers of identity and empathy.[748] The city's reconciliation principles also rejected depictions of participants that reduced them to racialized categories or tropes, while celebrating resilience both past and present.[749] Finally, Providence's reconciliation principles underscored action, emphasizing a community-owned but institutionally-supported process, and the principle that reconciliation cannot be accomplished without reparations.[750]

With regard to the third and final phase—reparations—the mayor's 2022 executive order created the Municipal Reparations Commission (Commission), consisting of 13 members from the local community.[751] The Commission held over a dozen public meetings, discussing the justifications for reparations and the form they might take.[752]

In November 2022, Jorge Elorza, the Mayor of Providence, signed a city budget allocating $10 million—provided to the city from the American Rescue Plan Act—to fund programs across seven of the Commission's recommendations.[753] The Mayor also issued an executive order recognizing and apologizing for the city's role in discriminating against African Heritage and Indigenous people.[754]

PART III: RECOMMENDATION FOR A FORMAL APOLOGY

XVI. Recommendation for a California Apology

The Legislature directed the Task Force to recommend appropriate remedies in consideration of the Task Force's findings. In those recommendations, the Legislature required the Task Force to address, among other issues, how the State of California will offer a formal apology on behalf of the people of California for the perpetration of gross human rights violations and crimes against humanity on African slaves and their descendants.[755]

Reparative apologies situate the harms of the past in society's present injustices, pay tribute to victims, and encourage communal reflection to ensure the historic wrongs are never forgotten and never repeated. In 2005, the United Nations adopted General Assembly Resolution 60/147 setting forth the Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law.[756] The Basic Principles and Guidelines include the principle of satisfaction.[757] "Satisfaction" can include, among other things, a public apology that constitutes an "acknowledgement of the facts and acceptance of responsibility," judicial and administrative sanctions against perpetrators, and commemorations and tributes to the victims.[758]

Apologies alone are inadequate reparations to victims.[759] But when combined with material forms of reparations, apologies provide an opportunity for communal reckoning with the past and repair for moral, physical, and dignitary harms.[760] An effective apology should both acknowledge and express regret for what was done to victims and their relatives and take responsibility.[761] Subtle differences in phrasing can denote unequivocal acceptance of responsibility for providing redress to victims and for making the changes necessary to guarantee non-repetition.[762] An apology should also be accompanied by a request for forgiveness.[763]

Apologies alone are inadequate reparations to victims. But when combined with material forms of reparations, apologies provide an opportunity for communal reckoning with the past and repair for moral, physical, and dignitary harms.

A universally satisfactory apology does not exist because each victim group has unique needs. However, in 2012, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights determined that the following elements form a "good" apology: (1) it must be made publicly; (2) it must be made at the place where the events occurred; (3) it must acknowledge responsibility for the violations that have been committed; (4) it must be made in the presence and with the participation of a considerable number of survivors and next of kin; (5) it must involve the highest state authority and senior state officials; and (6) it must be broadcast and disseminated fully throughout the state.[764]

The Task Force recommends the Legislature build upon the structure of previous state apologies and conform to international standards for the principle of satisfaction. The Legislature must apologize on behalf of the State of California and the People of California for the State's perpetration of gross human rights violations against Africans who were enslaved and their Descendants; and the State must do so through public apology, requests for forgiveness, censure of state perpetrators, and tributes to victims.

The Task Force recommends that the Legislature formally apologize on its own behalf, and on behalf of the State of California, for all of the harms delineated in Part I of this report, and for the atrocities committed by California state actors who promoted, enforced, and facilitated the institution of chattel slavery and its ongoing legacy of systemic discrimination. The Task Force has found that California, its executive branch, courts, and Legislature denied African Americans their fundamental liberties and denied their humanity throughout the state's history, from before the Civil War to the present. By participating in these horrors, California further perpetuated the harms African Americans faced, imbuing racial prejudice throughout society through segregation, public and private discrimination, and unequal disbursal of state and federal funding. The apology should also include a censure of the gravest barbarities carried out on behalf of the state by—or with the knowledge or support of—its representative officers, governing bodies, and people, as documented in this report.

In addition to acknowledging the atrocities committed by the state or which the state failed to deter or punish, the apology should also acknowledge California's responsibility to repair the harms and guarantee non-repetition. To be effective, a considerable number of survivors and their relatives should participate in the development of the apology. The Task Force recommends that the Legislature accomplish this by establishing a program or government body, such as the California American Freedman Affairs Agency, to facilitate listening sessions that allow victims and their relatives to narrate personal experiences and recount specific injustices caused by the State of California and elected and appointed officials at the state and local levels. The listening sessions should inform the language of the Legislature's apology and the methods enacted by the Legislature to satisfy victims.

Finally, the Legislature should order the commission of plaques or other commemorative tributes to secure communities' memory of the victims and the injustices, as occurred in California's apology for forced sterilizations.[765] Physical markers of past atrocities serve as reminders of the terror and harm and ensure the collective memory does not gloss over the past. Created in collaboration with stakeholders, plaques and memorials can honor survivors and raise awareness of descendants' ongoing struggle for justice.

Importantly, however, the Task Force reminds the Legislature that an apology on its own, no matter how forceful or detailed, is not enough; to have any effect under existing standards for reparations and reconciliation, the apology must take place within the same legislative effort that results in compensation and the enactment of policy recommendations to ensure non-repetition of the significant atrocities that would be addressed by the apology.

PART IV: METHODOLOGIES FOR CALCULATING COMPENSATION AND RESTITUTION

XVII. Calculations of Reparations and Forms of Compensation and Restitution

In enacting AB 3121, the Legislature charged the Task Force with recommending appropriate remedies in consideration of the Task Force's findings, including: (1) how any form of compensation to African Americans, with a special consideration for African Americans who are descendants of persons enslaved in the United States, is calculated; (2) what form of compensation should be awarded, through what instrumentalities, and who should be eligible for such compensation; and (3) how, in consideration of the Task Force's findings, any other forms of rehabilitation or restitution to African descendants are warranted and what form and scope those measures should take.[766]

In preparing the recommendations in Chapter 17 of this report, the Task Force consulted with a team of preeminent economists and policy experts, including Dr. Kaycea Campbell, Dr. William Spriggs, Dr. William A. Darity Jr., Dr. Thomas Craemer, and A. Kirsten Mullen. The Task Force also relied upon its own expertise, the public comments via in-person hearings, telephone or other remote access and email, and the testimony of dozens of witnesses who appeared before the Task Force.

In developing the recommendations regarding methodologies for calculating reparations, the Task Force considered, among numerous other factors, harms to African Americans (especially descendants of persons enslaved in the United States) attributable to the State of California and its local jurisdictions, and the availability of data. In many instances of atrocities, California has not collected data that would allow for precise calculations, and for those areas, the Task Force recommends, as AB 3121 directs, how the Legislature should calculate reparations in drafting and implementing a future state-level reparations scheme.

The difference in life expectancy between African Americans and white non-Hispanics in California can be interpreted as the cumulative effect of unequal treatment, from unequal access to health insurance and health care based on occupational discrimination, to discriminatory local zoning that exposes African American neighborhoods to greater environmental harm.

The Task Force voted to recommend that only those individuals who are able to demonstrate that they are the descendant of either an enslaved African American in the United States, or a free African American living in the United States prior to 1900, be eligible for monetary reparations.[767] The Task Force also determined that the State of California, potentially through the recommended new California American Freedman's Affairs Agency, should take responsibility for assisting any requester in establishing whether they qualify, by funding or otherwise handling the tracing and confirmation of this lineage through whatever means necessary. While the data available to the Task Force and its experts did not separate out descendant status from other racial or ethnic data, the Task Force generally recommends that the Legislature begin to collect data regarding descendant status and, when calculating reparations as recommended by the Task Force, take this data into account in formulating the most accurate amount of needed reparations as possible.

The Task Force also offers specific, preliminary estimates for the Legislature's consideration, regarding losses to African Americans in California, due to (a) health disparities, (b) disproportionate African American mass incarceration and over-policing, (c) housing discrimination, and (d) devaluation of African American businesses. Further, with regard to two other atrocities, unjust property takings by eminent domain and labor discrimination, the Task Force recommends a method of calculation for such reparations.

Although compensation and restitution for particular injuries is a necessary step toward comporting with international standards for reparations, it is not enough. Compensation or restitution for particular injuries, alone, would not provide a sufficient remedy for the many other longstanding laws and policies, and the scope of harm caused by them, detailed in Chapters 1 through 13 of this report against the whole class of people impacted by those atrocities. For these harms established by the detailed factual record recounted in Chapters 1 through 13, cumulative monetary payments must be made.

Health Harms

The difference in life expectancy between African Americans and white non-Hispanics[768] in California can be interpreted as the cumulative effect of unequal treatment, from unequal access to health insurance and health care based on occupational discrimination, to discriminatory local zoning that exposes African American neighborhoods to greater environmental harm (e.g., placement of toxic industries in residential neighborhoods, creation of food deserts), as well as explicit and implicit discriminatory behavior of medical personnel from which the state should shield its residents. These discriminatory practices are exacerbated by the State of California's willing complicity in federal redlining policies that created de jure racially-segregated living arrangements and the state's unwillingness to meaningfully address occupational discrimination. The Task Force recommends that the Legislature estimate the cost of health differences between African Americans and white non-Hispanic Californians and issue reparations according to that calculation, as follows:

1. Take the value of the individual's statistical life (roughly $10,000,000) and divide it by the white non-Hispanic life expectancy in California (78.6 years in 2021), to obtain the value for each year of life absent anti-Black racial discrimination ($127,226).[769]

2. Then calculate the difference in average life expectancy in years between African American and white non-Hispanic Californians (7.6 years in 2021).

3. Then multiply the two to arrive at a total loss in value of life for each African American due to health disparities based on racial discrimination ($966,918). An African American Californian at the average life expectancy of 71 years of age who spent their entire life in California would be entitled to the full amount.

4. For eligible recipients who spent part of their life in California, an annual value can be obtained by dividing the full amount by the African American life expectancy: $966,918 / 71 = $13,619. This would be the value of each year spent in California, to which an African American Californian would be entitled, subject to their eligibility.

Mass Incarceration and Over-Policing of African Americans

The "War on Drugs" began in 1971.[770] Established research shows that although people of all races use and sell illegal drugs at remarkably similar rates,[771] the federal and state governments disproportionately target African Americans for drug-related arrests.[772] To measure racial mass incarceration disparities in the 49 years of the War on Drugs from 1971 to 2020, the Task Force's experts estimated the disproportionate years spent behind bars for African American compared to white non-Hispanic drug offenders, and multiplied them with what a California state employee would have earned in a year on average (since incarcerated persons were forced, unpaid "employees" of the state). The Task Force's experts then added compensation for loss of freedom, comparable to Japanese American World War II prisoners, and arrive at $159,792 per year of disproportionate incarceration in 2020 dollars.

COURTESY OF SEAN RAYFORD VIA GETTY IMAGES

Protests break out in Charlotte, NC after police shooting. (2016)

To estimate the number of disproportionately incarcerated African American individuals:

1. The Task Force's experts used total California arrest figures for felony drug offenses and African American drug felony arrests from 1971 to 2020, to compute the African American percentage.

2. The Task Force's experts then computed the difference between the percentage of African American drug felony arrests and the estimated African American population percentage for each year. The difference between the two provides an estimate of the percentage of excess African American felony drug arrests.

3. The Task Force's experts obtained the number of African American excess felony drug arrests by multiplying the percentage of excess African American felony drug arrests times the total number of felony drug arrests.

4. The Task Force's experts then multiplied African American excess felony drug arrests by the average drug possession-related prison term of 1.48 years and the annual reparations amount of $20,000, and add the annual amounts up over the entire time period from 1971 to 2020, to arrive at a total sum of $227,858,891,023 in 2020 dollars.

5. Disproportionate law enforcement reduced the quality of life for all African American Californian descendants who lived in California during the "War on Drugs." The Task Force's experts therefore divided the total sum by the estimated 1,976,911 African American California residents who lived in the state in 2020, for an amount per recipient of $115,260 in 2020 dollars, or $2,352 for each year of residency in California from 1971 to 2020. The Task Force also recommends that African American California residents who served time for the possession or distribution of substances now legal (e.g., cannabis) should additionally be entitled to sue for compensation for their time in prison, or that the State of California create a special compensation fund to allow for specific redress of that specific harm.

Housing Discrimination

Nefarious housing discrimination has always existed in the United States, including in California even before the state's founding in 1850.[773] Individual participants in the housing market discriminated against African American buyers and renters, local zoning rules enforced segregation, and the state allowed this discrimination to occur even though the Supreme Court ruled it unconstitutional in Buchanan v. Warley (1917) 245 U.S. 60.[774] As a result, as of 2019, a year before the Reparations Task Force was established, African American Californians controlled far less of the state's average per-capita housing value than did white Californians.[775]

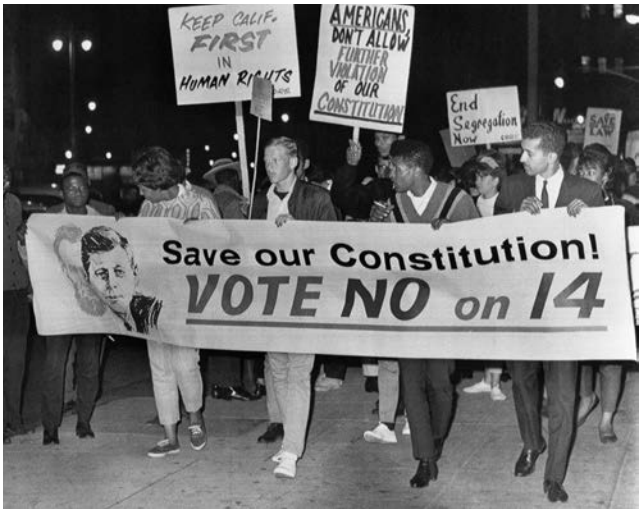
COURTESY OF BETTMANN ARCHIVE VIA GETTY IMAGES



Protest for fair housing. (1964)

The Task Force presents two potential methods to calculate the losses due to housing discrimination. The first calculates all monetary losses due to racial housing discrimination by calculating the average per capita white to African American homeownership wealth gap in 2019, and compounding interest on that gap until 2022.

The second method calculates monetary losses specifically due to redlining. As discussed in Chapter 5, Housing Segregation, redlining is a clear case of state-sanctioned housing discrimination beginning with the New Deal in 1933, and lasting for 44 years until the Community Reinvestment Act of 1977 formally (although not effectively) sought to combat the persisting effects of redlining.[776] While redlining denied federally insured, affordable mortgages to those in African American neighborhoods based on federal law, California could have insured redlined homes in place of the federal government to address this injustice in a timely fashion. But not only did California not engage in any policies to ameliorate the effect of federal redlining, it embraced redlining policies and other policies discriminating against African Americans Californians.[777]

Method 1: Estimating Financial Losses Due to All Forms of Housing Discrimination until the Present

In 2019, one year before the Legislature enacted AB 3121, and one year before the COVID-19 crisis hit, the average African American non-Hispanic home in California had a value of $593,200, and the average white non-Hispanic home had a value of $773,400.[778] At the time, about 36.8 percent of African American Californian households owned their own home, while 63.2 percent of white Californian households did, reflecting a homeownership gap of 26.4 percentage points.[779] Using 2019 census figures for the average number of people living in African American and white California households, the experts estimated the total wealth in home values controlled collectively by African American and white Californians.

2,213,986 / 2.44 = 907,371

[2,213,986 African Americans living in California in 2019[780] / 2.44 average number of African Americans per household in California in 2019[781] = 907,371 African American households in California]

14,364,928 / 2.36 = 6,086,834

[14,364,928 white Americans living in California in 2019[782] / 2.36 white Americans per household in California in 2019[783] = 6,086,834 white households in California]

The experts then estimated the total wealth in homes controlled in 2019 collectively by all African American non-Hispanic Californian households, and the total wealth in homes controlled in 2019 collectively by all white Californian households.

($593,200 • 907,371).368 = $198,076,911,610

[($593,200)[784] (907,371 African American households in California) (0.368)[785] = $198,076,911,610 in homeownership wealth owned by African American Californians in 2019]

($773,400 • 6,086,834).632 = $2,975,176,286,659

[($773,400)[786] (6,086,834 white households in California) (0.632)[787] = $2,975,176,286,659 in homeownership wealth owned by white Californians in 2019]

After calculating the total housing wealth controlled by each of the two racial groups, the experts computed the estimated per-capita amount held by each group—including those who do not own houses, due to housing discrimination.

$198,076,911,610 / 2,213,986 = $89,466

[$198,076,911,610 / 2,213,986 African Americans in California = $89,466 per capita African American Californian homeownership wealth]

$2,975,176,286,659 / 14,364,928 = $207,114

[$2,975,176,286,659 / 14,364,928 white Californians = $207,114 per capita white Californian homeownership wealth]

Comparing the two shows an estimated per capita home ownership wealth gap of $117,648 in 2019. Adding a compounded, annual 30-year mortgage interest rate (3.10 percent in 2020),[788] the African American and white homeownership gap in California, in 2020, is approximately $121,295 in 2020 dollars.

[$117,648 (1 + 0.031) = $121,295 in 2020 dollars]

While this figure represents the cumulative effect of all sources of discrimination, including individuals (home owners, real estate agents), corporate banks, local zoning boards, as well as state and federal actors (e.g. through policies like redlining), it represents a cautious estimate because it assumes that reparations for de jure discrimination (i.e., redlining) should not have been paid earlier (i.e., after 1977 when the federal government passed a law attempting to counteract the persisting effects of redlining).

Method 2: Estimating Financial Losses Due Primarily to Redlining

Alternatively, the Legislature could estimate the financial losses due to housing discrimination by calculating losses due primarily to redlining. This process follows a similar method to the one used above but uses data instead from 1930 (three years before the start of federal redlining in 1933) and 1980 (three years after the Community Reinvestment Act of 1977 formally sought to end private lending practices that reproduced redlining). While the Task Force would ideally use data from 1933 and 1977 to performthis calculation, at the time of this report, relevant data from those years is unavailable, andthe Task Force relies instead on data from the nearest decennial censuses (1930 and 1980).

In 1930, Black homes in California had a mean value of $4,535, and white homes in California had a mean value of $6,067, reflecting a $1,532 difference.[789] At the time, in California, about 37.6 percent of African Americans owned their own home, versus 48.2 percent of white Americans, revealing a homeownership gap of 10.6 percent.[790] From this data, the Task Force's experts estimated the total wealth held in home values collectively by African Americans and white Californians.

The Task Force's expert team estimated the total wealth in homes held in each year. For 1930:

($4,535 • 22,595).376 = $38,528,090

[($4,535 mean value of an African American home in California in 1930) (22,595 African American households in California in 1930[791]) (0.376) = $38,528,090 total African American wealth in California homes in 1930]

($6,067 • 1,482,203).482 = $4,334,397,340

[($6,067 mean value of a white home in California in 1930) (1,482,203 white households in California in 1930[792]) (0.482) = $4,334,397,340 total white wealth in California homes in 1930]

Calculating the total wealth held by each of the two racial groups, they then computed the estimated wealth per-capita (i.e. per person) in each group (whether homeowner or not).

$38,528,090 / 81,048 = $475

[$38,528,090 total African American wealth in California homes in 1930 / 81,048 African Americans in California in 1930[793] = $475 African American per capita wealth in California homes in 1930]

$4,334,397,340 / 5,408,260 = $801

[$4,334,397,340 total white wealth in California homes in 1930 / 5,408,260 white Americans in California in 1930[794] = $801 white per capita wealth in California homes in 1930]

Taking the difference between the two ($801 - $475) results in an estimated per capita African American-white home value wealth gap of $326 (in 1930 dollars), favoring white Californians. This gap represents the unequal starting positions for African American and white Californians even before the federal government massively subsidized white homeownership (while excluding African American applicants) through the New Deal and GI Bill.[795]

In other words, the Task Force's expert team calculated that discriminatory redlining facilitated by the State of California caused the average African American in California to lose $160,931 in homeownership wealth.

The experts then repeated the calculation with data from 1980, three years after the federal government attempted to end the effects of redlining through the Community Reinvestment Act of 1977.[796] Because the 1980 census did not provide the total number of white or African American households in California, the experts estimated this figure by dividing the total number of white and African American Californians by the mean or average number of white Americans and African Americans per household that year:

1,819,281 / 3.67 = 495,717

[1,819,281 African Americans in California in 1980[797] / 3.67 African Americans per household in 1980[798] = 495,717 African American California households in 1980]

18,030,893 / 3.22 = 5,599,656

[18,030,893 white Americans in California in 1980[799] / 3.22 white Americans per household in 1980[800] = 5,599,656 white American California households in 1980]

In 1980, the average African American non-Hispanic California home was worth $66,670, and the average white non-Hispanic California home an estimated $100,516 in 1980 dollars.[801]

The California homeownership gap in 1980 amounted to 20.1 percentage points, with 40.6 percent of Black homes being owner-occupied, and 60.7 percent of white homes being owner occupied.[802]

($66,670 • 495,717).406 = $13,418,077,670

[($66,670 average value of an African American home in California in 1980[803]) (495,717 African American households in California in 1980) (0.406) = $13,418,077,670 total homeownership wealth of African Americans in California in 1980]

($100,516 • 5,599,656).607 = $341,652,998,655

[($100,516 average value of a white home in California in 1980[804]) (5,599,656 white American households in California in 1980) (0.607) = $341,652,998,655 total homeownership wealth of white Americans in California in 1980]

Divided by the entire African American population in California in 1980, and the entire white population in California in 1980, respectively, each of these estimates yields the per-capita wealth in homes held by each group. The estimated average per capita African American wealth in California homes in 1980 amounted to $7,375, and the estimated per capita white homeownership wealth in California homes amounted to $18,948. In short, white Californians' per capita home wealth was $11,573 (in 1980 dollars) greater than that of African American Californians.

To identify how much of the 1980 per-capita homeownership wealth gap was due to California's complicity in federal redlining discrimination, the 1930 per-capita homeownership wealth gap can be subtracted from the 1980 value. After adjusting the 1930 per-capita homeownership wealth gap into its equivalent purchasing power in 1980 dollars,[805] subtracting the 1930 per-capita homeownership wealth gap from the 1980 per-capita homeownership wealth gap ($11,573 - $1,483) results in a redlining per-capita wealth gap of $10,090, quantifying how much Black Californians lost in homeownership wealth due to federal redlining discrimination and California's complicity in this policy. Compounding $10,090 up to 2020 using the annual 30-year mortgage interest rates[806] yields a per-capita value of $161,508 in 2020 dollars. In other words, the Task Force's expert team calculated that discriminatory redlining facilitated by the State of California caused the average African American in California to lose $161,508 in homeownership wealth.

To estimate a hypothetical amount California might have to pay to make up only for redlining, the expert team multiplied the average loss to African American Californians due to redlining with the number of African Americans living in the State in 1980. While the Task Force recommends reparations payments to descendants, specifically, because the U.S. Census does not currently identify the number of such descendants in the State, this report uses the number of census respondents who identified as Black or African American alone as a rough estimate. Multiplying the average-per capita housing wealth gap in 2020 dollars ($161,508) with the number of African American residents in California in 1980 (1,819,281)[807] yields $293,828,435,748—or approximately $294 billion (in 2020 dollars). If all 1,976,911 African American non-Hispanic California residents who lived in the State in 2020[808] were eligible African American descendants of the enslaved in the United States, each would receive housing reparations up to $148,630—or $3,378 for each year between 1933 and 1977 spent as a resident of the State of California.

Unjust Property Takings

As documented in Chapter Five, Housing Segregation, California built its cities over the bones of the African American neighborhoods that it tore apart through eminent domain,[809] building the highways, cities, and parks that have enabled the State of California to become the fourth or fifth largest economy in the world.[810] The unjust taking of land did more than just seize property—it destroyed communities and forced African Americans out of their neighborhoods and watering holes. At its peak in 1980, 7.7 percent of the population in California was Black.[811] By 2020, that number dropped to about five percent.[812] In 2018 alone, 75,000 Black Americans left the state.[813] The State's more expensive coastal cities alone have shed 275,000 Black residents.[814]

Due to the voluminous records associated with the State's many eminent domain actions throughout history, the Task Force and its experts did not have sufficient capacity, within the lifespan of the Task Force, to provide a calculation of the harm caused by unjust property takings throughout the State. Nevertheless, the Task Force's economic expert team explored two potential methods to quantify the damage caused by these actions, examining the displacement of African Americans Californians by the state and its local governments through eminent domain.

One method the Legislature could undertake would be to calculate the loss in property value experienced by displaced African Americans or descendants. This could be done by examining the market value of the seized property at the time it was taken, subtracting the amount paid to the owner after eminent domain, and adding the increase in the property's net value by adding in a fair measure of the estimated appreciation to the present day. A second method of estimating loss could measure the compensation due by using the current value of the property seized from African Americans or descendants. These methods for calculating harm are complicated if the property value has declined in value since it was seized, or if the seized property is now being used for infrastructure whose value is difficult to quantify. But, based on its experts' recommendations, the Task Force suggests some strategies to assist the Legislature in overcoming that hurdle.

COURTESY OF AMERICAN STOCK ARCHIVE/ARCHIVE PHOTOS VIA GETTY IMAGES

Eviction of families in Oakland, CA to make way for a housing project (1941)

Devaluation of African American Businesses

As detailed in Chapters 10 and 13, discriminatory policies resulted in the decimation and devaluation of African American businesses.[815] Business formation results from a combination of factors creating demand for businesses—including the public sector, households, business-to-business transactions, and the entrepreneurial environment—as well as existing rules, regulations, and taxes. But, as documented in Chapters 10 and 13, the doors to entrepreneurial opportunity are much more closed to the state's African American residents than its white ones due to discrimination and its effects, including sharp differences in access to capital and equity.[816] While the lack of business data collected by the State of California limited the Task Force's experts' ability to quantify the harms caused by discrimination against African American businesses, other available data from the United States Census can be used to approximate some of those harms. Based on its experts' analysis, the Task Force recommends a method for the Legislature to calculate the harms caused by discrimination against African American businesses based on the expected number of African American businesses that should exist in California, given the state's policies, aggregate household incomes, and demand for public investments, goods, and services.

The doors to entrepreneurial opportunity are much more closed to the state's African American residents than its white ones due to discrimination and its effects, including sharp differences in access to capital and equity.

The State of California does not collect information on business establishments by race, and does not maintain a database of contractors at the state or local level by race. Instead, the Task Force's experts reviewed the U.S. Census Bureau's Survey of Business Owners, which provides information about businesses, including information distinguished by race.[817] The most recent data from the Census's survey of business owners is from 2012.[818] Though the Census only gives a snapshot of differences in business ownership in 2012, it displays the total wealth acquired by African American versus white businesses in California, reflecting the cumulative effects of racial inequalities resulting from actions by the State of California. As a result, it provides a guide for measuring the losses to business wealth caused by discrimination.

In 2012, the U.S. Census Bureau reported that there were 1,875,847 white non-Hispanic owned firms in California, compared to 166,553 African American non-Hispanic owned firms.[819] Given California's population in 2012,[820] the state had a business ownership rate of roughly 806.7 firms per 10,000 white residents and 738.9 per 10,000 African American residents.[821] The white non-Hispanic owned firms had total sales, receipts or value of shipments totaling around $1.14 trillion, while African American non-Hispanic owned firms had about $14 billion.[822] In other words, white-owned firms had total sales, receipts, or value of shipments 80-times larger than that of African American-owned firms.

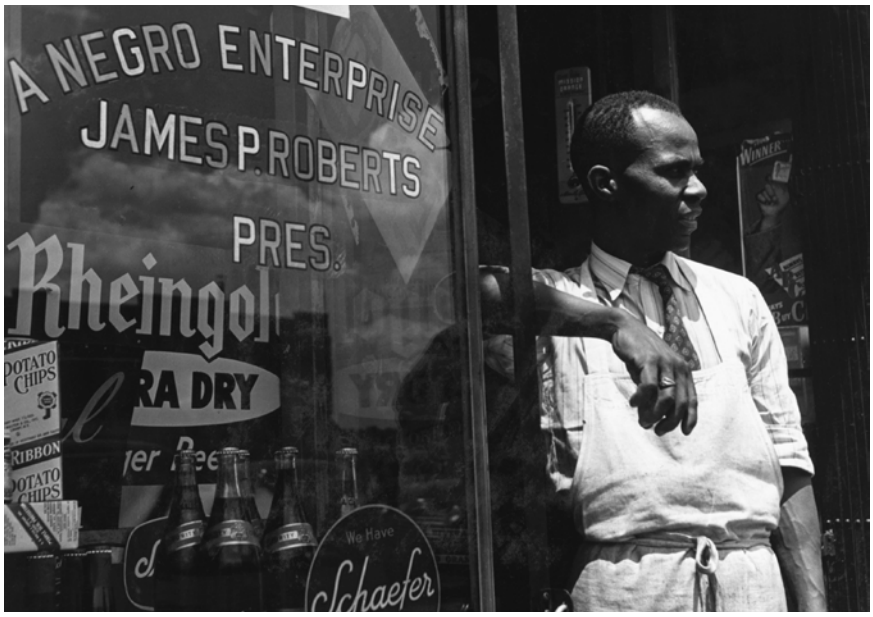
Census data show that African American-owned businesses are not overrepresented in the type of ethnic enclave industries of accommodations and food services, or retail sales catering towards an African American market.[823] So, if there were no discriminatory restrictions on access to capital or business equity—that is, if African American and white entrepreneurs competed on an equal playing field—the industry of African American and white businesses would be far more similar, reflecting the business opportunities that exist in California. For instance, the discrimination documented in this report explains why African American businesses lag behind white ones in the construction industry, a capital-intensive industry where access to government contracts matters greatly.[824] The history and ongoing effects of residential segregation and redlining further limited opportunities for African American construction firms in the private sector,[825] highlighting again how discrimination has produced the African American and white business wealth gap in construction, a trend that reoccurs across nearly every other industry.[826]

The Task Force recommends estimating the effect of discrimination against African American businesses by implementing an equation that calculates a figure for each state separately, based on the general demand environment of state and local government contracting and household income. Controlling for each state allows us to then control for differences in each state's business environment. Then estimates can incorporate the number of businesses formed, and sales and receipts generated on those factors. This is an approach used by many sociologists researching differences in business formation using the business environment.[827]

Using this method, the Task Force's experts estimate that African Americans in California were able to create 59,951 fewer firms than African Americans in other states, on average, under the same circumstances, reflecting the disadvantages unique to California. The average sales of firms in California, according to the 2012 U.S. Census Survey, was $1,103,966.[828] Because the average value of a non-financial business is generally 2.3 times its sales value[829] that would give these firms an average value of approximately $2,539,122. Multiplying that value times the missing number of businesses yields $152,222,903,022 in missing African American business wealth in California. On a per capita basis, using the African American population as of 2020,[830] that would amount to roughly $77,000 per African American in California.

COURTESY OF BETTMANN VIA GETTY IMAGES



James P. Roberts stands in front of his store, proudly labeled "A Negro Enterprise." (1950)

Conclusion

Since this list of harms and atrocities is not exhaustive, the total of the estimated losses to African American Californians is not a final estimate of losses, nor, given the Task Force's determination of eligibility for compensation, is it is a recommendation of an amount of reparations payments. Rather, it is an economically conservative initial assessment of what losses, at a minimum, the State of California caused or could have prevented, but did not. Further data collection and research would be required to augment these initial loss-estimates. And the Legislature would then have to decide how to translate loss-estimates into proposed reparations amounts and make determinations of who would ultimately be eligible to receive those amounts.

The Task Force also recommends that the Legislature provide reparations for less quantifiable harms. For example, pain and suffering from generations of discrimination represents real harm experienced by descendants.

Also, because in some instances, more data and research are required to calculate the just amount of reparations, the Task Force recommends that the Legislature make a substantial initial down payment on reparations, to be augmented over time with additional payments as new evidence becomes available. It should be communicated to the public that the substantial initial down payment is the beginning of a conversation about redressing the economic and societal harm of historical injustices, not the end of it. Delay of reparations is in itself an injustice that causes more suffering and may ultimately deny justice, especially to the elderly among the harmed. For this reason, the Task Force recommends prioritizing elderly recipients in the monetary reparations program.

PART V: POLICY RECOMMENDATIONS

The Legislature directed the Task Force to recommend appropriate remedies in consideration of the Task Force's findings; to address how California laws and policies that continue to disproportionately and negatively affect African Americans as a group and perpetuate the lingering material and psychosocial effects of slavery can be eliminated; to address how the resulting injuries can be reversed; to provide appropriate policies, programs, projects, and recommendations for the purpose of reversing the injuries; and to identify any other "forms of rehabilitation or restitution to African descendants" necessary.[831] AB 3121 thus requires that the Task Force provide concrete, common-sense, and necessary recommendations to end, once and for all, the discriminatory harm and suffering that those descended from enslaved Africans have uniquely endured and continue to experience in every facet of life.

In response to the Legislature's direction, Part V of the report contains policy recommendations tailored to the harms discussed in Chapters 1 through 13, with "[s]pecial [c]onsideration for African Americans [w]ho are [d]escendants of [p]ersons [e]nslaved in the United States."[832] In the Task Force's view, adoption and implementation of these recommendations is crucial to effectuating AB 3121's purpose and beginning the long-overdue process of providing true reparations to African Americans in California.

AB 3121 thus requires that the Task Force, and ultimately the Legislature and the larger public, provide concrete, common-sense, and necessary recommendations to end, once and for all, the discriminatory harm and suffering that those descended from enslaved Africans have uniquely endured and continue to experience in every facet of life.

As the Legislature recognized in AB 3121,[833] and as Part I of this report documented, emancipation from enslavement did not end the badges and incidents of slavery. By all measures, from health to wealth, African Americans as a group, and especially descendants of those enslaved, live with the persistent consequences of this legacy—consequences that include a shorter life expectancy, a vast wealth gap borne of stolen labor, political disenfranchisement, mass incarceration, the destruction of African American families, inadequate and biased health care, limited education and employment opportunities, unjust takings of property, redlining, and the destruction of African American-owned businesses and cultural institutions. Descendants of those who were enslaved have uniquely carried the weight of the harms and atrocities visited upon their ancestors, as trauma and loss have passed from generation to generation.

As described in Chapters 1 through 13, the harms inflicted upon African Americans have not been incidental or accidental—they have been by design. They are the result of an all-encompassing web of discriminatory laws, regulations, and policies enacted by government. These laws and policies have enabled government officials and private individuals and entities to perpetuate the legacy of slavery by subjecting African Americans as a group to discrimination, exclusion, neglect, and violence in every facet of American life.[834] And there has been no comprehensive effort to disrupt and dismantle institutionalized racism, stop the harm, and redress the specific injuries caused to descendants and the larger African American community. This is not to say that laws and society have not changed at all. But as Malcolm X expressed, "If you stick a knife in my back nine inches and pull it out six inches, there's no progress. If you pull it all the way out, that's not progress. Progress is healing the wound that the blow made."[835]

AB 3121 invokes the international standards of remedy for wrongs and injuries caused by the state.[836] In developing its policy recommendations in Part V, the Task Force followed the standards embodied in the U.N. Principles on Reparations. These recommended changes or substantially similar measures must be implemented in some form in order for any California reparatory effort to be able to satisfy the international reparations framework's requirements that there be both "rehabilitation" and "guarantees of non-repetition." Further, a number of the policies are also intended to provide restitution to augment the Task Force's recommendations for restitution and compensation in Part IV, Chapter 17, Economic Calculations. Policies necessary to achieve rehabilitation, while also affording special consideration to Descendants, should have the scope needed to bring repair to all those who have endured the harms outlined in this report and to ensure that the guarantee of non-repetition for those harms is fully realized.

The enormity of the task before California and the nation cannot be overstated. The policies recommended in this report, while wide-ranging, are not exhaustive—they are only a start. The harms to be repaired have been more than 400 years in the making. Their undoing will require ceaseless vigilance and a commitment to continually learn and meet the challenges ahead. Time and again, universal policies that have not been specifically directed to stop and repair the harm that continues to afflict African Americans have succeeded only in allowing that harm to continue. Channeling the voices of the hundreds of individuals who testified or offered public comment in Task Force meetings or who participated in community listening sessions, the Task Force urges the Legislature to ensure an end to the ongoing harms and atrocities experienced by its African Americans. This time must be different.

In Part V of the report, the Task Force recommends that the Legislature adopt the following policy proposals:

Chapter 18: Introduction to the Task Force's Policy Recommendations

a. Introduction
b. General Structural Policy Recommendations
    1. Create and Fund the California American Freedman Affairs Agency
    2. Repeal Proposition 209
    3. Mandate Effective Racial Impact Analyses
    4. Require Agency Transparency
    5. Make Legislative Findings that Build Legislative Records that Reflect the Historic and Present State of Pervasive Structural Barriers and Discrimination Against African Americans and Support Reparative Enactments
    6. Transmit the AB 3121 Task Force report to the President of the United States and the United States Congress

Chapter 19: Policies Addressing Enslavement

1. Enact a Resolution Affirming the State's Protection of Descendants of Enslaved People and Guaranteeing Protection of the Civil, Political, and Socio-Cultural Rights of Descendants of Enslaved People
2. Amend the California Constitution to Prohibit Involuntary Servitude
3. Require Payment of Fair Market Value for Labor Provided by Incarcerated Persons (Whether in Jail or Prison)
4. Emphasize the "Rehabilitation" in the California Department of Corrections & Rehabilitation (CDCR)
5. Abolish the Death Penalty
6. Prohibit Private Prisons from Benefiting from Contracts with CDCR to Provide Reentry Services to Incarcerated or Paroled Individuals

Chapter 20: Policies Addressing Racial Terror

1. Advance the Study of the Intergenerational, Direct, and Indirect Impacts of Racism
2. Establish and Fund Community Wellness Centers in African American Communities
3. Fund Research to Study the Mental Health Issues Within California's African American Youth Population, and Address Rising Suicide Rates Among African American Youth
4. Expand the Membership of the Mental Health Services Oversight and Accountability Commission to Include an Expert in Reducing Disparities in Mental Health Care Access and Treatment
5. Fund Community-Driven Solutions to Decrease Community Violence at the Family, School, and Neighborhood Levels in African American Communities
6. Address and Remedy Discrimination Against African American LGBTQ+ Youth and Adults, Reduce Economic Disparities for the African American LGBTQ+ Population, and Reduce Disparities in Mental Health and Health Care Outcomes for African American LGBTQ+ Youth and Adults
7. Implement Procedures to Address the Over-Diagnosis of Emotional Disturbance Disorders, Including Conduct Disorder, in African American Children
8. Disrupt the Mental Health Crisis and County Jail Cycle in African American Communities

9. Create and Fund Equivalents to the UC-PRIME-LEAD-ABC Program for Psychologists, Licensed Professional Counselors, and Licensed Professional Therapists
10. Eliminate Legal Protections for Peace Officers Who Violate Civil or Constitutional Rights
11. Recommend Abolition of the Qualified Immunity Doctrine to Allow Access to Justice for Victims of Police Violence

Chapter 21: Policies Addressing Political Disenfranchisement

1. Require District-Based Voting and Independent Redistricting Commissions to Safeguard Against the Dilution of the African American Voting Bloc
2. Increase Funding to Support the California Department of Justice's Enforcement of Voting Rights in California
3. Enact Legislation Aligning with the Objectives of AB 2576 and Establish Separate Funding to Support Educational and Civic Engagement Activities
4. Provide Funding to NGOs Whose Work Focuses on Increasing Civic Engagement Among African Americans
5. Declare Election Day a Paid State Holiday and Provide Support to Essential Workers to Increase Access to the Polls
6. Remove the Barrier of Proving Identity to Vote
7. Increase Jury Participation of Persons with Felony Convictions and Discourage Judges and Attorneys from Excluding Potential Jurors Solely for Having a Prior Felony Conviction
8. Increase Efforts to Restore the Voting Rights of Formerly and Currently Incarcerated Persons and Provide Access to Those Who Are Currently Incarcerated and Eligible to Vote

Chapter 22: Policies Addressing Housing Segregation and Unjust Property Takings

1. Prioritize Responsible Development in Communities and Housing Development
2. Enact Policies Overhauling the Housing Industrial Complex
3. Collect Data on Housing Discrimination
4. Provide Anti-Racism Training to Workers in the Housing Field
5. Expand Grant Funding to Community-Based Organizations to Increase Home Ownership
6. Provide Property Tax Relief to African Americans, Especially Descendants, Living in Formerly Redlined Neighborhoods, Who Purchase or Construct a New Home
7. Provide Direct Financial Assistance to Increase Home Ownership Among African Americans, Especially Descendants, Through Shared Appreciation Loans and Subsidized Down Payments, Mortgages, and Homeowner's Insurance
8. Require State Review and Approval of All Residential Land Use Ordinances Enacted by Historically and Currently Segregated Cities and Counties
9. Repeal Crime-Free Housing Policies
10. Increase Affordable Housing for African American Californians
11. Provide Restitution for Racially Motivated Takings
12. Provide a Right to Return for Displaced African American Californians

Chapter 23: Policies Addressing Separate and Unequal Education

1. Increase Funding to Schools to Address Racial Disparities
2. Fund Grants to Local Educational Agencies to Address the COVID-19 Pandemic's Impacts on Preexisting Racial Disparities in Education
3. Implement Systematic Review of School Discipline Data
4. Improve Access to Educational Opportunities for All Incarcerated People
5. Adopt Mandatory Curriculum for Teacher Credentialing and Trainings for School Personnel and Grants for Teachers
6. Employ Proven Strategies to Recruit African American Teachers
7. Require that Curriculum at All Levels Be Inclusive and Free of Bias
8. Advance the Timeline for Ethnic Studies Classes
9. Adopt a K-12 Black Studies Curriculum
10. Adopt the Freedom School Summer Program
11. Reduce Racial Disparities in the STEM Fields for African American Students
12. Expand Access to Career Technical Education for Descendants
13. Improve Access to Public Schools
14. Fund Free Tuition to California Public Colleges and Universities
15. Eliminate Standardized Testing for Admission to Graduate Programs in the University of California and California State University Systems
16. Identify and Eliminate Racial Bias and Discrimination in Statewide K-12 Proficiency Assessments

Chapter 24: Policies Addressing Racism in Environment and Infrastructure

1. Increase Greenspace Access and Recreation Opportunities in African American Communities
2. Test for and Eliminate Toxicity in Descendant Communities
3. Increase Trees in Redlined and Descendant Communities

4. Develop Climate Resilience Hubs in Redlined and Descendant Communities
5. Remove Lead in Drinking Water
6. Prevent Highway Expansion and Mitigate Transportation Pollution

Chapter 25: Policies Addressing Pathologizing the African American Family

1. Reduce and Seek to Eliminate Racial Disparities in the Removal of African American Children from Their Homes and Families
2. Reduce the Placement of African American Children in Foster Care and Increase Kinship Placements for African American Children
3. Establish and Fund Early Intervention Programs that Address Intimate Partner Violence (IPV) Within the African American Community
4. Eliminate Interest on Past-Due Child Support and Eliminate Back Child Support Debt
5. Eliminate or Reduce Charges for Phone Calls from Detention Facilities Located Within the State of California
6. Address Disproportionate Homelessness Among African American Californians
7. Address Disparities and Discrimination Associated with Substance Use Recovery Services
8. End the Under-Protection of African American Women and Girls

Chapter 26: Policies Addressing Control Over Creative, Cultural, & Intellectual Life

9. Provide State Funding to Address Disparities in Compensation Among Athletes in the University of California, California State University, and Community College Systems and Funding to Support African American Athletes in Capitalizing on their Name, Image, and Likeness and Intellectual Property
10. Prohibit Discrimination Based on Natural and Protective Hair Styles in All Competitive Sports
11. Identify and Remove Monuments, Plaques, State Markers, and Memorials Memorializing and Preserving Confederate Culture; Erect Monuments, Plaques, and Memorials Memorializing and Preserving the Reconstruction Era and the African American Community
12. Provide Funding to the Proposed California American Freedman Affairs Agency, Specifically for Creative, Cultural, and Intellectual Life
13. Eliminate the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation's Practice of Banning Books

Chapter 27: Policies Addressing Stolen Labor and Hindered Opportunity

1. Create Greater Transparency in Gubernatorial Appointments
2. Provide Guaranteed Income Program for Descendants
3. Eliminate Barriers to Licensure for People with Criminal Records
4. Transform the Minimum Wage Back into a Living Wage
5. Advance Pay Equity Through Employment Transparency and Equity in Hiring and Promotion
6. Create and Fund Professional Career Training
7. Create or Fund Apprenticeship Grant Programs
8. Fund African American Businesses
9. Fund African American Banks

Chapter 28: Policies Addressing the Unjust Legal System

1. Allocate Funds to Remedy Harms and Promote Opportunity
2. Eliminate Barriers for African American Prospective Attorneys by Funding Legal Education and Ending Discriminatory Gatekeeping at the State Bar
3. Prohibit Cash Bail and Mandate that Those Who Are Acquitted or Exonerated be Reimbursed by the Entity or Entities at Fault
4. Enact Enforceable Legislation with Penalties that Dismantles the School to Prison Pipeline and Decriminalizes the Youth Justice System
5. Amend the Penal Code to Clarify and Confirm Decriminalization of Transit and Other Public Disorder Offenses
6. Amend the Penal Code to Shift Public Disorder Infractions and Low-Level Crimes Outside of Law Enforcement Jurisdiction
7. Prohibit Pretextual Traffic and Pedestrian Stops, Probation Inquiries, and Consent-Only Searches
8. Mandate Policies and Training on Bias-Free Policing
9. Enact Legislation that Requires the Department of Justice to Promulgate Model Law Enforcement Policies Designed to Prevent Racial Disparities in Policing
10. Repeal Three Strikes Sentencing
11. Strengthen and Expand the Racial Justice Act
12. Assess and Remedy Racially Biased Treatment of African American Adults and Juveniles in Custody in County Jails, State Prisons, Juvenile Halls, and Youth Camps
13. Accelerate Scheduled Closures of Identified California State Prisons and Close Ten Prisons Over the Next Five Years, with Financial Savings Redirected to the California American Freedman Affairs Agency

Chapter 29: Policies Addressing Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect

1. Address Health Inequities Among African American Californians by Funding the California Health Equity and Racial Justice Fund
2. Improve Health Insurance Coverage
3. Evaluate the Efficacy of Health Care Laws, Including Recent Enactments
4. Address Anti-Black Discrimination in Health Care
5. Mandate Standardized Data Collection
6. Provide Medical Social Workers/Health Care Advocates
7. Improve Diversity Among Clinical Trial Participants
8. Remedy the Higher Rates of Injury and Death Among African American Mothers and Infants
9. Meet the Health Needs of African American Elders
10. Remedy Disparities in Oral Health Care
11. Fix Racially Biased Algorithms and Medical Artificial Intelligence in Health Care
12. Fund and Expand the UC PRIME-LEAD-ABC Program to be Available at All UC Medical Campuses
13. Create and Fund Equivalents to the UC-PRIME -LEAD-ABC Program for Psychologists, Licensed Professional Counselors, and Licensed Professional Therapists
14. Permanently Fund the California Medicine Scholars Program and Create and Fund Equivalent Pathway Programs for Students in the CSU and UC Systems
15. Review and Prevent Racially Biased Disciplinary Practices by the Medical Board of California
16. Address Food Injustice

Chapter 30: Policies Addressing the Wealth Gap

17. Fund and Conduct a Study to Calculate the Overall Racial Wealth Gap in California
18. Encourage the Federal Government to Use the National Racial Wealth Gap to Determine Federal-Level Reparations

PART VI: MEASURING THE BASELINE FOR RACIAL JUSTICE ACT IMPLEMENTATION

XXXI. California Prosecutorial and Judicial Race Data Survey: Summary of Responses

AB 2542, the California Racial Justice Act of 2020 (Act or RJA), codified in Section 745 of the California Penal Code, prohibits California, through any criminal prosecutor acting in the name of the People or the State, from seeking or obtaining a criminal conviction, or from imposing a sentence, based upon race, ethnicity, or national origin.[837] The Act allows an accused person to seek dismissal of pending charges, or vacatur of a conviction or sentence, through a claim alleging that a charge, conviction, or sentence was tainted by racial bias.[838] The Act originally applied prospectively to cases in which judgment had not been entered prior to January 1, 2021.[839] However, AB 256, the Racial Justice Act for All, enacted in 2022, extended the Act's protections to apply retroactively to most cases in which judgment was entered before January 1, 2021.[840]

The Act allows an accused person to seek dismissal of pending charges, or vacatur of a conviction or sentence, through a claim alleging that a charge, conviction, or sentence was tainted by racial bias.

The Racial Justice Act offers different pathways to demonstrating a violation. Some involve showing overt bias or animus, such as use of discriminatory language by a courtroom actor.[841] Others allow for claims that arise from implicit bias.[842] A central purpose of the Act was to respond to McCleskey v. Kemp (1987) 481 U.S. 279, 312-313, in which the U.S. Supreme Court accepted racial disparities as "an inevitable part of our criminal justice system" and held that these disparities generally do not violate the Constitution in the absence of proof of discriminatory intent.[843]

With the Racial Justice Act, California rejected the acceptance of racial disparities and sought to begin the process of reforming our unjust legal system. Under the Act, the law is violated when an accused person has been charged with or convicted of a more serious offense than similarly situated persons of other races, ethnicities, or national origins who commit similar offenses, and the evidence establishes that the prosecution more frequently sought or obtained convictions for more serious offenses against people who share the accused person's race, ethnicity, or national origin.[844] The Act similarly forbids sentencing disparities arising from race, ethnicity, or nationality, including that of victims.[845]

Racial Justice Act violations can occur at a number of different decision points, including the decision regarding which charges to bring, the convictions obtained, and in sentencing. Where claims of violations involve comparisons to the treatment of others, information about an accused individual's race, the race of the complainant or victim, and the race of those in comparable cases can be critical to establishing a prima facie case that a violation has occurred. A lack of data on race in comparable cases can severely limit the ability of an accused or convicted person to support claims of racial bias. The same is true when agencies do not track or share data on key decisions made by the prosecutor, judge, or jury in comparable cases. This lack of critical information impedes implementation and diminishes the efficacy of the Racial Justice Act. Without access to data, the promise of the Act has the potential to ring hollow for many. Gauging the availability of RJA-relevant data is thus critical to understanding the landscape for potential claims that may be raised under the Act.

In order to establish a baseline regarding the collection of RJA-relevant data, the AB 3121 Reparations Task Force requested that the California Department of Justice Research Center (DOJRC) survey all 58 California superior courts and district attorney offices, as well as a select group of 11 of the largest city attorney offices, regarding what data elements their agencies regularly collect when dealing with criminal cases. The 126 responding criminal justice agencies and courts completed an online questionnaire pertaining to data collected and maintained by their agency, with a focus on what racial data the agencies hold as well as data on factors that may involve prosecutorial or judicial discretion. Chapter 31 of the Task Force's report describes and summarizes the findings.

Notably, the DOJRC conducted the survey prior to the retroactive application of the Act and prior to implementation of AB 2418 (2021-22), the Justice Data Accountability and Transparency Act. The latter statute sought to mandate that agencies collect and transmit specified data, including data on the race of accused persons and victims, to the Department of Justice.[846] These data collection and transmission requirements were set to commence in 2027.[847] However, AB 2418 conditioned the operation of its provisions upon an adequate appropriation by the Legislature.[848] As of the time of this Report's issuance, there has not been an appropriation to this effect. As set forth in Part V, the Task Force's recommendations to the Legislature include full funding of AB 2418 and any further data collection, extraction, analysis, and dissemination that is needed for the Racial Justice Act to be implemented and applied without limitation. An unfunded or otherwise unfulfilled mandate will gravely undermine the law and risk the persistence of unacceptable racial bias in the criminal legal system.

Overall, in the absence of requirements like those set forth in AB 2418, there appears to be a large amount of discretion, and likewise variability, in what data elements are collected across California district attorneys offices, superior courts, and select city attorney's offices and between counties. This lack of consistency and absence of data on key variables could present substantial challenges to presenting and evaluating claims of racial discrimination in the criminal justice system, and could increase the difficulty of sustaining claims of Racial Justice Act violations in some California counties more than others.

PART VII: LISTENING TO THE COMMUNITY

Chapter 32

The Task Force engaged the Ralph J. Bunche Center[849] at the University of California, Los Angeles, to design and implement a plan in which it could facilitate the collection and documenting of important community perspectives independent of the formal meetings of the Task Force, through: (1) holding community listening sessions, and engaging with at least 867 people during 2022; (2) collecting seven oral histories and 46 personal testimonies; and (3) administering two statewide surveys. The first survey comprised a representative sample of all Californians, with 2,499 respondents. The second sample, with 1,934 respondents, was over 90 percent African American, and reached through connections to listening session participants. The fundamental goal of this work was to give the community voice in the ongoing statewide conversation concerning reparations—to create space for communities to express their concerns, desires, wishes, and experiences—and to provide the Task Force and the Legislature with additional community input as it explored and deliberated reparations proposals.

Through this multi-pronged approach to community engagement, the Bunche Center focused its data collection on four areas deemed important by the Task Force: (1) identifying forms of race-based harm through those who experienced it; (2) gauging support for reparations; (3) determining support for different types of reparations; and (4) determining perspective from the wider impacted community regarding eligibility for reparations.

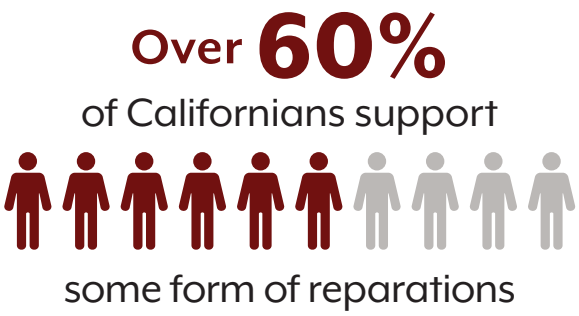
An analysis of the results of the community listening sessions, personal testimonies, oral histories, and statewide surveys revealed the following:

- There are five major types of racially-driven harm that communities consistently identified. Study participants named lack of educational opportunity, discriminatory policing and law enforcement, economic disenfranchisement, housing inequality, and healthcare disparities most often when asked about racially-driven harms that Black people experience. The participants also consistently cited the following harms: food inaccessibility, employment and workplace disparities, inadequate business support infrastructure, the cycle of municipal disinvestment in Black neighborhoods, and displacement.



- There is broad community support for reparations. The survey found that over 60 percent of Californians support some form of reparations, including financial compensation, community investments, educational opportunities, investments for Black businesses and organizations, and land and property ownership. Furthermore, community listening session participants overwhelmingly supported reparations initiatives.
- While a majority of Californians support reparations measures, they are divided on which types should be used. The survey queried respondents on the specific forms of reparations to be applied and found that California residents are largely in support of the three primary types of reparations measures—direct cash payments (66 percent of respondents); monetary reparations without cash measures (77 percent); and non-monetary reparations, such as an apology or monuments (73 percent). Support was consistently highest for remedies incorporating monetary measures, but without direct cash payments, among all Californians, including African American participants. The community listening sessions produced similar results, except that direct cash payments were the most frequently mentioned form of reparations, followed by other monetary measures.
- The opinions about who should be eligible for reparations differed across the statewide sample, the community listening session sample, and African American residents in the statewide sample. A plurality of respondents in the statewide sample supported reparations for all Black people (30 percent) followed closely by support for lineage-based reparations (29 percent). Lineage-based reparations refers to people who are descendants of those enslaved in the U.S. In the statewide sample, 24 percent believed that reparations should be for those Black people who experienced race-based discrimination. On the other hand, 67 percent of respondents in the community listening session sample supported reparations for people who descended from those enslaved in the U.S. (lineage based), while 18 percent supported reparations for all Black people. Black Californians were in the middle of responses when compared to both the overall statewide and community listening session samples. Black Californians indicate nearly equal support for lineage-based (40 percent) reparations and for reparations for all Black residents (39 percent).

The Task Force urges the Legislature, in formulating a state reparations statute or program, to ensure that the widest possible community engagement takes place, in order to ensure that what is enacted in carrying out the recommendations of this report reflects the input of the community intended to be served by this initiative.

PART VIII: RECOMMENDATIONS FOR EDUCATING THE PUBLIC

Chapter 33: Educating the Public & Responses to Questions
In enacting AB 3121, the Legislature directed the Task Force to recommend appropriate ways to educate the California public regarding the Task Force's findings.[850] To achieve this goal, the Task Force consulted academic experts to develop a concept for educating students of all ages and backgrounds, as well as the public in general, through a curriculum designed to make the Task Force's work accessible.

The Task Force recommends that the Legislature adopt the concepts discussed in Chapter 33 of this report, which the Task Force developed with the support of these experts, as a methodology for adopting a standard curriculum centered on the Task Force's findings and recommendations. The Task Force further recommends that the Legislature fund the implementation of age-appropriate curricula across all grade levels, as well as the delivery of these curricula in schools across California. The Legislature should also create a public education fund, specifically dedicated to educating the public about African American history, and support the initial and ongoing education about the Task Force's findings. Additionally, in order to facilitate ongoing conversations in communities across California following the publication of this report, the Task Force has developed materials included within Chapter 33 that will help answer some potential questions people may have about reparations. These questions are expected to come from both those who support reparations, but want to better understand their justification, and those who might be unaware of the need for or purpose of reparations.

The Legislature should also create a public education fund, specifically dedicated to educating the public about African American history, and support the initial and ongoing education about the Task Force's findings.

PART IX: KEY CASES AND STATUTES

Through its enactment of AB 3121, the Legislature charged the Task Force with compiling "[t]he federal and state laws that discriminated against formerly enslaved Africans and their descendants . . . from 1868 to the present," and identifying "[h]ow California laws and policies that continue to disproportionately and negatively affect African Americans as a group and perpetuate the lingering material and psychosocial effects of slavery can be eliminated."[851] Part IX of the report contains a legal compendium that catalogues, summarizes, and memorializes for the public the many state and federal laws that have perpetuated discrimination against African Americans in California, as well as some cases and laws that advanced the rights of African Americans by setting aside those racist laws and policies. Due to the myriad ways in which laws and cases have created and nurtured this system of subjugation, the compendium is illustrative, not exhaustive. Nevertheless, it is intended to provide a comprehensive documentation of the centuries-long struggle in California, dating back to the earliest years of statehood, for personhood, equality, and equity.

Part IX is divided thematically, based on five major subject areas discussed throughout the Task Force's report: (1) Housing (Chapter 35); (2) Labor (Chapter 36); (3) Education (Chapter 37); (4) Political Participation (Chapter 38); (5) the Unjust Legal System (Chapter 39); and (6) Civil Rights Cases (Chapter 40). In doing so, the compendium documents many of the constitutional provisions, statutes, and court cases that form the foundations of the discrimination and atrocities discussed throughout Chapters 1-13 of this report.

Endnotes

[1] Pres. Proc. No. 95 (Jan. 1, 1863); U.S. Const. 13th amend., § 1.

[2] The Reconstruction Amendments' Debates: The Legislative History and Contemporary Debates in Congress on the 13th, 14th, and 15th Amendments (Avins edit., 1967) p. 122.

[3] Foner, Forever Free: The Story of Emancipation and Reconstruction (First Vintage Books 2006) pp. 113-115, 117-118 (Foner, Forever Free); see Foner, Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863-1877 (2014) pp. 444-445 (Foner, Reconstruction); U.S. Const., 14th amend., § 1; U.S. Const., 15th amend., § 2.

[4] Cobb and Jenkins, Race and the Representation of Blacks' Interests During Reconstruction (2001) 54 Pol. Research Quarterly 181, 184.

[5] Foner, Reconstruction, supra, at pp. 581-582.

[6] The Civil Rights Cases (1883) 109 U.S. 3, 20.

[7] Gov. Code, § 8301, subd. (a)(6).

[8] Gov. Code, § 8301, subd. (b)(1).

[9] Gov. Code, § 8301, subd. (b)(2), (3) & (4).

[10] Gov. Code, § 8301, subd. (b).

[11] The Task Force published Part I of this report—Chapters 1 through 13—as its Interim Report in June 2022. These chapters are now subsumed within this Final Report from the Task Force. The chapters comprising Part I have been revised and updated to reflect the subsequent decision-making and considerations of the Task Force, but the substance of the historical record of atrocities remains unchanged, and forms the basis for the Final Recommendations set forth in this Final Report.

[12] Kolchin, American Slavery: 1619-1877 (1993) pp. 17-18; Kendi, Stamped from the Beginning: The Definitive History of Racist Ideas in America (2016) pp. 38-41.

[13] See generally Chapter 4, Political Disenfranchisement, infra.

[14] See generally Chapter 3, Racial Terror, infra.

[15] See generally Chapters 2-13, infra.

[16] See generally Chapters 4-13, infra.

[17] See generally Chapter 12, Harm and Neglect Mental Physical and Public Health, infra.

[18] Gov. Code, § 8301.3, subd. (a)(1). The meetings are conducted pursuant to the Bagley Keene Act. Gov. Code, § 11120. Due to the COVID-19 pandemic, from June 2021 to March 2022, all meetings were conducted virtually. See Gov. Code, § 11133(a).

[19] Kennedy, Nigger: The Strange Career of a Troublesome Word, Wash. Post (Jan. 11, 2001) (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[20] Malesky, The Journey from 'Colored' to 'Minorities' to 'People of Color', NPR (Mar. 30, 2014) (as of May 17, 2023); Smith, Changing Racial Labels: From "Colored" to "Negro" to "Black" to "African American" (1992) 56 Pub. Opinion Quarterly 496, 497-501 (as of May 12, 2023).

[21] See, e.g., Newkirk II, The Language of White Supremacy (Oct. 6, 2017) The Atlantic (as of May 12, 2023).

[22] Southern Poverty Law Center, Groups (as of May 12, 2023).

[23] See Bailey et al., How Structural Racism Works—Racist Policies as a Root Cause of U.S. Racial Health Inequities (2021) 384 New England J. of Medicine 768, 768-769 (as of May 12, 2023); see also Gates, Jr., Stony the Road: Reconstruction, White Supremacy, and the Rise of Jim Crow (2019) p. xxii.

[24] See ibid.

[25] Wiecek, Structural Racism and the Law in America Today: An Introduction (2011) 100 Ky. L.J. 1, 5-19 (as of May 12, 2023).

[26] See generally Metzl, Dying of Whiteness: How the Politics of Racial Resentment Is Killing America's Heartland (2019).

[27] White House Historical Assn., Slavery in the President's Neighborhood FAQ (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[28] Ibid.

[29] Nat. Park Service, Language of Slavery (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[30] Ibid.

[31] Ibid.

[32] See ibid.

[33] Cox, The Language of Incarceration (July 23, 2020) 1 Incarceration 1 (as of May 15, 2023); see also Bedell et al., Corrections for Academic Medicine: The Importance of Using Person-First Language for Individuals who have Experienced Incarceration (2019) 94 Academic Medicine 172, 173-174 (as of May 15, 2023).

[34] Perlman, 2020 AP Stylebook Changes: Person-First Language, and the Great 'Pled' Debate (May 6, 2020) Columbia Journalism Rev. (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[35] See California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Mar. 29, 2022) Meeting Minutes, pp. 10-12 (as of May 12, 2023). The Task Force's motion was especially informed by the testimony of the author of AB 3121, Dr. Shirley Weber, during the meeting of the Task Force on January 27, 2022. California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Jan. 27, 2022) Testimony of Dr. Shirley Weber (as of May 31, 2023).

[36] See Betts, Incarcerated Language (2018) Yale Rev. (as of May 12, 2023).

[37] Chapter 2, Enslavement, infra, at § V, subd. B; see also Baptist, The Half Has Never Been Told: Slavery and the Making of American Capitalism (2014) p. xxiii.

[38] Chapter 2, Enslavement, infra, at § V, subd. B.

[39] Baptist, supra, at p. xxiii.

[40] Chapter 2, Enslavement, infra, at § IV, subd. C.

[41] Baptist, supra, at pp. 9-11. For an in depth discussion, see Chapter 2, Enslavement, § IV, subd. C.

[42] Presidents who owned enslaved people while in office included Presidents

George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, James Monroe, Andrew Jackson, John Tyler, James K. Polk, and Zachary Taylor. See Rosenwald, Slave-Owning Presidents Become Targets of Protestors, Wash. Post (June 23, 2020) (as of May 12, 2023).

[43] Weil et al., More than 1,800 Congressmen Once Enslaved Black People. This is Who They Were, and How They Shaped the Nation, Wash. Post (Nov. 28, 2022) (as of May 16, 2023).

[44] Ericson, The Federal Government and Slavery: Following the Money Trail (2005) 19 Studies in Am. Pol. Development 107 (as of May 12, 2023).

[45] Id. at pp. 112-115.

[46] Pritchett, Quantitative Estimates of the United States Interregional Slave Trade, 1820-1860 (2001) 61 J. of Econ. History 467, 474.

[47] Ball, Slavery in the United States: A Narrative of the Life and Adventures of Charles Ball, a Black Man (1837) p. 69.

[48] Rosenthal, Reckoning with Slavery: How Revisiting Management's Uncomfortable Past Can Help Us Confront Challenges Today (2021) 20 Academy of Management Learning & Ed. 467, 467-472.

[49] Baptist, supra, at pp. 116-124. For an in depth discussion of the horrors suffered by enslaved people, see Chapter 2, Enslavement, section V.

[50] Berry, The Price for their Pound of Flesh: The Value of the Enslaved, from Womb to Grave, in the Building of a Nation (2017) pp. 78-83; Douglass, Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave (1845) pp. 3-4.

[51] Thomas Jefferson, Letter to Joel Yancey, Jan. 17, 1819 (as of May 9, 2022).

[52] U.S. Census of 1860, Introduction, p. vii (as of May 9, 2022).

[53] Kendi, supra, at pp. 38-41.

[54] Kendi, supra, at p. 48.

[55] Morgan, American Slavery, American Freedom: The Ordeal of Colonial Virginia (1975) pp. 369, 385-386.

[56] Commonwealth of Virginia Legislature, Act I. An Act About the Casual Killing of Slaves (1669) Act I. (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[57] Berlin, Many Thousands Gone: The First Two Centuries of Slavery in North America (1998) pp. 123-124.

[58] An Act Concerning Servants and Slaves XXXIV (1705) Records of the American Colonies, p. 459 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[59] See, e.g., U.S. Const., art. I, § 2; Kolchin, supra, at pp. 17-18; Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857) 60 U.S. 393; Darlene Goring, The History of Slave Marriage in the United States (2006) 39 J. Marshall L.Rev. 299 (Abolitionist William Goodell described the way that American law treated the families of enslaved people in 1853 as: "The slave has no rights. Of course, he or she cannot have the rights of a husband, a wife. The slave is a chattel, and chattels do not marry. 'The slave is not ranked among sentient beings, but among things;' and things are not married"); Campbell, Making Black Los Angeles: Class, Gender, and Community, 1850-1917 (2016). The 1850 and 1860 federal censuses did not list most enslaved people by name, as they did for white Americans, but en masse in "slave schedules." (St. Louis Integrated Database of Enslavement, 1850 and 1860 US Census Slave Schedules (as of May 16, 2023).)

[60] See Chapter 3, Racial Terror, and Chapter 4, Political Disenfranchisement.

[61] Petrella and Loggins, "This is a Country for White Men": White Supremacy and U.S. Politics (Jan. 5. 2017) Black Perspectives, African American Intellectual History (as of May 16, 2023).

[62] See Chapters 2, 4, 6, 10, 11.

[63] Smith, Remaking Slavery in a Free State: Masters and Slaves in Gold Rush California (Feb. 2011) 80 Pacific Hist. Rev. 33.

[64] Smith, Freedom's Frontier: California and the Struggle over Unfree Labor, Emancipation, and Reconstruction (2013) p. 8 (Freedom's Frontier).

[65] Id. at pp. 40, 257.

[66] Rohrbough, Days of Gold: The California Gold Rush and the American Nation (1997) pp. 136-138.

[67] Baur, The Health Factor in the Gold Rush Era (Feb. 1949) 18 Pacific Historical Rev. 97, 97-105.

[68] See e.g., A Slave Flogged in San Jose, Daily Alta California (Feb. 16, 1850) p. 2, col. 3; Slaveholding in California, Liberator (Aug. 30, 1850) p. 140, col. 5.

[69] An Act Respecting Fugitives from Labor, and Slaves brought to this State prior to her Admission into the Union, April 15, 1852, ch. 33, California Statutes, at 67–69; Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 67-68.

[70] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 71-72.

[71] Waite, Early California Lawmakers also Preached #Resistance—But Against Immigration, L.A. Times (Aug. 3, 2018) (as of Jan. 26, 2022); Cottrell, It Took 92 Years for California to Ratify the 15th Amendment, The Union (June 26, 2020) (as of May 17, 2023).

[72] See Equal Justice Initiative, Lynching in America: Confronting the Legacy of Racial Terror (2015) p. 3 (as of May 17, 2023) (EJI 2015).

[73] EJI 2015, supra, at pp. 3, 7; EJI, Lynching in America: Confronting the Legacy of Racial Terror: Third Edition (2017) pp. 48-50, 65, 73 (as of May 17, 2023) (EJI 3d ed.); Wilkerson, Caste: The Origins of Our Discontents (2020) p. 151; Lee, How America's Vast Racial Wealth Gap Grew: By Plunder, N.Y. Times (Aug. 18, 2019) (as of May 17, 2023); The Case for Reparations, supra; Byman, The Failure of Counterterrorism After the Civil War, Lawfare (Aug. 22, 2021) (as of April 4, 2022) (Lawfare).

[74] The Case for Reparations, supra; Lawfare, supra; Chokshi, Racism at American Pools Isn't New: A Look at a Long History, N.Y. Times (Aug. 1, 2018) (as of April 4, 2022).

[75] See, e.g., Brockell, Tulsa isn't the Only Race Massacre You were Never Taught in School. Here are Others, The Wash. Post (June 1, 2021) (as of May 17, 2023).

[76] EJI 2015, supra, at pp. 3, 7; EJI 3d ed., supra, at pp. 48-50, 73; The Case for Reparations, supra; SPLC History, supra, at pp. 14-15, 18; Eckstrand, The Ugliness of Trolls: Comparing the Strategies/ Methods of the Alt-Right and the Ku Klux Klan (2018) 10 Cosmopolitan Civil Societies: An Interdisciplinary J. 41, 46-47 (as of May 17, 2023); Lawfare, supra; Human Rights Watch, The Case for Reparations in Tulsa, Oklahoma: A Human Rights Argument (May 2020) p. 6 (as of May 17, 2023).

[77] Smith, Jr., The Impact of Racial Trauma on African Americans (2010) The Heinz Endowments, p. 4 (as of May 17, 2023) (Impact of Racial Trauma); Turner and Richardson, Racial Trauma Is Real: The Impact of Police Shootings on African Americans (July 14, 2016) Am. Psychological Ass, Psychology Benefits Society Blog (as of May 17, 2023).

[78] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 23.

[79] Ibid.

[80] How America's Vast Racial Wealth Gap Grew: By Plunder, supra.

[81] Niedermeier, The Color of the Third Degree (2019) pp. 17-19; U.N. General Assembly, Report of the Working Group of Experts on People of African Descent on its mission to the United States of America (Aug. 18, 2016) p. 16 (as of May 17, 2023); Love, The Trayvon Martin Case Reveals a Vigilante Spirit in the US Justice System, The Guardian (Apr. 7, 2012) (as of April 4, 2022).

[82] See e.g., Hudson, West of Jim Crow: The Fight Against California's Color Line (2020) p. 193.

[83] Bringhurst, The Ku Klux Klan in a Central California Community: Tulare County During the 1920s and 1930s (2000) 82 Southern Cal. Quarterly 365, 370; Hudson, supra, at pp. 171-72.

[84] Hudson, supra, at p. 172.

[85] Ibid.

[86] Stevenson, The Contested Murder of Latasha Harlins: Justice, Gender, and the Origins of the LA Riots (2013) p. 186; Hudson, supra, at p. 179.

[87] Hudson, supra, at p. 168.

[88] See Chapter 3, Enslavement, Section IV.J.5.

[89] Nat. Park Service, U.S. Dept. of the Interior, Civil Rights in America: Racial Voting Rights (2009) p. 4 (as of Nov. 8, 2021); see Chapter 4, Political Disenfranchisement, infra.

[90] Foner, Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863-1877 (1988) pp. 550, 569-576 (Foner, Reconstruction).

[91] Foner, Forever Free: The Story of Emancipation and Reconstruction (First Vintage Books 2006) pp. 113-115, 117-118 (Foner, Forever Free); Foner, Reconstruction, supra, at pp. 444-44, U.S. Const., amend. XV, § 1, U.S. Const., amend. XIV, § 2.

[92] Cobb and Jenkins, Race and the Representation of Blacks' Interests During Reconstruction (2001) 54 Pol. Research Quarterly 181, 184.

[93] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 6; Black Officeholders in the South (as of Nov. 19, 2021).

[94] Foner, Reconstruction, supra, at pp. 581-582.

[95] Chapter 4, Political Disenfranchisement, Section IV.

[96] See Equal Justice Initiative, Race and the Jury: Illegal Discrimination in Jury Selection (Nov. 2005) p. 15 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[97] Foner, Forever Free, supra, at p. 143.

[98] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 14.

[99] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 6; Black Officeholders in the South, (as of Nov. 19, 2021).

[100] U.S. House of Representatives, Office of History and Preservation, African Americans in Congress: 1870-2007 (2008) pp. 2, 4.

[101] Caro, Master of the Senate (2009) pp. xiii-xiv; Grantham, The Life and Death of the Solid South: A Political History (1992).

[102] Caro, supra, at pp. xiii-xiv.

[103] See Chapters 4, 10, 12

[104] See, e.g., Katznelson, When Affirmative Action was White (2005) p. 113; Krugman, New Deal Created the Middle Class (Apr. 1, 2011) (as of Jan. 18, 2022); Mettler, Soldiers to Citizens: The G.I. Bill and the Making of the Greatest Generation (2005) p. 9.

[105] Katznelson, supra, at p. 113; California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 13, 2021) Testimony of Jacqueline Jones, 7:20-8:55 (as of Jan. 26, 2022).

[106] Katznelson, supra, at p. 121.

[107] Thomas, The Hill-Burton Act and Civil Rights: Expanding Hospital Care for Black Southerners, 1939-1960 (2006) 72 J. of Southern History p. 823, 836; Von Hoffman, A Study in Contradictions: The Origins and Legacy of the Housing Act of 1949 (2000) 11 Housing Policy Debate 299, 309.

[108] See Chapter 4, Political Disenfranchisement, Section IV.L., and Chapter 3, Racial Terror.

[109] People v. Hall (1854) 4 Cal. 399, 404.

[110] Ibid.

[111] Katz et al., Reckoning with our Rights: The Evolution of Voter Access in California, UCLA Luskin Center for History and Policy (Sept. 2020) pp. 3, 7 (as of Mar. 31, 2021).

[112] See Chapter 4, Political Disenfranchisement.

[113] Cal. Const. of 1849, art. II, § 5.

[114] Katz et al., supra, at p. 9.

[115] Id. at pp. 11-12.

[116] See Chapters 3, 5, 6, 7, and 10

[117] See, e.g., Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns: The Epic Story of America's Great Migration (2011) pp. 38-45 (Warmth of Other Suns); Wilkerson, Caste: The Origins of Our Discontents (2020) pp. 116-117.

[118] See CalEPA, Pollution and Prejudice: Redlining and Environmental Injustice in California (Aug. 16, 2021) (as of Apr. 4, 2022).

[119] Rothstein, The Color of Law (2017) pp. 13.

[120] U.S. Census Bureau, Black Population 1790-1915 (1918) p. 33.

[121] See, e.g., Cutler et al., The Rise and the Decline of the American Ghetto (1999) 107 J. of Political Economy 455, 456

[122] Rothstein, supra, at pp. vii-xvii, 16-30, 51-52; CalEPA, supra; Taylor, Toxic Communities: Environmental Racism, Industrial Pollution, and Residential Mobility (2014) p. 229 (Toxic Communities); Taylor, The Environment and the People in American Cities, 1600s-1900s: Disorder, Inequality, and Social Change (2009) pp. 365 (Environment and People); Mohl, The Interstates and the Cities: Highways, Housing, and the Freeway Revolt, Poverty & Race Research Action Council (Jan. 1, 2002) p. 2.

[123] See Corrigan v. Buckley (1926) 271 U.S. 323, 331; U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Understanding Fair Housing (Feb. 1973) p. 4; Shelley v. Kraemer (1948) 334 U.S. 1.

[124] Domonoske, Interactive Redlining Map Zooms In On America's History Of Discrimination, NPR (Oct. 19, 2016) (as of May 3, 2022); Jackson, What Is Redlining?, N.Y. Times (Aug. 17, 2021) (as of May 3, 2022).

[125] Rothstein, supra, at p. 61.

[126] See id. at pp. 177-180.

[127] Cutler, supra, at p. 456.

[128] Frey, Neighborhood Segregation Persists for Black, Latino or Hispanic, and Asian Americans (Apr. 6, 2021) Brookings Institution (as of June 30, 2021).

[129] Menendian et al., The Roots of Structural Racism Project (June 30, 2021) Othering & Belonging Institute (as of May 17, 2023).

[130] Toxic Communities supra, at p. 184.

[131] Loewen, Sundown Towns: A Hidden Dimension of American Racism (2005) p. 76.

[132] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 72-73.

[133] Nelson et al., Mapping Inequality: Redlining in New Deal America (Oct. 12, 2016) Bunk (as of May 1, 2022).

[134] Beal, Redlining in San Diego, Local Initiatives Support Corporation San Diego (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[135] Rothstein, supra, at p. 31.

[136] Ibid.

[137] Id. at p. 33.

[138] Rothstein, supra, at p. 81; see also Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 155.

[139] Toxic Communities, supra, at pp. 184-186.

[140] Rothstein, supra, at p. 9.

[141] Taylor, How "Urban Renewal" Decimated the Fillmore District, and Took Jazz with It, KQED (June 25, 2020) (as of May 17, 2023) (Decimated Fillmore); Xia, Manhattan Beach Was Once Home to Black Beachgoers, but the City Ran Them Out. Now It Faces a Reckoning, L.A. Times (Aug. 2, 2020) (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[142] Fulbright, Sad Chapter in Western Addition History Ending, S.F. Chronicle (July 21, 2008) (as of July 7, 2021).

[143] Fulbright, supra.

[144] Decimated Fillmore, supra.

[145] Fulbright, supra.

[146] See generally Chapter 6, Separate and Unequal Education.

[147] Sambol-Tosco, The Slave Experience: Education, Arts & Culture, PBS (2004) p. 2 (as of Mar. 5, 2021); Bell, Silent Covenants: Brown v. Board of Education and the Unfulfilled Hopes for Racial Reform (2004) p. 52.

[148] Burnette II, Do America's Public Schools Owe Black People Reparations? (Sept. 23, 2020) 40 Ed. Week 4-7 (as of June 21, 2021) (Do America's Public Schools?); Jim Crow Laws, History (Feb. 21, 2021) (as of June 21, 2021); see also South Carolina v. Katzenbach (1966) 383 U.S. 301, 310-13, 311, fn. 10 (noting that Southern states "rapidly instituted racial segregation in their public schools" following the Civil War and discussing the interplay between efforts to restrict literacy and efforts to restrict the vote); Du Bois, The Souls of Black Folk: Essays and Sketches (2d ed. 1903); Tyack & Lowe, The Constitutional Moment: Reconstruction and Black Education in the South (1986) 94 Am. J. Ed. 236, 238-239, 250-252; Anderson, The Education of Blacks in the South, 1860-1935 (1988) pp. 95-96 ("From the vantage point of the southern white majority, any system of universal education for blacks, even industrial education, would potentially lead to universal suffrage.").

[149] Blackmon, Slavery by Another Name: The Re-Enslavement of Black Americans from the Civil War to World War II (2008) pp. 105 (Slavery by Another Name).

[150] See, e.g., Du Bois & Dill, The Common School and the Negro American, Report (1911) p. 52 (hereafter The Common School); see also The Warmth of Other Suns, supra, at pp. 57, 59-60, 101 (describing differences in months of operation for black and white schools in Georgia and South Carolina); Brooker, The Education of Black Children in the Jim Crow South, America's Black Holocaust Museum: Bringing Our History to Light (as of June 18, 2021); Ladson-Billings, From the Achievement Gap to the Education Debt: Understanding Achievement in U.S. Schools (2006) 35 Ed. Researcher 3, 5; The Warmth of Other Suns, supra, at p. 88.

[151] Brown v. Board of Education (1954) 347 U.S. 483, 495; Horsford and McKenzie, 'Sometimes I Feel Like the Problems Started with Desegregation': Exploring Black Superintendent Perspectives on Desegregation Policy (2008) 21 Internat. J. of Qualitative Studies in Ed. 443, 444.

[152] Id.

[153] See Alexander v. Holmes County Bd. of Ed. (1969) 396 U.S. 19, 20-21.

[154] See Burnette II, As Districts Seek Revenue Due to Pandemic, Black Homeowners May Feel the Biggest Hit, Ed. Week (July 23, 2020) (as of June 22, 2021); Oliver and Shapiro, Black Wealth/White Wealth: A New Perspective on Racial Inequality (1995) pp. 8-9, 19-20; Guastaferro, Why Racial Inequities in America's Schools are Rooted in Housing Policies of the Past, USA Today (Nov. 2, 2020) (as of June 23, 2021).

[155] Id.

[156] Milliken v. Bradley (1974) 418 U.S. 717, 752.

[157] Ward v. Flood (1874) 48 Cal. 36.

[158] Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) 163 U.S. 537.

[159] Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed: Segregation and Exclusion in California Schools, 1855-1975 (1976) p. 143.

[160] Id. at pp. 148-164.

[161] Orfield and Ee, Segregating California's Future: Inequality and Its Alternative 60 Years after Brown v. Board of Education (May 14, 2014) The Civil Rights Project, UCLA, pp. 3, 12-18 (Segregating California's Future); Butt v. California (1992) 4 Cal.4th 668, 684-685.

[162] See Cal. Const., art. I, § 7; School Assignment and Transportation of Pupils, California Proposition 1 (1979).

[163] Orfield and Jarvie, Black Segregation Matters: School Resegregation and Black Educational Opportunity, UCLA Civil Rights Project/Proyecto Derechos Civiles (Dec. 2020) pp. 30-31, Tables 13 and 14 (as of July 1, 2021).

[164] Segregating California's Future, supra, at pp. 3, 27.

[165] Muller et al., Environmental Inequality: The Social Causes and Consequences of Lead Exposure (2018) 44 Annual Rev. of Sociology 263, 266-68 (as of May 17, 2023); Jacobs, Environmental Health Disparities in Housing (2011) 101 Am. J. of Public Health S115, S115–S122 (as of May 17, 2023).

[166] Villarosa, Pollution is Killing African Americans. This Community Fought Back. N.Y. Times (July 28, 2020) (as of May 17, 2023); Zwickl, The Demographics of Fracking: A Spatial Analysis for Four U.S. States (2019) 161 Ecological Economics 202, 202-215 (as of May 17, 2023); Fleischman and Franklin, Fumes Across the Fence-Line (Nov. 2017) Nat. Ass. for the Advancement of Colored People and Clean Air Task Force, p. 6 (as of May 17, 2023); Pratt et al., Traffic, Air Pollution, Minority and Socio-Economic Status: Addressing Inequities in Exposure and Risk (2015) 12 Internat. J. of Environmental Research and Public Health 5355, 5355-5372 (as of May 17, 2023); Environment and People, supra, at pp. 94, 270.

[167] Hoffman et al., The Effects of Historical Housing Policies on Resident Exposure to Intra-Urban Heat: A Study of 108 US Urban Areas (2020) 8 Climate 1 (as of May 17, 2023).

[168] Pulido, Rethinking Environmental Racism: White Privilege and Urban Development in Southern California (2000) 90 Annals of the Assn. of Am. Geographers 12, 21 (as of May 17, 2023); CalEPA, Pollution and Prejudice; Office of Health Equity, Housing Overcrowding (Dec. 2018) Cal. Dept. of Public Health (as of Apr. 7, 2022).

[169] Arango, "Turn Off the Sunshine": Why Shade Is a Mark of Privilege in Los Angeles, N.Y. Times (Dec. 1, 2019) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[170] Del Real, The Crisis Lurking in Californians' Taps: How 1,000 Water Systems May Be at Risk, N.Y. Times (July 24, 2019) (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[171] Morello-Frosch et al., Environmental Justice and Regional Inequality in Southern California: Implications for Future Research (Apr. 2002) 110 Environmental Health Perspectives 149, 149-154 (as of May 17, 2023).

[172] London et al., The Struggle for Water Justice in California's San Joaquin Valley: A Focus on Disadvantaged Unincorporated Communities (Feb. 2018) UC Davis Center for Regional Change, p. 10 (as of May 23, 2023).

[173] Fuke, Planters, Apprenticeship, and Forced Labor: The Black Family under Pressure in Post-Emancipation Maryland (1988) 62 Agr. History 57, 63.

[174] Robinson, "The Black Family" and US Social Policy: Moynihan's Unintended Legacy?, 97 Revue Française d'études Américaines (2003) 118, 118-128; Baldwin, Stratification of the Welfare Poor: Intersections of Gender, Race, and "Worthiness" in Poverty Discourse and Policy (2010) 6 The Modern American 4; Cooper, Racial Bias in American Foster Care: The National Debate (2013) 97 Marq. L.Rev. 215, 230-233; see generally Minoff, Center for the Study of Social Policy, The Racist Roots of Work Requirements (Feb. 2020) (as of Mar. 6, 2022).

[175] Floyd et al., TANF Policies Reflect Racist Legacy of Cash Assistance (Aug. 4, 2021) Center on Budget & Policy Priorities, p. 10.

[176] Moehling, Mother's Pensions and Female Headship (2002) Yale University, pp. 2-3, 12-18, 31 table 9 (analyzing data from Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia).

[177] Dettlaff et al., It Is Not a Broken System, It Is a System That Needs to Be Broken: The UpEND Movement to Abolish the Child Welfare System (2020) 14 J. of Public Child Welfare 500 (Broken System).

[178] Dettlaff et al., Disentangling Substantiation: The Influence of Race, Income, and Risk on the Substantiation Decision in Child Welfare (2011) 33 Children and Youth Services Rev. 1630, 1634-1635; Miller, Racial Disproportionality in Washington State's Child Welfare System (June 2008) Wash. State Institute for Pub. Policy; Rivaux et al., The Intersection of Race, Poverty, and Risk: Understanding the Decision to Provide Services to Clients and to Remove Children (2008) 87 Child Welfare 151, 151-152.

[179] Children's Bureau, Child Welfare Practice to Address Racial Disproportionality and Disparity (Apr. 2021) U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Services, pp. 2-3 (Children's Bureau).

[180] Cooper, Racial Bias in American Foster Care: The National Debate (2013) 97 Marq. L.Rev. 215, 230; Sedlak and Broadhurst, Third National Incidence Study of Child Abuse and Neglect: Final Report (1996) U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Services, Administration for Children and Families, pp. 7-8; see generally Broken System, supra.

[181] Henning, The Rage of Innocence: How America Criminalizes Black Youth (Pantheon Books 2021) p. xv; U.S. Dept. of Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, Statistical Briefing Book: Juvenile Arrest Rates by Race, 1980-2019 (2019) (as of Apr. 15, 2022); Puzzanchera, Juvenile Arrests, 2018 (June 2020) U.S. Dept. of Justice, Juvenile Justice Statistics National Report Series Bulletin (as of Apr. 15, 2022).

[182] Cal. Dept. of Justice, Attorney General Becerra Secures Settlements with Barstow and Oroville School Districts to Address Discriminatory Treatment of Students Based on Race and Disability Status (Aug. 25, 2020) (as of Apr. 15, 2022).

[183] Tiano, Los Angeles' Plan to Address the Overrepresentation of Black and LGBTQ Youth in Foster Care, The Imprint (May 22, 2019) (as of Aug. 25, 2021).

[184] KidsData, Children in Foster Care, by Race/Ethnicity (2018) (as of Aug. 27, 2021).

[185] Compare ibid. with Children's Bureau, supra, at pp. 2-3.

[186] KidsData, supra; Dickey et al., San Francisco's Population Hit Hard Amid Pandemic, Census Data Shows, Axios (Apr. 12, 2023) (as of May 17, 2023).

[187] Sambol-Tosco, Education, Arts, & Culture (2004) PBS, p. 1 (as of March 20, 2022); Newton, Slave Artisans and Craftsmen: The Roots of Afro-American Art (1977) 9 Plastic Arts and Crafts 35.

[188] Barnes, Yes, Politicians Wore Blackface. It Used to be All-American 'Fun', Wash. Post (Feb. 8, 2019) (as of Mar. 21, 2022).

[189] Absher, The Black Musician and the White City: Race and Music in Chicago, 1900-1967 (2014) pp. 1-2, 157 (as of Apr. 6, 2022); Koppes and Black, Blacks, Loyalty, and Motion-Picture Propaganda in World War II (Sept. 1986) 73 The J. of Am. History 383; Rothwell, The Black Innovators Who Elevated the United States: Reassessing the Golden Age of Invention (Nov. 23, 2020) Brookings Institution (as of Mar. 21, 2022); Reese, The Socio-Political Context of the Integration of Sport in America (1998) 3 J. of African American Men 5, 5-22; Jefferson, Living the California Dream: African American Leisure Sites During Jim Crow Era (2020); Cox, Dixies Daughters: The United Daughters of the Confederacy and the Preservation of Confederate Culture (2003); Scott, Cinema Civil Rights: Regulation, Repression, and Race in the Classical Hollywood Era (2015).

[190] Rothwell, supra.

[191] Jefferson, supra

[192] Cox, supra.

[193] Scott, supra.

[194] Pepin, Music of the Fillmore (2000) PBS (as of Mar. 20, 2022).

[195] See, e.g., Paggett, Cultural Incompetence: My Son was Kicked out of Class Because of His Hair (March 8, 2018) ACLU of Northern California (as of Mar. 21, 2022).

[196] See, e.g., Miranda, How One Art Museum Has Reckoned with Race and Its Past, L.A. Times (Oct. 22, 2020) (as of Mar. 20, 2022).

[197] People v. Olguin (1994) 31 Cal.App.4th 1355.

[198] Desmarais, Historic Wrongs on a Pedestal: Ugly Past Doesn't Vanish When the Artwork Does (Feb. 27, 2018) (as of Mar. 21, 2022).

[199] Trotter, Workers on Arrival: Black Labor and the Making of America (2019) pp. xvi, xx-xxi; see also California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (October 13, 2021) Testimony of Jacqueline Jones (as of Apr. 7, 2022) citing Berry, The Price for their Pound of Flesh: The Value of the Enslaved, from Womb to Grave, in the Building of a Nation (2017); Baptist, The Half has Never Been Told: Slavery and the Making of American Capitalism (2016); Beckert, Empire of Cotton: A Global History (2015); Beckert and Rockman, edits., Slavery's Capitalism: A New History of American Economic Development (2018).

[200] U.S. Postal Service, Postal History: African American Postal Workers in the 20th Century (as of Apr. 11, 2022); Wilson and Race, President Wilson House (as of Apr. 11, 2022); The Army and Diversity, U.S. Army Center of Military History; Broussard, In Search of the Promised Land in Seeking El Dorado: African Americans in California (De Graaf et al., edits. 2001) p. 198; United States v. City and County of San Francisco (N.D. Cal. 1988) 696 F.Supp. 1287, 1290.

[201] Little, How Woodrow Wilson Tried to Reverse African American Progress (July 14, 2020) History.com (as of May 17, 2023).

[202] The Army and Diversity, U.S. Army Center of Military History (as of May 17, 2023).

[203] See Jones, American Work: Four Centuries of Black and White Labor (1998) p. 342 (Jones, American Work); see also Perea, The Echoes of Slavery: Recognizing the Racist Origins of the Agricultural and Domestic Worker Exclusion from the National Labor Relations Act (2011) 72 Ohio State L.J. 95; Katznelson, Fear Itself: The New Deal and the Origins of Our Time (2013) p. 163; Baradaran, The Color of Money: Black Banks and the Racial Wealth Gap (2017) p. 101; Reich, A Working People: A History of African American Workers Since Emancipation (2013) p. 91.

[204] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 13, 2021) Testimony of Jacqueline Jones (as of May 17, 2023).

[205] See, e.g., Walters and Briggs, The Family Economy, Child Labor, and Schooling: Evidence from the Early Twentieth-Century South (1993) 58 Am. Sociological Rev. 163, 164.

[206] Barnes, Is the EEOC Protecting Workers or Discriminatory Employers? (Sept. 4, 2019) Forbes (as of May 17, 2023); Jones, American Work, supra, at p. 362; Linderman, At the EEOC, Harassment Cases can Languish for Years, AP News (Apr. 9, 2018) (as of May 17, 2023); Korber and Adkisson, Department of Fair Employment and Housing: Underfunding and Misguided Policies Compromise Civil Rights Mission (Dec. 18, 2013) Cal. Sen. Office of Oversight & Outcomes, pp. 1-2 (as of May 17, 2023).

[207] Chatterji et al., The Impact of City Contracting Set-Asides on Black Self-Employment and Employment (2014) 32 J. of Labor Economics 507, 510; Regents of Univ. of Calif. v. Bakke (1978) 438 U.S. 265, 318-319.

[208] Quillian et al., Meta-Analysis of Field Experiments Shows No Change in Racial Discrimination in Hiring Over Time (2017) Proceedings of the Nat. Academy of Sciences (as of May 17, 2023).

[209] See, e.g., Broussard, "In Search of the Promised Land: African American Migration to San Francisco, 1900-1945" in Seeking El Dorado: African Americans in California (De Graaf et al., edits. 2001) p. 198; West of Jim Crow: The Fight Against California's Color Line (2020) p. 234.

[210] United States v. City and County of San Francisco (N.D. Cal. 1988) 696 F.Supp. 1287.

[211] See, e.g., Loewen, supra, at pp. 100, 239-240.

[212] See, e.g., Trotter, Workers on Arrival: Black Labor and the Making of America (2019) p. 113.

[213] Faughnder and James, Hollywood's C-suites Are Overwhelmingly White. What Are Studios Doing About It?, L.A. Times (July 1, 2020) (as of May 17, 2023); Is Silicon Valley Tech Diversity Possible Now? (June 26, 2019) Center for Employment Equity, U. Mass-Amherst.

[214] See, e.g., Alexander, The New Jim Crow (2020); see also Wilkerson, Caste: The Origins of Our Discontents (2020).

[215] Alexander, supra, at pp. 38-44; Jim Crow Laws, National Park Service (as of May 10, 2022).

[216] See Slavery by Another Name, supra, at pp. 247, 294-296, 377-382.

[217] See, e.g., Ruffin v. Commonwealth (1871) 62 Va. 790, 796.

[218] Baum, Legalize It All: How to Win the War on Drugs (April 2016) Harper's Magazine, at p. 22 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[219] See, e.g., Pierson et al., A Large Scale Analysis of Racial Disparities in Police Stops Across the United States (2017) 4 Nature Human Behavior, 736, 736-745 (as of Apr. 25, 2022); Weir, Policing in Black & White (Dec. 2016) 47 Monitor on Psychology 36, 36 (as of Apr. 25, 2022); Moy, A Taxonomy of Police Technology's Racial Inequity Problems (2021) 2021 U. Ill. L.Rev. 139 (as of Apr. 25, 2022); Okidegbe, When They Hear Us: Race, Algorithms and the Practice of Criminal Law (2020) 29 Kan. J.L. & Pub. Policy, 329 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Selbst, Disparate Impact in Big Data Policing (2017) 52 Ga. L.Rev. 109 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Richardson et al., Dirty Data, Bad Predictions: How Civil Rights Violations Impact Police Data, Predictive Policing Systems, and Justice (2019); Blad and Harwin, Black Students More Likely to Be Arrested at School (Jan. 24, 2017) Ed. Week (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Riddle and Sinclair, Racial Disparities in School-based Disciplinary Actions Are Associated with County-level Rates of Racial Bias (Apr. 2, 2019) Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Barkow, Prosecutorial Administration: Prosecutor Bias and the Department of Justice (2013) 99 Va. L.Rev. 271, 271-342 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Levinson, Forgotten Racial Equality: Implicit Bias, Decisionmaking, and Misremembering (2007) 57 Duke L.J. 345, 398-407 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[220] Sood, Biases Behind Sexual Assault: A Thirteenth Amendment Solution to Under-Enforcement of the Rape of Black Women (2018) 18 U. Md. L.J. Race, Religion, Gender & Class 405, 405, 407 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[221] See, e.g., van de Rijt et al., Racial and Gender Differences in Missing Children's Recovery Chances (Dec. 31, 2018) 13 Pub. Library of Sciences One 1 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[222] Wash. Post, Police Shootings Database 2015-2022 (as of May 17, 2023); Campaign Zero, Mapping Police Violence Database (Mar. 31, 2023) (as of May 17, 2023); U.S. Dept. of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics, Prisoners in 2019 (Oct. 2020) pp. 1, 16 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Federal Bureau of Prisons, Inmate Race (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[223] See, e.g., U.S. Const., 13th, 14th, and 15th Amends.

[224] See, e.g., The Civil Rights Act of 1866, The Reconstruction Acts of 1867-1868, The Ku Klux Klan Act, The Civil Rights Act of 1875, The Civil Rights Act of 1964, The Voting Rights Act of 1965, and The Fair Housing Act of 1968.

[225] Alexander, supra.

[226] Cal. Dept. of Justice, Racial and Identity Profiling Advisory Board Annual Report 2022, pp. 6-8 (as of Apr. 25, 2022) (RIPA 2022); Cal. Dept. of Justice, Use of Force Incident Reporting 2016-2020 (as of Apr. 25, 2022); U.S. Census Bureau, Quick Facts: California (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[227] RIPA 2022, supra, at p. 8.

[228] Semel et al., Whitewashing the Jury Box: How California Perpetuates the Discriminatory Exclusion of Black and Latinx Jurors (June 2020) Berkeley Law Death Penalty Clinic (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[229] Sutton, Symbol and Substance: Effects of California's Three Strikes Law on Felony Sentencing (2013) 47 Law & Society Rev. 37, 37-71 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[230] Office of Minority Health, Profile: Black/African Americans (Oct. 12, 2021) U.S. Dept. of Health & Human Services (as of Mar. 20, 2022).

[231] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Jan. 27, 2022) Testimony of Melissa Jones (as of Feb. 8, 2022).

[232] Forde et al., The Weathering Hypothesis as an Explanation for Racial Disparities in Health: A Systematic Review (2019) 33 Annals of Epidemiology 1, 1-18.

[233] Simons et al., Discrimination, Segregation, and Chronic Inflammation: Testing the Weathering Explanation for the Poor Health of African Americans (2018) 54 Developmental Psychology 1993; Geronimus et al., Black/White Differences in the Relationship of Maternal Age to Birthweight: A Population-Based test of the Weathering Hypothesis (1996) 42 Social Science & Medicine 589; Geronimus et al., Differences in Hypertension Prevalence Among United-States Black-and-White Women of Childbearing Age (1991) 106 Pub. Health Report 393.

[234] Forde et al., supra.

[235] Simons et al., supra.

[236] Sellers et al., Racial Identity Matters: The Relationship between Racial Discrimination and Psychological Functioning in African American Adolescents (2006) 16 J. of Research on Adolescence 187; Fisher et al., Discrimination Distress During Adolescence (2000) 29 J. of Youth and Adolescence 679.

[237] Chavous et al., Gender Matters, Too: The Influences of School Racial Discrimination and Racial Identity on Academic Engagement Outcomes among African American Adolescents (2008) 44 Developmental Psychology 637; Neblett et al., African American Adolescents' Discrimination Experiences and Academic Achievement: Racial Socialization as a Cultural Compensatory and Protective Factor (2006) 32 J. of Black Psychology 199; Smalls et al., Racial Ideological Beliefs and Racial Discrimination Experiences as Predictors of Academic Engagement Among African American Adolescents (2007) 33 J. of Black Psychology 299; Wong et al., The Influence of Ethnic Discrimination and Ethnic Identification on African American Adolescents' School and Socioemotional Adjustment (2004) 71 J. of Personality 1197.

[238] Cal. Health Care Foundation, California Health Care Almanac (Oct. 2019) p. 7 (as of July 12, 2021).

[239] Cal. Maternal Quality Care Collaborative, The California Pregnancy-Associated Mortality Review (2018) p. 21 (as of May 17, 2023); Watson, A Black Mother Told Not to Scream in Labor Asks: Can California Fix Racism in Maternity Care?, Cal Matters (July 11, 2019) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[240] Cal. Health Care Foundation, Health Disparities by Race and Ethnicity in California: Pattern of Inequity (Oct. 22, 2021) pp. 19, 25, 28.

[241] Woods et al., "WE AIN'T CRAZY! Just Coping With a Crazy System": Pathways into the Black Population for Eliminating Mental Health Disparities (May 2012) Cal. Reducing Disparities Project, p. 6 (as of Mar. 16, 2022).

[242] Eberhart, Monitoring Californians' Mental Health: Population Surveillance Reveals Gender, Racial/Ethnic, Age, and Regional Disparities (2018) Rand Corporation, pp. 3-8 (as of May 17, 2023).

[243] Ibid.

[244] Allen, Homesteading and Property Rights; or, 'How the West Was Really Won (1991) 34 J. of Law & Economics 1.

[245] Merritt, Land and the Roots of African-American Poverty, Aeon (Mar. 11, 2016) (as of Mar. 18, 2022).

[246] Darity Jr. and Mullen, William A. Darity and Kristen Mullen on Direct Payments to Close the Racial Wealth Gap, The Economist (May 18, 2021) (as of Mar. 18, 2022).

[247] Go Deeper: Where Race Lives, PBS (as of Mar. 18, 2022).

[248] Katznelson, When Affirmative Action Was White: An Untold History of Racial Inequality in Twentieth-Century America (2005) pp. 42-43; Katznelson and Mettler, On Race and Policy History: A Dialogue About the G.I. Bill (Sept. 2008) 6 Am. Political Science Assn. 519, 521, 522, 530 (as of Jan. 18, 2022).

[249] See Brown, The Whiteness of Wealth (2021) p. 16; Asante-Muhammad et al, Corporation for Economic Development, The Ever-Growing Gap: Without Change, African-American and Latino Families Won't Match White Wealth for Centuries (Aug. 2016) (as of May 23, 2023).

[250] Fed. Reserve Bank of Cleveland, What is Behind the Persistence of the Racial Wealth Gap? (Feb. 28, 2019) (as of May 23, 2023).

[251] Hicks et al., Still Running Up the Down Escalator: How Narratives Shape Our Understanding of Racial Wealth Inequality (2021) Samuel DuBois Cook Center on Social Equity (as of May 23, 2023).

[252] Darity Jr. and Mullen, From Here to Equality: Reparations for African Americans in the 21st Century (2020) pp. 35-38.

[253] De La Cruz-Viesca et al., The Color of Wealth in Los Angeles (2016) Fed. Reserve Bank of San Francisco, p. 38 (as of May 23, 2023).

[254] Nat. Park Service, A History of African Americans in California: Farming (as of May 23, 2023).

[255] Toxic Communities supra, at p. 184; Sundown Towns, supra, at p. at 76; Rothstein, supra, at pp. 72-73.

[256] Lohrentz, The Impact of Proposition 209 on California's MWBEs (Jan. 2015) Equal Justice Society, p. 2 (as of May 17, 2023).

[257] Ibid.

[258] Gov. Code, § 8301.1, subd. (b)(3)(A).

[259] Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law, U.N. Doc. A/RES/60/147 (Mar. 21, 2006) (as of May 15, 2023) (U.N. Principles on Reparation).

[260] Internat. Com. of Jurists (Revised Edition, 2018) The Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Gross Human Rights Violations: A Practitioners' Guide, p. xii (ICJ).

[261] Ibid.

[262] U.N. Office on Genocide Prevention and the Responsibility to Protect, Genocide (as of May 15, 2023).

[263] U.N. Principles on Reparation, supra, at pp. 7-9.

[264] Id. at p. 7.

[265] ICJ at p. 173.

[266] Ibid.

[267] Ibid.

[268] Ibid.

[269] U.N. Principles on Reparation, supra, at p. 7.

[270] ICJ, supra, at p. 174.

[271] Id. at p. 176.

[272] Id. p. 177.

[273] Ibid.

[274] Id. at p. 180.

[275] Id. at p. 181.

[276] Id. at p. 189.

[277] U.N. Principles on Reparation, supra, at p. 8.

[278] ICJ, supra, at p. 206.

[279] Id. at pp. 206-207.

[280] Id. at p. 207.

[281] Ibid.

[282] Ibid.

[283] U.N. Principles on Reparation, supra, at p. 8.

[284] ICJ, supra, at p. 207.

[285] Id. at pp. 207-209.

[286] Id. at p. 209.

[287] Ibid.

[288] Id. at p. 210; see also Impunity, U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/RES/2001/70 (Apr. 25, 2001) par. 8; Impunity, U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/RES/2002/79 (Apr. 25, 2002) par. 9; Impunity, U.N. Doc. No. E/CN.4/RES/2003/72 (Apr. 25, 2003) par. 8.

[289] ICJ, supra, at p. 211.

[290] Ibid.

[291] Ibid.

[292] Ibid.

[293] U.N. Principles on Reparation, supra, at p. 8.

[294] Ibid.

[295] Id. at pp. 8-9.

[296] ICJ, supra, at p. 135.

[297] Id. at p. 136.

[298] Id. at p. 137.

[299] Ibid.

[300] Id at p. 138.

[301] Id. at pp. 138-139.

[302] Id. at p. 140.

[303] Ibid.

[304] Van Boven, The United Nations Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2010) U.N. Audiovisual Library of Internat. Law, p. 3.

[305] U.N. Principles on Reparation, supra, at p. 5.

[306] Id. at p. 7.

[307] Id. at p. 7*Ibid*.

[308] Id. at p. 5.

[309] Ibid.

[310] Id. at p. 6

[311] International Commission of Jurists, The Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Gross Human Rights Violations: A Practitioners' Guide (Revised Edition, 2018)ICJ, supra, at p. 36.

[312] Id. at p. 34.

[313] Ibid.

[314] Ibid.

[315] Id. at p. xii.

[316] Ibid.

[317] Id. at p. 42.

[318] U.N. Principles on Reparation, supra, at p. 6.

[319] Human Rights Committee, General Comment No. 31 on Tthe Nature of the General Legal Obligation Imposed on States Parties to the Covenant, U.N. Doc. CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.13 (May 26, 2004), par.a 16 (as of May 15, 2023).

[320] U.N. Principles on Reparation, supra, at p. 6.

[321] ICJ, supra, at p. 55.

[322] Ibid.

[323] Encyclopedia Britannica, Third Reich (May 17, 2023) (as of May 18, 2023).

[324] Blakemore, How the Holocaust Happened in Plain Sight (Jan. 27, 2023) Nat. Geographic (as of May 18, 2023).

[325] See ibid.

[326] Ibid.

[327] David Ben-Gurion, Prime Minister of Israel, statement at Sitting 38 of the Second Knesset (Jan. 7, 1952) p. 704 (as of May 18, 2023).

[328] See Blakemore, supra.

[329] De Greiff, The Handbook of Reparations (2006) Luxembourg Agreement [Excerpts], p. 886 (De Greiff, Luxembourg Agreement); Colonomos and Armstrong, The Handbook of Reparations (2006) German Reparations to the Jews After World War II, p. 391 (Colonomos and Armstrong, German Reparations).

[330] U.N. Principles on Reparation, supra.

[331] See generally Luxembourg Agreement.

[332] The Agreement sets out the FRG's financial obligations in Deutschemark. See generally Luxembourg Agreement. At the time of the Agreement was executed, one dollar equaled 4.2 Deutschemark, meaning the DM3 billion was equal to about $820 million in U.S. dollars. Honig, The Reparations Agreement Between Israel and The Federal Republic of Germany (1954) 48 Am. J. Internat. L. 564, 566 & fn. 11.

[333] De Greiff, Luxembourg Agreement, supra, at p. 887.

[334] Ibid.

[335] Colonomos and Armstrong, German Reparations, supra, at p. 399; De Greiff, Luxembourg Agreement, supra, at pp. 895-897.

[336] Colonomos and Armstrong, German Reparations, supra, at p. 399; De Greiff, Luxembourg Agreement, supra, at pp. 895-897. The Claims Conference is an umbrella organization comprised of 23 Jewish organizations. It was founded in 1951 after a meeting in New York. Colonomos and Armstrong, German Reparations, supra, at p. 394.

[337] Colonomos and Armstrong, German Reparations, supra, at p. 407.

[338] Ibid.

[339] Ibid.

[340] Ibid.

[341] Ibid.

[342] See Barkan, Between Restitution and International Morality (2001) 25 Fordham Internat. L.J. 46, 49

[343] Ibid.

[344] Ibid.

[345] Colonomos and Armstrong, German Reparations, supra, at p. 408.

[346] Ibid.

[347] Ibid.

[348] Ibid.

[349] Id. at p. 409.

[350] Ibid.

[351] Ibid.

[352] Id. at p. 407.

[353] Authers, The Handbook of Reparations (2006) Making Good Again: German Compensation for Forced and Slave Laborers, pp. 433-434 (Authers, German Compensation).

[354] Under the Forced and Slave Labor Compensation Law, slave labor was defined as work performed in a concentration camp or ghetto or other place of confinement under conditions of hardship. Authers, German Compensation, supra, at p. 435. Forced labor was work performed by force other than slave labor in the Third Reich or its territories under conditions resembling imprisonment. Ibid.

[355] Id. at p. 434.

[356] Ibid.

[357] Id. at p. 435.

[358] Ibid.

[359] Id. at p. 437.

[360] Ibid.

[361] Ibid.

[362] The Center for Justice & Accountability, Chile (as of May 16, 2023).

[363] Robinson, Chile's Pinochet Beaten in Plebiscite on Rule, Wash. Post (Oct. 6, 1988) (as of May 18, 2023).

[364] Rojo, Patricio Aylwin Sworn in as President of Chile, United Press Internat. (Mar. 11, 1990) (as of May 18, 2023).

[365] Chilean Nat. Com. on Truth and Reconciliation, Report of the Chilean National Commission on Truth and Reconciliation (Feb. 1991) United States Institute of Peace, p. 28 (as of May 16, 2023).

[366] Lira, The Handbook of Reparations (2006) The Reparations Policy for Human Rights Violations in Chile, p. 57 (Chile); Chilean Nat. Com. on Truth and Reconciliation, supra, at p. 28.

[367] See Chilean Nat. Com. on Truth and Reconciliation, supra.

[368] Lira, Chile, supra, at p. 58.

[369] De Grieff, The Handbook of Reparations (2006) p. 748.

[370] Ibid.

[371] Id. at p. 749.

[372] Ibid.

[373] Ibid.

[374] Ibid.

[375] Id. at p. 750.

[376] Ibid.

[377] Id. at p. 59.

[378] Ibid.

[379] Ibid.

[380] Ibid.

[381] Ibid.

[382] Id. at p. 58.

[383] Ibid.

[384] Id. at p. 63.

[385] Chilean Nat. Com. on Political Imprisonment and Torture, Commission of Inquiry: Chile 03, United States Institute of Peace (as of May 18, 2023).

[386] Farbstein, Perspectives from a Practitioner: Lessons Learned from the Apartheid Litigation (2020) 61 Harv. Internat. L.J. 451, 454-455.

[387] See Guelke, The Origin of White Supremacy in South Africa: An Interpretation (1989) 15 Social Dynamics 40, 40-45; Encyclopedia Britannica (2023) Apartheid (as of May 16, 2023).

[388] See Encyclopedia Britannica (2023) Apartheid (as of May 16, 2023).

[389] See Ibid. A fourth category for Asian, that is Indian and Pakistani, was added later. Ibid.

[390] Ibid.

[391] See ibid.

[392] Ibid.

[393] Ibid.

[394] A Ford plant in Port Saint Elizabeth manufactured vehicles that were used by the military and police. Farbstein, supra, at pp. 455, 462-463.

[395] Id. at p. 455.

[396] Daly, Reparations in South Africa: A Cautionary Tale (2003) 33 U. Mem. L.Rev. 367, 370-372

[397] Id. at p. 372.

[398] Id. at pp. 377-378; Colvin, The Handbook of Reparations (2006) Reparations Program in South Africa, pp. 195-196 (Colvin, South Africa Reparations).

[399] Colvin, South Africa Reparations, supra, at pp. 196-197.

[400] Id. at pp. 195-196.

[401] Daly, supra, at p. 383.

[402] See Colvin, South Africa Reparations, supra, at pp. 200-203, 208-210.

[403] Id. at pp. 177, 194-195, 197-198, 209.

[404] Id. at pp. 209-210.

[405] Ibid.

[406] Id. at p. 187.

[407] See id. at pp. 187-188.

[408] Id. at pp. 188-189.

[409] Id. at p. 188.

[410] Ibid.

[411] Id. at p. 189.

[412] Ibid.

[413] Id. at p. 190.

[414] Ibid.

[415] Ibid.

[416] Ibid.

[417] de Bruin, Indian Residential Schools Settlement Agreement (July 11, 2013) The Canadian Encyclopedia (as of May 19, 2023); The Residential School System (Sept. 9, 2020) Government of Canada (as of May 19, 2023).

[418] See de Bruin, supra; The Residential School System, supra.

[419] de Bruin, supra.

[420] Ibid.; Miller, Residential Schools in Canada (Oct. 10, 2012) The Canadian Encyclopedia (as of May 19, 2023) (Miller, Residential Schools).

[421] Glover, Residential Schools in Canada (Plain-Language Summary) (Jan. 15, 2020) The Canadian Encyclopedia (as of May 19, 2023)

[422] Ibid.

[423] Ibid.

[424] Miller, Residential Schools, supra.

[425] Ibid.

[426] Ibid.

[427] Ibid.

[428] Glover, supra.

[429] Ibid.

[430] de Bruin, supra.

[431] Litigation and Courts, Indigenous Peoples Atlas of Canada, Canadian Geographic (as of Oct. 20, 2022).

[432] Llewellyn, Dealing with the Legacy of Native Residential School Abuse in Canada: Litigation, ADR, and Restorative Justice (2002) 52 U. Toronto L.J. 253, 261-262.

[433] de Bruin, supra.

[434] The Indian Residential School Settlement Agreement, The University of British Columbia (as of May 19, 2023).

[435] Indian Residential Schools Settlement Agreement (May 8, 2006) (as of May 19, 2023); de Bruin, supra.

[436] de Bruin, supra.

[437] Ibid.

[438] Ibid.

[439] Ibid. All dollar amounts referred to in this section refer to Canadian dollars.

[440] Ibid.

[441] Ibid.

[442] Ibid.

[443] Ibid.

[444] Ibid.; Truth and Reconciliation Com. of Canada, Honouring the Truth, Reconciling for the Future: Summary of the Final Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada (2015) (as of May 19, 2023).

[445] de Bruin, supra.

[446] Ibid.

[447] Austen, Canada Settles $2 Billion Suit Over 'Cultural Genocide' at Residential Schools, N.Y. Times (Jan. 21, 2023) (as of May 19, 2023).

[448] Ibid.

[449] Ibid.

[450] The Canadian Press, 'Historic' $2.8B Class-Action Indigenous Court Settlement Approved, CBC News (Mar. 9, 2023) (as of Mar. 10, 2023).

[451] Ibid.

[452] Ibid.

[453] Ibid.

[454] Sinha, The Long History of American Slavery Reparations, Wall Street J. (Sept. 20, 2019) (as of Apr. 12, 2023).

[455] Ibid.

[456] Ibid.

[457] Ibid.

[458] Darity and Mullen, From Here to Equality: Reparations for Black Americans in the Twenty-First Century (2nd ed. 2022) p. 9.

[459] Id. at p. 10.

[460] Id. at p. 11.

[461] Id. at p. 12.

[462] Id. at p. 11.

[463] Johnson v. McAdoo (1916) 45 App.D.C. 440, 441.

[464] Id. at pp. 440-441.

[465] Id. at p. 441.

[466] Johnson v. McAdoo (1917) 244 U.S. 643.

[467] Perry, No Pensions for Ex-Slaves: How Federal Agencies Suppressed Movement to Aid Freedpeople (2010) 42 Prologue Magazine (as of May 19, 2023).

[468] Darity and Mullen, supra, at p. 12.

[469] Ibid.

[470] Nat. African-American Reparations Com., Who is Queen Mother Moore? (July 27, 2013) (as of May 19, 2023).

[471] Darity and Mullen, supra, at p. 13.

[472] Ibid.

[473] The Black Panther Party's Ten-Point Program, UC Press Blog (as of Apr. 12, 2023).

[474] Malcolm X, address at Michigan State University (Jan. 23, 1963) The Race Problem (as of May 19, 2023).

[475] Darity and Mullen, supra, at p. 15.

[476] Nat. Coalition of Blacks for Reparations in Am., About (as of Apr. 13, 2023).

[477] Darity and Mullen, supra, at p. 15.

[478] Felton, Supporters Say They Have the Votes in the House to Pass a Reparations Bill after Years of Lobbying, Wash. Post (Feb. 25, 2022) (as of Apr. 13, 2023).

[479] Coates, The Case for Reparations (June 2014) The Atlantic (as of May 19, 2023).

[480] See Assem. Com. on Judiciary, analysis of Assem. Bill No. 3121 (2019- 2020 Reg. Sess.) May 6, 2020, p. 7 (as of May 19, 2023).

[481] Sotomayor, House Panel Approves Bill to Create Commission on Slavery Reparations, Wash. Post (Apr. 14, 2021) (as of May 19, 2023).

[482] Ibid.

[483] Felton, supra. H.R. 40 has been reintroduced in the 118th Congress, but as of May 2023 was awaiting consideration by the House Judiciary Committee. H.R. No. 40, 118th Cong., 1st Sess. (2023) (as of May 16, 2023).

[484] Kuykendall et al., United States Indian Claims Commission, Final Report (Sept. 30, 1978) p. 5 (ICC Final Report).

[485] Id. at pp. 1-5.

[486] See, e.g., Cohen, Cohen's Handbook of Federal Indian Law (Newton edit., 2019) § 1.03[4][a] (discussing the Trail of Tears and several other forcible relocations associated with Indian Removal).

[487] Dunbar-Ortiz, Yes, Native Americans Were the Victims of Genocide (May 12, 2016) History News Network (as of May 19, 2023); Dobuzinskis, California Governor Apologizes to Native Americans, Cites 'Genocide' (June 18, 2019) Reuters (as of May 19, 2023).

[488] ICC Final Report, supra, at p. 1.

[489] Saunt, The Invasion of America (Jan. 7, 2015) Aeon (as of May 19, 2023).

[490] ICC Final Report, supra, at pp. 5-6.

[491] Derocher, Manifesting a Better Destiny: Interest Convergence and the Indian Claims Commission (2022) 24 N.Y.U. J. of Legislation & Pub. Policy 511, 535 (as of May 19, 2023).

[492] Indian Claims Commission Act of 1946, Pub. L. No. 79-726, § 2 (May 21, 1946) 60 Stat. 1049, 1050.

[493] H.R.Rep. No. 1466, 2d Sess., pp. 1347-1359 (1946).

[494] ICC Final Report, supra, at p. 8.

[495] Id. at pp. 6, 8.

[496] Id. at p. 5.

[497] Id. at p. 9.

[498] Id. at pp. 7-8.

[499] Indian Claims Commission Act of 1946, Pub. L. No. 79-726, § 2 (May 21, 1946) 60 Stat. 1049, 1050.

[500] Indian Claims Commission Act of 1946, Pub. L. No. 79-726, § 23 (May 21, 1946) 60 Stat. 1049, 1055.

[501] ICC Final Report, supra, at p. iii.

[502] Id. at p. 6.

[503] Ibid.

[504] Id. at p. 21.

[505] Ibid.

[506] Id. at p. 20.

[507] See, e.g., Danforth, Repaying Historical Debts: The Indian Claims Commission (1973) 49 N.D. L.Rev. 359, 374-403; Lurie, The Indian Claims Commission (1978) 436 Annals of the Am. Academy of Political & Social Science 97; Vance, The Congressional Mandate and the Indian Claims Commission (1969) 45 N.D. L.Rev. 325, 332-335 (as of May 19, 2023); Churchill, Charades, Anyone? The Indian Claims Commission in Context (2000) 24 Am. Indian Culture and Research J. 43, 46-49.

[508] Churchill, Charades, Anyone?, supra, at p. 53.

[509] Cohen, Cohen's Handbook of Federal Indian Law (Newton edit., 2019) § 5.06[3].

[510] Churchill, Charades, Anyone?, supra, at p. 57.

[511] Id. at pp. 48, 53.

[512] ICC Final Report, supra, at p. 11.

[513] Ibid.

[514] Danforth, supra, at pp. 376-377.

[515] Vance, supra, at p. 334.

[516] Churchill, Charades, Anyone?, supra, at p. 48; Vance, supra, at p. 334 (noting that although settlement at the ICC was authorized by statute, the prevailing Department of Justice policy at the time was to not make settlement offers).

[517] ICC Final Report, supra, at p. 9.

[518] Vance, supra, at p. 332-334; Danforth, supra, at pp. 376-377.

[519] Indian Claims Commission Act of 1946, Pub. L. No. 79-726, 60 Stat. 1049, 1052.

[520] Danforth, supra, at pp. 376-377.

[521] About the USPHS Syphilis Study, Nat. Center for Bioethics in Research and Health Care, Tuskegee University (as of May 19, 2023).

[522] Ibid.; The U.S. Public Health Service Syphilis Study at Tuskegee (Nov. 3, 2022) Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, Office of Science (as of Feb. 13, 2023).

[523] See Tuskegee Patient Medical Files (Jan. 13, 2021) Nat. Archives at Atlanta (as of Feb 13, 2023).

[524] About the USPHS Syphilis Study, supra.

[525] Nix, Tuskegee Experiment: The Infamous Syphilis Study (Dec. 15, 2020) History (as of May 19, 2023); see, e.g., Reverby, Examining Tuskegee: The Infamous Syphilis Study and its Legacy (2009) p. 111.

[526] About the USPHS Syphilis Study, supra; Nix, supra.

[527] About the USPHS Syphilis Study, supra.

[528] Ibid.; see generally Tuskegee Syphilis Study Ad Hoc Advisory Panel, Final Report (Apr. 28, 1973) U.S. Dept. of Health, Education, and Welfare (as of May 19, 2023).

[529] See Pollard v. United States (M.D. Ala. 1974) 384 F.Supp. 304; Yearby, Exploitation in Medical Research: The Enduring Legacy of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study (2017) 67 Case Western Reserve L.Rev. 1171, 1173 fn. 8 (as of May 19, 2023).

[530] Yearby, supra, at p. 1173 fn. 8.

[531] Ibid.

[532] Ibid.

[533] Ibid.

[534] Jones, Bad Blood: The Tuskegee Syphilis Experiment (1993) pp. 215, 217.

[535] See H.R. 7724, Pub. L. 93-348 (July 12, 1974) 88 Stat 342 (as of May 19, 2023).

[536] Nat. Center for Bioethics in Research and Health Care, Tuskegee University, Syphilis Study Legacy Committee, (as of May 19, 2023).

[537] Tuskegee Syphilis Study Legacy Committee, Final Report (May 1996) (as of May 19, 2023).

[538] Ross, AP WAS THERE, Tuskegee Syphilis Study: Clinton Apologized (May 10, 2017) The Associated Press (as of Feb. 14, 2023); Remarks by the President in Apology for Study Done in Tuskegee (May 16, 1997) The White House Office of the Press Secretary (as of Feb. 14, 2023).

[539] Ross, supra.

[540] Ross, supra; Remarks by the President in Apology for Study Done in Tuskegee, supra.

[541] Ross, supra; Remarks by the President in Apology for Study Done in Tuskegee, supra.

[542] The Associated Press, A Fund Apologizes for its Role in the Tuskegee Syphilis Study that Targeted Black Men, NPR (June 11, 2022) (as of Feb 14, 2023).

[543] Everest-Phillips, The Pre-War Fear of Japanese Espionage: Its Impact and Legacy (Apr. 2007) 42 J. of Contemporary History 243, 261 fn. 60 (as of May 19, 2023); Exec. Order No. 9066, 7 Fed. Reg. 1407 (Feb. 19, 1942); Golden Gate National Recreation Area, Remembering Executive Order 9066 (Feb. 23, 2021) U.S. Nat. Park Service (as of May 19, 2023).

[544] Golden Gate Nat. Recreation Area, supra.

[545] Ibid.

[546] Nagata et al., The Japanese American Wartime Incarceration: Examining the Scope of Racial Trauma (2019) 74 Am. Psychology 36, 37 (as of May 19, 2023).

[547] See Com. on the Wartime Internment and Relocation of Civilians, Personal Justice Denied: Report of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians (1982) p. 1 (as of May 19, 2023).

[548] Ibid.; Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians Act, H.R. No. 5499, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. (1979).

[549] See generally Personal Justice Denied, supra.

[550] See Anti-Defamation League, Understanding the Civil Liberties Act of 1988 (2013) (as of May 19, 2023).

[551] 50 U.S.C. §§ 4214-4216.

[552] 50 U.S.C. § 4215.

[553] Kunioka and McCurdy, Relocation and Internment: Civil Rights Lessons from World War II (July 2006) 39 PS: Political Science and Politics 503, 503 (as of May 19, 2023).

[554] 50 U.S.C. §§ 4214, 4216.

[555] Ibid.

[556] 50 U.S.C. § 4213.

[557] Kunioka and McCurdy, supra, at p. 503.

[558] Jackson, September 11 Attacks: What Happened on 9/11?, BBC News (Aug. 3, 2021) (as of May 19, 2023).

[559] CDC World Trade Center Health Program, Toxins and Health Impacts (as of May 16, 2023).

[560] Ibid.

[561] Ibid.; Haelle, Health Effects of 9/11 Still Plague Responders and Survivors (Sept. 10, 2021) Scientific Am. (as of May 19, 2023).

[562] CDC World Trade Center Health Program, supra.

[563] Virgilio v. City of New York (2d Cir. 2005) 407 F.3d 105, 109.

[564] September 11th Victim Compensation Fund, 20th Anniversary Special Report (Sept. 2021) p. 4 (as of Feb. 14, 2023).

[565] Id. at p. 12.

[566] Id. at p. 3.

[567] James Zadroga 9/11 Health and Compensation Act of 2010, H.R. 847, 11th Cong., 2d. Sess. (Dec. 24, 2010) (as of May 19, 2023).

[568] Ibid.

[569] Ibid.

[570] September 11th Victim Compensation Fund, Section 1: Eligibility Criteria and Deadlines (Jan. 9, 2023) (as of May 19, 2023) § 1.4.

[571] 20th Anniversary Special Report, supra, at p. 3.

[572] Ibid.

[573] September 11th Victim Compensation Fund of 2001, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Compensation for Deceased Victims (as of May 19, 2023).

[574] CNN Editorial Research, September 11 Victim Aid and Compensation Fast Facts, CNN (Sept. 7, 2022) (as of May 19, 2023).

[575] September 11th Victim Compensation Fund, About the Victim Compensation Fund (as of May 19, 2023).

[576] Ibid.

[577] Isaacson, Terrorism and Mass Toxic Torts: An Examination of the James Zadroga 9/11 Health and Compensation Act (2014) 25 Fordham Environmental L.Rev. 509.

[578] Id. at p. 510.

[579] See id. at pp. 511-513.

[580] See id. at pp. 516-520.

[581] Goldmacher, With Ground Zero Payments Slashed, a Push to Replenish a 9/11 Fund, N.Y. Times (Feb. 28, 2019) (as of May 19, 2023).

[582] Gordy, The 9/11 Cancer Conundrum: The Law, Policy, & Politics of the Zadroga Act (2012) 37 Seton Hall Legis. J. 33, 50.

[583] 20th Anniversary Special Report, supra, at p. 3.

[584] About the Victim Compensation Fund, supra; September 11th Victim Compensation Fund, Annual Report 2019, p. 7 (as of May 19, 2023).

[585] See About the Victim Compensation Fund, supra; September 11th Victim Compensation Fund, Annual Report 2019, supra, at p. 7.

[586] September 11th Victim Compensation Fund, VCF Permanent Authorization Act: Questions and Answers (Aug. 2019) (as of Feb. 14, 2023).

[587] September 11th Victim Compensation Fund, 2022 Annual Report, p. 8 (as of May 19, 2023).

[588] Barron, Nation Reels After Gunman Massacres 20 Children at School in Connecticut, N.Y. Times (Dec. 14, 2012) (as of May 19, 2023).

[589] Buchanan et al., How They Got Their Guns, N.Y. Times (Feb. 16, 2018) (as of May 19, 2023); Ray, Encyclopedia Britannica (2023) Sandy Hook Elementary School Shooting (as of May 19, 2023).

[590] Ray, supra.

[591] Ibid.

[592] Ibid.

[593] Barron, supra.

[594] Ibid.; Gamio and Hubler, Texas Massacre is the Second-Deadliest School Shooting on Record, N.Y. Times (May 24, 2022) (as of May 19, 2023).

[595] Ray, supra.

[596] Sandy Hook Advisory Com., Final Report (Mar. 6, 2015) p. 1 (as of May 16, 2023).

[597] See id. at pp. 10-12.

[598] Id. at pp. 211-213.

[599] Altimari, Sandy Hook Two Years Later: Where is the Aid Going?, Hartford Courant (Dec. 14, 2014) (as of Feb. 15, 2023).

[600] Ibid.

[601] U.S. Dept. of Justice, Attorney General Holder Announces $1.5 Million to Reimburse Support Efforts to Victims of the Sandy Hook Elementary School Shooting (Dec. 17, 2013) (as of May 20, 2023).

[602] Ibid.

[603] U.S. Dept. of Justice, Attorney General Holder Announces $2.5 Million to Connecticut Law Enforcement for Costs Related to Sandy Hook School Shootings (Aug. 28, 2013) (as of May 20, 2023).

[604] New Haven Register, Newtown Receives $7.1M Federal Grant to Support Sandy Hook Victims (June 17, 2014) (as of May 20, 2023).

[605] Ibid.

[606] Altimari, supra.

[607] Ibid.

[608] Ibid.

[609] Encyclopedia Britannica (2023) Iran Hostage Crisis (as of May 16, 2023).

[610] Ibid.

[611] Ibid.

[612] Hostage Relief Act of 1980, Pub. L. 96-449 (Oct. 14, 1980) 94 Stat. 1967; see also Elsea, Congressional Research Service, The Iran Hostages: Efforts to Obtain Compensation (Nov. 2, 2015) pp. 1-2 (as of May 20, 2023).

[613] Elsea, supra, at p. 4.

[614] Id. at p. 3.

[615] Ibid.

[616] H.R. No. 2851, 99th Cong., 1st sess. (June 25, 1985).

[617] Originally 42 U.S.C. § 10609; now, as amended, 34 U.S.C. § 20144; see Former U.S. Hostages of Iran to be Eligible for Compensation (Dec. 29, 2015) CRS Reports & Analysis (as of May 20, 2023).

[618] Feinberg, United States Victims of State Sponsored Terrorism Fund, Report from the Special Master (Jan. 2017) p. 1 (as of May 19, 2023).

[619] United States Victims of State Sponsored Terrorism Fund, Special Master's Supplemental Report Regarding the Third Distribution (Dec. 2022) p. 4 (as of May 16, 2023).

[620] Herszenhorn, Americans Held Hostage in Iran Win Compensation 36 Years Later, N.Y. Times (Dec. 25, 2015) p. A1 (as of Feb. 15, 2023).

[621] 34 U.S.C. § 20144, subd. (c)(2)(B)-(C).

[622] Herszenhorn, supra.

[623] Special Master's Supplemental Report Regarding the Third Distribution, supra, at p. 1; 34 U.S.C. § 20144, subd. (d)(3).

[624] Special Master's Supplemental Report Regarding the Third Distribution, supra, at p. 1

[625] Id. at p. 4.

[626] Id. at p. 12 (rounding to the nearest hundredth thousand).

[627] Id. at p. 13.

[628] Colburn et al., A Documented History of the Incident Which Occurred at Rosewood, Florida, in January 1923 (Dec. 1993) pp. 23, 25.

[629] Id. at p. 27.

[630] Ibid.

[631] Id. at p. 31.

[632] Id. at pp. 28-56.

[633] Ibid.

[634] Id. at pp. 42-44.

[635] Id. at p. 47.

[636] Id. at p. 49.

[637] Id. at p. 3.

[638] Id. at p. 4.

[639] Real Rosewood Foundation, Rosewood Remembered (as of May 16, 2023).

[640] Colburn et al., supra, at p. 85.

[641] Id. at p. 4.

[642] Id. at p. 87.

[643] Times Staff Writer, Arnett Doctor, Driving Force Behind Rosewood Reparations, Dies at 72, Tampa Bay Times (Mar. 26, 2015) (as of May 20, 2023).

[644] Bassett, House Bill 591: Florida Compensates Rosewood Victims and Their Families for A Seventy-One-Year-Old Injury (1994) 22 Fla. State U. L.Rev. 503, 508.

[645] Time Staff Writer, supra.

[646] Ibid.

[647] Dye, The Rosewood Massacre: History and the Making of Public Policy (1997) 19 The Public Historian 25, 39.

[648] Bassett, supra, at p. 513.

[649] Fla. House Bill No. 591 (1994 Reg. Sess.).

[650] Fla. House Bill No. 591 (1994 Reg. Sess.) §§ 3-5.

[651] Fla. House Bill No. 591 (1994 Reg. Sess.).

[652] Fla. Stat., § 1009.55.

[653] Fla. Admin. Code, rule 6A-20.027.

[654] Fla. Dept. of Ed., Rosewood Family Scholarship Fact Sheet 2022-23 (2022) (as of May 16, 2023).

[655] Ibid.

[656] Fla. Stat., § 1009.55, subd. (2)(c).

[657] Banks, Reparations after Rosewood Massacre a Model, Descendants Say, Tampa Bay Times (Dec. 24, 2020) (as of May 20, 2022).

[658] Ibid.

[659] N.C. Pub. L. 1929, ch. 34.

[660] Brewer v. Valk (1933) 204 N.C. 186.

[661] N.C. Pub. L. 1933, ch. 224.

[662] N.C. Pub. L. 1933, ch. 224.

[663] Railey and Begos, 'Still Hiding,' Winston-Salem J. (Mar. 19, 2013) (as of May 20, 2023).

[664] Bakst, North Carolina's Forced-Sterilization Program: A Case for Compensating the Living Victims, John Locke Foundation Policy Rep. (2011) p. 6 (as of May 16, 2023).

[665] Ibid.

[666] Ibid.

[667] Brophy and Troutman, The Eugenics Movement in North Carolina (2016) 94 N.C. L.Rev. 1871, 1876 & fn. 19.

[668] N.C. Justice for Sterilization Victims Foundation, N.C. Dept. of Administration, Brochure (Sept. 2014) (as of May 16, 2023).

[669] Ibid.

[670] N.C. Sess. Law 2013-360, § 6.18, subd. (a), creating N.C. General Statutes, § 143B-426.50-57.

[671] James and Hutchison, N.C. to Compensate Victims of Sterilization in 20th Century Eugenics Program, ABC News (Jan. 10, 2012) (as of May 20, 2023).

[672] N.C. General Statutes, § 143B-426.51; Craver, Final Payment Goes Out to 220 Eugenics Victims, Winston-Salem J. (Feb. 9, 2018) (as of May 20, 2023).

[673] N.C. General Statutes, § 143B-426.50, subd. (5); Bakst, supra, at p. 12.

[674] Mennel, Why Some NC Sterilization Victims Won't Get Share of $10 Million Fund, WUNC.org (Oct. 6, 2014) (as of May 20, 2023).

[675] Encyclopedia Virginia, Ch. 46B of the Code of Virginia § 1095h–m (1924) (as of May 20, 2023).

[676] Ibid.

[677] Equal Justice Initiative, Virginia Passes Acts Seeking to 'Purify the White Race' (as of May 20, 2023).

[678] See, e.g., Murray, Abortion, Sterilization, and the Universe of Reproductive Rights (2022) 63 William & Mary L.Rev. 1599, 1612-1615; Suter, Why Reason-Based Abortion Bans are not a Remedy Against Eugenics: An Empirical Study (2023) 10 J. Law & Biosciences 1, 16.

[679] Encyclopedia Virginia, Buck v. Bell (1927) (as of May 20, 2023). On October 19, 1927, John H. Bell, the colony's superintendent, performed a salpingectomy, sterilizing Carrie Buck. (Ibid.) She was released from the institution a month later. (Ibid.) Historians have since found evidence that neither Carrie Buck nor her daughter suffered from any mental illness and that Bell's sterilization relied on a false diagnosis. (Ibid.) Vivian Dobbs, Carrie Buck's daughter, was placed on the honor roll at her elementary school in 1931, a year before she died at the age of eight. Ibid. Carrie Buck Eagle Detamore, who married twice, died in a nursing home in Waynesboro on January 28, 1983, and is buried in Oakwood Cemetery in Charlottesville. (Ibid.)

[680] Ibid.

[681] Ibid.

[682] Branigan, Warner Apologizes to Victims of Eugenics, Wash. Post (May 3, 2002) (as of May 20, 2023).

[683] Virginia Acts of Assembly – Ch. 665, 2015 session (Mar. 26, 2015) pp. 306-307 (as of May 16, 2023).

[684] Id. at p. 307.

[685] Portnoy, Va. General Assembly Agrees to Compensate Eugenics Victims, Wash. Post (Feb. 27, 2015) (as of May 20, 2020).

[686] Virginia Acts of Assembly – Ch. 665, supra, at p. 307.

[687] Ibid.

[688] Portnoy, supra.

[689] Victims of Eugenics Sterilization Compensation Program, Va. Dept. of Behavioral Health and Developmental Services (as of May 20, 2023).

[690] Assem. Bill No. 137 (2021-2022 Reg. Sess.) § 34, subds. (a) & (b) (as of May 20, 2023).

[691] Ibid.

[692] Id. § 34, subd. (c).

[693] Ibid.

[694] Id. § 34, subd. (e).

[695] Id. § 34, subd. (i)(2).

[696] Id. § 34, subds. (g)-(h).

[697] Cal. State Auditor, Sterilization of Female Inmates, Some Inmates Were Sterilized Unlawfully, and Safeguards Designed to Limit Occurrences of the Procedure Failed (June 2014) (as of Jan. 12, 2023).

[698] Id. at p. 19.

[699] Assem. Bill No. 1135 (2013-2014 Reg. Sess.) (as of May 20, 2023).

[700] Sen. Com. on Judiciary, analysis of Assem. Bill. No. 1007 (2021-2022 Reg. Sess.) July 1, 2021, p. 6 (as of May 20, 2023).

[701] CalVCB, Forced or Involuntary Sterilization Compensation Program Frequently Asked Questions (as of May 20, 2023).

[702] Assem. Bill No. 137, supra, § 21.

[703] Assem. Bill No. 137, supra, § 21, subd. (a).

[704] Beam, California Trying to Find, Compensate Sterilization Victims, A.P. News (Jan. 5, 2023) (as of May 20, 2023); CalVCB, supra.

[705] CalVCB, supra.

[706] Baer, Dignity Restoration and the Chicago Police Torture Reparations Ordinance (2019) 92 Chi.-Kent L.Rev. 769, 769-770.

[707] Id. at p. 770.

[708] Ibid.

[709] Ibid.

[710] Taylor, Symposium: Police in America: Ensuring Accountability and Mitigating Racial Bias: The Long Path to Reparations for the Survivors of Chicago Police Torture (2016) 11 Nw. J. L. & Social Policy 330, 340 (Taylor, Survivors of Chicago)

[711] Ibid.; Macaraeg and Kunichoff, How Chicago Became the First City to Make Reparations to Victims of Police Violence (Mar. 21, 2017) Yes Magazine (as of May 21, 2023).

[712] See Macaraeg and Kunichoff, supra.

[713] Taylor, Survivors of Chicago, supra, at pp. 336-337.

[714] Id. at pp. 337, 346.

[715] U.N. Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Concluding Observations on the Third to Fifth Periodic Reports of United States of America, U.N. Doc. CAT/C/USA/CO/3-5 (Nov. 2014) par. 26 (as of May 22, 2023).

[716] Baer, supra, at p. 771; Chicago Ord. No. SO2015-2687(as of May 16, 2023).

[717] Chicago Substitute Res. No. SR2015-256 (as of May 22, 2023).

[718] Ibid.; Chicago Ord. No. SO2015-2687 (as of May 22, 2023).

[719] Evans, Chicago Promised Police Torture Survivors A Memorial. Nearly 6 Years Later, They're Still Waiting For Funding (Feb. 26, 2021) Book Club Chicago (as of May 22, 2023).

[720] Ibid.

[721] City of Evanston Res. No. 37-R-21 (Mar. 22, 2021) (as of May 22, 2023).

[722] Gavin, Report Examines the City of Evanston's Practices That Impacted the Black Community, 1900-1960, Evanston RoundTable (Oct. 12, 2020) (as of May 16, 2023).

[723] Robinson, Jr., and Thompson, Evanston Policies and Practices Directly Affecting the African American Community, 1900 - 1960 (and Present) (Aug. 2020) p. 39 (as of May 22, 2023).

[724] Id. at pp. 35-57.

[725] City of Evanston Res. No. 37-R-21, supra, § 6.

[726] See City of Evanston, Local Reparations: Restorative Housing Program: Official Program Guidelines (2021) p. 3 (as of May 16, 2023); City of Evanston Res. No. 58-R-19 (Jun 5, 2019) § 1; Kimberly Richardson, Interim Assistant City Manager, mem. to Mayors and Members of the City Council, Mar. 22, 2021, p. 1 (as of May 22, 2023); Bookwalter, Evanston Names New African American Heritage Sites to Mark Local History, Chicago Tribune (July 7, 2020 (as of May 22, 2023).

[727] City of Evanston, Local Reparations: Restorative Housing Program: Official Program Guidelines (2021) p. 3 (as of May 22, 2023).

[728] Id. at p. 8.

[729] Id. at pp. 3, 6-7.

[730] Brown and Cahan, Evanston Reparations Begin: Random Drawing Selects 16 Black 'Ancestors' to Receive $25,000 Grants, Evanston RoundTable (Jan. 13, 2022) (as of Oct. 4, 2022).

[731] Broaddus, Evanston City Council Votes in Favor of Expanding its Reparations Program to Repair Housing Discrimination, CNN (as of May 22, 2023).

[732] Harrison, Inside the US City That's Been Paying Slavery Reparations for Years, Courthouse News Service (Apr. 18, 2023) (as of May 22, 2023).

[733] City of Evanston Res. No. 120-R-22 (Nov. 14, 2022) § 2 (as of May 22, 2023).

[734] City of Evanston Res. No. 125-R-22; Harrison, supra.

[735] Biss, Your Input on Evanston's Local Reparations Program (Feb. 16, 2023) Mayor Daniel Biss Newsletter (as of May 22, 2023).

[736] Traynum-Carson, Asheville City Council Makes Initial $2.1 Million in Reparations Funding Appropriation (June 8, 2021) The City of Asheville (as of May 22, 2023).

[737] Davis, Asheville Reparations Resolution is Designed to Provide Black Community Access to the Opportunity to Build Wealth (July 20, 2020) The City of Asheville (as of May 22, 2023).

[738] Traynum-Carson, supra.

[739] City of Asheville and Buncombe County Community Reparations Com., 2023 Reparations Project Timeline and IFA Recommendation Development, Jan. 9, 2023 Meeting (as of May 22, 2023).

[740] Asheville Res. No. 20-128 (as of May 22, 2023); Davis, supra; see also Honosky, 'Slap in the Face;' Asheville Reparations Commission Balks at Proposed Timeline Changes, Citizen Times (Jan. 10, 2023) (as of Mar. 9, 2023).

[741] Asheville Res. No. 20-128, par. 8 (as of May 22, 2023).

[742] Ibid.

[743] Providence, Rhode Island Mayor's Exec. Order No. 2020-13 (July 15, 2020) (as of May 22, 2023).

[744] Kalunian, Providence Finalizes Plan to Invest $124M in Federal COVID Money, WPRI.com (May 22, 2022) (as of May 22, 2023).

[745] Stokes and Stokes, A Matter of Truth: The Struggle for African Heritage & Indigenous People Equal Rights in Providence, Rhode Island (1620-2020) (2021) Rhode Island Black Heritage Society and 1696 Heritage Group, pp. 1-2 (as of May 22, 2023).

[746] Ibid.

[747] Roger Williams University and Providence Cultural Equity Initiative, Truth-Telling and Reconciliation: Proposing a Framework for the City of Providence (Feb. 9, 2022) p. 10 (as of May 22, 2023).

[748] Id. at pp. 4-8.

[749] Id. at p. 8.

[750] Id. at pp. 8-9.

[751] Providence, Rhode Island Mayor's Exec. Order No. 2022-4 (Feb. 28, 2022) (as of May 22, 2023). Seven of the Commission's members were appointed by the mayor, while six were appointed by the city council. Ibid.

[752] See Providence Municipal Reparations Commission (as of May 22, 2023).

[753] City of Providence Ordinance 38099 COVID-19 Equities Program Budget (as of May 22, 2023); Russo, Elorza Signs Providence's $10M Reparations Budget. Here's What's in It, The Providence J. (Nov. 18, 2022) (as of May 22, 2023); Abdul-Hakim et al., Providence Establishes Reparations Program to Praise and Criticism, ABC News (Jan. 31, 2023) (as of May 22, 2023).

[754] Providence, Rhode Island Mayor's Exec. Order No. 2022-6 (Aug. 25, 2022) (as of Mar. 13, 2023).

[755] Gov. Code, § 8301.1, subd. (b)(3)(B).

[756] U.N. Principles on Reparation, supra.

[757] Id. at art. IX, par. 22.

[758] Id. at art. IX, par. 22 subds. (e)-(g). See also Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, U.N. Doc. No. A/RES/56/83 (Dec. 12, 2001) art. 37 ("Satisfaction may consist in an acknowledgment of the breach, an expression of regret, a formal apology or another appropriate modality").

[759] Carranza et al., Reparative Justice: More Than Words: Apologies as a Form of Reparation (2015) Internat. Center for Transitional Justice, p. 1 (as of May 23, 2023).

[760] Wijaya, Public Apology as a Form of Reparation (July 2019) 2 Internat. J. of Global Community 2, p. 1 (as of Mar. 9, 2023).

[761] Carranza et al., supra, at p. 12.

[762] Id. at p. 13.

[763] See id. at p. 5.

[764] Id. at p. 18.

[765] See CalVCB, Forced or Involuntary Sterilization Compensation Program Frequently Asked Questions (as of May 20, 2023).

[766] Gov. Code, § 8301, subd. (b)(3)(E), (F) & (G).

[767] See California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Mar. 29, 2022) Meeting Minutes, pp. 10-12 (as of May 12, 2023)

[768] Census bureau term.

[769] All calculations performed in this report are rounded to the nearest dollar or singles digit at each step of the calculation, unless otherwise noted.

[770] See Encyclopaedia Britannica, War on Drugs (2023) (as of May 12, 2023).

[771] Alexander, The New Jim Crow: Mass Incarceration in the Age of Colorblindness (2010) p. 99.

[772] See, e.g., Travis et al., The Growth of Incarceration in the United States: Exploring Causes and Consequences (2014) p. 61.

[773] See generally Rothstein, The Color of Law (2017).

[774] See Chapter 5, Housing Segregation.

[775] See Manhertz, Home Value Disparities Between Races are Shrinking, but Remain Very Wide (Dec. 19, 2020) Zillow (as of May 23, 2023).

[776] See Chapter 5, Housing Segregation; 12 U.S.C. 2901 et seq.

[777] See Chapter 5, Housing Segregation.

[778] U.S. Census Bureau, 2019 California—Value, Purchase Price, and Source of Down Payment—Owner-occupied Units, Am. Housing Survey (as of Apr. 19, 2023) (Variable 1: Race of Householder, Variable 2: Hispanic Origin of Householder).

[779] Cal. Assn. of Realtors, Housing Affordability for Black California Households is Half that of Whites, Illustrating Persistent Wide Homeownership Gap and Wealth Disparities, C.A.R. Reports, P.R. Newswire (Feb. 17, 2021) (as of May 16, 2023).

[780] USA Facts, Our Changing Population: California (as of May 16, 2023) (measuring data between 2019 and 2021).

[781] U.S. Census Bureau, America's Families and Living Arrangements: 2019 (as of May 16, 2023) (Table AVG1. Average Number of People per Household, by Race and Hispanic Origin, Marital Status, Age, and Education of Householder: 2019 [Excel file]). The 2019 Census survey defined households as "a house hold maintained" by "a group of two persons or more residing together and related by birth, marriage, or adoption," and "may include among the household members any unrelated persons . . . who may be residing there." U.S. Census Bureau, Current Population Survey: 2019 Annual Social and Economic (ASEC) Supplement (as of May 16, 2023) at pp. 7-1, 7-2.

[782] Our Changing Population: California, supra (measuring data between 2019 and 2021).

[783] America's Families and Living Arrangements: 2019, supra (Table AVG1. Average Number of People per Household, by Race and Hispanic Origin, Marital Status, Age, and Education of Householder: 2019 [Excel file]).

[784] 2019 California—Value, Purchase Price, and Source of Down Payment—Owner-occupied Units, supra (Variable 1: Race of Householder, Variable 2: Hispanic Origin of Householder).

[785] Reflecting the 36.8 percent of Black Californian households who owned their own home. Cal. Assn. of Realtors, supra.

[786] U.S. Census Bureau, 2019 California—Value, Purchase Price, and Source of Down Payment—Owner-occupied Units, American Housing Survey (as of Apr. 19, 2023) (Variable 1: Race of Householder, Variable 2: Hispanic Origin of Householder).

[787] Reflecting the 63.2 percent of white Californian households who owned their own home. Cal. Assn. of Realtors, supra.

[788] Miller, Mortgage Rates Chart: Historical and Current Rate Trends (May 16, 2023) The Mortgage Reports (as of May 16, 2023) (Miller, Mortgage Rates).

[789] The mean home values of white and African American homes in California in 1930 was provided by the California Department of Housing and Community Development, through its analysis of 1930 decennial census microdata.

[790] Collins and Margo, Race and Home Ownership from the End of the Civil War to the Present (2011) 101 Am. Economic Rev. 355 (as of Apr. 19, 2023) (Web Appendix Table 1).

[791] U.S. Census Bureau, United States Summary: Families (1930) table 40 p. 33 (as of May 17, 2023). This figure are based off the 1930 census's count of families—which the 1930 census defined as "a group of persons, related either by blood or by marriage or adoption, who live together as one household[.]" Id. at p. 5. These figures therefore only include "private families, excluding the institutions and hotel or boarding-house groups[.]" Id. at p. 5, p. 33.

[792] Id. at table 40 p. 33 (as of May 17, 2023) (including both total native born white Americans and foreign-born white Americans). This figure are based off the 1930 census's count of families—which the 1930 census defined as "a group of persons, related either by blood or by marriage or adoption, who live together as one household[.]" Id. at p. 5. These figures therefore only include "private families, excluding the institutions and hotel or boarding-house groups[.]" Id. at p. 5, p. 33.

[793] Gibson and Jung, Historical Census Statistics on Population Totals by Race, 1790 to 1990, and by Hispanic Origin, 1970 to 1990, for the United States, Regions, Divisions, and States (2002) U.S. Census Bureau, Population Division, Working Paper No. 56, Table 19 (as of May 16, 2023).

[794] Ibid.

[795] See generally Katznelson, When Affirmative Action was White (2005); California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 13, 2021) Testimony of Jones (as of Jan. 26, 2022).

[796] See 12 U.S.C. 2901 et seq.

[797] Gibson and Jung, supra, at Table 19.

[798] U.S. Census Bureau, Household and Family Characteristics: March 1980, table 8, p. 108 (as of Apr. 24, 2023). The 1980 Census defined its size of household data as "includ[ing] all persons occupying a housing unit." Id. at p. 224.

[799] Gibson and Jung, supra, at Table 19.

[800] Household and Family Characteristics: March 1980, supra, at table 8, p. 106. The 1980 Census defined its size of household data as "includ[ing] all persons occupying a housing unit." Id. at p. 224.

[801] The mean home values of white and African American homes in California in 1980 was provided by the California Department of Housing and Community Development, through its analysis of 1980 decennial census microdata.

[802] Collins and Margo, Race and Home Ownership from the End of the Civil War to the Present (2011) 101 American Economic Review 355 (Web Appendix Table 1) (as of Apr. 19, 2023).

[803] The mean home values of white and African American homes in California in 1980 was provided by the California Department of Housing and Community Development, through its analysis of 1980 decennial census microdata.

[804] The mean home values of white and African American homes in California in 1980 was provided by the California Department of Housing and Community Development, through its analysis of 1980 decennial census microdata.

[805] U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, CPI Inflation Calculator (as of Apr. 24, 2023) (inputting the dates of January 1930 and January 1980 and rounding to the nearest dollar). If kept in nominal dollars, not adjusted for inflation, the difference between the 1980 mean, per capita homeownership gap between African Americans and white Americans ($11,573 in 1980 dollars) and the 1930 mean, per capita homeownership gap between African Americans and white Americans ($326 in 1930 dollars) is $11,247. Compounding $11,247 up to 2020 using the annual 30-year mortgage interest rate yields a per-capita white-African American homeownership gap of $180,027—or $4,092 for each year between 1933 and 1977 spent as a resident of the State of California.

[806] See Miller, Mortgage Rates, supra.

[807] Gibson and Jung, supra, at Table 19.

[808] U.S. Census Bureau, Quick Facts: California (2021) (as of Apr. 18, 2023)

[809] Chapter 5, Housing Segregation.

[810] ICYMI: California Poised to Become World's 4th Biggest Economy, Office of Governor Newsom (Oct. 24, 2022) (as of May 16, 2023) citing Winkler, California Poised to Overtake Germany as World's No. 4 Economy, Bloomberg News (Oct. 24, 2022) (as of May 16, 2023).

[811] McGhee, California's African American Community (Feb. 22, 2023) Pub. Policy Institute of Cal. (as of May 23, 2023).

[812] California's Population, supra.

[813] Helper, The Hidden Toll of California's Black Exodus, Cal Matters (July 15, 2020) (as of May 23, 2023).

[814] Ibid.

[815] See Chapter 10, Stolen Labor and Hindered Opportunity; Chapter 13, The Wealth Gap.

[816] See Chapter 10, Stolen Labor and Hindered Opportunity; Chapter 13, The Wealth Gap.

[817] U.S. Census Bureau, Survey of Business Owners (SBO) - Survey Results: 2012 (Feb. 23, 2016) (as of May 23, 2023).

[818] See ibid.

[819] Ibid.

[820] U.S. Census Bureau, American Community Survey, Selected Population Profile in the United States, 2012, SO201 (as of May 17, 2023).

[821] Rounding to the nearest tenth.

[822] Survey of Business Owners (SBO) - Survey Results: 2012, supra.

[823] See ibid.; cf. Aldrich et al., Ethnic Residential Concentration and the Protected Market Hypothesis (1985) 63 Social Forces 996, 996-997, 1007-1008.

[824] See Survey of Business Owners (SBO) - Survey Results: 2012, supra.

[825] See, e.g., Lippard, Building Inequality: A Case Study of White, Black, and Latino Contractors in the Atlanta Construction Industry (2006) Dissertation, Georgia State University, pp. 179-181 (as of Apr. 20, 2023).

[826] See Survey of Business Owners (SBO) - Survey Results: 2012, supra.

[827] See, e.g., Motoyama and M, Demand Pull or Supply Push? Metro-level Analysis of Start-ups in the United States (2017) 4 Regional Studies, Regional Science 232, 232-246 (providing an example that highlights the importance of demand or pull factors in business formation compared to push factors—for instance, unemployment that drives professionals to go into self-employment, or discrimination that create ethnic businesses as a source of self-employment to address discrimination in hiring).

[828] Survey of Business Owners (SBO) - Survey Results: 2012, supra.

[829] New York University, Stern School of Business, Revenue Multiples by Sector (US) (Jan. 2023) (as of April 13, 2023).

[830] U.S. Census Bureau, Quick Facts: California (2021) (as of Apr. 18, 2023).

[831] Gov. Code, §§ 8301, subd. (a), 8301.1, subd. (b)(3)(C), (D) & (G).

[832] Assem. Bill No. 3121 (2019-2020 Reg. Sess.).

[833] Gov. Code, § 8301, subd. (a)(5)-(6).

[834] See generally Chapters 1 through 13, infra.

[835] Interview with Malcolm X (Mar. 4, 1964) (as of May 16, 2023).

[836] See generally Chapter 14, International Reparations Framework, infra, for a more fulsome discussion of the international law framework for reparations.

[837] Pen. Code, § 745.

[838] Id. § 745, subd. (b).

[839] Sen. Com. on Pub. Safety, analysis of Assem. Bill No. 256 (2021-2022 Reg. Sess.) June 29, 2021, p. 5 (as of May 23, 2023).

[840] Assem. Bill No. 256 (2021-2022 Reg. Sess.) (as of May 23, 2023).

[841] Pen. Code, § 745, subd. (a)(1)-(2).

[842] Id. at § 745, subd. (a)(3)-(4).

[843] Analysis of Assem. Bill No. 256, supra.

[844] See Pen. Code, § 745, subd. (a)(3).

[845] Id. at § 745, subd. (a)(4).

[846] Assem. Bill No. 2418 (Reg. Sess. 2021-2022) (as of May 23, 2023).

[847] Ibid.

[848] Ibid.

[849] Ralph J. Bunche (1903-1971) was the first African American and the first person of color to win the Nobel Peace Prize, an honor he received in 1950 in recognition of his successful mediation of the Armistice Agreements between Arab nations and Israel. Ralph J. Bunche, UCLA Ralph J. Bunche Center for African American Studies (as of May 16, 2023). It was the first and only time in the long history of the Middle East conflict that peace agreements were signed by all of the nations involved. (Ibid.) For almost two decades, as Undersecretary General of the United Nations, Bunche was celebrated worldwide for his contributions to humanity, particularly in the areas of peacekeeping, decolonization, human rights and civil rights. (Ibid.) UCLA's Center for African American Studies was renamed after Bunche in 2003, in commemoration of the centenary of his birth. (Ibid.)

[850] Gov. Code, § 8301.1, subd. (b)(2).

[851] Gov. Code, § 8301.1, subd. (b)(1)(F) & (3)(C).

PART I

RECOUNTING THE HISTORICAL ATROCITIES

CHAPTER 1 Introduction

COURTESY OF PHOTO12/UNIVERSAL IMAGES GROUP VIA GETTY IMAGES

I. California's Stories

Why Reparations in California?

After all, California promised to be a free territory not once, but twice. First, in 1823 as a part of Mexico.[1] Then again in 1850, by the time California entered the Union and declared in its Constitution that "neither slavery, nor involuntary servitude, unless for the punishment of crimes, shall ever be tolerated in this state."[2]

So why is California considering reparations for African Americans and descendants of enslaved people?

Consider Basil Campbell. Campbell was born enslaved in Missouri, where he married a woman named Mary Stephens and had two sons.[3] In 1854, four years after California joined the Union as a free state, a man named J.D. Stephens bought Campbell for $1,200 and forcibly moved him 1,500 miles away to a farm in Yolo County, California.[4] Campbell never saw his wife or two sons again.[5] J.D. Stephens enslaved Basil Campbell in California, ignoring California's status as a free state, for another seven years, until Stephens decided that Campbell had sufficiently paid off his purchase price.[6] Over the rest of his life, Campbell married again, adopted his wife's children, and amassed a small fortune in land and livestock.[7] A few years after his death in 1906, his two sons from his first marriage in Missouri filed a petition for a portion of Campbell's estate.[8] A California appellate judge concluded that a marriage between enslaved people "is not a marriage relation, and it is mockery to speak of it as such."[9] The land once owned by Campbell is now a nature preserve.[10]

Consider the Short family. In December 1945, O'Day Short, his wife Helen, their seven-year-old daughter Carol Ann, and their nine-year-old son Barry moved into the house that they had built in Fontana, California.[11] In 1945, Fontana was a white neighborhood.[12] Deputy sheriffs warned Short that he was "out of bounds," and that to avoid "disagreeableness," Short should move his family back to the segregated African American neighborhood on "the other side of the Baseline."[13] The real estate agent who sold the property to the Shorts warned them on December 3, 1945 that a "vigilante committee had a meeting on your case last night. They are a tough bunch to deal with. If I were you, I'd get my family off this property at once."[14]

Enslaved people working in California's Gold Mines. (1852)

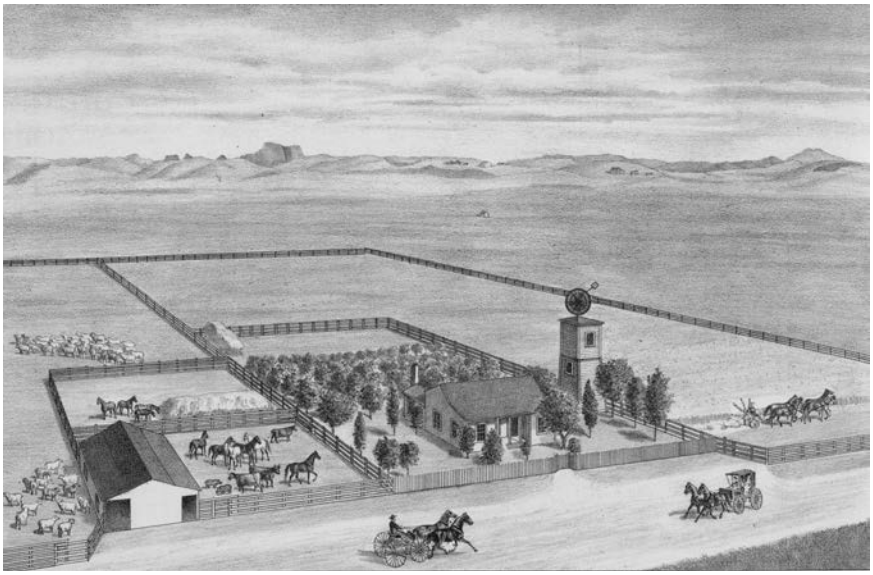
On December 6, an explosion and a fire engulfed the house.[15] Neighbors reported seeing Helen try to beat down the flames consuming her children.[16] Helen, Carol Ann, and Barry died in the hospital.[17] The San Bernardino County Coroner and District Attorney concluded that the explosion was an accident.[18] The District Attorney based this conclusion partly on a statement given by O'Day while he was in the hospital. During the same conversation, O'Day also said, "I am here on my sick bed, my hair burned off my head, my legs twisted under me. You have no respect for my position. All you want to do is get the information you are looking for."[19] The District Attorney told O'Day that his wife and two young children had died when doctors had been keeping the information from him for fear that his condition would worsen.[20] O'Day Short died a few days later.[21] A subsequent California Attorney General report investigating the murders concluded that no evidence of vigilante activity in Fontana could be found.[22]

Consider Alfred Simmons, an African American school teacher who rented a house from his white colleague in the Elmwood district of Berkeley in 1958.[23] The Berkeley chief of police asked the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) to investigate how Simmons managed to live in the all-white community.[24] The FBI referred the case to the U.S. Attorney, who did not prosecute because no laws had been broken.[25] The Federal Housing Administration, the agency created by the federal government to help Americans buy homes, then wrote to Simmons's white landlord to tell him that his future mortgage insurance applications would be rejected because renting to a African American was an "Unsatisfactory Risk Determination."[26]

Consider Paul Austin and Tenisha Tate-Austin, who bought a home in Marin City in 2016. Three years later, a white appraiser valued their home for $500,000 less than it was worth, calling it a "distinct, marketable area."[27] "I took that as code word as: it's a Black area," said Paul Austin, who testified before the Task Force that he felt physically sick when he read the appraisal report.[28] Paul Austin testified that his grandparents had moved to California in the 1940s to work in the shipyards in Sausalito.[29] When they had saved up enough money to buy a house, his grandparents realized that they could not buy homes outside of Marin City due to redlining.[30] Redlining is a set of government policies that helped white families buy homes in the suburbs while forcing African American families to remain in urban centers.[31] These policies have devalued African American neighborhoods[32] and led to continued education segregation.[33] In 2019, a California Attorney General investigation found that the Sausalito-Marin City School District intentionally established a racially and ethnically segregated elementary and middle school, by offering inferior education programming and directly harming a mostly African American and Latino student body.[34] In the 1950s, Paul Austin's paternal grandparents were one of the first African American families to move to Mill Valley, a white neighborhood.[35] Paul's grandfather built a home where the driveway dropped 90 degrees so that the house could not be seen from the road. "Grandson," Paul's grandfather told him, "I had to build this home at nights and on weekends, so we wouldn't be detected, because they didn't want any Black families living in their city."[36] A white man picked up the lumber for them.[37] Like Alfred Simmons's white landlord, the white woman who sold her land to Paul's grandfather was, in Paul's words, "blackballed," because the neighbors found out that she had

A California appellate judge concluded that a marriage between enslaved people "is not a marriage relation, and it is mockery to speak of it as such."

COURTESY OF DE PUE & COMPANY/DIGITAL PUBLIC LIBRARY OF AMERICA



"Residence & Ranch Basil Campbell, near Fairview, Yolo Co." Basil Campbell became one of the wealthiest African Americans in California and owned this ranch. (1879)

sold her property to an African American family.[38] In 2021, Paul testified that the smaller houses in a white neighborhood that are a mile away from Paul and Tenisha's house are valued at $200,000 to $300,000 more.[39]

Consider Paul Austin and Tenisha Tate-Austin, who bought a home in Marin City in 2016. Three years later, a white appraiser valued their home for $500,000 less than it was worth, calling it a "distinct, marketable area."

What does California owe the Campbells, the Shorts, the Simmonses, the Austins, and the 2.28 million African American Californians who have experienced different versions of these stories throughout their lives, their parents' lives, their grandparents' lives, and their great-grandparents' lives, some of whom were enslaved?

Similar stories are repeated throughout the history of California and the nation.

As W.E.B. Du Bois asked in 1935: "Nations reel and stagger on their way; they make hideous mistakes; they commit frightful wrongs; they do great and beautiful things. And shall we not best guide humanity by telling the truth about all this, so far as the truth is ascertainable?" [40]

To that end, the following twelve chapters will recount the horrors and harms perpetrated against African Americans in California and the nation in a number of different areas:

To maintain a system of enslavement and subjugation in the United States, white government leaders used the belief system of white supremacy to restrict the freedom of African Americans and the flourishing of African American culture and prosperity.[41] These belief systems have served to normalize and perpetuate crimes against humanity and systemic racism in our governmental institutions. These beliefs created dehumanizing stereotypes of African Americans, which mainstream arts and culture disseminated and amplified, fueling racial terror and violence long after enslavement ended. These beliefs were enshrined into the United States' laws, court decisions, and government policies and practices, and into California's laws, court decisions, and government policies and practices.[42]

Government actors used these laws and practices to suppress and criminalize African American political participation and rip apart African American families. Federal, California, and local government, acting in tandem and in parallel with private actors, created and intensified housing segregation. Government actions intertwined with private action and segregated America, leading to environmental harms, unequal educational and health outcomes, and over-policing of African American neighborhoods in California and across the nation. Government actions and failures over 400 years have created a wealth gap that persists between African Americans and white Americans at all levels of income, regardless of education or family status. In fact, the wealth gap today is the same size it was two years before the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.[43]

COURTESY OF THE SAN FRANCISCO CALL (MAY 8, 1910)

NEGRO SLAVERY DIVIDES COURT

State Supreme Justices at Odds Over Marriage Relations of Slaves

There came a split in the state supreme court yesterday over a point arising out of the marriage relations of negro slaves. The contention of Mary Jane Stephens, an aged woman of Yolo county, formerly a slave, in effect that her children were not legitimate because they were born of a marriage contracted in slavery, was upheld by the majority of the court. Justice Shaw dissented with a strong opinion touching on the almost obsolete point at issue.

In 1910, the California Supreme Court decided that California law did not recognize the family that Basil Campbell created while he was enslaved, and that family could not inherit his fortune.

II. The Task Force's Charge

What does California owe its African American residents?

Assembly Bill No. 3121 (S. Weber) established this Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans.[44] The Task Force consisted of nine members[45] charged with studying the institution of slavery and its lingering negative effects on society and on living African Americans, including descendants of persons enslaved in the United States.[46] The Task Force synthesized documentary evidence of the capture, procurement, and transportation of Africans for the purpose of enslavement; the domestic trade of trafficked African Americans; the treatment of enslaved people; the denial of humanity and the abuse of African Americans; and the discrimination and lingering negative effects that followed in the colonies that eventually became the United States, and the United States of today.[47]

In order to maintain slavery, American government officials used the belief system of white supremacy to restrict the freedom and prosperity of African Americans. These beliefs were enshrined into the laws, court decisions, and policies and practices of the United States and of the state of California.

The Task Force recommends appropriate remedies of compensation, rehabilitation, and restitution for African Americans, with a special consideration for African Americans who are descendants of persons enslaved in the United States.[48] The Task Force's recommendations address how they comport with international standards and how the State of California will apologize for its role in perpetuating gross human rights violations and crimes against humanity on enslaved Africans and their descendants.[49] The Task Force addresses the role of California laws and policies in continuing the negative lingering effects on African Americans as a group and how these injuries can be reversed.[50] The recommendations include how to calculate compensation, what form it will take, and who should be eligible.[51]

Under international law, a government is responsible where its wrongful actions or negligence caused injury to a specific group of people.[52] Once proven, governments have a duty to remedy wrongful actions.[53] Reparations offer such a remedy, and the United Nations recognizes five formal categories of reparations: restitution, compensation, rehabilitation, satisfaction, and guarantees of non-repetition.[54] American courts of law have long recognized a similar concept—that parties must redress the harms caused by their actions or omissions where there was a duty to act.[55] Advocates frame reparations as a program that seeks acknowledgment, redress, and closure for injustice.[56]

This report has been created by the Task Force to support the Legislature in its future effort to acknowledge the wrongful actions and negligence of California as well as the wrongful actions and negligence of the local governments within its jurisdiction that have harmed African Americans.

In addition to California's potential legal obligations, repairing a wrong is a political and moral obligation. America's and California's democratic forms of government exist to embody the will of the people.[57] In accepting this system, we, as Americans and as Californians, are more than a random group of people who live in the same geographic area; we bind ourselves into a community that lives beyond the lifespans of its individual members.[58] Through government, a community channels its visions for the society it wants to create through the laws that govern it.[59]

Following the charge of AB 3121 to describe the trade of trafficked African people across the oceans and within the lands of the United States, in this report the Task Force recounts the moral and legal wrongs the American and Californian governments have inflicted upon their own African American citizens and residents. Chapter 2 describes the institution of slavery as it existed in the geographic territory of the United States, and the legal, political, economic, and cultural systems maintaining and enriched by enslavement. The subsequent 11 chapters describe how these racist systems metastasized throughout America and California, reaching into all corners of American life. Each chapter traces an issue from its historic foundations in slavery, through successive discriminatory government actions, and government failures to correct and remedy the harms of anti-Black racism. Each chapter describes the uncorrected, compounding, and continuous harms all levels of the American government inflicted upon African Americans, as well as the modern-day effects of those harms.

By focusing on the role of government actors at all levels of local, state, and national authority in enslavement and racial discrimination, this report does not and cannot ignore the countless racist actions of private citizens throughout American history. The government's role does not absolve private actors of their own responsibility or prevent private individuals and entities who benefited from this state of affairs for generations from offering their own apologies and engaging in their own acts of reparations.[60] As the report makes clear in the following pages, federal, state, and local governments often worked in tandem with private individuals[61] to build and maintain a system placing African Americans in the lowest social strata of this country.[62]

The report's focus on African Americans also does not and cannot ignore the countless ways in which the Californian government and its private citizens enslaved, dehumanized, or discriminated against other marginalized communities.

Often, government discrimination or racist mob violence targeted many communities at once. During the Zoot Suit Riots of 1943, white mobs of U.S. servicemen, off-duty police officers, and civilians indiscriminately attacked Latino, African American, and Filipino men in Los Angeles.[63] Sometimes, one racial group committed violence against another. As AB 3121 charged this Task Force solely with investigating the history of systemic racism as it relates to African American Californians, it did not focus on the innumerable acts of racist violence and discrimination by government officials and private citizens against other people of color.

III. Immigration and Migration Patterns

The first ship carrying enslaved people landed in what would become the United States in 1619 on the shores of Virginia.[64] Although Congress outlawed the trans-Atlantic slave trade in 1807, between 1525 and 1866, approximately 388,000 enslaved people were trafficked to the United States.[65] These African men, women, and children were mostly captured on the west coast of the African continent between modern day Senegal and Angola.[66] Once in the United States, the majority of enslaved people remained in the South, although Southern enslavers often brought enslaved people into free states.[67]

In the 1800s and early 1900s, very few African people voluntarily immigrated to the United States, due to immigration laws that limited the number of African immigrants.[68] Between 1870 and 1920, 17,376 African immigrants arrived in the United States, representing 0.06 percent of the total immigrant population at the time.[69] The Johnson-Reed Act of 1924 established an immigration system that limited the number of immigrants from the African continent.[70] Between 1920 and 1970, 58,449 African individuals entered the United States, or about 0.51 percent of the total immigrant population.[71] Beginning in the 1960s, Congress passed immigration reforms which significantly increased Caribbean and African immigration to the United States.[72] As a result, the African American population of the United States became increasingly diverse. In 1990, 363,819 African immigrants entered the United States.[73]

Today, approximately 47 million African American people live in the United States, according to the 2020 census.[74] Of those 47 million African American individuals, academics and other experts differ on the number who are the descendants of people enslaved in the United States. About 12 percent of African American people in America were born in a foreign country.[75] Nine percent of African Americans have at least one foreign-born parent.[76] By 2060, the Black foreign-born population is projected to make up about one-third of the U.S. Black population.[77] Fifty-eight percent of Black immigrants arrived in the United States after 2000.[78] Every U.S. census conducted since 1970 has found that Black immigrants from the English speaking Caribbean earn more, are more likely to be employed than U.S.-born African Americans, are more likely to hold more financial assets,[79] are more likely to own their home,[80] and most are more likely to be healthy than U.S.-born African Americans.[81]

COURTESY OF BUYENLARGE/GETTY IMAGES

African Americans take a break from their work on the railroad. (1938)

In California, the African American population remained small until World War II. Unlike the English speaking colonies on the East Coast, racial boundaries were not strict, and a multiracial population lived in California as a Spanish colony in the 1500s.[82] By 1850, when California entered the Union, the African American population of California was a mix of African Americans from the North and South, foreign-born Black Afro-Latinos from Mexico, Peru and Chile, and Jamaicans.[83] The 1860 census counted 4,086 "total free colored" people in California.[84] Sources vary in the estimates of enslaved people in California, with some sources estimating up to 1,500 enslaved African Americans lived in California in 1852.[85] The 1920 census counted 38,763 African Americans, out of a total population of 3.4 million in the state.[86]

California's African American population increased significantly during World War II, as many moved to the state in search of war industry jobs.[87] More African American people moved to California in the 1940s than in the entire previous century of statehood combined.[88] The African American population of California ballooned from 124,306 in 1940 to 1,400,143 in 1970.[89]

IV. State of African Americans in California

California is home to the fifth largest African American population in the United States, after Texas, Florida, Georgia, and New York.[90] As of 2020, about 39.5 million people live in California, of whom about 2.8 million self-identify as African American.[91] Of the current 2.8 million African American Californians, 244,969 are foreign born, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.[92]

While the number of African American Californians has increased in the last 30 years, the overall percentage of African American Californians has fallen over the same period.[93] African American Californians make up about six percent of the state's population today, a decrease from 8.1 percent of the state's population in 1990.[94]

African American Californians live in all 58 Californian counties, but most African American Californians live in Los Angeles County (943,145), San Bernardino County (223,116), San Diego County (211,354), Alameda County (198,250), and Riverside County (197,329).[95] The counties with the highest number of African American Californians, as a percentage of the total population, are Solano County (16.87 percent), Sacramento County (12.43 percent), Alameda County (11.78 percent), Contra Costa County (10.69 percent), and San Bernardino County (10.23 percent).[96] In the past three decades, about 275,000 African American Californians have left expensive coastal cities to move inland or to other states.[97] During the same timeframe, the African American populations of some of California's historically African American neighborhoods in cities across California have plunged: Compton by 45 percent, San Francisco by 43 percent, and Oakland by 40 percent.[98]

Despite the history of African American voter suppression throughout the United States and California, California has steadily improved voting access since the late 20th century.[99] Surveys from 2019 show that six percent of likely voters are African American, equal to their share of the population in California.[100]

Nevertheless, the effects of 400 years of compounding governmental and private acts of racial violence and discrimination described in this report have resulted in disparities between African American and white Californians in almost every corner of life. Compared to white Californians, African American Californians earn less and are more likely to be impoverished. In 2018, on average, African American Californians earned $53,565, compared to $87,078 for white Californians.[101] Around 19.4 percent of African American Californians live below the poverty line, compared to nine percent of white Californians.[102] African American Californians are also

Compared to white Californians, African American Californians are

2x MORE LIKELY to live below the poverty line

far less likely to own a home than white Californians; in 2019, 59 percent of white households owned their homes, compared with 35 percent of African American Californians.[103] And in contrast to the advances in voting rights in California, the rates of African American homeownership in California have declined by over 11 percent since 2010.[104] In fact, African American homeownership in California in the 2010s was lower than in the 1960s, when sellers could still legally discriminate against African American home buyers.[105]

Homelessness is a more acute problem in California than in the rest of the country, and the burden falls heaviest on African American Californians. Almost 50 percent—or nearly one in every two African American Californians—lives in a household where rent or mortgage payments eat up more than 30 percent of the residents' income, compared to about 30 percent of white Californians who suffer similar housing cost burdens.[106] Nearly 40 percent of California's unhoused people are African American, even though African American Californians represent only six percent of the state's total population.[107]

The pervasive effects of racial discrimination have seriously harmed the health of African American Californians. In 2021, the life expectancy of an average African American Californian was 75.1 years, six years shorter than the state average.[108] African American babies are more likely to die in infancy,[109] and African American mothers giving birth die at a rate of almost four times higher than the average Californian mother.[110] Compared with white Californians, African American Californians are more likely to have diabetes,[111] to die from cancer,[112] or be hospitalized for heart disease.[113]

Racial discrimination in housing, education, and the legal system, along with institutionally racist approaches and a militarized culture, have collectively resulted in the over-policing of African American communities and the mass incarceration of African American citizens.[114] According to data from 2020, the police are more than two times more likely to stop and search African Americans in California than white Americans, even though officers reported no criminal activity for the African American individuals stopped more than twice as often as they did for the white individuals stopped.[115] In 2020, law enforcement officers used force against African Americans in California more than twice as often than they did against white Americans,[116] and data from 2016 to 2019 indicates that law enforcement officers in California are three times more likely to seriously injure, shoot, or kill an African American in California, even when other factors are taken into account.[117] About 28 percent of people imprisoned in California are African American—even though they make up about six percent of the population in the state.[118]

African American youth in the state also face a heightened risk of punishment. African American students in California are suspended at rates 2.4 times higher than the statewide average,[119] and lose the most number of days of instruction to suspensions when compared with other racial groups.[120] Recently, the California Attorney General's Office identified racial disparities in discipline for African American students across three different school districts.[121]

Further, school discipline is often the first step toward law enforcement involvement. African American students in California are disproportionately referred by schools to law enforcement.[122] A California Attorney General's Office investigation found that, since 2015, African American and Latino students in Stockton Unified School District were significantly more likely to experience severe policing outcomes than other students, including being cited or booked into police custody.[123]

As a result, compared to white youth in California, African American youth are over 30 times more likely to be held in a juvenile justice facility in the State.[124] In 2019, African American youth comprised 36 percent of those ordered to be placed in state juvenile detention facilities, even though they make up only 14 percent of the youth population in California.[125]

Endnotes

[1] Lapp, Blacks in Gold Rush California (1977) pp. 3-9, 130-139.

[2] Cal. Const. of 1849, art. I, § 18; id. at p. 127.

[3] L.H., The Roots of Slavery in Woodland (Mar. 20, 2016) The Davis Vanguard (as of Mar. 28, 2022); Smith, Freedom's Frontier: California and the Struggle over Unfree Labor, Emancipation, and Reconstruction (2013), pp. 231-233.

[4] L.H., supra; Smith, supra, at pp. 231-233.

[5] L.H., supra; Smith, supra, at pp. 231-233.

[6] L.H., supra; Smith, supra, at pp. 231-233.

[7] L.H., supra; Smith, supra, at pp. 231-233.

[8] L.H., supra; Smith, supra, at pp. 231-233.

[9] In re Campbell's Estate (1910) 12 Cal.App. 707, 718.

[10] Restore/Restory: A People's History of the Cache Creek Nature Preserve, Basil Campbell Restore/Restory (as of Mar. 28, 2022).

[11] Hudson, West of Jim Crow: The Fight Against California's Color Line (2020) p. 190.

[12] Id. at p. 192.

[13] Ibid.

[14] Ibid.

[15] Id. at p. 193

[16] Ibid.

[17] Ibid.

[18] Id. at p. 194.

[19] Ibid.

[20] Id. at p. 204.

[21] Ibid.

[22] Ibid.

[23] Rothstein, The Color of Law: A Forgotten History of How Our Government Segregated America (2017) pp. 66-67.

[24] Ibid.

[25] Ibid.

[26] Ibid.

[27] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 13, 2021), Testimony of Paul Austin (as of Mar. 28, 2021).

[28] Ibid.

[29] Ibid.

[30] Ibid.

[31] Perry and Harshbarger, America's Formerly Redlined Neighborhoods Have Changed, and So Must Solutions to Rectify Them (Oct. 14, 2019) Brookings Inst. (as of Apr. 4, 2022).

[32] Perry, et al., The Devaluation of Assets in Black Neighborhoods (Nov. 2018) Brookings Inst. pp. 10-19 (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[33] Ibid.; Guastaferro, Why Racial Inequities in America's Schools are Rooted in Housing Policies of the Past (Nov. 2, 2020) USA Today (as of Apr. 5, 2022); Oliver and Shapiro, Black Wealth/White Wealth: A New Perspective on Racial Inequality (2006) pp. 8-9, 22-23.

[34] Cal. Atty. Gen., Sausalito Marin City School District Agrees to End Segregation in its Schools (Aug. 9, 2019) Cal. Dept. of J. (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[35] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 13, 2021), Testimony of Paul Austin (as of Mar. 28, 2021).

[36] Ibid.

[37] Ibid.

[38] Ibid.

[39] Ibid.

[40] Du Bois, Black Reconstruction in America (1935) p. 714.

[41] See generally Kendi, Stamped from the Beginning: The Definitive History of Racist Ideas in America (2016).

[42] See, e.g., U.S. Const., art. I, § 2, cl. 3; id., art. I, § 9, cl. 1; id., art. IV, § 2, cl. 3; Cal. Const. of 1849, art. II, § 1; Stats. 1852, ch. 33, § 1 et seq., pp. 67–69; Dred Scott v. Sanford (1857) 60 U.S. 393; People v. Hall (1854) 4 Cal. 399, 403.

[43] Aliprantis and Carroll, What is Behind the Persistence of the Racial Wealth Gap? (Feb. 28, 2019) Fed. Reserve Bank of Cleveland (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[44] Assem. Bill No. 3121 (2019-2020 Reg. Sess.).

[45] Gov. Code, § 8301.2, subd. (a).

[46] Gov. Code, § 8301, subd. (b)(1).

[47] Gov. Code, § 8301.1, subd. (b)(1).

[48] Id., subd. (b)(3).

[49] Id., subd. (b)(3)(A)-(B).

[50] Id., subd. (b)(3)(C)-(D).

[51] Id., subd. (b)(3)(E)-(G).

[52] Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, 53rd Sess., art. 31, 39, U.N. Doc. A/56/83 (Dec. 12, 2021).

[53] Ibid.

[54] G.A. Res. 60/147, ¶¶ 19-23 (Mar. 21, 2006).

[55] See, e.g., Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Elec. Co. (1910) 158 Cal; 499, 503–04; Rest.2d Torts, §§ 4, 430, 431.

[56] Darity and Mullen, From Here to Equality (2020) p. 2.

[57] Reynolds v. Sims (1964) 377 U.S. 533, 562; see also U.S. Const., preamble; Cal. Const., preamble.

[58] See U.S. Const., preamble; Cal. Const., preamble; Hamilton, Federalist No. 1 (as of Apr. 21, 2021); Testimony of Ta-Nehisi Coates, Hearings before House Com. on Jud. on H.R. 40, 116th Cong., 1st Sess. (2019).

[59] Testimony of Ta-Nehisi Coates, supra.

[60] See, e.g., Desai, The First Reparations Attempt at an American College Comes from its Students (Apr. 18, 2019) The Atlantic (as of Apr. 21, 2022); Lockhart, A Virginia Seminary Is the First School to Create a Reparations Fund (Sept. 10, 2019) Vox (as of Apr. 21, 2022).

[61] See, e.g., Burton v. Wilmington Parking Auth. (1961) 365 U.S. 715, 716-26; Shelley v. Kraemer (1948) 334 U.S. 1, 13-23.

[62] See generally, Wilkerson, Caste: The Origins of Our Discontents (2020).

[63] Gerber, Zoot Suit Riots: After 75 Years, L.A. Looks Back on a Violent Summer (June 4, 2018) L.A. Times (as of Apr. 21, 2022).

[64] Selections: Massachusetts and Virginia. The May-Flower at Plymouth, and the First Slave Ship at Jamestown (Sep. 28, 1860) Liberator (1831-1865) p. 1.

[65] Gates, Jr., How Many Slaves Landed in the U.S.? (Sep. 19, 2013) PBS (as of Apr. 21, 2022).

[66] Pruitt, What Part of Africa Did Most Enslaved People Come From? (Jun. 19, 2019) History (as of Apr. 21, 2022); Rice University, Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade - Database Slave Voyages (as of Apr. 21, 2022).

[67] Mullen, These Maps Reveal How Slavery Expanded Across the United States (May 15, 2014) Smithsonian Magazine (as of Apr. 21, 2022).

[68] Capps et al., Diverse Streams: Black African Migration to the United States (April 2012) Migration Policy Institute (as of Apr. 21, 2022); see also U.S. Dept of State Office of the Historian, The Immigration Act of 1924 (The Johnson-Reed Act) U.S. Dept of State Office of the Historian (as of Mar. 21, 2022).

[69] Newton, Injecting Diversity into U.S. Immigration Policy: The Diversity Visa Program and the Missing Discourse on its Impact on African Immigration to the United States (2005) 38 Cornell Internat. L. J. 3 at p. 1061.

[70] U.S. Dept of State Office of the Historian, supra; The Immigration Act of 1924 (Johnson-Reed Act), Pub. L. 68-139, 43 Stat. 153.

[71] Newton, supra at p. 1061.

[72] Rumbaut, Origins and Destinies: Immigration to the United States Since World War II (1994) 9 Sociological Forum 4 at pp. 588, 595.

[73] Id. at p. 95.

[74] Jones et al., 2020 Census Illuminates Racial and Ethnic Composition of the Country (Aug. 12, 2021) U.S. Census Bureau (as of Apr. 21, 2022).

[75] Tamir, Key Findings about Black Immigrants in the U.S. (Jan. 27, 2022) Pew Research (as of Apr. 21, 2022).

[76] Ibid.

[77] Ibid.

[78] Ibid.

[79] Hamilton, Immigration and the Remaking of Black America (2009).

[80] Id.

[81] Ibid.

[82] Taylor, In Search of the Racial Frontier: African Americans in the American West 1528-1990 (1998) p. 30.

[83] Id. at p. 83

[84] U.S. Census Bureau, Population of the United States in 1860: California (as of Apr. 22, 2022) p. 28.

[85] Smith, Freedom's Frontier, supra, at p. 40.

[86] U.S. Census Bureau, 1920 Census: Population, Composition and Characteristics of the Population by States (as of Apr. 22, 2022) p. 106.

[87] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns (2010), p 188

[88] Id. at Ibid.

[89] Gibson and Jung, Historical Census Statistics on Population Totals by Race, 1790-1990, and by Hispanic Origin, 1970 to 1990, for the United States, Regions, Divisions, and States (Sept. 2002) U.S. Census Bureau (as of Apr. 20, 2022) p. 47.

[90] The Campaign for College Opportunity, The State of Higher Education for Black Californians (Feb. 2021) The Campaign for College Opportunity (as of Apr. 20, 2021) p. 10.

[91] U.S. Census Bureau, Race (2020) (as of Nov. 3, 2021). This number includes all Californians who identify solely as Black or as Black and at least one other race.

[92] U.S. Census Bureau, Place of Birth for the Foreign-Born Population in California (as of Apr. 20, 2022).

[93] Compare U.S. Census Bureau, Race (2020) (as of Apr. 20, 2022) with Raphael and Stoll, The State of Black California (Feb. 1, 2008) UCLA: School of Public Affairs (as of Apr. 22, 2022) p. 78.

[94] U.S. Census Bureau, Quick Facts: California (2020) U.S. Census Bureau (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[95] U.S. Census Bureau, Race (2020) (as of Nov. 3, 2021).

[96] Ibid.

[97] Hepler, The Hidden Toll of California's Black Exodus (Jul. 15, 2020) Cal Matters (as of Apr. 20, 2022).

[98] Ibid.

[99] See Katz, et al., Reckoning with our Rights: The Evolution of Voter Access in California (Sept. 2020) UCLA Luskin Center for History and Policy (as of Apr. 17, 2022) pp. 20-27.

[100] Baldassare et al., California's Likely Voters (Sept. 2021) Public Policy Institute of California (as of Apr. 21, 2022).

[101] Sen. Joint Economic Com., The Economic State of Black America in 2020 (2020) Sen. Joint Economic Com. (as of Apr. 22, 2022) p. 28.

[102] Ibid.

[103] California Forward, Building Racial and Economic Equity Through Home Ownership (Apr. 2021) California Forward (as of Apr. 22, 2022) p. 17.

[104] Ibid.

[105] California Housing Finance Agency, Black Homeownership Initiative: Building Black Wealth California Housing Finance Agency (as of Apr. 20, 2022); Reid, Crisis, Response, and Recovery: The Federal Government and the Black/White Homeownership Gap (Mar. 2021) UC Berkeley Terner Center for Housing Innovation (as of Apr. 22, 2022) p. 2.

[106] Levin, Black Californians' Housing Crisis, by the Numbers (June 19, 2020) Cal Matters (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[107] Cimini, Black People Disproportionately Homeless in California (Oct. 5, 2019) Cal Matters (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[108] California Health Care Foundation, Health Disparities by Race and Ethnicity in California: Pattern of Inequity (Oct.

22, 2021) California Health Care Foundation (as of Apr. 22, 2022) p. 7.

[109] Id. at p. 42.

[110] Cal. Maternal Quality Care Collaborative, The California Pregnancy-Associated Mortality Review (2018) Cal. Maternal Quality Care Collaborative (as of Apr. 21, 2022) p. 21.

[111] Cal. Health Care Foundation, supra at p. 25.

[112] Id. at p. 28.

[113] Id. at p. 19.

[114] Reskin, The Race Discrimination System (2012) 38 Annual Rev. of Soc. pp. 17–35.

[115] Racial and Identity Profiling Advisory Board, 2022 Report Quick Facts (2022) Racial and Identity Profiling Advisory Board (as of Apr. 19, 2022) p. 1; see also Premkumar et al., Police Use of Force and Misconduct in California (Oct. 2021) Public Policy Institute of California (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[116] Racial and Identity Profiling Advisory Board, supra.

[117] Premkumar et al., supra.

[118] Vera Institute of Justice, Incarceration Trends in California (Dec. 2019) Vera Institute of Justice (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[119] Wood et al., Suspending Our Future: How Inequitable Disciplinary Practices Disenfranchise Black Kids in California's Public Schools (Feb. 17, 2021) Black Minds Matter Coalition (as of Apr. 22, 2022) p. 4.

[120] Losen & Martin, The Unequal Impact of Suspension on the Opportunity to Learn in California (Sep. 18, 2018) The Civil Rights Project (as of Apr. 22, 2022) pp. 4-5; see also Office for Civil Rights, An Overview of Exclusionary Discipline Practices in Public Schools for the 2017-2018 School Year (June 2021) U.S. Dept. of Ed. (as of Apr. 22, 2022) pp. 6-7.

[121] Office of the Attorney General, Attorney General Becerra Secures Settlements with Barstow and Oroville School Districts to Address Discriminatory Treatment of Students Based on Race and Disability Status (Aug. 25, 2020) Cal. Dept. of Justice (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[122] Black Organizing Project et al., From Report Card to Criminal Record: The Impact of Policing Oakland Youth (Aug. 2013) Black Organizing Project (as of Apr. 22, 2022) p. 17.

[123] State of Cal. v. Stockton Unified School District, Complaint for Injunctive Relief (2019) at pp. 5-6.

[124] Ridolfi, et al., California Youth Face Heightened Racial and Ethnic Disparities in Division of Juvenile Justice (Aug. 2020) Center on Juvenile and Criminal Justice (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[125] Ibid.

CHAPTER 2 Enslavement

COURTESY OF ANN RONAN PICTURES/PRINT COLLECTOR/GETTY IMAGES

Captives being brought on board of a slave ship on the West Coast of Africa. (c. 1880)

I. Introduction

On July 5th, 1852, Frederick Douglass gave a speech to a crowd of 600 mostly white antislavery activists in Rochester, New York, the day after Independence Day.[1] Douglass was one of the most famous African American antislavery and civil rights activists at the time.[2] He began by praising the courage of the nation's founders in winning their freedom from the British Empire.[3] But Douglass did not come to celebrate American independence and liberty.[4] The United States was founded on the idea that "all men are created equal[,]" but white Americans enslaved their fellow African Americans and "notoriously hate[d] [...] all men whose skins are not colored like your own."[5] For Douglass, the Fourth of July only highlighted the "immeasurable distance" between free white Americans and enslaved African Americans.[6] "The blessings in which you, this day, rejoice, are not enjoyed in common.—The rich inheritance of justice, liberty, prosperity and independence, bequeathed by your fathers, is shared by you, not by me," he explained; "You may rejoice. I must mourn."[7]

Frederick Douglass's speech about the Fourth of July shows the conflict at the heart of American history. The United States prides itself on liberty, equality, and justice for all, but for over 400 years, white people of European ancestry built and continued a brutal caste system based on false notions of racial difference: white people at the top, people of African descent at the bottom, and all other groups ranked in between.[8] From the beginning, America's wealth was built by the forced labor of people from Africa and their descendants. These people were forcibly sold and traded as commodities and millions of them cultivated crops—tobacco, sugar, rice, indigo, wheat, corn, and especially cotton—that allowed American colonies and the early United States to prosper. Colonial governments and the U.S. government at all levels allowed and participated in the exploitation, abuse, terror, and murder of people of African descent so that white people could profit as much as possible from their enslavement. To justify stealing the intellect, skill, and labor of African Americans, enslavers created and spread false, racist ideas that African Americans were less intelligent than whites, that they loved their children less than white parents, and that they felt less pain than white people did.

Insisting that African Americans were less than human made it easier for enslavers and the American government at all levels to deny them the legal rights that many white Americans believed were a basic part of being American. After enslavement officially ended in 1865, white Americans terrorized African Americans with violence and racist ideas. African Americans lived under violent threats to themselves and their families and did not have the economic opportunities or political rights of their white peers. Through laws allowing, promoting, and protecting enslavement, federal, state, and local governments were complicit in stealing centuries of unpaid wages from African Americans. The racist ideas invented to control enslaved people have echoed through centuries of American laws and policies and inflicted physical, mental, and emotional trauma on approximately 16 generations of African Americans. The state and federal governments of this country have never atoned for these harms.

This chapter traces the long arc of enslavement in early North America and the United States. Sections III and IV examine the origins of race-based enslavement targeting people of African ancestry, the ways slavery generated wealth for white colonists in English North America, and the emergence of transatlantic trafficking in enslaved African people. Section V discusses the importance of enslavement to the founding of the United States from the American Revolution to the creation of the U.S. Constitution. Sections VI, VII, and VIII describe the lives of enslaved people during the height of the domestic slave trade, the complicity of northerners in the perpetuation of enslavement, and enslavement's importance to American educational, religious, and governmental institutions. Section IX discusses the expansion of enslavement into western U.S. territories, the establishment of enslavement in California, and the complicity of the California state government in promoting enslavement, oppressive laws, and anti-Black sentiment. Finally, sections X, XI, and XII conclude the chapter by examining the U.S. Civil War, the formal abolition of enslavement, policies toward formerly enslaved people during Reconstruction. It ends by considering the lingering, harmful effects of efforts to recast the defeat of the Confederate States of America into a "Lost Cause" myth that endures to the present day.

II. The Origins of American Enslavement

Pre-Modern Enslavement

Enslavement has existed for thousands of years in many different cultures across the world.[9] It is only in the past 400 to 500 years that white Europeans developed a type of enslavement based heavily on the color of someone's skin and that mainly targeted people of African ancestry.[10] This type of enslavement developed gradually between the 1400s and the 1700s.[11] It was based on the ideas that African ancestry could be the basis for life-long enslavement that the children of enslaved African-descended women could be enslaved from birth, and that people of African descent were naturally destined to be enslaved.[12]

Before the 1400s, a time period known as the "pre-modern era," enslavement and enslaved people differed widely.[13] In the ancient Roman Empire, for instance, those who were enslaved were mostly conquered people who came from multiple racial, ethnic, religious, and class backgrounds across Europe, the Middle East, and North Africa.[14] In the Middle Ages (600s to 1400s), Celtic peoples, North Africans, Scandinavians, and especially Slavic people from Eastern Europe (from whom the word "slave" comes) were the most commonly enslaved groups in Europe.[15] In the Muslim kingdoms of North Africa and the Middle East, both Slavic people and sub-Saharan African people (Africans who lived south of the Sahara Desert) made up a large number of those who were enslaved.[16]

Enslaved people in these diverse societies became enslaved in different ways: they could be prisoners of war, victims of kidnapping, targets of religious crusades, people sentenced to enslavement as a punishment for crimes, or poor people sold to pay off debts.[17] Depending on the culture or time period, children born to one or more enslaved parent were not always automatically enslaved, and it was fairly common for enslavers to free

To justify stealing the intellect, skill, and labor of African Americans, enslavers created and spread false, racist ideas that African Americans were less intelligent than whites, that they loved their children less than white parents, and that they felt less pain than white people.

the children, grandchildren, or great-grandchildren of enslaved people.[18]

Finally, early enslaved people fulfilled a variety of roles in their societies beyond being forced agricultural laborers or house servants.[19] Enslaved people could be status symbols who represented the wealth and power of their enslavers, trusted advisors, poorly treated members of their enslavers' extended families, coerced sexual and marriage partners, or slave-soldiers forced into military service.[20]

Beginnings of Modern Enslavement

Enslavement changed with European world exploration and global colonization between the 1400s and the 1600s.[21] In North America and South America, English, Spanish, French, Portuguese, and Dutch colonizers took Indigenous peoples' land to grow crops such as sugarcane, tobacco, rice, and coffee and to mine for gold.[22]

In most of these new colonies, natural resources and land to grow crops were common, but laborers were scarce.[23] In order to efficiently exploit these resources, Europeans first captured, enslaved, and exploited the Indigenous peoples of North and South America.[24] Because the enslavement of Indigenous people could not keep up with the demand for labor, European colonizers began to traffic enslaved people from the continent of Africa.[25]

Portuguese and Spanish colonizers brought the first enslaved Africans to North and South America to supplement forced Indigenous labor.[26] Portuguese merchants had been trafficking West Africans and selling them in Portugal for many years before the colonization of North and South America.[27] It was these captives who were first forcibly moved in small groups to European colonies across the Atlantic Ocean.[28] Portuguese and Spanish colonizers eventually started buying thousands of enslaved Africans along the coasts of West Africa and Central Africa and bringing them directly to colonies in the Caribbean and Brazil.[29] Around 500,000 enslaved people of African descent had already arrived in North and South America[30]—including Spanish settlements in present-day South Carolina (by 1526)[31] and Florida (by 1539)[32]—by the time Dutch pirates sold around 20 African captives to English colonists in Jamestown, Virginia, in 1619.[33]

Creating the American Racial Hierarchy

When these first Africans were brought by force to the English colonies that became the United States, a caste system based mostly on skin color did not yet fully exist. Instead, European colonists who wanted to exploit enslaved African American people and profit from their labor built this caste system gradually during the 1600s and 1700s.

In the very earliest years of English colonization in Virginia, European indentured servants were the most common workers.[34] Indentured servants were usually either poor people who agreed to work for wealthy people for several years in exchange for transportation to the colonies, or they were people found guilty of crimes who had to work for several years in the colonies before getting their freedom.[35]

At first, there was not much difference between the treatment of enslaved Africans and European indentured servants.[36] The major divisions in Virginia were between wealthy people and poor people who were forced to labor, not between African American and white people.[37] Wealthy white Virginians who controlled the colony and profited from the labor of both indentured white people and enslaved African people feared that rebellions by these lower-class people might undermine their power and wealth.[38]

Wealthy white colonists attempted to solve this problem by using race as a way to divide these two groups and stay in power.[39] Rich white Virginians began to grant more rights and privileges to poorer white people.[40] This move created a false sense of greater equality among rich and poor white English colonists, who began to come together around a shared idea that they were "white" people who were naturally superior to "Black" people of African descent.[41] The new unity between rich and poor white people in Virginia encouraged poor whites to keep Africans and their descendants enslaved and to help their wealthy neighbors squash rebellions of enslaved people.[42]

COURTESY OF KEAN COLLECTION/GETTY IMAGES

'Introduction of Slavery,' probably Jamestown, Virginia, late 1610s.

Colonial lawmakers then established new laws that made the racial caste system a permanent part of American culture and society.[43] Colonial laws aimed to control people of African descent, keep them in life-long enslavement, and keep poor whites and enslaved African-descended people divided.[44] In the late 1600s and early 1700s, these colonial laws gradually built up a legal system that treated people of African descent as permanent outsiders whose skin color made them naturally different from and unequal to all white people.[45] These Virginia laws, called "Slave Codes," did the following:

- Made enslavement permanent and automatic for most people of African descent by saying that children born to enslaved mothers would be enslaved for life[46]; that becoming a Christian would not end enslavement[47]; and that enslavers could not set enslaved people free unless they paid to take them out of the Virginia colony;[48]

- Made it easier for whites to control free people of African descent (those born into freedom or who did manage to escape enslavement) by denying them legal, political, and social rights.[49] These included the right to vote, serve in colonial military organizations, have political office, or carry firearms;[50] and

- Divided all white people from all African American people by making interracial sex or marriage a crime,[51] punishing white women who gave birth to mixed-race children,[52] and forcing these mixed-race children (and their children) into indentured servitude until they were 31 years old.[53]

Other southern colonies that depended on enslavement passed similar laws across the 1700s, sometimes copying the laws of Virginia directly.[54]These early slave codes ensured that this racial caste system became widespread across much of the area that would later become the United States.[55]

Only after enslavement became widespread and profitable and racist policies were in place, did white people develop elaborate racist ideas to explain why the racial caste system was natural and good.[56] European enslavers argued either that enslavement "civilized" Africans by introducing them to European climates and lifeways, or that the Christian Bible had automatically cursed them to suffer enslavement.[57] The overall goal of these racist ideas was to defend enslavement and white supremacy by claiming that African American people were, and always had been, inferior to white people with European ancestry.[58]

III. The Transatlantic Trafficking of Enslaved People

The Growth of Slavery

The search for profits, the unity of rich and poor white colonists, and the development of racist ideas paved the way for the massive increase of slaving voyages to Africa and the enslavement of people of African descent in the lands that would later become the United States.[59]

The enslavement of people of African descent played a major role in the population boom of English colonies in North America during the 1700s.[60] Enslaved Africans and African descended peoples made up 47.5 percent of all people who arrived in the English colonies between 1700 and 1775 (around 278,400 of the 585,800 new arrivals documented during this period).[61] This meant that the transatlantic slave trade was nearly as important to the growth of English North America as free (or indentured) immigration from Europe.[62]

The populations of the English colonies showed this change: Between 1680 and 1750, people of African descent increased from 7 percent to 44 percent of the total population of Virginia, and from 17 percent to 61 percent of the total population of South Carolina.[63] This trend was even more pronounced in the nearby British colonies of the Caribbean (known as the West Indies) where almost one million enslaved Africans were forcibly brought during the same period of time,[64] and where enslaved people made up 80 to 90 percent of the total population.[65]

To keep the profits of enslavement growing, British merchants, the British monarchy, and the British government worked together to become the leaders of the transatlantic slave trade.[66] Just one English company, the Royal African Company, forcibly brought nearly 150,000 enslaved people from Africa across the Atlantic Ocean between the early 1670s and the early 1720s.[67] This total was more than any single company in the entire history of the transatlantic slave trade.[68]

The English transatlantic slave trade of the 1600 to 1700s differed from the slave trades which existed in West Africa before or during the same period.[69] Enslavement was common in sub-Saharan Africa, including West Africa, which (in addition to Central Africa) was one of the main areas of the transatlantic slave trade.[70] In West African societies, enslaved people were usually people captured in wars or attacks on other ethnic or lineage (family ancestry) groups, people who owed debts, or people found guilty of crimes.[71] Enslaved people in West African societies also had a wide variety of social and economic roles.[72] Many, especially children, lived in the same home as their enslavers and were treated as "pawns," low-status members of the family group.[73] Some worked in agriculture or as house servants, while some became wives or concubines (involuntary sexual partners or secondary wives).[74] This enslavement was not usually permanent or passed on to the next generation.[75] Most enslaved people and their children in West Africa gradually lost their enslaved status and became part of the families and communities of their enslavers.[76]

The arrival of Europeans made enslavement along the western coast of Africa more widespread and violent.[77] European enslavers depended on African slave-trading networks for captives to send across the Atlantic Ocean.[78] But the massive demand for African captives, which kept growing as Europeans colonized more areas of the world, changed African enslavement greatly.[79] Warfare and kidnapping raids increased to capture more people to sell to Europeans.[80] The focus of the West African slave trade also shifted to the coasts and port cities where Europeans set up trading forts to buy people who had been captured.[81]

The transatlantic slave trade eventually involved capturing Africans from an enormous geographic area covering much of West Africa and Central Africa, and even extending to the island of Madagascar off the southeast coast of Africa.[82] This trafficking in human beings spanned 3,500 miles along the western African coast from present-day Senegal in the north to present-day Angola in the south, and as many as 500 to 1,000 miles into the interior of the continent.[83] Captive African people often changed hands many times and traveled long distances before they arrived at coastal ports where Europeans bought them.[84]

The Middle Passage

African captives suffered horrific physical, emotional, and mental trauma before and during the voyage across the Atlantic Ocean.[85]This journey was called the "Middle Passage" and it was so dangerous, unhealthy, and violent that almost 1.8 million people died before they ever reached the Americas.[86]

Enslaved Africans' suffering began even before the slave ships set sail for the Americas.[87] Once European enslavers purchased people who had been captured from African enslavers, they incarcerated them for days, weeks, or even months until they were ready to sail.[88] In the earlier years of the slave trade, European enslavers imprisoned enslaved people in large corrals called "barracoons."[89] The most common practice, however, was to incarcerate enslaved people on board the slave ships until it was time to sail for the Americas.[90]

During the journey across the Atlantic Ocean, enslaved Africans went through months of torture trapped inside slave ships.[91] The voyage, which was called the "Middle Passage" because it was the second leg of a triangular trade between Europe, Africa, and the Americas,[92] took 80 to 100 days (around 2.5 to 3 months or more) in the early years of the trade (although new sailing technologies cut the length of the trip to 60 to 80 days in later years).[93] Slaving ships came in many different sizes, but the average Royal African Company boat held around 330 enslaved people.[94]

Almost 1.8 million Africans died as they were trafficked across the Atlantic Ocean to slavery.

African men, who made up around two-thirds of all those captured,[95] spent almost all of the journey—sixteen hours or more every day—laying down in specially constructed rooms inside the ships.[96] Crews stripped them naked, chained them up,[97] and forced them to lay down on their sides, or to lay head to feet, so that they could fit in as many people as possible.[98] On English slave ships, each man had a space smaller than the size of a coffin.[99] On ships with "tight-packing," captains added an extra platform so that men laid in two rows stacked on top of each other with only 2.5 feet of vertical space to lay down.[100] Enslaved women and children, who were usually smaller in number, lived together in groups in small rooms inside the ship.[101]

Conditions inside slave ships were horrific and caused massive amounts of sickness and death.[102] Hundreds of people were crowded together in the blazing heat and tossed back and forth with the ship's movement, especially during bad weather.[103] Enslaved captive Olaudah Equiano, who survived the Middle Passage, wrote that "the closeness of the place, and the heat of the climate, added to the number in the ship, which was so crowded that each had scarcely room to turn himself, almost suffocated us."[104]

Captives did not have much fresh air and their rooms were covered with human waste.[105] Rats and insects swarmed around them.[106] Low-quality food, as well as scarce water, led to widespread lack of nutrition and dehydration.[107] Filthy conditions and poor nutrition caused waves of sickness, including scurvy (a lack of vitamins B and C) and "bloody flux" (amoebic diarrhea or dysentery).[108] Highly contagious diseases—especially smallpox—spread fast in the overcrowded spaces.[109] Slave ships were filled with people who were very sick, dying, or dead.

Enslaved Africans also suffered physical and sexual violence at the hands of ships' crews.[110] Crew members moved people who had been captured to the top deck of the ship on a regular basis to force them to bathe and dance for exercise.[111] They often raped and impregnated women and girls.[112] Heavily armed crew members watched enslaved people carefully, and they threatened, beat, tortured, and sometimes killed them, especially if they resisted or rebelled.[113]

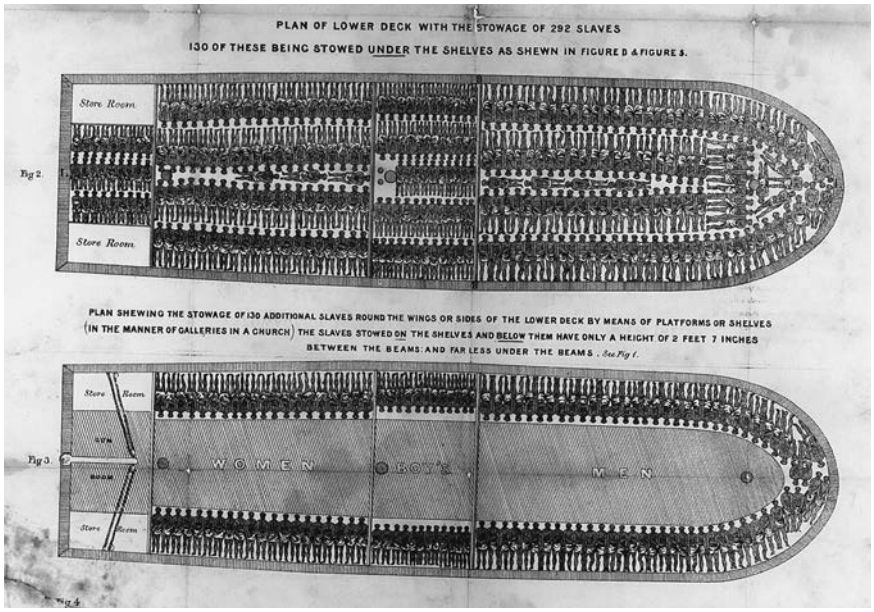
There is also evidence that ship crews threw sick enslaved people overboard to prevent them from spreading disease to others and to claim insurance money for "lost" human cargo.[114] In one especially brutal case in 1781, an English slave ship captain ordered his crew to throw 132 Africans overboard because he had run out of supplies and his insurance company would only pay him if enslaved people drowned, not if they starved to death.[115] During the worst storms, crews also tried to keep from sinking by throwing enslaved people overboard to decrease the weight of the ship.[116] British insurance companies allowed this and paid ship captains for any human beings who their crews threw overboard to drown.[117]

Crews stripped enslaved Africans naked, chained them up, and forced them to lay down on their sides, or to lay head to feet, so that they could fit in as many people as possible. On English slave ships, each man had a space smaller than the size of a coffin.

The transatlantic slave trade and the Middle Passage had a sickening cost in human lives. European enslavers forced around 12.5 million enslaved Africans to cross the Atlantic Ocean between 1500 and 1866.[118] More than 14 percent of these people, around 1.8 million in total, died of sickness, neglect, abuse, murder, or suicide.[119] The men, women, and children who survived the Middle Passage were then sold to local slave traders, merchants, or owners of plantations and forced labor camps.[120]

When their voyage across the Atlantic Ocean finally ended in North America, South America, or the Caribbean, enslaved Africans suffered "social death," which meant they were now permanently separated from their home communities, cultures, and families.[121] They were outsiders in an unfamiliar place, surrounded by strangers with completely different cultures, religions, and languages. Enslaved Africans had to build new families, languages, cultures, and religious practices rooted both in the pre-colonial traditions of their homelands and the new cultures that they found in the Americas.[122]

COURTESY OF LIBRARY OF CONGRESS/ART IMAGES VIA GETTY IMAGES



Engraving "Stowage of the British Slave Ship 'Brookes' Under the Regulated Slave Trade Act of 1788" (circa 1788)

Slavery and the Founding of the United States

Starting in the late 1600s, enslaved people and the institution of enslavement became increasingly important to the colonial societies of North America that would later become the United States.[123] The southern English colonies of North America, which eventually included Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia, began trafficking more and more enslaved people as the 1700s went on. [124]

These colonies gradually built economies and societies that depended heavily on enslavement for growing cash crops to sell in international markets.[125] In the colonies of the Upper South, including Maryland, Virginia, Delaware, and North Carolina, enslaved people grew tobacco. Enslaved people in the low country and coastal plains of the Carolinas and Georgia grew rice and indigo (a plant for making blue dye).[126]

Enslavers who forced enslaved people to labor in agricultural production exploited not only their physical strength, but also their intellect, innovation, and skill.

Enslavers who forced enslaved people to labor in agricultural production exploited not only their physical strength, but also their intellect, innovation, and skill. Growing rice and indigo, for instance, required skilled labor and knowledge of specialized techniques for successful production. In fact, rice and indigo growing was already highly developed along the western coast of Africa, and, later the Caribbean, where people of African descent had already innovated several production techniques. Enslavers were eager to buy enslaved people who already had these specialized agricultural skills.

Growing rice and indigo, for instance, required skilled labor and knowledge of specialized techniques for successful production.[127] In fact, rice and indigo growing was already highly developed along the western coast of Africa, and, later the Caribbean, where people of African descent had already innovated several production techniques.[128] Enslavers were eager to buy enslaved people who already had these specialized agricultural skills.[129]

Human trafficking in enslaved people was not limited to the southern colonies.[130] Whites in northern colonies also trafficked enslaved people, and enslavement became a feature of life in every northern colony.[131] In most New England colonies, enslavement was not a major institution, but in colonies farther south, such as New York, enslavement was often a part of daily life.[132] For example, one-fifth of New York City's population was enslaved in 1746, making it the second largest slaveholding city in the 13 original English colonies behind only Charleston, South Carolina.[133]

By the time white English colonists began to complain about their mistreatment by the British government and began comparing their lack of rights in the British Empire to enslavement, the real enslavement of people of African descent was already well established in all 13 original British colonies.[134] Five hundred thousand enslaved African American people, who made up 20 percent of the entire colonial population, knew the real horrors and trauma of enslavement.[135]

The American Revolution

When white colonists declared their independence from Great Britain, they explained their actions by saying that the King of England and the British government had taken away their freedom and their rights as "freeborn Englishmen."[136] In the Declaration of Independence, Americans famously announced that "all men are created equal" and "that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness."[137] At the same time, these same colonists bought and sold people of African descent who had no freedom and very few rights.

People who opposed the American Revolution were quick to point out the hypocrisy of these words.[138] Thomas Day, an Englishman who opposed enslavement, said that "[i]f there be an object truly ridiculous in nature, it is an American patriot, signing resolutions of independence with the one hand and with the other brandishing a whip over his affrighted slaves."[139] Even white American colonists understood the hypocrisy of the Declaration of Independence.[140] Abigail Adams, an opponent of enslavement from New England, the wife of John Adams, and a future first lady of the United States, wondered just how strongly white colonists felt about human liberty when they were "accustomed to deprive their fellow citizens of theirs."[141]

The founders of the United States, especially those who owned enslaved people and profited from enslavement, were well aware of these contradictions and they tried to downplay them. They knew that enslavement made them, and their independence movement, look hypocritical, but they also wanted to continue to profit from the stolen labor of enslaved people.

Thomas Jefferson, the author of the first draft of the Declaration of Independence, owned around 600 enslaved people over the course of his lifetime. He willingly freed only 10 of the 600 people who he had enslaved over the course of his life. Four of those 10 people were his own children with Sally Hemings, an enslaved woman who he owned as his property and who he never freed.

Thomas Jefferson, the author of the first draft of the Declaration of Independence, owned around 600 enslaved people over the course of his lifetime.[142] His original draft of the Declaration of Independence openly criticized the transatlantic slave trade, which he called "a cruel war against human nature itself, violating it's [sic] most sacred rights of life and liberty," but he blamed it almost all on King George III of England.[143] Jefferson claimed that the king not only failed to stop the slave trade, but also that the king encouraged enslaved people to rise up and kill white colonists.[144]

Embarrassment over enslavement, and the hope to keep making money from it, was clear when the Continental Congress rejected this part of the Declaration and voted to remove it.[145] Jefferson explained the rejection in his notes.[146] Representatives from South Carolina and Georgia depended on enslavement and wanted to continue in the trafficking of humans.[147] Men from the northern colonies were embarrassed by the criticism of the slave trade because they were highly involved in shipping enslaved Africans across the Atlantic.[148] The final version of the Declaration of Independence only mentioned enslavement indirectly by claiming that King George III was trying to cause "domestic insurrections" (code words for rebellions by enslaved people) in the colonies.[149]

The founders of the United States tried to dodge the issue of enslavement, but enslaved and free people of African descent would not let them. They tested the new nation's ideas of freedom during the American Revolutionary War (1775 to 1783).[150]

Around 30,000 to 40,000 people (and maybe as many as 100,000 people) escaped their enslavement during the American Revolution.[151] Virginia's colonial governor, John Murray, Earl of Dunmore, quickly took advantage of enslavement in the colonies by promising freedom to any enslaved man who fought for the British Army against the Americans.[152] Some male freedom seekers did join the British Army, but large numbers died from smallpox during their service.[153] Others, including many women and children, took advantage of wartime chaos to escape to areas where the British Army was strong.[154] The massive number of freedom seekers greatly damaged enslavement in the lower southern states.[155] For instance, around 30 percent of South Carolina's enslaved population left or died during the Revolution.[156]

Some states tried to solve this problem by promising freedom to enslaved men who fought on the side of the Americans.[157] Other states recruited free African American men to boost the size of the small American army.[158] Even though they were smaller in number than whites, free African American men were more likely to volunteer for military service and to serve longer than whites because they wanted both independence for the United States and greater rights for themselves.[159] Overall, around 9,000 free or enslaved African American men served alongside white revolutionaries in integrated military units to fight for American independence.[160]

African Americans' struggles for freedom during the American Revolution led to the end of the enslavement in most of the northern states where the enslaved population was small and local enslavement was less central to the economy.[161] Enslaved people used the revolutionary ideals of freedom to convince northern judges and the general public to end enslavement.[162]

When enslaved people in Massachusetts sued for their freedom, the state courts decided that enslavement went against the state's new constitution, which said that "all men are born free and equal."[163] Enslavement ended there in 1783.[164] Nearby, the state of Vermont approved a new constitution that outlawed enslavement completely in 1777.[165] States farther south, such as New York and Pennsylvania, depended much more on enslavement and so passed gradual emancipation laws to cover enslavers' loss of profits.[166] These laws required children born to enslaved mothers to go through a long indenture (up to 28 years) and then be set free.[167]

Southern states that profited the most from enslavement kept and rebuilt it, but the process looked different in the Upper and Lower South.

States in the Upper South—Virginia, Maryland, and Delaware—temporarily began to relax their laws against freeing enslaved people.[168] "Manumission," the legal process by which enslavers freed enslaved people or allowed them to save money and purchase their freedom, became more common.[169] This was partly because the Revolutionary War had hurt the market for tobacco and made enslavement less profitable in the Upper South.[170] Revolutionary ideas about human freedom also motivated some of this manumission, although with limits.[171] For instance, Virginian George Washington, leader of the revolutionary army and the first president of the United States, freed all of the people he enslaved, but only upon his death.[172]

Washington, however, was not the norm. Thomas Jefferson, the next slaveholder from Virginia to win the presidency, willingly freed only 10 of the 600 people who he had enslaved over the course of his life.[173] Four of those 10 people were his own children with Sally Hemings, an enslaved woman who he owned as his property and who he never freed.[174]

Jefferson's fellow white southerners in the Upper South increasingly stopped manumission when they found that selling "surplus" enslaved people to cotton growers in South Carolina and Georgia could be a profitable replacement for tobacco.[175] Meanwhile, the Lower or Deep South states rebuilt their plantation economies by buying enslaved people from the Upper South and trafficking in large numbers of enslaved Africans from the transatlantic slave trade.[176]

Overall, the American Revolution created a new nation that was increasingly divided into three regions: The North, where enslavement was immediately or gradually ended; the Upper South, where older patterns of enslavement were changing; and the Lower South, where enslavement remained an important and growing part of the economy.

The New Cotton Economy and the Expansion of Slavery

Instead of dying out after the American Revolution, enslavement became the economic lifeblood of the United States, North and South. After winning independence, the United States built one of the largest and most profitable enslaved labor economies in the world.[177] Between the end of the American Revolution in 1783 and the start of the Civil War in 1861, roughly the length of one human lifetime, the enslaved population of the United States increased almost five times from just under 650,000 enslaved individuals to almost four million enslaved people.[178]

Two major processes made this possible. First, new technologies for producing cotton increased the value of enslaved people's labor and encouraged the expansion of enslavement into lands in the Deep South.[179] Second, white Americans adopted a national constitution that protected enslavement and gave proslavery white Americans outsized political power in the federal government.[180] This power allowed enslavers to increase the profits of enslavement and to enjoy those profits with little regulation by the federal government.

Starting in the 1790s new technologies made enslavement more profitable than ever in North America. A new machine, the cotton gin, made it much easier and faster to remove the seeds from short-staple cotton, a sturdy breed of cotton that could be grown in many different climates and soils in the South.[181] Cotton growing breathed new life into the institution of enslavement. Enslavers looked for new lands to the west to expand cotton plantations.[182]

COURTESY OF PICTURES FROM HISTORY/UNIVERSAL IMAGES GROUP VIA GETTY IMAGES

To help these land-hungry cotton planters, the United States government increasingly pressured Native Americans in the Deep South to give up their homelands.[183] Native Americans in the southeastern United States, some of whom had adopted the practices of white colonizers such as growing cotton and owning enslaved African Americans, resisted this pressure.[184] The U.S. government eventually used a brutal policy of removal in which soldiers rounded up Native Americans, removed them from their land, and force marched (or sailed) them hundreds of miles to lands west of the Mississippi River.[185] People of African descent enslaved by Native Americans were also forcibly moved west with their enslavers, and some Native Americans even purchased more enslaved people to take west with them.[186] Thousands of Native Americans and an unknown number of enslaved African Americans died from disease and neglect along the way and the removal process came to be known as the "Trail of Tears."[187] As white southern cotton planters moved into Native homelands, the removal, death, and land theft suffered by Native Americans went hand-in-hand with the widespread enslavement and forced relocation of African Americans.

Slavery in the New U.S. Constitution

Around the same time that the cotton gin took off, southern enslaving states left a permanent mark on the American legal system by shaping the U.S. Constitution to meet their needs in upholding enslavement. During the Constitutional Convention in 1787, southern proslavery representatives pushed for protections for enslavement, partly by threatening not to sign onto the new Constitution.[188]

A major protection for enslavement in the Constitution came in a clause that prohibited Congress from outlawing U.S. participation in the transatlantic slave trade for another 20 years.[189] During those important 20 years, slave ships legally brought around 86,000 enslaved Africans to the United States.[190] Congress was also required, and given the power, to use military force to stop "Insurrections" and "domestic violence,"[191] which would have included rebellions by enslaved people.[192] Proslavery southerners also ensured that the Constitution included a fugitive slave law, which required the return of enslaved people who sought freedom across state lines.[193]

The most important proslavery constitutional policy was the 3/5 Clause. The Constitution was built on the idea of representative government and that Americans should elect people to represent their needs and interests in the federal government. In the U.S. House of Representatives, the number of representatives each state got was based on population with the idea that more populous states should get more representation than less populous states.[194] This part of the Constitution raised controversial questions: Was it reasonable or fair for southern states with large numbers of enslaved people to count those people toward their Congressional representation when they allowed enslaved people no vote, no political rights, and very few legal rights? If enslavers usually treated enslaved people as property, why should they suddenly be counted as people for purposes of representation?[195] People who opposed counting enslaved people toward Congressional representation came mostly from the North and they argued that the enslaved population should give little or no boost to southern states' power.[196] At the same time, enslavers demanded to count the enslaved as whole people, not because they believed enslaved people were equal to white Americans, but because they wanted more voice in Congress and to counterbalance the power of the more populous northern states.[197] The authors of the Constitution reached a compromise.[198] States would get to count each enslaved person toward their representation in Congress, but each enslaved individual would only count as 3/5 (or 60 percent) of a free white person when it came time to determine how many representatives each state received in the House.[199] This was an enormous benefit for enslavers. They could continue to treat enslaved people as property but still get to count 60% of the enslaved population toward getting more power in Congress.[200]

The Founding Fathers embedded slavery into the U.S. Constitution by:

- Protecting the transatlantic trafficking of enslaved people for another 20 years, resulting in the trafficking of 86,000 Africans.
- Giving power to Congress to use military force to stop insurrections, including slave rebellions.
- Requiring the return of enslaved people who fled towards freedom across state lines.
- Counting enslaved people as 3/5 of a person

COURTESY OF JOHN PARROT/STOCKTREK IMAGES VIA GETTY IMAGES

More Than 50 percent of U.S. Presidents from 1789 to 1885 enslaved African Americans

The first twenty-one Presidents seated together in The White House. The enslavers are shaded in red.

Representation in Congress also had a major influence on presidential elections.[201] The Constitution set up an electoral college in which a group of representatives (called "electors") voted to choose the next president. Each state got a number of electors equal to the number of senators and representatives that it had in Congress.[202] In this way, enslaving states, which gained more representatives in Congress from the 3/5 Clause, automatically gained more presidential electors, and more power to influence presidential elections, too.[203]

At the same time, some historians argue that white southerners would have gone even further to make the U.S. Constitution a proslavery document if they did not have to compromise with representatives from the northern states.[204] The words "slave" and "slavery" could not be found anywhere in the new Constitution. Instead, it used code words for enslaved people such as "Person held to Service or Labour"[205] or just "other Persons."[206] Some historians see this as a sign that white northerners who helped write the Constitution were growing less comfortable with enslavement and did not want the nation's founding document to say openly that owning human beings as property was legal.[207]

The Constitution also gave Congress the power to end U.S. participation in the transatlantic slave trade in 1808, rather than leaving it completely open, and the fugitive slave law was vague and not well enforced.[208] Finally, the 3/5 Clause probably disappointed proslavery southerners who pushed hard for enslaved people to be counted as whole people, rather than as 60 percent of a person, for purposes of representation in Congress.[209]

No matter what the Constitutional Convention intended to do, the new Constitution ended up giving proslavery southerners outsized power in the federal government, strengthening the institution of enslavement.[210] Northerners complained that the enslaving states' 60 percent boost in Congressional representation and in the electoral college, both due to the 3/5 Clause, gave enslavers too much power over national politics. Some northerners tried to get rid of the 3/5 Clause.[211]

The linking of Congressional representation to presidential electors also helped proslavery southerners control the White House. Enslavers Thomas Jefferson, in 1800, and James K. Polk, in 1846, would not have won election to presidency without the South's extra electoral votes based on counting enslaved people.[212]

The power of proslavery white southerners was evident throughout the United States' early government. Fifty percent of the nation's pre-Civil War presidents were enslavers.[213] Between George Washington's election and 1850, enslavers held the presidency for 50 years, the position of Speaker of the House for 41 years, and the chair of the House of Representatives Ways and Means Committee for 42 years. [214] Control of the presidency also meant control of the U.S. Supreme Court, where presidents chose justices to serve for life. Enslavers made up 18 of the 31 justices (or 58 percent) who sat on the U.S. Supreme Court before 1850.[215] Ultimately, throughout American history, more than 1,700 Congressmen, representing 37 states, once enslaved Black people.[216] They did not only represent the South, but also every state in New England, much of the Midwest, and many Western states.[217]

Proslavery southerners' control of Congress, the presidency, and the U.S. Supreme Court increased the lifespan of enslavement and the geographic area where it was legal. Together, proslavery officials in the federal government paved the way for enslavement's expansion into new states and territories in the West by letting enslavers move without regulation into the large geographic area south of the Ohio River.[218]

Between the ratification of the Constitution in 1788 and the start of the Civil War in 1861, Congress approved the creation of nine new enslaving states (roughly 43 percent of all 21 new states).[219] This expansion of enslavement included parts of the new territory of Louisiana, which the United States purchased from France in 1803. French Louisiana had long been an enslaving colony where sugar production based on enslaved labor was becoming a major source of wealth.[220] Louisiana became a state in 1812 and, by the time of the Civil War, produced one-quarter of the world's sugar and was the second richest state.[221] In addition to creating this major new enslaving state, enslavers won another big victory in 1820 when Congress voted, after protests by antislavery politicians, to let Missouri become a state with a constitution that both allowed enslavement and banned free African Americans from settling there.[222] The major tradeoff that opponents of enslavement got from the Missouri Compromise was the policy that enslavement would be illegal in all parts of the Louisiana Territory located north of Missouri's southern border.[223] For the time being, white Americans reached an unsteady political peace over enslavement's westward expansion.

Between 1790 and 1859, slave traders sold approximately 845,720 people within the U.S. They made enormous fortunes in this trafficking of human beings, amounting to more than $159 million between 1820 and 1860.

IV. The Lives of Enslaved People During the Height of the Domestic Slave Trade

Domestic Trafficking of Enslaved People

Cotton solidified enslavement's importance to the United States, especially in the Deep South where the crop grew the best. The demand for enslaved people in the Deep South allowed enslavers in the Upper South to profit from enslavement in a new way: the interstate trafficking of enslaved people. Enslavers on worn-out tobacco farms in Maryland, Delaware, and Virginia could not grow cotton themselves, but they could sell enslaved people to the growing cotton plantations farther south.[224]

Between 1790 and 1859, slave traders sold approximately 845,720 people within the U.S.[225] They made enormous fortunes in this trafficking of human beings, amounting to more than $159 million between 1820 and 1860.[226] Slave traders force marched, or sailed, hundreds of thousands of enslaved people to new territories along the Mississippi River or the Gulf of Mexico. Today's states of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and (later) Texas were built on the brutal forced migration of the enslaved.[227]

The trafficking of enslaved people destroyed enslaved people's families, communities, and their bodies. Enslavers and slave traders often ambushed enslaved people with a surprise sale so that they could not attempt to run away or plead to stay with their families.[228] A person "sold south" was almost always separated from their family members and home communities forever.

Parents and children, husbands and wives, brothers and sisters, and extended family members and friends never saw each other again.[229]

On top of the grief and mental and emotional trauma of family separation came physical violence. Slave traffickers usually chained the hands and feet of enslaved people and then chained several individuals together in a line (called a "coffle"). Then, traffickers force marched their captives by gunpoint to the next place of sale.[230]

Newly purchased people might be added to the coffle along the way, or enslaved people might be sold to a string of different traders as they moved South.[231] Some enslaved people might make part of their forced journey via ship or riverboat.[232] But it was common practice to march enslaved people hundreds of miles over land to their destinations.[233] Handcuffs and chains rubbed their skin raw, their feet ached and bled, and they suffered from a lack of food, clothing, shelter, and sleep.[234]

Charles Ball, an enslaved man who was bought by slave traffickers Maryland and forced to march to South Carolina, later remembered: "I seriously meditated on self-destruction, and had I been at liberty to get a rope, I believe I should have hanged myself at Lancaster... I had now no hope of ever again seeing my wife and children, or of revisiting the scenes of my youth."[235]

At the end of their forced march south, enslaved people faced the terrifying process of being sold to their new enslavers. Many of the enslaved ended up in the city of New Orleans, the human trafficking center of the Deep South.[236]

Some buyers specifically bought Black people that they could subject to sexual and reproductive violence. The "fancy trade" was the term for selling young women and girls to white men for the purpose of constant rape and/or forced sex work in brothels. Other enslavers bought young mothers (with or without their children) because a woman who had recently given birth to children showed that she was able to have more children in the future to enrich her buyer.

Enslaved people waited until their day of sale in a high-walled outdoor yard, called a "slave pen," where they were crowded together with 50 to 100 people.[237] Upon arrival, traffickers allowed enslaved people food, rest, baths, and new clothing to make them look more appealing to future buyers and bring a higher price upon sale.[238] Later, traders who trafficked in enslaved people sold them in a showroom next to the pen.[239]

As historian Walter Johnson has written, one of the great obscenities of enslavement was that enslavers forced enslaved people "to perform their own commodification."[240] Slave traders coached enslaved people on how to act and what to say to potential buyers, to hide any injuries or disabilities, and to highlight their valuable skills.[241] When sales began, enslaved people were required to line up by gender and height, separate from any family members.[242] Buyers questioned and examined them, forcing them to open their mouths to show their teeth and to undress to reveal any signs of illness, disability, disease, or scars from previous whippings (which whites saw as signs of disobedience).[243]

Enslaved people with specialized skills, such as the ability to play a musical instrument, might perform for buyers, while slave traders forced everyone to parade around and dance to show their physical well-being.[244] Women and girls often suffered the most violent inspections of their bodies. Buyers took them behind closed doors, stripped them naked, and forcibly examined their breasts and genitals to see if they would be good "breeders" and were free of sexually transmitted infections.[245]

The moment of sale was extremely painful and traumatic. Buyers purchased enslaved people based on racist stereotypes about African Americans' capabilities and skills, which were often connected to skin color, gender, and physical size.[246] Younger enslaved African American men and women, as well as teenagers, often sold at high prices as "prime" field hands to pick cotton and do other hard labor.[247] Enslaved men with specialized knowledge and skills, such as carpentry, barrel making, or driving carts, also sold for higher prices.[248] Enslavers often bought younger enslaved women to work in the cotton fields, but also valued their knowledge and skills in home-based work such as cooking, washing clothes, sewing, cleaning, and childcare.[249] Finally, elderly people and very young children usually were sold for a lot less money because white buyers viewed their labor and skills as less valuable.[250]

Some buyers specifically bought African American people that they could subject to sexual and reproductive violence.[251] The "fancy trade" was the term for selling young women and girls to white men for the purpose of constant rape and/or forced sex work in brothels.[252] Other enslavers bought young mothers (with or without their children) because a woman who had recently given birth to children showed that she was able to have more children in the future to enrich her buyer. Pregnant and breastfeeding women could be forced to nurse all the children, African American and white, on a plantation to free up other enslaved mothers for field work.[253]

All of these factors often meant that even if an enslaved family had managed to stay together up to this point, they would now face permanent separation. Solomon Northup, a free African American man from New York who was kidnapped and sold into enslavement, remembered the case of an enslaved woman named Eliza. Eliza begged to be sold with her two children, Emily, who was seven or eight years old and Randall, who was four to five years old. Slave traders sold off Randall to another buyer and refused to sell Emily to Eliza's buyer because they hoped to sell the tiny girl as a "fancy" to a wealthy enslaver when she was a little older. Northup wrote that the sale of her children was absolutely soul crushing for Eliza. She died young from the grief of losing them.[254]

Cotton and Capitalism

Enslavers were capitalists, and like all capitalists, they strived for profit maximization. They wanted to get the most work out of enslaved people by pushing them up to, but not beyond, their physical breaking point. To do this, enslavers used violence, or the threat of violence, to make the enslaved work harder and faster and to maintain a constant, carefully calculated rate of production. The result for enslaved people was a nearly endless daily round of work under the constant threat of violence.[255]

Once enslaved people were sold to the Deep South, their new enslavers subjected them to a lifetime of brutal, backbreaking work growing cotton, which was a never-ending, year-round process.[256] Enslaved people began every spring by plowing the land and planting cotton seeds. For the next several months they hoed the fields to kill grass and weeds that might damage the fragile young cotton plants.[257] Starting in August, enslaved people worked from sunup to sundown to pick cotton, sometimes working by the light of the moon to finish. They only stopped for a 10- to 15-minute meal break per day.[258] This exhausting workday did not end when the cotton picking was done. Everyone still had to cut wood, feed farm animals, and do all of the other daily tasks that kept the plantation running. Then, enslaved people went back to their cabins, made their evening meals, and cooked food to eat in the cotton fields the next day.[259]

The cotton-picking season went on for months into the winter.[260] After the cotton season ended, enslaved people harvested the corn crop, which, according to Solomon Northup, was used for "fattening hogs and feeding slaves."[261] After the corn harvest was complete, enslaved people burned all the dead corn and cotton plants and began the process of planting the next year's crops all over again.[262]

The American colonial Slave Codes created a new type of slavery that was different than the slavery which existed in pre-modern times.

- These laws enslaved babies at birth, for their entire lives, and for the entire lives of their children, and their children's children.
- These laws denied political, legal and social rights to free and enslaved Black people alike in order to more easily control enslaved people.
- These laws divided white people from Black people by making interracial marriage a crime.

Some of these laws survived well into the 20th century. The Supreme Court only declared that outlawing interracial marriage was unconstitutional in 1967.

To make sure that enslaved people worked as hard and as quickly as possible, enslavers came up with the "pushing system." The main idea behind the pushing system was that every enslaved person should farm a certain number of acres of cotton per year.[263] This number kept increasing, from five acres per enslaved person in 1805 to double that number (10 acres) by the 1850s.[264] In fact, many of today's financial accounting and scientific management practices to increase profits had their early beginnings among enslavers in the U.S. South and the Caribbean who wanted to perfect the pushing system.[265]

To make sure that the production of cotton and profits kept increasing, enslavers intensified the physical violence.[266] Frederick Douglass remembered that sleep-deprived enslaved people who accidentally slept past sunrise were whipped for lateness.[267] Solomon Northup, the free African American man kidnapped and sold into enslavement in Louisiana, remembered that enslavers followed enslaved people into the fields on horseback and whipped them if they stopped work or fell behind.[268] He also remembered that each adult was responsible for picking 200 pounds of cotton per day and that those who did not pick enough got whipped. Even picking less than one's own personal best daily weight record, or accidentally breaking a branch on a cotton plant, resulted in whipping.[269] Northup himself was whipped for failing to pick cotton fast enough when he was sick and exhausted.[270]

Enslavers also forced sexual intercourse between enslaved people—an act historian Daina Ramey Berry has called third-party rape—so that they could "breed" more children to make more money.

Southern slave codes, the state and local laws that enforced enslavement, became more severe to support the increased brutality and profitability of enslavement, especially in the Deep South. Many southern states outlawed all meetings of enslaved people—including religious observance—without supervision by white people, prohibited teaching enslaved people to read and write, and banned enslaved people from trading.[271] These laws also increased patrols, the police forces that enforced these laws.[272] Finally, new laws made it much more difficult for enslaved people to achieve their freedom by banning "manumission," voluntary emancipation by enslavers. Altogether, these developments in slave codes aimed to maintain the racial caste system by cracking down on all resistance by enslaved people and to prevent them from ever getting their freedom.[273]

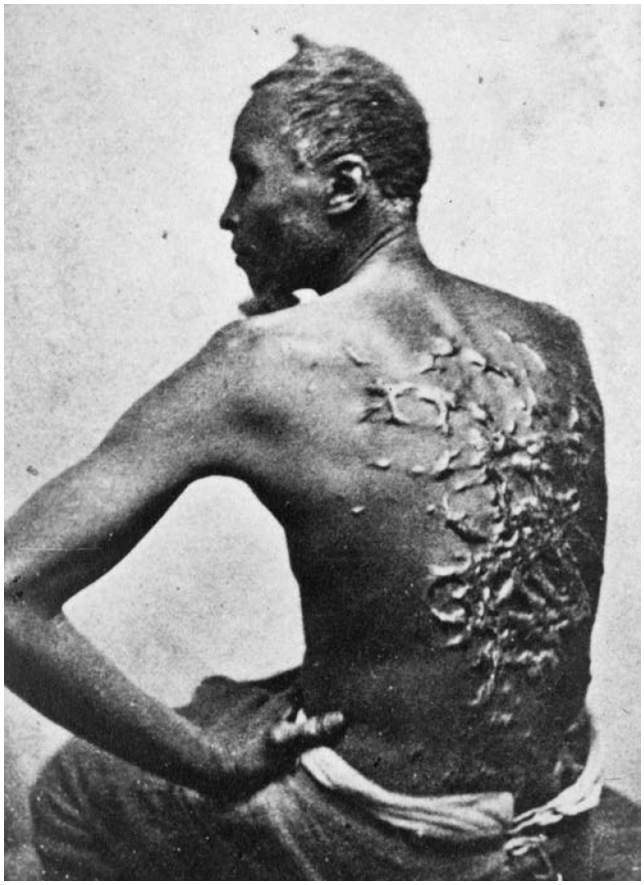
Neglect and Violence

Living conditions for enslaved people showed enslavers' inhumane, brutal emphasis on profit maximization. Most of the enslaved lived in small, poorly built cabins. Gaps between the log walls were so big that the wind and rain constantly blew in.[274] Furniture was either rare or non-existent. Solomon Northup's bed "was a plank [of wood] twelve inches wide and ten feet long."[275]

Frederick Douglass reported that enslaved people on the Maryland tobacco plantation where he was born had no beds at all; they slept on the cold dirt floor with only a rough blanket.[276] On the coldest nights, the young Douglass would steal a sack used for carrying corn and sleep inside it with his head inside and his feet hanging out. Years later, when he wrote about his life, he remembered that "[m]y feet have been so cracked with the frost, that the pen with which I am writing might be laid in the gashes."[277]

Besides cold, one of the greatest things Douglass suffered was hunger. Douglass's enslaver fed enslaved children mashed-up boiled corn in a trough on the ground. The children were then forced to eat "like so many pigs" and "[h]e that ate fastest got most."[278] Solomon Northup remembered a similar lack of food on the Louisiana plantation where he lived for 10 years. Each person received only three and a half pounds of bacon and a peck of corn (about eight dry quarts) per week.[279]

COURTESY OF LIBRARY OF CONGRESS



Formerly enslaved person named Gordon, also known as "Whipped Peter," showing his scarred back at a medical examination, Baton Rouge, Louisiana. (1863)

Enslaved people, particularly women and girls, also suffered sexual and reproductive violence. Enslavers frequently raped and impregnated enslaved women and girls and increased their profits by doing so.[280] Frederick Douglass pointed out that since children born to enslaved women were automatically enslaved at birth, enslavers often owned and sold their own children as property.[281] Additionally, Douglass remembered that white women often harassed enslaved victims of rape and their mixed-race children by insisting on their sale or punishing them even more cruelly than other enslaved people.[282]

Enslavers also forced sexual intercourse between enslaved people—an act historian Daina Ramey Berry has called third-party rape—so that they could "breed" more children to make more money.[283] Frederick Douglass remembered that a poor white farmer named Edward Covey owned only one enslaved woman named Caroline and had to rent additional enslaved people from others (a practice called hiring out). To increase his own wealth, Covey forced Caroline and one of the rented enslaved men, who was already married, to have sex. Not long after, Caroline gave birth to twins. Douglass remembered that "[t]he children were regarded as being quite an addition to his wealth." Sexual violence tripled Covey's wealth—from one to three enslaved people—within just one year.[284]

Finally, enslavers also used the bodies of enslaved people, living and deceased, for medical and scientific experimentation. For an in-depth discussion of medical experimentation on enslaved people and African Americans throughout U.S. history, please see Chapter 12, Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect.

Enslaved Communities and Cultures: Resilience, Resistance, and Rebellion

Enslaved people of African descent defied enslavers' efforts to dehumanize them by creating resilient families and communities, vibrant cultures, and distinctive religious and intellectual traditions. Family ties, community ties, cultural practices, and religious traditions ensured African American survival. They were the foundation of African American resistance to enslavement and the struggle for human rights both before emancipation and long afterward.

Family life was the building block of enslaved life in the American South.[285] Although enslaved families were always in danger of being broken apart by sale, enslaved people built strong extended family ties and fought to preserve these relationships.[286] Husbands and wives struggled to have enslavers recognize their marriage ties by claiming their right to live together in their own private cabins, or to visit spouses who lived on different plantations.[287] Enslaved parents chose their children's names to honor their own family ties, not according to the will of their enslavers, and frequently named children after grandparents, aunts, uncles, and cousins.[288] Enslaved people often chose their own last names, even if enslavers refused to recognize them, and they passed down their skills to their children.[289] Enslaved people also rebelled against the sale of their family members, sometimes by fleeing to see their relatives on distant plantations.[290]

Family life was the building block of enslaved life in the American South. Although enslaved families were always in danger of being broken apart by sale, enslaved people built strong extended family ties and fought to preserve these relationships.

Enslaved people built close communities bound together by blood, marriage, and adoptive family ties. On larger plantations, multiple extended family groups lived in the same "slave quarters" and were often linked to each other through marriages or adoptive kin relations.[291] For instance, Frederick Douglass remembered that the enslaved children on the Maryland plantation where he was born referred to older enslaved men as their uncles, demonstrating both their respect for their elders and the close family-like relationships that grew between community members unrelated by blood.[292] These close ties can best be seen in cases of young enslaved children orphaned by the sale or death of their parents: extended family members and non-kin alike frequently raised these children along with their own children.[293]

Close-knit families and communities ensured that cultural practices, language, and oral histories were passed down to the next generation. "Slave quarters," the clusters of cabins where the enslaved lived, were often distant from the "big house" of the enslavers and allowed the enslaved some privacy to pray, dance, sing, tell stories, rest, and tend to their homes.[294] The lively cultural spaces that enslaved people created for themselves allowed for the persistence of elements of African language, music, medicine, and storytelling in African American culture across generations.[295]

Religious life was often the heart of family and community experience for enslaved people, creating spaces for freedom of expression, cultural resilience, and resistance. Enslaved people who were stolen from Africa continued the spiritual practices of their homelands, whether indigenous West African religions or Islam.[296] Over time, enslaved communities fused elements of African religious practice—including song, dance, call and response, and healing practices—with Protestant Christianity.[297] They created a distinctive American religious culture that taught a message of liberation, a "gospel of freedom."[298] Enslaved preachers emphasized freedom from enslavement, both in the afterlife and on earth. They focused on Biblical liberation stories, such as Moses leading the Israelites out of bondage in Egypt, as well as stories that emphasized the power of the weak to defeat the mighty, such as David and Goliath. [299]

Enslavers tried to suppress this religious expression by prohibiting religious gatherings or by emphasizing parts of the Bible that said that "servants" should obey their "masters."[300] Still, enslaved people resisted these efforts by meeting in secret to worship.[301] As a formerly enslaved woman named Alice Sewell remembered, "We used to slip off in the woods in the old slave days on Sunday evening way down in the swamps to sing and pray to our own liking. We prayed for this day of freedom. We come from four and five miles to pray together to God that if we didn't live to see it, to please let our children live to see a better day and be free."[302]

As Alice Sewell's memory shows, religious and community life became a foundation for enslaved people's resistance to the brutal and dehumanizing conditions of their enslavement. In some cases, religious and community ties catalyzed outright rebellions against enslavement. The alleged Denmark Vesey conspiracy in Charleston, South Carolina in 1822, and the Nat Turner rebellion in Southampton County, Virginia in 1831, developed among communities of free and enslaved African Americans who believed strongly in the gospel of freedom.[303] Most often, though, enslaved communities, cultures, and spiritual beliefs made possible smaller forms of everyday resistance that pushed back against the relentless work and violence of enslavement. Enslaved people slowed down work, broke tools, or temporarily escaped to avoid abuse or brutal working conditions.[304] Everyday resistance forced enslavers to recognize enslaved people's humanity and showed their deep longings to be free.

Ultimately, enslaved people in the United States created a distinctive American Black culture that was different from ancestral African cultures, white European cultures, or African-diaspora cultures elsewhere in the world. Distinctive African American artistic expression—especially music and dance—literary and linguistic styles, and culinary innovations, among many other practices, would shape mainstream American culture across centuries.

For a detailed discussion of African American cultural and artistic impact on the United States, see Chapter 9, Control over Spiritual, Creative and Cultural Life.

V. Northern Complicity in Enslavement

White New Englanders, the Slave Trade, and the Textile Industry

Although enslavement itself was disappearing in the North, white northerners' participation in enslavement grew along with the southern cotton economy. White people in New England, for instance, profited from the transatlantic traffic in enslaved Africans, rum manufacturing, and cotton textile production.

Cotton grown by enslaved people in the South fed mills employing thousands of people across New England. By the time of the Civil War in 1861, New Englanders had invested more than $69 million in cotton fabric production and operated 570 separate mills. Over 81,000 Americans worked in the New England textile mills and the total profits amounted to over $79 million dollars per year.

White northerners had been involved in the transatlantic trafficking of enslaved people for a long time as shipping company owners, slave ship captains, and slave traders. For example, businessmen from the northern state of Rhode Island controlled most of the trade in captive human beings.[305] Slaving ships from Rhode Island brought rum to the coast of West Africa and traded barrels of the liquor for enslaved people, who they trafficked to North America.[306] Around 24 rum distilleries in the town of Newport, Rhode Island, fed this profitable trade.[307] By the time of the American Revolution, these Rhode Island merchants controlled two-thirds of the entire transatlantic slave trade in the Thirteen Colonies and they held onto this control after U.S. independence.[308] When added together, white Rhode Islanders were responsible for bringing 100,000 enslaved Africans to North America.[309]

Fifty thousand of these enslaved people were captives whom Rhode Island enslavers rushed to bring into the United States before Congress outlawed participation in the transatlantic trafficking of enslaved people in 1808.[310]

At the same time, textile mills, the factories which processed southern cotton into cloth, were the basis of early northern industrial growth.[311] Cotton grown by enslaved people in the U.S. South fed these mills and the mills employed thousands of people across New England.[312] By the time of the Civil War in 1861, New Englanders had invested more than $69 million in cotton fabric production and operated 570 separate mills.[313] Over 81,000 Americans worked in the New England textile mills and the total profits amounted to over $79 million dollars per year.[314]

In 2005, JP Morgan Chase, the banking giant, wrote a formal apology because two banks that it now owned had taken 13,000 enslaved people as security for loans in the state of Louisiana. When enslavers could not pay back the loans, the banks ended up taking ownership of 1,250 of these people.

Slavery and the Economic Power of New York City

New York City is a strong example of how northerners participated in and profited from enslavement. Captive Africans, enslaved by the Dutch West Indian Company, were part of the labor force that constructed the early walled street that eventually became Wall Street, the economic center of the United States.[315] Later, the street became the city's first slave market. City leaders decided in 1711 that whites who wanted to rent out enslaved African American or Native American people could only do so at the end of Wall Street next to the East River.[316]

Enslaved people became less and less common in the city after the state of New York passed a law in 1799 that gradually freed children born to enslaved mothers, and then outlawed enslavement completely in 1817.[317] But as enslavement itself was dying out, white New Yorkers were building strong economic ties to southern enslavement that brought millions of dollars in profit every year. New York City was the main destination of southern cotton and the center of the transatlantic cotton trade.[318] New York-based shipping companies gathered the cotton in southern cities and took it north to New York City where merchants packed it and shipped it to Europe.[319]

New York City was also the banking center of the United States and New York banks helped finance the expansion of enslavement in the South. Banks loaned money to enslavers to buy more land and more enslaved people.[320] Banks also accepted enslaved people as security for these loans, which meant that they could take and sell enslaved people if their enslavers failed to pay back their debts. For example, in 2005, JP Morgan Chase, the banking giant, wrote a formal apology because two banks that it now owned had taken 13,000 enslaved people as security for loans in the state of Louisiana. When enslavers could not pay back the loans, the banks ended up taking ownership of 1,250 of these people, and then most probably sold them.[321]

New York City was also strongly connected to southern enslavement through the insurance industry. Insurance companies insured the lives of enslaved, and paid enslavers if an enslaved person died.[322] Some insurance companies also insured shipments of trafficked enslaved people sold within the United States.[323] Some of these companies were the early ancestors of today's most important insurance companies, including New York Life, US Life, and Aetna.[324] American insurance companies' investment and complicity in enslavement was so widespread that the California government required all insurers who did business in the state to make their records of participation in enslavement open to the public.[325]

Corporate Manufacturing Profits

A variety of New York businesses also profited from processing and manufacturing agricultural products grown by enslaved people into goods for consumers to buy. Brooks Brothers, still a well-known New York City clothing company, made money from enslavement in multiple ways. The company made fashionable, expensive clothing woven from southern cotton grown by enslaved people.[326] It also profited from making cheap clothing that enslavers bought to dress enslaved people.[327]

At the same time, sugar refineries, factories which processed raw sugar into a usable form, became a major New York industry, especially in the borough of Brooklyn. These factories processed thousands of pounds of raw sugar grown by enslaved people in Louisiana and Cuba.

By 1855, fifteen New York City refineries were producing over $12 million of sugar per year.[328]

The profits of sugar refining can still be seen in New York City today. Columbia University's Havemeyer Hall was funded by and named after one of the city's most important sugar refining families from the 1800s whose business relied on sugar grown by enslaved people.[329] The Havemeyer family built what was once the largest sugar refining factory in the world, the Domino Sugar Refinery, which still stands beside East River in Brooklyn.[330] Although the Brooklyn location is no longer running, the Domino Sugar brand, now owned by the ASR Group, continues to be processed in factories in New York, Maryland, and Louisiana.[331]

The legacies of enslavement in the sugar industry continue in the present-day. After the Civil War and the end of enslavement, southern states such as Texas and Louisiana rented out imprisoned African Americans to white sugarcane farmers. Many died in the brutal sugar production process.[332] The Louisiana State Penitentiary at Angola and the Texas State Penitentiary at Sugar Land also supported themselves, and profited these state governments, by growing and processing sugar cane on prison grounds.[333] Incarcerated individuals at Angola continued to process sugar to sell in the prison gift shop as recently as 2014.[334]

VI. Slavery and American Institutions

Historically White Universities and Religious Organizations

A wide range of U.S. colleges and universities, both private and public, profited from enslavement or ties to enslavers, while at the same time denying admission to African Americans for most of the nation's history. Almost all Ivy League universities and colleges can be included in this category.

Harvard University Law School was created in 1817 and funded largely by land donations from a wealthy merchant named Isaac Royall, Jr. Royall, who was the son of a human trafficker in enslaved people, owned multiple sugar plantations in the Caribbean and Latin America that were worked by enslaved people.[335] Other early Harvard donors made their money by trading enslaved people or goods produced by enslaved people in the Caribbean; smuggling enslaved Africans into the United States after Congress banned American participation in the transatlantic slave trade in 1808; or running textile mills fed by southern cotton.[336]

The wealth of Brown University (formerly known as the College of Rhode Island) was greatly tied to the human trafficking activities of its home state, Rhode Island. Members of the Brown family, early donors after whom the university is named, owned enslaved people and participated in the transatlantic slave trade.[337] University Hall, the oldest building on the Brown University campus, was partially built by enslaved people and made of wood donated by one of the state's largest slave trading companies.[338] South Carolina slave traffickers and enslavers also gave money to help fund the college.[339]

Other Ivy League schools have similar connections to enslavement. The University of Pennsylvania,[340] Princeton University,[341] Columbia University,[342] Yale University,[343] and Dartmouth College[344] count enslavers, slave traffickers, and/or proslavery defenders among their early donors, founders, trustees, administrators, building namesakes, faculty, students, and alumni.

Enslavement was also strongly linked to religious life and religious organizations in colonial America and the early United States. Some churches and religious colleges owned, bought, and sold enslaved people.[345] In the southern enslaving states, some churches raised money to buy enslaved people. Anglican and Episcopalian churches in Virginia during the 1600s and 1700s attracted new ministers by allowing them use of church-owned enslaved people.[346] Some wealthy churchgoers donated enslaved people to churches so that the profits of their labor could be used to fund free schools for poor white children.[347] In the 1700s and 1800s, many Virginia Presbyterian churches hired out enslaved people so that they could use the profits to pay ministers and fund church upkeep.[348]

Colleges with religious missions also owned and profited from enslaved people. Virginia's College of William and Mary, which was originally an Anglican college to train new ministers, started owning enslaved people by around 1704.[349] Enslaved people worked in the college's kitchens, dormitories, laundries, stables, and gardens, or on the college-owned tobacco plantation to raise money for student scholarships.[350] Although the college sold off many enslaved people during the American Revolution to pay off its debts, tearing them away from their families and communities,[351] enslavement continued on the William and Mary campus until during the Civil War.[352]

Some colleges run by the Society of Jesus, a Catholic religious group better-known as the Jesuits, also depended on the lives and labor of the enslaved. The Jesuits who operated Georgetown College (now Georgetown University) owned plantations and hundreds of enslaved people.[353] The profits of these plantations funded the school.[354] In 1838, when the college was struggling due to a lack of funding, Jesuits sold 272 enslaved African American people to Deep South plantations so that they could pay off the school's debts.[355] Even though Jesuit leaders in Rome required that the enslaved people be kept together as families and given Catholic religious education in their new homes,[356] buyers in Louisiana failed to keep these promises.[357] Altogether, the mass sale of elders, men, women, children, and infants raised $115,000 (equal to around $3.3 million in 2016) to fund Georgetown College/University.[358]

In the southern enslaving states, some churches raised money to buy enslaved people. Anglican and Episcopalian churches in Virginia during the 1600s and 1700s attracted new ministers by allowing them use of church-owned enslaved people. Some wealthy churchgoers donated enslaved people to churches so that the profits of their labor could be used to fund free schools for poor white children. In the 1700s and 1800s, many Virginia Presbyterian churches hired out enslaved people so that they could use the profits to pay ministers and fund church upkeep.

Direct Federal Government Investment and Participation

Finally, the federal government directly invested in, protected, and profited from the enslavement of African Americans. The early U.S. national banking system played an important role in funding the expansion of cotton growing and the interstate slave trade. For example, in the years 1831 to 1832, the Second Bank of the United States, the private bank that the United States used to handle all of the federal government's banking needs, gave five percent of all its loans to just one slave trading company in New Orleans.[359] By 1861, just under two percent of the entire budget of the United States went to pay for expenses related to enslavement.[360] These expenses included dealing with the illegal transatlantic slave trade;[361] colonization projects to remove formerly enslaved people from the United States and settle them in other parts of the world;[362] enforcing fugitive slave laws;[363] and renting enslaved people to build federal military sites in the South.[364]

The U.S. federal government also actively participated in upholding enslavement because it directly controlled the nation's capital at Washington, D.C. The District of Columbia was formed from lands that once belonged to the two enslaving states of Maryland and Virginia. As a result of this, Washington, D.C. had to carry over the laws of those two states, including laws supporting enslavement.[365] U.S. courts in Washington, D.C., took direct responsibility for punishing enslaved people and deciding cases involving the buying, selling, and inheritance of enslaved people.[366] Since there were no laws against moving enslaved people through D.C., and because D.C. was centrally located in the Upper South, the area also became an important location in the interstate slave trade.[367] Slave traffickers gathered and imprisoned enslaved people in D.C. "slave pens" where they waited to be moved to the Deep South and sold.[368] Solomon Northup, a free African American man who was kidnapped and sold into enslavement in 1841, remembered that he waited to be sold south in a "slave pen within the very shadow of the Capitol!"[369] That U.S. capitol building,[370] along with another major national landmark and symbol of democracy, the White House, was partially built by the labor of enslaved people.[371]

VII. Enslavement in California

Slavery's Expansion into the West

Even though large numbers of white northerners profited from the labor of enslaved people, many also began to worry about the place of enslavement in the nation's future and to question whether it should be allowed to expand west into new American territories. Some of this new concern sprung from the abolitionist movement, a northern interracial movement of African American and white antislavery activists who pushed to end enslavement immediately.[372] Across the 1830s and 1850s,

American abolitionists published thousands of texts, and gave thousands of speeches, to convince their fellow citizens that enslavement was wrong and against the will of god.[373] They also helped thousands of freedom seekers escape enslavement via a secret network called the Underground Railroad.[374]

While most white northerners disapproved of abolitionism and worried that it would tear the North and South apart, the high-profile nature of the movement and the actions of freedom seekers raised new opposition to enslavement moving west. Most white northerners' opposition to the westward expansion of enslavement was based on self-interest. They argued that new western territories should be "free soil" so that free white people could have access to inexpensive farmland and opportunities to build wealth without having to compete with wealthy enslavers and enslaved people.[375] Keeping slavery out of the West became a major goal for a growing number of northerners and it put them into conflict with proslavery southerners who wanted enslavement to keep growing westward and to create new enslaving states.[376]

The conflict over the westward expansion of enslavement caused bitter political battles and violence in the years leading up to the Civil War.[377] In the 1840s, some northerners opposed allowing Texas, an independent enslaving nation that had broken off from Mexico, to join the United States. They worried that Texas would add an enormous amount of new territory for enslavement to grow.[378] When the United States declared war on Mexico in 1846 over conflicts related to Texas, many northerners supported the idea of outlawing enslavement in any new lands that the United States might take away from Mexico.[379] In 1848, the U.S. did force Mexico to give up a massive territory that included today's states of California, New Mexico, Nevada, and Utah, as well as parts of present-day Arizona, Wyoming, and Colorado.[380]

By 1861, just under two percent of the entire budget of the United States went to pay for expenses related to enslavement. These expenses included dealing with the illegal transatlantic slave trade; colonization projects to remove formerly enslaved people from the United States and settle them in other parts of the world; enforcing fugitive slave laws; and renting enslaved people to build federal military sites in the South.

A political crisis grew over whether enslavement should be allowed into these new territories or closed out forever. This crisis intensified when thousands of people rushed to California after the discovery of gold in the state and to set up a new state government with a constitution that outlawed enslavement.[381]

Northern and southern politicians in Congress tried to hold the country together by passing a set of laws called the Compromise of 1850. Together, these laws said that California could join the U.S. as a free state and that the residents of New Mexico and Utah territories could decide for themselves whether they wanted to allow enslavement.[382]

The Compromise of 1850 also gave other important concessions to both the opponents and defenders of enslavement. It ended the slave trade in Washington, D.C.[383] It also included a harsher fugitive slave law that gave enslavers greater federal aid in chasing down enslaved people who escaped to the free states, limited freedom seekers' ability to defend themselves in court, and harshly punished people who helped freedom seekers or people who refused to participate in enforcing the law.[384]

This fugitive slave law further divided white northerners and white southerners. Northerners hated the new law for forcing them to participate in enslavement.[385] Southerners viewed northern opposition to the law as a refusal to enforce the U.S. Constitution.[386] Eventually, this conflict spread all the way to California where proslavery southerners and antislavery northerners fought over what should happen to enslaved people who escaped their enslavement once they got to the free state.[387]

Enslavers and the Enslaved in the California Gold Rush

While people in northern and southern states fought over whether enslavement should be allowed to expand west, enslavement already had moved to California. Even though California was supposed to be a free state with an antislavery constitution,[388] enslavement existed in the state.[389] More importantly, California's early state government protected the institution of enslavement and greatly limited African Americans' civil rights.[390]

The enslavement of African Americans had already started in California before the state adopted an antislavery constitution in 1849. California had been part of Mexico before the United States took it in the U.S.-Mexico War of 1846 to 1848. Mexico had already outlawed enslavement in 1829,[391] but American enslavers began trafficking enslaved African Americans into California before, during, and after the U.S.-Mexico War, especially once the gold rush began in 1848.[392]

A gold rush source estimated that 1,500 enslaved African Americans lived in California in 1852.

The exact number of enslaved African descended people in California is difficult to estimate. Federal and state census records, which counted the number of people in California, show around 203 enslaved African descended people living in the state in 1850 and around 178 in 1852.[393] These are probably undercounts because early census records are very incomplete.[394] These incomplete records, though, do show support for the findings of historian Rudolph Lapp who estimated that at least 500 to 600 enslaved African Americans lived and worked in California during the gold rush.[395] But these numbers may be even higher because another gold rush source estimated that 1,500 enslaved African Americans lived in California in 1852.[396]

Each of these enslaved people suffered traumatic uprooting from their homes and families. Going to California meant a forced separation from family, friends, and community by a distance of thousands of miles.[397] Even though enslavers thought of the move to California as only temporary, most gold seekers spent at least two years in California—and usually many more—due to the distance and difficulty of traveling between the East and West Coast.[398] For example, an enslaved North Carolina man, known only as John, arrived in California with slaveholder Robert M. Dickson in 1852 and stayed at least three years, until Dickson suddenly died in 1855.[399] We do not know how long John remained in California or whether he ever returned to North Carolina. His journey to California may have resulted in permanent separation from his family.

Like John, more than 75 percent of the enslaved people trafficked to California were younger men or teenaged boys who ended up working as gold miners.[400] These enslaved miners faced backbreaking and often dangerous working conditions. Placer mining, the most common type of mining in the earliest days of the California gold rush, involved digging up soil from the beds and banks of rivers and creeks. Sometimes, miners dammed up these bodies of water to get at soil deep in the beds. These practices often required standing knee- or waist-deep in cold water for several hours each day in the broiling summer heat.[401]

Overwork, exposure to bad weather, unclean working and living environments, a lack of nutritious food, and the absence of medical care often resulted in long-term illnesses or death by disease.[402] For instance, several enslaved men from western North Carolina died from cholera, a disease caused by contaminated food or water, along with their enslaver, in Tuolumne County in 1852.[403] Accidents and injury were also common, as seen in the life of an enslaved man from Kentucky, known only as Rheubin. He drowned in the American River while working in a mining area in 1851.[404]

COURTESY OF PHOTO12/UNIVERSAL IMAGES GROUP VIA GETTY IMAGES

Enslaved people working in California Gold Mines. (1852)

Not all enslaved people worked directly in mining. Women and girls, who made up less than one quarter of all recorded enslaved people in California,[405] often worked as servants, cooks, or laundry workers in private homes, hotels, restaurants, or boarding houses.[406] People with these skills were so scarce, and their work was so valuable, that enslavers often hired out both enslaved women and men as servants. Enslavers then pocketed all or most of the enslaved people's wages from their rented labor.[407]

Violence Against the Enslaved and Resistance to Enslavement in California

Much like enslaved people in the South, those in California also faced brutal violence. In 1850, one slaveholder beat an enslaved man in the town square of San Jose for disobeying him. The police arrested both men, but ultimately determined that the slaveholder was not guilty of assault because his victim was legally his property.[408]

In another case from 1850, an elderly enslaved couple ran away near the town of Sonora. When the slaveholder caught them, he whipped the elderly man until his blood flowed so heavily that it filled his shoes. The couple later escaped with the help of a free African American neighbor.[409] One of the worst violent events also happened in 1850, this time in Los Angeles. A group of white southerners chased, shot at, and captured a handful of escaped enslaved people and then beat them until one almost died.[410]

In another case from 1850, an elderly enslaved couple ran away near the town of Sonora. When the slaveholder caught them, he whipped the elderly man until his blood flowed so heavily that it filled his shoes. The couple later escaped with the help of a free Black neighbor.

The forced journey to California had different outcomes for the enslaved people who survived it. Many people probably worked in California for a few years before returning to enslavement in the South. Others, especially those who were allowed to keep a small portion of their wages from hiring out or digging gold, saved enough money to buy their freedom.[411] Finally, some enslaved people worked under formal or informal "indenture" agreements by which they promised to work for a certain number of years in California, or to earn a certain amount of money, in exchange for their freedom.[412] Enslaved people who bought their own freedom might then also earn enough money to free their family members.[413]

Large numbers of enslaved people also saw California as a place where they could take their own freedom or challenge their enslavement. The California gold mining country was large, rural, and full of diverse people, including antislavery African American and white Northerners. It was much easier to run away, hide, and find allies in California than in the Southern enslaving states.[414] But it is important to remember that all enslaved people who went west were forced to leave their family members and communities behind in the South. For this reason, escape was not a good option for many enslaved people because staying with enslavers was their only way to keep in touch with their families.

In this way, enslavers used their control over enslaved people's family members to force them to cooperate. For this reason, enslaved people may have been more likely to resist in other ways besides running away. For example, some refused to work or escaped temporarily until they were allowed to keep more of their earnings.[415] This might have been a safer path to freedom than running away if they could earn enough money to buy themselves and their family members out of enslavement.

California Legislature's Complicity

California's 1849 antislavery state constitution did little to stop the violence and exploitation that enslaved people suffered. The new constitution said that "neither slavery, nor involuntary servitude, unless for the punishment of crimes, shall ever be tolerated in this State."[416]

The problem was that enslavement already existed in the state and was already being tolerated there. The constitution also said nothing about what should happen to those enslaved people who already lived in California or those who came after statehood. The California constitution could say that the state would not tolerate enslavement, but this statement did not mean much without laws making it a crime to keep someone enslaved, laws to free enslaved people, laws to punish enslavers, or laws to protect African Americans' freedom.[417]

Proslavery white southerners took advantage of this lack of specific laws against enslavement to keep enslavement going in California. During California's 1849 Constitutional Convention, a meeting to write the state's first constitution, proslavery politicians from the South quietly accepted the law banning enslavement.[418] But after statehood, a large number of southern proslavery men ran for political office in California so that they were overrepresented in the state government compared to their overall population in California. White southerners with proslavery views had a great deal of power in the state legislature, the state court system, and among California's representatives in the U.S. Congress.[419] During the 1850s, these men used their political power to make sure that California protected enslavers. They passed and upheld laws that skirted around the antislavery constitution.

The California government's most proslavery action was passing and enforcing a state fugitive slave law in 1852.[420] Proslavery southerners were angry when they discovered that the federal fugitive slave law of 1850, a harsh new law to help slavecatchers chase down and re-enslave freedom seekers who escaped enslavement, did not apply to most cases in California. Enslavers could only use the federal law to chase down and re-enslave people who escaped across state lines, not those who ran away inside one state's borders.[421]

In 1852, the California state legislature dealt with this issue by changing the definition of who counted as a "fugitive slave." Instead of just covering people who escaped across state lines, California's new state law said that a fugitive slave was any enslaved person who arrived before California officially became a U.S. state in September 1850 but who refused to return to the enslaving states with their enslavers. These people could be arrested, placed under the control of their enslavers, and forced to return to the South.[422]

The legal reasoning behind this law was that California's antislavery constitution did not become official until the moment of statehood. Before then, California was a federal territory controlled by the U.S. government. Proslavery southerners believed that the U.S. Constitution gave every white citizen the right to move into the federal territories and to take their property with them, including human beings who were considered property. For this reason, the law's supporters argued that the state of California had no choice except to help enslavers capture any enslaved person who they had brought in before official statehood in late 1850.[423]

Enslaved people who went west were forced to leave their family members and communities behind in the South. For this reason, escape was not a good option for many enslaved people because staying with enslavers was their only way to keep in touch with their families.

The California legislature's decision to pass this fugitive slave law made California a much more proslavery state than most other free states. In the northeastern U.S., many free states protested the federal fugitive slave law of 1850 and tried to give African Americans more legal rights to defend their freedom against slavecatchers. California did the opposite.[424]

The California fugitive slave law of 1852 allowed enslavers to use violence to capture enslaved people. The law also required state officials to help enslavers capture and arrest enslaved people. Those who refused to help could lose their jobs and/or have to pay expensive fines. Finally, the California fugitive slave law, much like the federal fugitive slave law, said that people accused of being fugitive slaves could not testify in court to defend their rights.[425] Since California had already outlawed non-white people from testifying in any court case involving whites, free African American Californians, who were usually involved in helping people escape from enslavement, could not be witnesses in any of these cases either.[426]

Instead of just covering people who escaped across state lines, California's law said that a fugitive slave was any enslaved person who arrived before California officially became a U.S. state in September 1850 but who refused to return to the enslaving states with their enslavers. These people could be arrested, placed under the control of their enslavers, and forced to return to the South.

California's fugitive slave law was supposed to be a temporary one-year policy, but it ended up lasting much longer. In 1853, California legislators extended the fugitive slave law for another year.[427] They did the same thing again in 1854.[428] This meant that for three years, from 1852 to 1855, anyone accused of being a runaway from enslavement could be chased down, dragged before a court, and sent back to lifelong enslavement in the South, even if they had been living in the free state of California for five years or more.[429]

The California Court System's Complicity

California's courts, including the California Supreme Court, also participated in the enslavement of African Americans. Free African American activists, with the help of white lawyers, challenged the legality of the fugitive slave law because it went against the antislavery state constitution. They took a test case called In re Perkins all the way to the California Supreme Court in 1852.[430] The state's Supreme Court justices finally decided that three African American men—Carter Perkins, Robert Perkins, and Sandy Jones[431]—should be forced to go back into enslavement in Mississippi because they had arrived with their enslaver before official statehood.[432]

The court said that the antislavery law in the California Constitution was only a "declaration of a principle." The constitution said the state would not tolerate enslavement, but California had no laws in place to enforce it by actually setting people free.[433] The justices also agreed with the state legislature that California could not give freedom to enslaved people who arrived before official statehood. The court accepted the extreme proslavery legal view that the U.S. Constitution gave enslavers the right to bring enslaved people into the federal territories without any limits.[434] This decision came before the similar one in the much more famous case of Dred Scott v. Sandford five years later in 1857. In that historic decision, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the federal government could not outlaw enslavement in any of the federal territories.[435]

Altogether, California courts were involved in at least 10 cases, connected to the freedom of 13 people, under the state fugitive slave law between 1852 and 1855. In five of those 10 cases, the courts returned seven freedom seekers to enslavement. These numbers may seem small, but this list only includes cases that were well-known enough to make it into the newspapers, or for which court records happen to survive.[436]

The small numbers also do not accurately show the terror that all African Americans, free or enslaved, would have suffered under this law. When combined with the outlawing of African American court testimony against whites, the California fugitive slave law put every African American person at risk of being accused of running away, arrested, and enslaved without being able to defend themselves.[437]

Finally, the California fugitive slave law was important for symbolic and political reasons. In supporting the law, California's legislature and courts sent an important message: they were friendly to the southern enslaving states, they believed enslaved people should have no legal rights, and they thought that the U.S. Constitution should protect enslavers and enslavement.[438]

The California legislature finally let the state fugitive slave law expire in 1855.[439] Still, cases involving freedom seekers from enslavement continued. At least six additional cases, involving the freedom of 19 people, came before the California courts between 1855 and the official end of enslavement in 1865.[440] All of these cases—including the famous 1856 freedom case of Bridget "Biddy" Mason in Los Angeles County—eventually led to enslaved people's freedom.[441]

But in one example, the case of Archy Lee from 1857 to 1858, the proslavery California Supreme Court made every effort to return him to enslavement. Lee's enslaver, Charles Stovall, forced him to go with him to California years after the state fugitive slave law had expired. But California's supreme court justices decided that since Stovall was a young man who suffered from constant illness, and he did not know about California's laws, he should not be punished by losing his right to own Archy Lee. It took several more lawsuits by free African American Californians, and a new decision from a federal legal official, before Lee finally won permanent freedom.[442]

California's legislature and courts sent an important message: they were friendly to the southern enslaving states, they believed enslaved people should have no legal rights, and they thought that the U.S. Constitution should protect enslavers and enslavement.

California's Political Leadership and Anti-Black Oppression

During the 1850s, California's political leaders, including governors, state assemblymen, and state senators, supported other anti-Black laws. California's 1849 Constitutional Convention restricted the right to vote to white male citizens[443] and also debated (put did not pass) an exclusion law to outlaw all future African American migration to the state.[444]

Peter Burnett, California's first Governor, opposed both enslavement and the presence of African Americans, so he was angry that the new state Constitution did not have an African American exclusion law.[445] Before coming to California, Burnett had served in Oregon's provisional government and had personally helped pass a Black exclusion law, the "Lash Law," which said that African Americans who arrived in Oregon would be whipped every six months until they left.[446]

Burnett encouraged the California legislature to pass an African American exclusion law immediately.[447] He said that failing to exclude African American residents would lead to enslavers bringing more enslaved people into the state.[448] When the California Legislature failed to pass an African American exclusion law in 1850, Burnett gave another speech in 1851 demanding a law to ban African American residents.[449] This time he claimed that any free African American residents would be so poor, and so upset about not having any civil rights under California law, that they would start a race war against whites.[450] Overall, California tried to pass an African American exclusion law at least four times during the 1850s, but the state Legislature was either too politically divided to agree on a law or ran out of time before the legislative session ended.[451]

Overall, California tried to pass a Black exclusion law at least four times during the 1850s.

California legislators focused instead on limiting the rights of African Americans who were already in the state. In addition to outlawing African American court testimony in cases involving whites, the California Legislature also made interracial marriage between African American and white people illegal,[452] excluded African American people from getting homesteads (free or cheap farms) on state lands,[453] refused to offer state funding for African American children to attend public schools,[454] and would not accept petitions from African American activists who wanted to change these unjust laws.[455]

After free African American activists successfully rescued Archy Lee from enslavement in 1858, angry proslavery legislators tried to make these anti-Black laws even worse. They tried to pass another state fugitive slave law and to pass yet another African American exclusion law. Although both of these laws failed to pass before the end of the legislative session, the vicious anti-Black tone of state politics prompted many African American Californians to leave the state in search of greater freedom and equality.[456] Starting in 1858, up to 800 African American men, women, and children migrated north to the British colonies of Vancouver Island and British Columbia, in what is now Canada, where many became British subjects.[457]

VIII. The U.S. Civil War and the End of Enslavement

Political Struggles Leading up to the U.S. Civil War

Between 1850 and the start of the Civil War in 1861, the political fight over enslavement's westward expansion and African Americans' legal rights became more intense and more violent. Proslavery politicians in Congress pushed through the Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854, a law that overturned the 1820 Missouri Compromise that had outlawed enslavement in most of the Louisiana Purchase lands.[458] This meant that white settlers in the new western territories of Kansas and Nebraska territories could allow enslavement if they wanted to do so. A bloody civil war broke out in Kansas between proslavery and antislavery settlers who had rushed there to claim the new territory for their side.[459] The Kansas-Nebraska Act and "Bleeding Kansas," as this violence came to be called, shocked many northerners who opposed enslavement moving into the West. They formed a new political party, the Republican Party, which was based mostly in the North and whose main goal was stopping the westward expansion of enslavement.[460]

As northerners became more antislavery, proslavery southerners became even louder in their defense of enslavement.[461] They falsely claimed that enslavement was a gentle and humane institution, and that enslaved people got just as many benefits from the institution as white people because they received life-long care and support in exchange for their work.[462] Proslavery people also used scientific racism, the false theory that all white people were naturally smarter and more "civilized" than African descended people, to argue that enslavement was good for people of African descent because it "uplifted" them.[463]

In the late 1850s, the U.S. Supreme Court supported these false theories that African Americans were inferior to white Americans and helped open the western U.S. to enslavement. In the 1857 case of Dred Scott v. Sandford, the court decided that African Americans were not citizens of the United States and did not have any of the legal rights that white Americans had.[464] Chief Justice Roger Taney, from the enslaving state of Maryland, explained that white people had always treated African American people as slaves and that African Americans were "so far inferior, that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect."[465] In addition to denying African Americans' claims to legal rights, the court also said that the federal government had no power to close enslavement out of the western territories.[466] The U.S. Constitution allowed slaveholding southerners to take their property, including property in human beings, into the western territories.[467]

Free African Americans resisted their legal exclusion from U.S. citizenship both before and after the Dred Scott decision by claiming birthright citizenship. This was the idea that birth on U.S. soil automatically made them citizens of the United States.[468] Across the first half of the 1800s, African Americans used local courthouses and everyday interactions with state and municipal governments to establish that their U.S. birth entitled them to the title and rights of citizenship.[469] The groundwork laid by free African Americans was eventually the foundation of the Civil Rights Act of 1866, and the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which made everyone born in the United States a citizen of the United States.[470]

The conflict over enslavement's westward expansion and African Americans' rights broke out into a full civil war in 1861. Abraham Lincoln, a Republican, won the presidential election of 1860 by promising to keep enslavement from moving West into any new territories.[471] Proslavery southerners claimed Lincoln's election was proof that all northerners wanted to end enslavement, give citizenship rights to African Americans, and cause a race war in the South.[472]

Less than two months after Lincoln's election, South Carolina, an enslaving state, voted to leave the United States.[473] Over the next two months, an additional six enslaving states—Mississippi, Florida, Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, and Texas—also left the United States. They formed the Confederate States of America, also known as the Confederacy. Once war broke out in 1861, another four enslaving states—Virginia, Arkansas, North Carolina, and Tennessee—joined the Confederacy.[474] The deadliest war in U.S. history had begun.

The Civil War, and the Emancipation Proclamation

The Confederate States of America, also known as the Confederacy, fought to create a new nation built on the enslavement of people of African descent. The Confederate Constitution was based strongly on the U.S. Constitution, except that it outlawed the national government from ending enslavement[475] and it said that white people living in any new Confederate territories had the right to own enslaved people.[476]

Alexander Stephens, the Confederate Vice-President, declared that, unlike the United States, the Confederacy was not based on the notion that all men were created equal. Instead, the "cornerstone" of the Confederacy, the foundation on which it was built, was "the great truth that the negro is not equal to the white man; that slavery subordination to the superior race is his natural and normal condition."[477]

For many white southerners in the Confederacy, keeping enslavement was even more important than winning independence from the United States. When the Confederacy lacked soldiers to fight in the later years of the Civil War, Confederate military leaders, including General Robert E. Lee, supported recruiting enslaved men as soldiers. The idea was that enslaved men would fight for the Confederacy in exchange for their freedom.[478]

In the end, recruiting enslaved men as soldiers and giving freedom to those who fought for the Confederacy was very unpopular because proslavery whites feared that it would weaken enslavement and go against the enslaving states' reason for seceding.[479] For example, Howell Cobb, a Confederate general from Georgia, said that giving guns to the enslaved was a "suicidal policy" and "[t]he day you make soldiers of them is the beginning of the end of the revolution."[480]

Since many white southerners agreed with Cobb, the Confederacy did not accept the idea of freeing and arming enslaved men as soldiers until March 1865, the last month of the Civil War. The Confederacy organized a handful of enslaved men as soldiers in these very last days of the war, but none of them fought in battle.[481]

Unlike the Confederacy, the Union made freeing the enslaved and recruiting enslaved men into the military a major part of its war strategy. Even though Abraham Lincoln and many Republican politicians were not interested in freeing the enslaved at first, the actions of enslaved people pushed the United States toward ending enslavement.[482]

Enslaved people began escaping to U.S. military sites even before the war began.[483] When the United States Army began moving into the Confederacy, large numbers of refugees from enslavement—as many as 500,000 people or 12.5 percent of the entire enslaved population—sought freedom in U.S. Army camps.[484] These freedom seekers worked as wagon drivers, laundry workers, cooks, manual laborers, and nurses for the U.S. army.[485] However, not all African Americans served in the Army voluntarily, as a small number were kidnapped and forced to enlist against their will.[486]

Congress understood that these freedom seekers would play a key role in winning the war against the Confederacy. Every formerly enslaved person working for the U.S. took away resources from the South and helped the Union.[487] In 1861 and 1862, Congress passed laws called "confiscation acts," which allowed the U.S. military to give shelter and work to enslaved people who were being forced to work for the Confederacy, and, later to any enslaved person whose enslaver supported the Confederacy.[488]

Even as the United States was dismantling enslavement, the Union could not immediately or completely abolish the institution. With the secession of 11 Southern states, the number of enslaving congressmen decreased accordingly, which did give opponents of enslavement a political advantage.[489] However, more than 20 percent of the members of Congress during the Civil War remained either current or former slaveholders, mostly from the border states that had not seceded.[490]

Even as the United States was dismantling enslavement, the Union could not immediately or completely abolish the institution. More than 20 percent of the members of Congress during the Civil War remained either current or former enslavers, mostly from the border states that had not seceded.

Abraham Lincoln was also slow to use his presidential power to free enslaved people. In September 1862, Lincoln wrote a preliminary version of the Emancipation Proclamation, which freed all the enslaved people in any area still in rebellion against the United States on the first day of the new year in 1863.[491] Lincoln's preliminary proclamation also recommended transporting newly-freed African Americans out of the United States and resettling them elsewhere[492] (a scheme that Lincoln considered seriously for years until it was clear that most African Americans refused to leave the land of their birth).[493] Then, on January 1, 1863, Lincoln signed his final Emancipation Proclamation, setting enslaved people free everywhere in the Confederacy, except the parts already controlled by the U.S. Army,[494] and making no reference to removing African Americans overseas.[495] The Emancipation Proclamation also left out the enslaving Border States that had not joined the Confederacy—Maryland, Kentucky, Delaware, and Missouri—to keep them loyal to the Union.[496]

Enslaved People Tear Down Enslavement and Fight for their Freedom

Enslaved people set the Emancipation Proclamation in motion by seeking freedom by the thousands, and they also fought for their freedom on the battlefield. Congress stopped excluding African American men from the U.S. Army in 1862[497] and the Emancipation Proclamation opened the way for African American men to join the army and navy.[498] Free African Americans in Union states quickly organized military units, including the 54th Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry.[499]

But most African American Civil War soldiers were formerly enslaved men recruited in the South as part of the United States Colored Troops (USCT). Altogether, 178,000 African American men served in 175 USCT regiments.[500] Another 29,000 Black men served in the U.S. Navy.[501] By the end of the Civil War, Black servicemen made up roughly 10 percent of the entire Union military.[502] They fought in every major Union military campaign between 1864 and 1865,[503] and participated in 39 major battles and 410 smaller armed conflicts.[504] Around 40,000 of these men (around 20 percent) died during the Civil War.[505]

COURTESY OF CORBIS VIA GETTY IMAGES

The 107th U.S. Colored Infantry stand guard during the United States Civil War. (c. 1860-1865)

The federal government and the U.S. military did not treat African American soldiers equally. Black soldiers faced doing hard labor, being fed less nutritious food than white soldiers, and having less access to medical care.[506] The federal government also paid African American soldiers less than white soldiers, and African American soldiers were closed out of opportunities to lead their units as high-ranking officers because these positions were given to white men only.[507] African American soldiers' resistance to poor treatment helped fix some of these inequalities.[508] After African American soldiers protested strongly against lower pay, Congress finally began paying African American and white soldiers equally in 1864.[509] By the end of the war, 80 African American men also won their promotion to high-ranking officer positions.[510] For a further discussion the U.S. military's discriminatory treatment of African Americans, see Chapter 10, Stolen Labor and Hindered Opportunity.

By the end of the Civil War, Black servicemen made up roughly 10 percent of the entire Union military. The federal government and the U.S. military did not treat Black soldiers equally. Black soldiers faced doing hard labor, being fed less nutritious food than white soldiers, and having less access to medical care. The federal government also paid Black soldiers less than white soldiers, and Black soldiers were closed out of opportunities to lead their units as high-ranking officers because these positions were given to white men only.

These African American servicemen fought bravely to win their freedom and to claim equal rights with white Americans. Sattira A. Douglas, a Black woman whose husband, H. Ford Douglas, fought in the war, explained that Black soldiers wanted "to strike the blow that will at once relieve them of northern prejudice and southern slavery."[511] They fought courageously because they had "everything to gain in this conflict: liberty, honor, social and political position," and losing the war would result in "slavery, [and] prejudice of caste."[512]

For instance, the 54th Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, the most famous northern Black unit, and the one in which Frederick Douglass's two sons served, led a heroic attack on Fort Wagner, South Carolina in July 1863.[513] More than 40 percent of the men died or were wounded in the attack.[514] One of the survivors of Fort Wagner, Sergeant William Harvey Carney, eventually was awarded the Medal of Honor, the highest military honor in the United States, for saving the 54th Massachusetts flag from the enemy.[515] Carney was among 26 African American Civil War soldiers who earned this prestigious medal for bravery above and beyond the call of duty.[516]

African American soldiers also faced more violence on the battlefield than white soldiers. The Confederacy threatened to kill or enslave African American soldiers who Confederates captured as prisoners of war.[517] Abraham Lincoln tried to protect African American soldiers by warning the Confederacy that the Union would kill or force into hard labor one Confederate prisoner of war for every African American soldier that Confederates killed or enslaved.[518]

Still, some Confederates targeted African American servicemen with violence. In 1864, Confederates attacked a much smaller Union force of mostly African American soldiers at Fort Pillow in Tennessee. The Confederates entered the fort and killed 300 men, 200 of whom were African American.[519] Witnesses said that Confederates killed these African American soldiers instead of capturing them as prisoners of war.[520] After this massacre, it became popular for African American soldiers to shout "Remember Fort Pillow!" as they went into battle to fight for their lives and their freedom.[521]

The End of the Civil War and the Thirteenth Amendment

The United States won the Civil War against the Confederacy in 1865, effectively ending enslavement in all of the ex-Confederate states. Enslaved people in Texas, one of the very last places reached by the United States Army, did not hear that they had been legally freed until June 19, 1865.[522] This was two and a half years after the Emancipation Proclamation. Formerly enslaved African American Texans began celebrating June 19th as "Juneteenth," a day to remember their hard-fought battle for freedom.[523]

Six months later, on December 6, 1865, the required number of states finally approved the Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution outlawing enslavement and making emancipation permanent.[524] The Amendment said that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."[525] Section 2 of the Thirteenth Amendment also empowered Congress to pass "appropriate legislation" to enforce the elimination of enslavement, [526] which the U.S. Supreme Court later interpreted as the power to outlaw all "badges and incidents of slavery."[527]

IX. Reconstruction and the Lost Cause

Reconstruction Begins

After the end of the Civil War and the outlawing of enslavement, the United States went through a process known as Reconstruction, a period of rebuilding and reuniting the country.[528] Abraham Lincoln had begun this process during the Civil War.[529] But Lincoln's assassination in April 1865 put Reconstruction in the hands of his vice-president, Andrew Johnson, and Republicans in Congress.[530]

President Johnson was a former Democrat from Tennessee who remained loyal to the Union. He disapproved of the Confederacy and wanted to punish wealthy enslavers who participated in it.[531] But he also wanted to keep white people in charge of the South and opposed giving equal political rights to African Americans.[532] As Johnson wrote in an 1868 letter to the governor of Missouri: "This is a country for white men, and by God, as long as I am President; it shall be a government for white men."[533]

Johnson fought with Republicans in Congress over the direction of Reconstruction and African Americans' civil rights, which eventually led to Johnson's impeachment.[534] Congressional Republicans took over the process of Reconstruction and passed new laws aimed at giving formerly enslaved people basic legal rights.[535]

Congressional Republicans had several overlapping goals: re-growing the southern cotton economy, rebuilding the ex-Confederate states' governments before allowing them to come back fully into the United States, and making sure that formerly enslaved people could no longer be held in enslavement.[536] Some of the most progressive Republicans (known as Radical Republicans) wanted to completely change social, economic, and political life in the South to support African American equality.[537] But moderate and conservative Republicans mostly focused on laws that would give African Americans basic legal and economic rights such as making contracts to work and getting paid for their work.[538]

In every ex-confederate state, white southerners passed laws called the Black Codes. Examples include:

- Vagrancy laws that allowed police to arrest any Black person without an employer and force them to work
- Laws that forced Black parents to give control over their children to their former enslavers.
- Laws that did not allow African Americans to change employers without permission

The formerly enslaved and former enslavers in the South had their own goals. Formerly enslaved people wanted more than just basic legal rights. They wanted to be independent, out of the control of their former enslavers, and to own small farms where they could work for themselves.[539] They wanted to educate themselves and their children.[540] They wanted the ability to move around in search of family members sold away during enslavement.[541] Finally, they wanted political rights such as the right to vote and hold office.[542]

Former enslavers refused to acknowledge African Americans' new freedom. In every ex-Confederate state, white southerners passed laws called "Black Codes."[543] Black Codes included vagrancy laws that allowed police to arrest any Black person without an employer and force them to work. Black Codes in some states also forced Black parents to give control over their children to their former enslavers. State courts generally punished African Americans more harshly than white Americans charged with the same crimes.[544]

Republicans in Congress would have to force former enslavers in the South to treat the formerly enslaved fairly, equally, and with basic human dignity. Republicans briefly considered passing laws that would take away land from wealthy Confederates and give it to formerly enslaved people so that they could support themselves as independent farmers.[545]

Immediately before the end of the Civil War, Congress created the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands to provide for the welfare of formerly enslaved African Americans, including through

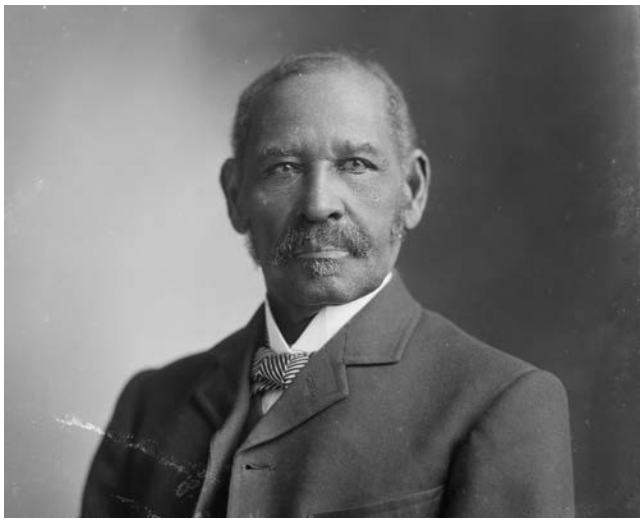
"issues of provisions, clothing, and fuel, as [necessary] for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen and their wives and children," according to the statute.[546] Commonly known as the Freedmen's Bureau, the agency had the authority to supervise labor relations in the South, with the mandate to provide education, medical care, and legal protections for formerly enslaved African Americans, along with the authority to rent out and eventually sell allotments of abandoned or confiscated land to free African Americans.[547]

The original goal of the Freedmen's Bureau Act was the more radical notion of allowing African Americans the means to become self-sufficient.[548] In the closing days of the Civil War, Union General William Tecumseh Sherman issued Special Field Order No. 15, setting aside 400,000 acres of confiscated land for those who had been freed, and two months later, the Freedman Bureau's Act formalized the field order, "providing that each negro might have forty acres at a low price on long credit."[549] Many free African Americans and northern Republicans believed that land reform in the South—granting formerly enslaved African Americans access to their own land—was the true way that formerly enslaved people would be free from their enslavers.[550] The resulting independent African American farmers would provide a power base for a new social and political order in the postwar South.[551]

This new vision of social relations in the South was opposed by white southerners as well as northerners who opposed enslavement but did not believe in full equality for African Americans.[552] Most white Americans, even in the North, thought these policies were too "radical" because they took away ex-Confederates' individual property rights and set a dangerous precedent that wealth could be redistributed to poorer members of society.[553] Moreover, a large number of African American landowners would threaten plantations and disrupt the southern economy and social system.[554] White capitalists in the North and South believed that African American freedom should mean African American workers continuing to work on a plantation, although they would now be paid.[555] They did not believe that African Americans should be able to support themselves independently through subsistence farming, which would have led to less cotton being grown and posed a threat to the interests of cotton merchants and other capitalists in the South, elsewhere in the United States, and in Europe.[556] In less than a full harvest season, the land that Sherman had given to freed persons was returned to the prior owners.[557]

Although the Freedmen's Bureau tried to assert and protect the rights of the formerly enslaved, it also perpetuated racist stereotypes, paternalistic attitudes, and continued to limit African Americans' economic and social power. Bureau agents often viewed formerly enslaved African Americans as children, unprepared for freedom, and needing to be taught the importance of work and wages.[558] The Freedmen's Bureau abandoned the possibility of land reform in the South, and focused mostly on labor relations between African American and white southerners instead.[559]

COURTESY OF LIBRARY OF CONGRESS



"Gibbs, Judge M.W." Judge Mifflin Wistar Gibbs (1823-1915) was a prominent civil rights and entrepreneur in San Francisco who fought against California's anti-black laws. (c. 1901-1903)

Republicans' other major Reconstruction policies focused on making sure that formerly enslaved African American Southerners had access to basic civil rights, such as rights to make contracts, own property, keep their families together, have physical safety, and be treated fairly by the courts and the criminal justice system.[560] In 1866, Congress passed a civil rights act that made anyone born in the United States a citizen, without regard to their race, color, or previous enslavement.[561] Newly freed African American citizens were supposed to have the same equality under the law "as is enjoyed by white citizens."[562]

Republicans feared that a federal law like the Civil Rights Act of 1866 could be overturned easily if another political party came into power. They pushed for a constitutional amendment that would make African American citizenship and civil rights permanent.[563]

The Fourteenth Amendment, approved by Congress in 1866 and ratified by the required number of states in 1868, said that any person born in the United States was a citizen (birthright citizenship); that state governments could not take away the life, liberty, or property of any person (citizen or non-citizen) without due process of law (following standard legal procedures); and that the states had to treat every person equally under the law.[564] African American activists had finally won their decades-long battle for birthright citizenship, and all people born in the United States now benefitted from their work.[565]

Congress soon decided that formerly enslaved people's legal and economic rights could not be protected unless African Americans had political rights, specifically rights to vote and hold office.[566] The Fifteenth Amendment, approved by Congress in 1869 and ratified by the required number of states in 1870, made it illegal for states to discriminate against voters based on "race, color, or previous condition of servitude."[567] The intention was to stop the states from denying voting rights to African American men.[568] As with the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments, the Fifteenth Amendment gave Congress the power to pass future legislation to ensure that the states followed the law.[569]

ratifying the Fifteenth Amendment in 1870.[577] Enough other states had ratified the amendments that they became part of the U.S. Constitution without California's approval.[578] Still, California would continue its resistance to Reconstruction civil rights legislation by refusing to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment until 1959[579] and the Fifteenth Amendment until 1962.[580]

California also led the way in establishing the legal defense for segregation during Reconstruction. In 1874, the Supreme Court of California made a destructive decision that the rest of the United States eventually followed. In the case of Ward v. Flood, California's Supreme Court justices decided that segregation in the state's public schools did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment as long as African American children and white children had equal access to similar schools and educational opportunities.[581] Twenty-two years later, the U.S. Supreme Court made a similar "separate but equal" decision in the case of Plessy v. Ferguson. This decision supported the segregation of public facilities in the United States for almost 60 years.[582]

In the case of Ward v. Flood, California's Supreme Court justices decided that segregation in the state's public schools did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment as long as Black children and white children had equal access to similar schools and educational opportunities. Twenty-two years later, the U.S. Supreme Court made a similar "separate but equal" decision in the case of Plessy v. Ferguson. This decision supported the segregation of public facilities in the United States for almost 60 years.

California Rejects Reconstruction Civil Rights Legislation

The Legislature and Governor of California strongly opposed Congress's Reconstruction civil rights laws and tried to stop them.[570] During the Civil War, Black Californians had fought for and won new rights, such as the right to testify in court cases involving whites.[571] This was because white Republicans controlled the legislature and governorship during the early 1860s and took power away from the proslavery Democrats who used to control the state.[572] But many white Californians opposed Congressional civil rights laws to protect formerly enslaved people and worried that these laws would apply to other non-white people in the state.[573]

Democrats came back into power in California in 1867 by promising white voters that they would fight against Reconstruction and any new law that would make African Americans, Native Americans, or Chinese Americans equal to whites or give them voting rights.[574]

California Democrats who controlled the state legislature kept this promise when it came time to ratify the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments.[575] California's legislature ignored the Fourteenth Amendment and never considered it.[576] The legislature voted to reject

The Destruction of Reconstruction

African Americans fought for and took advantage of many new legal rights during Reconstruction, but this time period of growing legal equality was short. White supremacist terrorist groups, first the Ku Klux Klan and then later militias such as the White League of Louisiana and the Red Shirts of South Carolina, eventually overthrew the Reconstruction governments that African American and white Republicans had established together in the South.[583] (For a detailed discussion of African Americans' political accomplishments during Reconstruction and white supremacist terrorism in the U.S. South, see Chapters 3, Racial Terror, and 4, Political Disenfranchisement, of this report).

White southern Democrats, who wanted to keep African Americans working on plantations and out of politics, retook control of the southern states.[584] The long and expensive process of Reconstruction lost popularity with white northerners, and many of them wanted to give up on the project of trying to change the racial, legal, and economic relationships of the South.[585]

During the U.S. presidential election of 1876, white northern Republicans abandoned Reconstruction in the South in exchange for keeping control of the presidency of the United States.[586] After the election, Ohio Republican Rutherford B. Hayes and New York Democrat Samuel Tilden both claimed to be the winner.[587] It was well-known that white southerners had used violence, threats, and fraud to keep African Americans from voting for the Republican Hayes.[588] The national leadership of the Republican and Democratic parties made a secret deal: in exchange for Democrats acknowledging Hayes's victory in the presidential election, Republicans would reduce federal support for Reconstruction.[589] Soon after Hayes became president in 1877, he pulled U.S. troops out of key areas in the South where they had been protecting African Americans' political rights and Republican officeholders.[590] Hayes' action effectively ended direct federal protection of African Americans' political rights in the South.[591]

The U.S. Supreme Court played its own important role in defeating Reconstruction.[592] In the 1870s, the court made several decisions that greatly reduced the power of the Fourteenth Amendment and federal laws to protect African American equality.[593]

At the end of the 1800s and the start of the 1900s, white southerners began building thousands of monuments and statues all over the South to celebrate famous Confederates, and to name important buildings after Confederate figures. White Californians also built Confederate monuments across the state.

The last of these decisions happened in the 1883 Civil Rights Cases, a group of several cases that African Americans had brought under the federal Civil Rights Act of 1875.[594] That act had made it illegal for theaters, hotels, and public transportation companies such as railroads to exclude African Americans.[595]

The Supreme Court decided in 1883 that the Civil Rights Act of 1875 was unconstitutional because the Fourteenth Amendment, on which it was based, only gave Congress the power to stop state governments from discriminating against African Americans. Congress could not outlaw individual people and private business owners from discriminating against African Americans; only the state governments themselves could do that.[596]

The Supreme Court decision in the Civil Rights Cases legalized racial discrimination and segregation in most public places. It set the stage for the "separate but equal" decision in Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) and practices such as housing discrimination and education segregation.[597]

The Rise of the Lost Cause Myth

After Reconstruction ended, white southerners created the myth of the Confederate "Lost Cause" in order to downplay the horrors of enslavement and terrorize African Americans.[598] Southerners who opposed African American civil rights falsely argued that the Civil War had little to do with enslavement. The Lost Cause myth claims that the Confederacy had fought a heroic war to save the southern way of life from being destroyed by the North.[599] This untruthful history also claims that the Confederacy lost the Civil War only because the more populated, industrialized North overpowered white southerners, not because enslavement or the Confederate cause was wrong.[600]

The Lost Cause is not just a story that white southerners tell. It is a weapon of terror against African Americans and a rejection of the southern defeat in the Civil War and African American civil rights. At the end of the 1800s and the start of the 1900s, white southerners began building thousands of monuments and statues all over the South to celebrate famous Confederates, and to name important buildings after Confederate figures.[601]

In the 1910s, the Ku Klux Klan, which the federal government had broken up during Reconstruction, re-emerged and began terrorizing and murdering African Americans. The combination of violence against African Americans and the constant sight of monuments celebrating the enslaving Confederacy were terrorist tactics meant to silence African Americans and keep them from challenging white supremacy.[602]

Lost Cause symbols became especially important to white southerners who tried to stop the Civil Rights Movement in the 1950s and 1960s. White southerners who opposed African American civil and human rights beat and murdered African American (and some white) civil rights activists. They also began regularly flying versions of the battle flag of the Army of Northern Virginia (the Confederate "Stars and Bars," popularly known as the "Confederate Flag") to threaten civil rights activists and to show that they were determined not to give equality to African Americans.[603]

Even though defenders of the Lost Cause have argued that Confederate monuments and flags stand for "heritage, not hate," and they claim that removing them erases history, this argument ignores the true history of these objects. White southerners have used them strategically as symbols of terror to try and keep African Americans from fighting for full equality.[604]

California and the Lost Cause

In California, white Americans popularized the Lost Cause mythology with national audiences. The Hollywood film industry was responsible for bringing the Lost Cause to movie screens and making it popular with many white Americans, North and South, during the first half of the 1900s.[605]

D.W. Griffith's blockbuster film, The Birth of a Nation (1915), falsely showed members of the Ku Klux Klan as heroes who were protecting white women and southern honor against violent African Americans (mostly played by white actors who painted their faces black). This film was the main factor behind the revival of the Ku Klux Klan in the early 1900s.[606] Gone with Wind (1939) celebrated the pre-Civil War South by showing a world of kindly enslavers, loyal and happy enslaved people, and heroic Confederates fighting for the southern way of life.[607]

White Californians also built Confederate monuments across the state. For example, a plaque honoring Confederate President Jefferson Davis, set up by the United Daughters of the Confederacy, stood along a Bakersfield, California, highway for almost 80 years.[608] A monument in the Hollywood Forever Cemetery in Los Angeles, California, built in 1925, celebrated all Confederates who died on the Pacific Coast.[609] Although both of these monuments have now been removed, their existence reminds us of California's complicity in the United States' long history of enslavement, white supremacist terrorism, and systemic racism against African Americans.

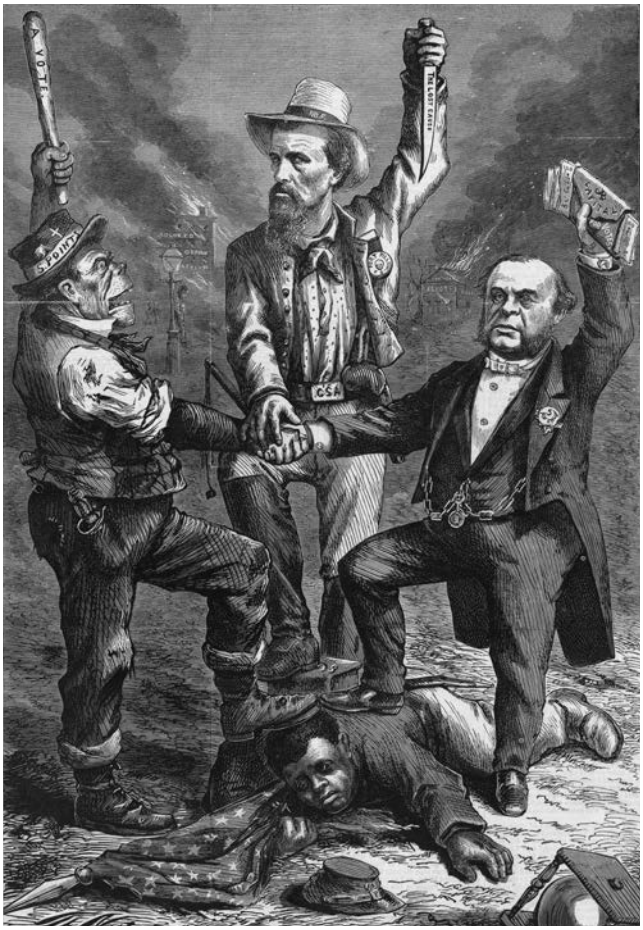
The Hollywood film industry was responsible for popularizing white supremacist movies, like The Birth of a Nation, during the first half of the 1900s. This film was the main factor behind the revival of the Ku Klux Klan in the 1900s.

X. Conclusion

In order to steal and profit from the labor of millions of human beings for 244 years, the colonial American and U.S. governments built an institution of enslavement that was markedly different from the type of slavery that the world had seen before. Americans passed laws that enshrined a racial hierarchy with white people at the top and African American people at the bottom. This hierarchy was based on the false idea that all white people were naturally superior in intelligence and morality to all African American people, and white Americans then used these ideas to justify the lifelong enslavement of people of African ancestry and their descendants. American law enslaved babies from the moment they were born, through adulthood, until the moment they died, and ensured that all their descendants suffered the same fate. During certain time periods, state governments even passed laws that made it illegal for enslavers to voluntarily free enslaved people from their bondage. Enslavement was a badge pinned on people of African descent because of the color of their skin.

When slavery formally ended in 1865, this racial hierarchy continued functioning. The end of Reconstruction and the rise of the Lost Cause brought a long period of political, social, economic, and legal inequality for African Americans that white people enforced through terrorism, violence, and exploiting legal loopholes. This period was known as "Jim Crow," after a racist stereotyped character popular with white Americans, and it lasted roughly 60 to 70 years, from the 1890s to the Civil Rights Movement of the 1950s and 1960s. Without the laws that made enslavement legal, American citizens, aided by government officials, terrorized, murdered, and abused their African American neighbors to maintain this legacy of slavery, as discussed in Chapter 3, Racial Terror. During this period, white Southerners gradually took away African American Southerners' rights to vote by using violent intimidation against and legal loopholes such as literacy tests and poll taxes to disqualify African American voters, as discussed in Chapter 4, Political Disenfranchisement. As African American people fled violence and oppression in the rural South to find economic opportunity in the North and the West, government officials maintained the racial hierarchy by putting up barriers to prevent African American and white Americans from living in the same neighborhoods, as discussed in Chapter 5, Housing Segregation, and allowing private companies to prevent African American and white Americans from holding the same jobs, as discussed in Chapter 10, Stolen Labor and Hindered Opportunity. New systems of forced labor, such as convict leasing, sharecropping, and debt peonage kept formerly enslaved African Americans working for white Americans on cotton plantations or in other industries, as discussed in Chapter 10. Much of this forced labor rested on discrimination in law enforcement, judicial decisions, and prison sentencing that doomed African Americans to slavery-like conditions, as discussed in Chapter 11, An Unjust Legal System.

COURTESY OF THOMAS NAST /LIBRARY OF CONGRESS



"This is a white man's government" (1868)

Government actions relegated African Americans to mostly urban neighborhoods with underfunded schools, as discussed in Chapter 6, Separate and Unequal Education, and menial and service jobs. U.S. Supreme Court decisions such as the Civil Rights Cases (1883) and Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) excluded African Americans from using public facilities such as schools on equal terms with white Americans and validated discrimination in housing that excluded African Americans from desirable neighborhoods. These legal decisions and violent practices caused direct physical harm to African Americans by segregating them in polluted, unhealthy neighborhoods, as discussed in Chapter 7, Racism in Environment and Infrastructure, and denying them equal access to quality healthcare, as discussed in Chapter 12, Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect.

The racial hierarchy that laws created during enslavement also created deeply harmful and untrue racial stereotypes, which have followed African Americans throughout American history, as discussed in Chapter 9, Control over Spiritual, Creative and Cultural Life. Inequalities in the criminal justice system, child welfare laws, housing, and healthcare harmed the survival of African American families, as discussed in Chapter 8, Pathologizing the African American Family, while discriminatory, predatory banking practices and employment discrimination prevented many African Americans from accumulating generational wealth to pass down to their children, as discussed in Chapter 13, The Wealth Gap.

Four hundred years of discrimination has resulted in an enormous and persistent wealth gap between African American and white Americans, as discussed in Chapter 13 The Wealth Gap, and continuous and compounding harm on the health of African Americans, as discussed in Chapter 12, Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect.

As the following chapters will show, these effects of slavery continue to be embedded in American society today and have never been sufficiently remedied. The governments of the United States and the State of California have never apologized to or compensated African Americans for these harms.

Endnotes

[1] Balkansky, What, to the American Slave, is Your 4th of July? (July 15, 2020) Library of Congress (as of Jan. 16, 2022) (Balkansky).

[2] Ibid.

[3] Douglass, What to the Slave is the Fourth of July? (July 5, 1852) Teaching American History (as of Nov. 3, 2021) (What to the Slave).

[4] Ibid.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid.

[7] Ibid.

[8] Wilkerson, Caste: The Origins of Our Discontents (Oprah's Book Club Edition, 2020), pp. 28–29 (Wilkerson).

[9] Patterson, Slavery and Social Death: A Comparative Study (1982), pp. vii – viii (Patterson).

[10] Davis, Inhuman Bondage: The Rise and Fall of Slavery in the New World (2006), pp. 53 – 54 (Davis); Kolchin, American Slavery: 1619 – 1877 (1993), pp. 5–6 (Kolchin).

[11] Davis, supra, at pp. 53–54.

[12] Kolchin, supra, at pp. 17-18.

[13] Id. at pp. 4–5.

[14] Slavery in Ancient Rome, British Museum (as of Jan. 23, 2022).

[15] Patterson, supra, at pp. 152–157.

[16] Kendi, Stamped from the Beginning: The Definitive History of Racist Ideas in America (2016), pp. 19 – 21 (Kendi).

[17] Patterson, supra, at pp. 105–130.

[18] Id. at pp. 134–147, 262–263.

[19] Kolchin, supra, at p. 4.

[20] Ibid.; Patterson, supra, at pp. 62–64, 92–93, 173–175.

[21] Kolchin, supra, at p. 5.

[22] Guasco, The Fallacy of 1619: Rethinking the History of Africans in Early America (Sept. 4, 2017) Black Perspectives, African American Intellectual History Society (as of Jan. 17, 2022) (Guasco); Kolchin, supra, at pp. 5–6; Eltis, A Brief Overview of the Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade: Introduction (2007) SlaveVoyages (as of Jan. 17, 2022) (Brief Overview-Introduction).

[23] Kolchin, supra, at pp. 6–7.

[24] Id. at pp. 7–8.

[25] Ibid.; Brief Overview-Introduction, supra.

[26] Eltis, A Brief Overview of the Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade: Early Slaving Voyages (2007) SlaveVoyages (as of Jan. 17, 2022) (Brief Overview-Early Slaving Voyages).

[27] Ibid.

[28] Ibid.

[29] Ibid.

[30] Guasco, supra; Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade—Estimates (2007) SlaveVoyages (as of March 12, 2022).

[31] Guasco, supra.

[32] Torres-Spelliscy, Everyone is talking about 1619. But that's not actually when slavery in America started (Aug. 23, 2019) Washington Post (as of Jan. 17, 2022).

[33] Kendi, supra, at p. 38.

[34] Kolchin, supra, at pp. 8–10.

[35] Ibid.

[36] Id. at 15-16.

[37] Id. at 14-16.

[38] Morgan, American Slavery, American Freedom: The Ordeal of Colonial Virginia (1975), pp. 327–328 (Morgan).

[39] Id. at p. 328.

[40] Id. at pp. 338–346.

[41] Id. at pp. 369, 385–386.

[42] Kendi, supra, at p. 53.

[43] Kolchin, supra, at pp. 17-18

[44] Kendi, supra, at pp. 38–41.

[45] Ibid.

[46] Id. at pp. 40–41.

[47] Id. at p. 48.

[48] Morgan, supra, at p. 337.

[49] Berlin, Many Thousands Gone: The First Two Centuries of Slavery in North America (1998), pp. 123 – 124 (Berlin).

[50] Ibid.

[51] Morgan, supra, at pp. 334–335.

[52] Kendi, supra, at p. 41.

[53] Berlin, supra, at p. 124.

[54] Baptist, The Half Has Never Been Told: Slavery and the Making of American Capitalism (2014), pp. 32-35 (Baptist).

[55] Sterling, Through a Glass, Darkly: Systemic Racism, Affirmative Action, and Disproportionate Minority Contact (December 2021) 120 Mich. L. Rev. 462-463.

[56] Kendi, supra, at pp. 8–10.

[57] Id. at pp. 31–32.

[58] Id. at pp. 9–10.

[59] Kolchin, supra, at pp.18–19.

[60] Fogelman, Migrations to the Thirteen British North American Colonies, 1700 – 1775: New Estimates (Spring 1992) 22 J. of Interdisciplinary Hist. 700 (Fogelman).

[61] Id. at pp. 697–698.

[62] Ibid.

[63] Kolchin, supra, at p. 11.

[64] Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade—Estimates, SlaveVoyages (2007) (as of March 12, 2022).

[65] Mintz, Historical Context: American Slavery in Comparative Perspective Gilder Lehrman Institute of American History (as of Jan. 17, 2022).

[66] Bilow, Royal African Company (Feb. 26, 2009) Blackpast.org (as of March 15, 2022).

[67] Pettigrew, Freedom's Debt: The Royal African Company and the Politics of the Atlantic Slave Trade, 1672 – 1752 (2013), p. 11 (Pettigrew).

[68] Ibid.

[69] Davis, supra, at pp. 100–101.

[70] Walvin, Crossings: Africa, the Americas and the Atlantic Slave Trade (2013), pp. 31 – 32 (Walvin); Davis, supra, at p. 89.

[71] Davis, supra, at pp. 12–13; Walvin, supra, at pp. 31-32; Kolchin, supra, at p. 20.

[72] Kolchin, supra, at p. 20.

[73] Walvin, supra, at pp. 31–32.

[74] Kolchin, supra, at p. 20.

[75] Ibid.

[76] Ibid.

[77] Smallwood, Saltwater Slavery: A Middle Passage from Africa to American Diaspora (2007), pp. 23–24 (Smallwood).

[78] Walvin, supra, at pp. 40–41.

[79] Davis, supra, pp. 100–101; Smallwood, supra, 20 – 32.

[80] Davis, supra, pp. 100–101; Mustakeem, Slavery at Sea: Terror, Sex, and Sickness in the Middle Passage (2016), pp. 30-32 (Mustakeem).

[81] Davis, supra, at pp. 12–13.

[82] Id. at p. 100; Wilson-Fall, Memories of Madagascar and Slavery in the Black Atlantic (2015), pp. 2 – 3.

[83] Davis, supra, at p. 100.

[84] Mustakeem, supra, at p. 31.

[85] Rediker, The Slave Ship: A Human History (2007), pp. 12-13 (Rediker).

[86] Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade—Estimates (2007) SlaveVoyages (as of March 13, 2022). This estimate is calculated by subtracting the number of enslaved people who disembarked after a slaving voyage from the entire number of enslaved people who embarked from Africa.

[87] Walvin, supra, at pp. 83–86.

[88] Ibid.

[89] Id. at pp. 48, 83.

[90] Id. at p. 83.

[91] Ibid.

[92] The Middle Passage, National Museum of American History, Smithsonian Institution (as of March 13, 2022).

[93] Haines, McDonald, and Shlomowitz, Mortality and Voyage Length in the Middle Passage Revisited (Oct. 2001) 38 Explorations in Econ. Hist. 506.

[94] Smallwood, supra, at p. 71.

[95] Davis, supra, at p. 100.

[96] Rediker, The Slave Ship: A Human History (2007), p. 68 (Rediker).

[97] Eltis, A Brief Overview of the Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade: The Middle Passage (2007) Slavevoyages (as of March 13, 2022).

[98] Mustakeem, supra, at p. 59.

[99] Mustakeem, supra, at p. 59.

[100] Kolchin, supra, at p. 21.

[101] Rediker, supra, at pp. 68–69.

[102] Mustakeem, supra, at pp. 55–58.

[103] Walvin, supra, at p. 91.

[104] Olaudah Equiano quoted in California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (September 23, 2021), Testimony of Dr. Daina Ramey Berry, (as of Jan. 26, 2022).

[105] Mustakeem, supra, at pp. 59–62.

[106] Walvin, supra, at pp. 95–96.

[107] Mustakeem, supra, at pp. 64–70.

[108] Id. at pp. 132–136.

[109] Walvin, supra, at pp. 86, 91–92; Mustakeem, supra, at pp. 136–144.

[110] Mustakeem, supra, at pp. 81–90.

[111] Id. at pp. 62–64, 71-72.

[112] Id. at pp. 82–90.

[113] Id. at pp. 76–82, 94–101.

[114] Id. at pp. 188–189.

[115] Kolchin, supra, at p. 19.

[116] Walvin, supra, at pp. 90-91.

[117] Ibid.

[118] Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade—Estimates, SlaveVoyages (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[119] Rediker, supra, at p. 5.

[120] Mustakeem, supra, at pp. 160–165.

[121] Patterson, supra, at p. 5.

[122] See Section VI below on these new communities and culture.

[123] Foner, Forever Free: The Story of Emancipation and Reconstruction (2005), p. 8 (Forever Free).

[124] Ibid.

[125] Kolchin, supra, at pp. 24–26.

[126] Ibid.

[127] African Impact on Colonial Agriculture, The American Revolution, Colonial Williamsburg (as of March 15, 2022) (African Impact).

[128] Seck, Bouki fait Gombo: A History of the Slave Community of Habitation Haydel (Whitney Plantation) Louisiana, 1750 – 1860 (2014), chapter 3; Schafer, Indigo Cultivation: Life at Governor James Grant's Villa Plantation, Florida History Online (as of March 15, 2022).

[129] African Impact, supra.

[130] Kolchin, supra, at pp. 26–27.

[131] Ibid.

[132] Id. at p. 27.

[133] Forever Free, supra, at p. 8.

[134] Id. at pp. 8–9.

[135] Baptist, supra, at p. 4; American Revolution, Slavery and Remembrance: A Guide to Sites, Museums, and Memory, Colonial Williamsburg Foundation (as of Dec. 10, 2021).

[136] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 8–9.

[137] Declaration of Independence (July 4, 1776) (as of Jan. 24, 2022) (Declaration).

[138] Forever Free, supra, at p. 9.

[139] Thomas Day, quoted in Chernow, Alexander Hamilton (2004), p. 307.

[140] Forever Free, supra, at p. 9.

[141] Abigail Adams, quoted in Forever Free, supra, at p. 9.

[142] Jefferson's Attitudes Toward Slavery, Jefferson and Slavery, Monticello (as of Nov. 2, 2021).

[143] Jefferson, Jefferson's "original Rough draught" of the Declaration of Independence, Declaring Independence: Drafting the Documents, Library of Congress (as of Jan. 24, 2022) (Original Rough Draught).

[144] Ibid.

[145] Jefferson, Notes of the Proceedings in the Continental Congress, 7 June – 1 August, 1776, Library of Congress, Founders Online (as of Jan. 24, 2022) (Notes).

[146] Ibid.

[147] Ibid.

[148] Ibid.

[149] Declaration, supra.

[150] Forever Free, supra, at p. 9.

[151] Nash, The African Americans' Revolution, in the Oxford Handbook of the American Revolution, edited by Jane Kamensky and Edward G. Gray (2012), p. 261 (Nash).

[152] Kolchin, supra, at pp. 70–71.

[153] Nash, supra, at pp. 258–259.

[154] Id. at pp. 259–260.

[155] Kolchin, supra, at pp. 72–73.

[156] Id. at p. 73.

[157] Nash, supra, at pp. 256–257.

[158] Id. at pp. 254–256.

[159] Id. at p. 254–255.

[160] Id. at p. 254.

[161] Kolchin, supra, at p. 78.

[162] Id. at pp. 78–79.

[163] Id. at p. 78; Massachusetts Constitution of 1780, Part 1, Article 1 (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[164] Nash, supra, at p. 258.

[165] Kolchin, supra, at p. 78.

[166] Id. at pp. 78-79.

[167] Ibid.

[168] Id. at p. 77.

[169] Id. at pp. 77–78.

[170] Ibid.

[171] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 9–10.

[172] Ibid.

[173] Slaves who Gained Freedom, Thomas Jefferson Encyclopedia, Monticello, (as of Jan. 24, 2022) (Gained Freedom).

[174] Gained Freedom, supra; The Life of Sally Hemings, Monticello (as of Jan. 24, 2022). After Jefferson's death, his family allowed Sally Hemings to leave without pursuing her, effectively setting her free.

[175] Baptist, supra, at p. 18.

[176] Kolchin, supra, at pp. 85–86.

[177] Baptist, supra, at p. xxiii.

[178] Ibid.; Bourne, Slavery in the United States, EH.Net, Economic History Association.

[179] Baptist, supra, at p. 18.

[180] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 10–11.

[181] Baptist, supra, at pp. 18, 82.

[182] Kolchin, supra, at pp. 94–96.

[183] Krauthamer, Black Slaves, Indian Masters: Slavery, Emancipation, and Citizenship in the Native American South (2013), pp. 7–8 (Krauthamer).

[184] Id. at pp. 17–19, 38–39.

[185] Baptist, supra, at pp. 228–229.

[186] Krauthamer, supra, at pp. 42–43.

[187] Naylor, African Cherokees in Indian Territory: From Chattel to Citizens (2008), p. 1.

[188] Baptist, supra, at pp. 9–11.

[189] US Constitution, Article I, Section 9, Clause 1.

[190] Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade—Estimates, SlaveVoyages (as of March 14, 2022).

[191] US Constitution, Article I, Section 8, Clause 15; and US Constitution, Article IV, Section 4.

[192] Waldstreicher, How the Constitution was Indeed Pro-Slavery (Sept. 19, 2015) The Atlantic (as of Jan. 24, 2022) (Waldstreicher).

[193] US Constitution, Article IV, Section 2, Clause 3.

[194] Rael, A Compact for the Good of America?: Slavery and the Three-Fifths Compromise (Dec. 19, 2016) Black Perspectives, African American Intellectual History Society (as of Feb. 9, 2022) (Rael).

[195] Ibid.

[196] Ibid.

[197] Ibid.

[198] Ibid.

[199] US Constitution, Article I, Section 2, Clause 3.

[200] Rael, supra.

[201] Baptist, supra, at pp. 9–10.

[202] US Constitution, Article II, Section 1, Clause 2.

[203] Baptist, supra, at p. 9.

[204] Wilentz, Constitutionally, Slavery is no National Institution (Sept. 16, 2015) New York Times (as of Jan. 24, 2022) (Constitutionally).

[205] US Constitution, Article IV, Section 2, Clause 3.

[206] US Constitution, Article I, Section 2, Clause 3.

[207] Wilentz, No Property in Man: Slavery and Antislavery at the Nation's Founding (2018), pp. 10–11.

[208] Constitutionally, supra.

[209] Ibid.

[210] Waldstreicher, supra.

[211] Richards, The Slave Power: The Free North and Southern Domination, 1780 –1860 (2000), pp. 41–45 (Richards).

[212] Waldstreicher, supra.

[213] Presidents who owned enslaved people while in office included George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, James Monroe, Andrew Jackson, John Tyler, James K. Polk, and Zachary Taylor. See Rosenwald, Slave-owning presidents become targets of protestors (June 3, 2020) Washington Post (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[214] Richards, supra, at p. 9.

[215] Ibid.

[216] Weil and Adrian Blanco, More than 1,700 Congressmen Once Enslaved Black People. This Is Who They Were, and How They Shaped the Nation (Jan. 20, 2022) Washington Post (As of January 24, 2022) (Weil and Blanco).

[217] Ibid.

[218] Baptist, supra, at p. 12.

[219] Richards, supra, at pp. 48–49.

[220] Khalil Gibran Muhammad, The Sugar that Saturates the American Diet has a Barbaric History as the "White Gold" that Fueled Slavery (August 14, 2019) New York Times (as of March 14, 2022) (Muhammad).

[221] Ibid.

[222] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 28–29; Richards, supra, pp. 78–79.

[223] Baptist, supra, at pp. 154–158.

[224] Kolchin, supra, at pp. 94–97.

[225] Baptist, supra, at pp. 2–3.

[226] Pritchett, Quantitative Estimates of the United States Interregional Slave Trade, 1820 – 1860 (June 2001) 61 J. of Econ. Hist. 474.

[227] Baptist, supra, at pp. 2–3.

[228] Id. at p. 17.

[229] Id. at pp. 17–19, 23.

[230] Id. at pp. 18–32.

[231] Ibid.

[232] Rothman, The Ledger and the Chain: How Domestic Slave Traders Shaped America (2021), pp. 91–92.

[233] Baptist, supra, at pp. 1–2.

[234] Ibid.

[235] Ball, Slavery in the United States: A Narrative of the Life and Adventures of Charles Ball, a Black Man (1837), p. 69.

[236] Baptist, supra, at pp. 87 – 88.

[237] Johnson, Soul by Soul: Life Inside the Antebellum Slave Market (1999), pp. 2-3 (Soul by Soul).

[238] Id. at pp. 119–121.

[239] Id. at pp. 2–3.

[240] Id. at p. 164.

[241] Id. at pp. 129–130.

[242] Id. at pp. 121–123.

[243] Id. at pp. 141–142, 145.

[244] Id. at pp. 130.

[245] Id. supra, at pp. 143–144, 147–149.

[246] Id. supra, at p. 58.

[247] Berry, The Price for their Pound of Flesh: The Value of the Enslaved, from Womb to Grave, in the Building of a Nation (2017), pp. 66–70 (Berry).

[248] Baptist, supra, at pp. 102–103.

[249] Soul by Soul, supra, at pp. 153–154; Berry, supra, at p. 18.

[250] Berry, supra, at pp. 46–47, 136–137.

[251] Id. at p. 18, 78–83.

[252] Id. at p. 18; Baptist, supra, at pp. 240–243.

[253] Soul by Soul, supra, at pp. 143–144.

[254] Northup, Twelve Years a Slave (1853), pp. 80–82, 84–88 (Northup).

[255] Baptist, supra, at pp. 116–124.

[256] Dattel, Cotton in a Global Economy: Mississippi (1800 – 1860) (October 2006) Mississippi History Now (as of March 15, 2022).

[257] Northup, supra, at pp. 163–165.

[258] Id. at pp. 165–167.

[259] Id. at p. 168.

[260] Id. at pp. 163–168.

[261] Id. at p. 171.

[262] Id. at p. 172.

[263] Baptist, supra, at pp. 116–117.

[264] Ibid.

[265] Rosenthal, Reckoning with Slavery: How Revisiting Management's Uncomfortable Past Can Help Us Confront Challenges Today (2021) 20 Academy of Management Learning & Ed. 467-472.

[266] Baptist, supra, at pp. 120–123.

[267] Douglass, Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, An American Slave. Written by Himself (1845), p. 11 (Douglass).

[268] Northup, supra, at p. 165.

[269] Id. at pp. 165, 167–168.

[270] Id. at p. 177.

[271] Id. at pp. 127–128.

[272] Id. at p. 128.

[273] Ibid.

[274] Id. at pp. 170–171.

[275] Id. at p. 170.

[276] Douglass, supra, at pp. 10-11.

[277] Id. at pp. 26–27.

[278] Id. at p. 27.

[279] Northup, supra, at 168.

[280] Berry, supra, at pp. 78–83.

[281] Douglass, supra, at pp. 3–4.

[282] Ibid.

[283] Berry, supra, at pp. 78–80.

[284] Douglass, supra, at pp. 62–63.

[285] Forever Free, supra, at p. 16.

[286] Id. at pp. 16–17.

[287] Berlin, supra, at pp. 130–131.

[288] Id. at p. 130; Forever Free, supra, at p. 16; Kolchin, supra, at p. 140.

[289] Kolchin, supra, at p. 140; Berlin, supra, at pp. 130–131.

[290] Berlin, supra, at p. 130.

[291] Id. at pp. 132–133.

[292] Forever Free, supra, at p. 16.

[293] Ibid.

[294] Kolchin, supra, pp. 149–150.

[295] Ibid.

[296] Raboteau, African American Religion (1999), p. 54-56 (Raboteau).

[297] Id. at pp. 55–57.

[298] Forever Free, supra, at p. 20.

[299] Ibid.

[300] Id. at pp. 19–20.

[301] Id. at pp. 20–21.

[302] Ibid. quoting Alice Sewall.

[303] Forever Free, supra, at p. 23.

[304] Id. at pp. 22–23.

[305] Farrow et. al, Complicity: How the North Promoted, Prolonged, and Profited from Slavery (2005), p, 95–99 (Complicity).

[306] Id. at pp. 98–99.

[307] Ibid.

[308] Id. at p. 95.

[309] Ibid.

[310] Ibid.

[311] Mintz, Historical Context: Was Slavery the Engine of American Economic Growth?, Gilder Lehrman Institute of American History (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[312] Complicity, supra, at pp. 6, 25–26.

[313] U.S. Bureau of the Census, Manufactures of the United States in 1860; complied from the original returns of the Eighth Census under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior (1865), p. x (1860 Census) (as of Jan. 24, 2022) (1860 US Census).

[314] Ibid.

[315] White New Yorkers in Slave Times, Slavery in New York virtual exhibit, p. 1 (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[316] Slave Market, Mapping the African American Past, Columbia University Center for Teaching and Learning (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[317] Foner, Gateway to Freedom: The Hidden History of the Underground Railroad (2015), pp. 43–44 (Gateway).

[318] Id. at pp. 44–45.

[319] Ibid.

[320] Ibid.

[321] Sidel, A Historian's Quest Links J.P. Morgan To Slave Ownership; Bank's Distant Predecessor Took Human Collateral For Rich Client's Debt (May 10, 2005) Wall Street Journal (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[322] Swarns, Insurance Policies on Slaves: New York Life's Complicated Past (Dec. 18, 2016) New York Times (as of Jan. 24, 2022) (Swarns).

[323] Supporting the Trade, Purchased Lives, The Historic New Orleans Collection, (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[324] Swarns, supra.

[325] State of California, Slavery Era Insurance Policies, SB 2199, Chapter 934 (2000), (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[326] Thomas, The hidden links between slavery and Wall Street (Aug. 29, 2019) BBC News (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[327] Gateway, supra, at p. 45.

[328] White, Building Havemeyer Hall: Charles Frederick Chandler and the Sugar Refining Industry, Columbia University and Slavery, Columbia University (as of Jan. 24, 2022) (White).

[329] Ibid.

[330] Domino Sugar Factory, NYC-Arts: The Complete Guide (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[331] Domino Sugar, ASR Group (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[332] Staples, A Fate Worse Than Slavery, Unearthed in Sugar Land (Oct. 27, 2018) New York Times (as of Jan. 24, 2022) (Staples).

[333] Ibid.

[334] Hardy, Angola Inmates Make Sugar Cane Syrup the Old-Fashioned Way (Dec. 23, 2014) The Advocate (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[335] Beckert, Katherine Stevens, et al., Harvard and Slavery: Seeking a Forgotten History (2011), p. 11 (as of Jan. 24, 2022) (Harvard and Slavery).

[336] Id. at pp. 11-12, 15–17.

[337] Slavery and Justice: Report of the Brown University Steering Committee on Slavery and Justice (2006), pp. 14–17 (as of Jan. 24, 2022) (Slavery and Justice). One of the Brown brothers, Moses, converted to Quakerism, emancipated the enslaved people he owned, and became an antislavery activist.

[338] Id. at pp. 12–13.

[339] Id. at pp. 13–14.

[340] Gutmann, Statement on Penn's Connections to Slavery (June 28, 2018) Penn Today (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[341] Sandweiss and Craig Hollander, Princeton and Slavery: Holding the Center, Princeton University (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[342] Foner, Columbia and Slavery: A Preliminary Report, Columbia University (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[343] Remnick, Yale Grapples With Ties to Slavery in Debate Over a College's Name (Sept. 11, 2015) New York Times (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[344] Cano, A Complicated History: Slavery at Dartmouth (Feb. 19, 2020) The Dartmouth (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[345] Oast, Institutional Slavery: Slaveholding Churches, Schools, Colleges, and Businesses in Virginia, 1680 – 1860 (2016), p. 10 (Institutional Slavery).

[346] Ibid.

[347] Ibid.

[348] Oast, "The Worst Kind of Slavery": Slave-owning Presbyterian Churches in Prince Edward County, Virginia (November 2010) 76 J. of Southern Hist. 867–868.

[349] Institutional Slavery, supra, at p. 131.

[350] Id. at pp. 131, 133–136.

[351] Id. at p. 147.

[352] Id. at p. 156.

[353] Swarns, 272 Slaves were Sold to Save Georgetown. What Does it Owe their Descendants? (April 16,2016) New York Times (as of Jan. 24, 2022) (Sold to Save Georgetown).

[354] Ibid. Another enslaving Jesuit institution was Saint Louis University. See Dorn, Confronting SLU's History With Slavery (Oct. 4, 2019) The University News (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[355] Report of the Working Group on Slavery, Memory, and Reconciliation to the President of Georgetown University (2016), pp. 13-15 (as of Jan. 24, 2022) (Working Group).

[356] Id. at p. 14.

[357] Id. at p. 16.

[358] Id. at p. 15.

[359] Baptist, supra, p. 239.

[360] Ericson, The Federal Government and Slavery: Following the Money Trail (Spring 2005) 19 Stud. in Amer. Pol. Dev. 107 (Ericson).

[361] Id. at pp. 108 – 110.

[362] Id. at pp. 110 – 112.

[363] Id. at pp. 112 – 115.

[364] Id. at p. 115.

[365] Fehrenbacher and McAfee, The Slaveholding Republic: An Account of the United States Government's Relations to Slavery (2002), pp. 61–62 (Slaveholding Republic).

[366] Id. at p. 63.

[367] Id. at p. 67.

[368] Jeff Forret, The Notorious "Yellow House" that Made Washington, D.C. a Slavery Capital (July 22, 2020) Smithsonian Magazine (as of March 14, 2022).

[369] Northup, supra, at p. 43.

[370] Bell, Commentary: Enslaved Labor and the Capitol (2003) United States Capitol Historical Society (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[371] Mann, Building the White House, The White House Historical Association, (as of Jan. 24, 2022).

[372] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 25–27.

[373] Ibid.

[374] Gateway, supra, at pp. 4–7.

[375] Foner, Free Soil, Free Labor, Free Men: The Ideology of the Republican Party Before the Civil War (1970), pp. 11–18, 27–29, 54-58.

[376] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 28–31.

[377] Id. at pp. 28–29.

[378] Rathbun, The Debate over Annexing Texas and the Emergence of Manifest Destiny, 4 Rhetoric and Pub. Affairs 459-494.

[379] Kendi, supra, at p. 186.

[380] Smith, Freedom's Frontier: California and the Struggle over Unfree Labor, Emancipation, and Reconstruction (2013), p. 7 (Freedom's Frontier).

[381] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 7–8.

[382] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 29–30.

[383] Gateway, supra, at pp. 119–120.

[384] Id. at pp. 124–125.

[385] Id. at pp. 125–130.

[386] McPherson, Battle Cry of Freedom: The Civil War Era (1988), p. 86 (McPherson).

[387] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at p. 9.

[388] Id. at pp. 7–8.

[389] Id. at p. 9.

[390] Smith, Remaking Slavery in a Free State: Masters and Slaves in Gold Rush California (Feb. 2011) 80 Pacific Hist. Rev. 33 (Remaking Slavery).

[391] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at p. 7.

[392] Lapp, Blacks in Gold Rush California (1977), pp. 4–9, 130–139 (Lapp).

[393] Id. at pp. 240–245.

[394] Poor census taking in isolated mining camps, the constant population flux, the loss or destruction of census returns, and the possible desire of enslavers to hide enslavement from census takers, make it impossible to construct a complete picture of enslavement in 1850s California. On these difficulties, see Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 237–238; and Lapp, supra, at pp. 64-65.

[395] Lapp, supra, at p. 65.

[396] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 40, 257.

[397] Id. at p. 44.

[398] Rohrbough, Days of Gold: The California Gold Rush and the American Nation (1997), pp. 256–261 (Rohrbough).

[399] Id. at pp. 211–214.

[400] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 239–245.

[401] Rohrbough, supra, at pp. 136–138.

[402] Baur, The Health Factor in the Gold Rush Era (Feb. 1949) 18 Pacific Hist. Rev. 97–105.

[403] Inscoe, Mountain Masters: Slavery and the Sectional Crisis in Western North Carolina (1996), p. 73.

[404] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at p. 259.

[405] Id. at pp. 239–245.

[406] For some examples, see Beasley, The Negro Trail Blazers of California (1919), pp. 70–71.

[407] Remaking Slavery, supra, at pp. 38-39; Lapp, supra, at pp. 132–133.

[408] A Slave Flogged in San Jose (Feb. 16, 1850) Daily Alta California, p. 2, col. 3.

[409] Slaveholding in California (Aug. 30, 1850), Liberator, p. 140, col. 5.

[410] An Illustrated History of Los Angeles County, California (1889), pp. 358 – 359; Letter from California (Oct. 11, 1850) Liberator, p. 161 col. 3.

[411] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 52-54.

[412] Id. at pp. 57–63.

[413] Id. at p. 54.

[414] Id. at pp. 50–52.

[415] Id. at pp. 52–54.

[416] Cal. Const. of 1849, art. I, § 18.

[417] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at p. 65.

[418] Id. at p. 7.

[419] Id. at p. 8.

[420] An Act Respecting Fugitives from Labor, and Slaves brought to this State prior to her Admission into the Union, April 15, 1852, ch. 33, California Statutes, at 67–69 (An Act Respecting Fugitives).

[421] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 66–67.

[422] An Act Respecting Fugitives; Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 67–70.

[423] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 67–70.

[424] Id. at pp. 67–68.

[425] An Act Respecting Fugitives; Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 67–69.

[426] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 71–72.

[427] An Act to Amend an Act respecting Fugitives from Labor and Slaves Brought to this State prior to her Admission into the Union, Act of April 15, 1853, ch. 67, Cal. Stat., at 94.

[428] An Act Amendatory to an Act to Amend an Act respecting Fugitives from Labor and Slaves Brought to this State prior to her Admission into the Union, Act of April 13, 1854, ch. 22, Cal. Stat., at 30.

[429] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 71–72.

[430] In re Perkins, 2 Cal. 424 (1852); Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 70–71.

[431] The three men had arrived in California in 1849 with Charles Perkins, the son of their enslaver. When Charles Perkins went back to Mississippi in 1851, he informally emancipated the men. Once he heard about the new California fugitive slave law, Perkins decided to use it to reclaim the men and force them to return to Mississippi as slaves.

[432] In re Perkins, 2 Cal. 424 (1852).

[433] Id. at pp. 455–457.

[434] Id. at pp. 452–455.

[435] Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857) 60 U.S. 393; In fact, one California antislavery attorney asserted that the lawyers for Dred Scott's enslavers cited the California case of In re Perkins as a precedent to support Scott's continued enslavement. For this evidence, see Cornelius Cole, "Judicial Influence--Politics upon the Bench, no. 3," scrapbook no. 1, box 38, Cole Family Papers, Charles E. Young Research Library, Department of Special Collections, University of California-Los Angeles.

[436] These include: 1) the Lathrop case, described in Lapp, supra, at pp. 141–142; 2) the Perkins case, described in In re Perkins, 2 Cal. 424 (1852); 3) the case of Harriet Jordan, described in Another Fugitive Slave Case (Sept. 22, 1852) Daily Alta California p. 2, col. 2 and A Fugitive Slave Case (Sept. 22, 1852) Placer Times and Transcript p. 3, col. 1; 4) an anonymous enslaved woman in El Dorado County, described in Fugitive Slave Case (Oct. 2, 1852), Sacramento Daily Union p. 2, col. 3; 5) the case of Lucy Brown, described in Fugitive Slave (April 20, 1853) Daily Alta California, p. 2, col. 2; 6) the O'Neil case, described in Habeas Corpus (Jan. 19, 1854) Sacramento Daily Union p. 3, col. 2; 7) the case of an anonymous enslaved boy in Marysville, described in Kidnapping (March 31, 1854), Daily Alta California p.2, col. 2 and The Kidnapping Case (April 1, 1854) Placer Times and Transcript p. 2, col. 4; 8) the case of Stephen Spencer Hill, described in Johnson, Roaring Camp: The Social World of the California Gold Rush (2000), pp. 67 – 68, 191 (Roaring Camp); 9) the Kibbe case, described in untitled article (April 7, 1855) Daily Alta California, p. 2, col. 4; and 10) the case of George Mitchell, described in Lapp, supra, at p. 147.

[437] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 71–73.

[438] Remaking Slavery, supra, at pp. 49–50.

[439] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 75–76.

[440] These include: 1) The case of Bridget "Biddy" Mason, Hannah, and their enslaved children and grandchildren, described in Taylor, In Search of the Racial Frontier: African Americans in the American West, 1528 – 1990 (1998), pp. 79–80 (Taylor); 2) the case of Archy Lee, described in Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 76–78; 3) the Mathews case, described in Alleged Abduction Case (Jan. 21, 1859) San Francisco Bulletin, p. 3, col. 2; 4) the case of Nathaniel Rice, described in Almost an 'Archy Case' (Aug. 20, 1860) San Francisco Bulletin, p. 3, col. 5; 5) the case of John Turner, described in Attempt to Kidnap (Jan. 25, 1861) Sacramento Daily Union p. 3, col. 2; and 6) the case of Ada (Edith) Blue, described in Smith, California's Last Slave Case (March 5, 2014) New York Times (as of Jan. 26, 2022).

[441] Taylor, supra, at pp. 79–80.

[442] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 76-78.

[443] Cal. Const. of 1849, art. II, § 1.

[444] Richards, The California Gold Rush and the Coming of the Civil War (2007), pp. 73–77.

[445] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at p. 61.

[446] Greg Nokes, Black Exclusion Laws in Oregon, Oregon Encyclopedia (as of December 7, 2021).

[447] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at p. 61.

[448] Ibid.

[449] State of California, Journal of the Senate, 2nd sess. (1851) 19 – 21.

[450] Ibid.

[451] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 61–63.

[452] An Act Regulating Marriages, April 22, 1850, ch. 140, § 3, Cal. Stat., at 424.

[453] An Act extending the Privileges of the Homestead Law to certain Persons, and to Regulate the Creation of the Same, March 18, 1860, ch. 120, § 2, Cal. Stats., at 87-88.

[454] Smith, Dred Scott on the Pacific: African Americans, Citizenship, and Subjecthood in the North American West (Spring 2018) 100 S. California Hist. Q. 50 (Dred Scott on the Pacific).

[455] Lapp, supra, at pp. 196–197.

[456] Id. at pp. 239–245.

[457] Dred Scott on the Pacific, supra, at p. 46.

[458] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 30–31.

[459] McPherson, supra, at pp. 145–149.

[460] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 30–32.

[461] McPherson, supra, at pp. 56–57.

[462] Ibid.

[463] Kendi, supra, at pp. 179 – 180.

[464] Id. at pp. 203–204.

[465] Ibid.

[466] Id. at p. 203.

[467] Baptist, supra, at p. 377.

[468] Jones, Birthright Citizens: A History of Race and Rights in Antebellum America (2018), p. 1 (Jones).

[469] Id. at pp. 1, 9 – 10, 12 – 13.

[470] Id. at p. 14.

[471] Kendi, supra, at p. 212.

[472] Id. at p. 214.

[473] Baptist, supra, at pp. 389–390.

[474] Foner, The Fiery Trial: Abraham Lincoln and American Slavery (2010), pp. 161–162 (Fiery Trial).

[475] Constitution of the Confederate States, March 11, 1861, Article I, section 9, clause 4 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[476] Id. at Article IV, section 3, clause 3.

[477] Alexander H. Stephens, 'Cornerstone' Speech, March 21, 1861 <> (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[478] Levine, Confederate Emancipation: Southern Plans to Free and Arm Slaves During the Civil War (2006), pp. 26–36 (Levine).

[479] Id. at pp. 40–49.

[480] Letter from Howell Cobb to James A. Seddon, January 1, 1865, Encyclopedia Virginia (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[481] Martinez, Black Confederates (April 23, 2021) Encyclopedia Virginia (as of March 15, 2022).

[482] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 42–44.

[483] Berlin, Who Freed the Slaves?: Emancipation and its Meaning, in Union and Emancipation: Essays on Politics and Race in the Civil War Era, edited by David W. Blight and Brooks D. Simpson (1997), p. 111 (Who Freed the Slaves?).

[484] Woodward, Marching Masters: Slavery, Race, and the Confederate Army During the Civil War (2014), p. 107.

[485] Who Freed the Slaves?, supra, at p. 111.

[486] Army Engineer to the Headquarters of the Department of the South (Apr. 3, 1863), cited in Berlin, Reidy & Rowlands, eds., Freedom: A documentary History of Emancipation, 1861-1867, Series II: The Black Military Experience (1982) p. 56.

[487] Confiscation Acts, Mr. Lincoln and Freedom: An American History Project of the Lehrman Institute (as of March 15, 2022) (Confiscation Acts).

[488] Ibid.

[489] Weil and Blanco, supra.

[490] Ibid.

[491] Who Freed the Slaves?, supra, at p. 117.

[492] Ibid.

[493] Forever Free, supra, at p. 48.

[494] Emancipation Proclamation, Jan 1. 1863 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[495] Forever Free, supra, at p. 51.

[496] Id. at p. 50.

[497] Militia Act of 1862, 12 Stat. at 597–600 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[498] Forever Free, supra, at p. 52.

[499] Ibid.

[500] Mouser, The United States Colored Troops (1863-1865) (July 22, 2017) BlackPast.org. (as of Jan. 26, 2022) (Mouser).

[501] Mintz, Historical Context: Black Soldiers in the Civil War, Gilder Lehrman Institute of American History (as of Jan. 26, 2022) (Black Soldiers in the Civil War).

[502] Black Soldiers in the Civil War, supra.

[503] Mouser, supra.

[504] Hanna, African American Recipients of the Medal of Honor: A Biographical Dictionary, Civil War through Vietnam War (2002), p. 10 (Hanna).

[505] Black Soldiers in the US Military During the Civil War (Sept. 1, 2017) National Archives (as of Jan. 26, 2022) (National Archives)

[506] Black Soldiers in the Civil War, supra.

[507] Ibid.

[508] Ibid.

[509] National Archives, supra.

[510] Ibid.

[511] Douglas to Robert Hamilton (June 9, 1863) quoted in The Black Abolitionist Papers, Volume V, The United States, 1859 – 1865, edited by C. Peter Ripley (1992), p. 212.

[512] Id. at p. 213.

[513] Black Soldiers in the Civil War, supra.

[514] Ibid.

[515] Hanna, supra, at pp. 22–25.

[516] Id. at p. vii.

[517] Forever Free, supra, at p. 53.

[518] Lincoln, Order by the President, July 30, 1863, Freedmen and Southern Society Project (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[519] The Fort Pillow Massacre, 1864: A Spotlight on a Primary Source, Gilder Lehrman Institute of American History (as of Jan. 26, 2022) (Fort Pillow).

[520] Ibid.

[521] Ibid.

[522] The Historical Legacy of Juneteenth (June 19, 2019) National Museum of African American History and Culture, Smithsonian Institution (as of Jan. 26, 2022) (Juneteenth).

[523] Ibid.

[524] Kolchin, supra, at p. 207.

[525] US Constitution, Amdt. 13, section 1, clause 1.

[526] US Constitution, Amdt. 13, section 2, clause 1.

[527] Greene and McAward, A Common Interpretation: The Thirteenth Amendment (Dec. 6, 2016) National Constitution Center (as of March 11, 2022).

[528] Forever Free, supra, at pp. xix–xx.

[529] Id. at pp. 61–63.

[530] Id. at pp. 79–80,

[531] Id. at pp. 78–79.

[532] Id. at pp. 79–80, 109–110.

[533] Petrella and Loggins, "This is a Country for White Men": White Supremacy and U.S. Politics (Jan. 5. 2017) Black Perspectives, African American Intellectual History Society (as of March 15, 2022).

[534] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 107–113, 116–117, 145-146.

[535] Id. at pp. 113–122.

[536] Id. at pp. 111–115.

[537] Id. at pp. 111–113.

[538] Id. at pp. 113-115, 142.

[539] Id. at pp. 82-83, 91.

[540] Id. at pp. 88–89.

[541] Id. at pp. 83–84.

[542] Id. at pp. 89–90.

[543] Id. at pp. 95–96.

[544] Id. at pp. 95–96.

[545] Id. at pp. 112, 141–42.

[546] Freedmen's Bureau Bill (Mar. 3, 1865) Chap. XC, § 2, 13 Stat. 507.

[547] Reich, A Working People, supra, p. 13.

[548] See Foner, Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863-1877 (2011) pp. 68-69; Gates, Jr., The Truth Behind "40 Acres and a Mule" African Am. Hist. Blog (2013) (as of Apr. 10, 2022); see also Reich, A Working People, supra, p. 11 (discussing freedmen's view of land ownership as key to economic autonomy).

[549] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, p. 16, citing Fleming, "Forty Acres and a Mule" (1906) 182 North Am. Rev. 721, 729.

[550] Reich, A Working People: A History of African American Workers Since Emancipation (2013) pp. 11-12.

[551] Id. at p. 12.

[552] Id. at pp. 13-15.

[553] Id. at pp. 141–42.

[554] Id. at p. 12.

[555] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, p. 19; Reich, A Working People, supra, p. 10

[556] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, p. 19.

[557] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, p. 17.

[558] Reich, A Working People, supra, p. 15.

[559] Id. at pp. 13-15; see also Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, p. 18 (discussing President Johnson's view that capitalism, free trade, and the law of supply and demand would suffice to allow freedmen to secure remuneration and acquire land without the help of the state, even as the government was aiding private industry and after the government had given away land to white settlers).

[560] Id. at pp. 113–115.

[561] Ibid.

[562] An Act to Protect all Persons in the United States in their Civil Rights, and furnish the Means of their Vindication (the Civil Rights Act of 1866), US Statutes, Chapter 31, sec. 1

[563] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 117–118.

[564] US Constitution, Amdt. 14, section 1.

[565] Jones, supra, at pp. 5, 14.

[566] Pildes and Smith, Common Interpretation: The Fifteenth Amendment, National Constitution Center (as of March 15, 2022) (Common Interpretation).

[567] US Constitution, Amdt. 15, section 1.

[568] Common Interpretation, supra.

[569] US Constitution, Amdt. 15, section 2.

[570] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 209–214.

[571] Lapp, supra, at pp. 206–209.

[572] Freedom's Frontier, supra, at pp. 177–178.

[573] Id. at pp. 207–208.

[574] Id. at pp. 207–213.

[575] Id. at pp. 210–213.

[576] Id. at p. 210.

[577] Id. at p. 213.

[578] Ibid.

[579] Waite, Early California lawmakers also preached #resistance—but against immigration (Aug. 3, 2018) Los Angeles Times (as of Jan. 26, 2022).

[580] Cottrell, It took 92 years for California to ratify the 15th Amendment (June 26, 2020) The Union (as of March 15, 2022).

[581] Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36 (1874).

[582] Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896).

[583] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 171–177, 194–197.

[584] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 195–197, 200–203.

[585] Id. at pp. 190–193, 197.

[586] Id. at p. 198.

[587] Id. at pp. 197–198.

[588] Ibid.

[589] Id. at p. 198.

[590] Id. at p. 198–199.

[591] Ibid.

[592] Id. at p. 194.

[593] Ibid. The key cases in the 1870s were the Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. 36 (1873) and United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1876).

[594] Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883).

[595] An Act to protect all Citizens in their Civil and Legal Rights, 18 US Stat. 335-337.

[596] Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883).

[597] Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896).

[598] Janney, The Lost Cause (Feb. 24, 2022) Encyclopedia Virginia (as of March 15, 2022) (Janney).

[599] Ibid.

[600] Ibid.

[601] Whose Heritage? Public Symbols of the Confederacy (February 1, 2019) Southern Poverty Law Center (as of Jan. 26, 2022) (Whose Heritage?).

[602] Ibid.

[603] Ibid.

[604] Ibid.

[605] Boyd, Gone with the Wind and the damaging effect of Hollywood racism (June 13, 2020) The Guardian (as of March 15, 2022) (Boyd).

[606] Forever Free, supra, at pp. 217–219 (photo essay by Joshua Brown).

[607] Boyd, supra.

[608] Knight, Commentary: A Fitting End to the Last Confederate Monument in Southern California (July 8, 2020) Los Angeles Times (as of Jan. 26, 2022).

[609] Waite, The Struggle over Slavery Was Not Confined to the South, LA Has a Confederate Memorial Problem Too (August 4, 2017) Los Angeles Times (as of Jan. 26, 2022).

CHAPTER 3 — Racial Terror

COURTESY OF JACK BENTON/ARCHIVE PHOTOS VIA GETTY IMAGES

Ku Klux Klan members. (c. 1920)

I. Introduction

Enslavement was followed by decades of violence and intimidation intended to subordinate African Americans across the United States.[1] Racial terror, and lynchings in particular, pervaded every aspect of pre- and post-enslavement African American life.[2] African Americans faced threats of violence when they tried to vote, when they tried to buy homes in white neighborhoods, when they tried to swim in public pools, and when they made progress through the courts or in legislation.[3] Led and joined by prominent members of society, and enabled by government officials, ordinary citizens terrorized African Americans to preserve a caste system that kept African Americans from building the same wealth and political influence as white Americans.[4] Racial terror also continued the generational trauma that began during enslavement.[5]

While lynching, mob violence, and other forms of racial terror are no longer socially acceptable, the threat and legacy of terror continue to haunt African American communities.[6] Such violence has found a modern form in extrajudicial killings of African Americans by police and vigilantes.[7] Racial terror targeted at successful African Americans has contributed to the present wealth gap between African Americans and white Americans.[8] Today, the monitoring of polling places by white supremacist groups evokes a history of violent suppression of Black voters.[9]

This chapter chronicles the racial terror inflicted on African Americans, including in California, and the lasting impact of racial terror. First, this chapter addresses the overarching purpose of racial terror as a method of social control. Second, this chapter will identify the perpetrators of racial terror, most notably the Ku Klux Klan (KKK), and their objective of preserving their dominance in society. This chapter pays special attention to the KKK's history and spread in California. Third, this chapter will discuss the various forms of racial terror, such as lynching, mob violence, and sexual violence. The chapter also identifies numerous instances of racial terror in California. This chapter shows how racial terror allowed white Americans to politically, economically, and socially subordinate African Americans. Finally, this chapter will discuss the consequences of racial terror, such as intergenerational trauma and the racial wealth gap, which continue to this day.

II. Objectives of Racial Terror: Social, Political, and Economic Oppression

The practice of racial terror began during enslavement and has continued ever since, developing through Reconstruction, Jim Crow, the 20th century, and today. A critical key to understanding the widespread use of racial terror is recognizing how its perpetrators sought to oppress African Americans socially, psychologically, politically, and economically in order to maintain a racial hierarchy.

As the journalist Isabel Wilkerson argues, a caste system is a social hierarchy created by people in a community that separates groups of human beings based on ancestry, skin color, or other characteristics that cannot be changed.[10] In a caste system, one group of human beings is believed to be superior, while other groups are believed to be inferior and treated as less than human.[11] In the racially ordered caste system of the United States, white people occupy this higher social position.[12] One pillar holding up the American racial caste system is the use of physical and psychological terror, which serves to control African Americans and prevent resistance.[13] For this caste system to continue functioning, the rest of society, including government officials, only need to look the other way.[14] For state and local government officials, this is a neglect of their duty to protect.[15] In America, for centuries, the perpetrators of racial terror have rarely been held accountable for their violence, and so they have continued to enforce their dominant caste position.[16]

In America, for centuries, the perpetrators of racial terror have rarely been held accountable for their violence, and so they have continued to enforce their dominant caste position.

The system of racial terror in America started during enslavement, when whipping was a tool to control enslaved people and break their spirit.[17] Enslavers openly publicized their use of violence.[18] When an enslaved person sought freedom by escaping, enslavers sometimes turned to torture, or invited others to kill the freedom seeker.[19] White enslavers could thus use a public display of violence to demonstrate their power over African American enslaved persons, scare enslaved persons into submission, and uphold the institution of enslavement.[20]

Rebellions of the enslaved were also violently suppressed.[21] For example, white officials purportedly discovered an extensive conspiracy of insurrection in Charleston, South Carolina in 1822.[22] The enslaved, led by the free African American carpenter Denmark Vesey, allegedly plotted to take over the city and kill all of its white residents, including women and children.[23] After the discovery of the alleged conspiracy, Vesey was arrested, along with dozens of enslaved persons.[24] Confessions and testimony against the alleged conspirators were procured in at least some instances by coercion and torture.[25] The prosecution had no physical evidence to support its case.[26] In the end, Vesey and thirty-four others were executed, although no insurrection ever occurred and no white person was actually killed.[27] Indeed, there is significant doubt as to whether any such insurrection plot ever existed.[28] Then-governor of South Carolina Thomas Bennet condemned the trial as hasty and unreliable; his brother-in-law, Supreme Court Justice William Johnson, described the proceedings as perjury and "legal murder."[29]

After the formal end of enslavement, African American Southerners began to gain political and economic influence. As discussed in Chapter 2 on Enslavement, the Reconstruction Acts of 1867 gave voting rights to African Americans, and following the laws' enactment, African American voter turnout reached nearly 90 percent in many jurisdictions.[30] During Reconstruction, approximately 2,000 African American men held a public office, including 600 African American state legislators, 18 African American state executive officials, 16 African American representatives elected to Congress, and two of the nation's first African American senators.[31] Nearly 20 percent of all public officials in the South were African American between 1870-1876.[32] In spite of violence and other obstacles, African American Southerners began owning land, particularly in the Upper South (Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, North Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and Washington, D.C.).[33] Black land ownership grew to such an extent that by 1910, nearly half of the Black farmers in the Upper South owned land.[34] In addition, African American literacy rates surged from approximately 20 percent in 1870 to approximately 70 percent in 1910.[35]

In 1876, partially as a result of a disputed presidential election, Reconstruction came to an end. In exchange for Democrats not blocking the certification of Republican Rutherford B. Hayes as President, Hayes and other Republicans agreed to remove federal troops from key locations of political conflict in the South.[36] With the end of Reconstruction, supporters of white supremacy returned to power.[37] They regained political, social, and economic control, and prevented African Americans from voting.[38] After federal troops no longer had a strong presence in the South, white southerners intensified the violent oppression of African Americans.[39] As shown in detail below, racial terror took on many forms throughout American history: lynchings, massacres, intimidation, murders, beatings, and police killings. Today, extrajudicial killings of African Americans by police and vigilantes represent a modern form of racial terror.[40]

According to the then-governor of Louisiana, Cruikshank "establish[ed] the principle that hereafter no white man could be punished for killing a Negro."

White Americans feared that newly empowered African Americans would destroy the racial hierarchy.[41] The Ku Klux Klan and other white supremacists beat, burned, and killed African Americans.[42] Terror pervaded every aspect of Southern life and had a devastating effect on the psyche of African Americans.[43] The perpetrators' principal goal was to use violence and intimidation to prevent African American people from voting, achieving equality,[44] and amassing political and economic power.[45] For example, white supremacists murdered African American political activists in the 1873 Colfax massacre and African American military members in the 1876 Hamburg massacre.[46] The Supreme Court's 1876 decision in United States v. Cruikshank enabled such violence to continue by making it more difficult to prosecute.[47] According to the then-governor of Louisiana, Cruikshank "establish[ed] the principle that hereafter no white man could be punished for killing a Negro."[48]

White supremacists often targeted the greatest perceived threats to the caste system: African American political, economic, and social activities, and those perceived to be accomplished members of the African American community. After the end of Reconstruction, government actors in the South did little to correct the view that African American people did not deserve human dignity or basic legal and political rights.[49] Across the country, white people often rejected the idea that African Americans were equal to white Americans,[50] and used violence to preserve America's racial caste system.[51]

As explained below, racial terror advanced three main goals: maintaining the superior social position of white people; destroying African American economic competition and stealing African American wealth; and limiting the political influence of African American people while advancing white supremacy through government offices.

III. Perpetrators of Terror: Private Citizens, Government Support

Throughout American history, from enslavement to the present day, private citizens and government actors have perpetrated and enabled racial terror. Ordinary people committed heinous acts of violence, while others did nothing, watched, or obstructed investigations.[52] Meanwhile, government officials often did nothing to prevent or prosecute racial terror—and sometimes encouraged or assisted the perpetrators.[53] Indeed, white supremacists and Ku Klux Klan members have held positions in all levels of American government.[54]

Among the numerous perpetrators of racial terror, the Ku Klux Klan was especially prominent. The KKK is not the only hate group in American history, and oftentimes racial violence was and is committed by individuals unassociated with an organized group.[55] But because the KKK has been active and influential for several intervals during its long history, it is centrally important to the history of racial terror in the United States.[56] Throughout its history, the Klan has targeted members of all racial groups, as well as Jews, Catholics, and others, but its origins were anti-Black.[57]

The KKK was especially powerful during three periods. The first iteration of the KKK lasted from 1866 until 1869. After several decades of dormancy, the second iteration of the KKK lasted from 1915 until about 1944. The third version of the KKK arose in the 1950s and 1960s and went into decline in the 1980s. Each of these iterations will be discussed in greater detail below.

Origins of the Ku Klux Klan

The first iteration of the Ku Klux Klan took shape in early 1866, during Reconstruction, and formally disbanded

in 1869.[58] After the Civil War ended, many white southerners resented Reconstruction and its policies, which threatened their superiority.[59] Reconstruction policies led to social, political, and economic gains by formerly enslaved people.[60]

Around this time, the KKK emerged to oppose Reconstruction, led by former Confederate General Nathan Bedford Forrest and a group of Confederate veterans in Pulaski, Tennessee.[61] This first version of the KKK consisted of ex-Confederates and other white southerners, and it was tacitly supported by most white southerners.[62] Their hooded costumes were intended to represent the ghosts of Confederate soldiers and evoke the history of slave patrols.[63] Their hoods also allowed KKK members to remain anonymous as they spread fear and violence.[64] In order to re-exert control over the African American labor force and maintain white supremacy, the KKK used fear tactics and violence, such as robbery, rape, arson, and murder.[65] The KKK was effective at targeting its violence and intimidation tactics at African American voters, including hanging and beating African American officeholders.[66] It is unknown how many African American people were killed by white supremacists during Reconstruction, though it is estimated to be in the high thousands, if not tens of thousands.[67]

In the late 1860s, the KKK began to decline as it succumbed to infighting and increased federal scrutiny.[68] The federal Enforcement Acts of 1870 and 1871, in conjunction with federal policing, helped weaken the KKK.[69] When the KKK formally disbanded by the end of Reconstruction, the KKK had achieved its objectives, as white southerners were able to openly revive many aspects of life during enslavement.[70] Having effectively intimidated and suppressed African American voters, and without the presence of federal troops to protect African American voters, white southerners were successful in retaking control of state governments.[71] Once in control, white supremacists passed laws to take away the rights that African American Southerners had gained during Reconstruction.[72] It also became less necessary to wear a mask to commit violent crimes against African Americans, as public lynching became an openly accepted part of Southern culture and was tolerated by law enforcement.[73]

State and local governments often looked the other way or supported the KKK. Although state governments passed laws in response to the KKK's violence, these laws were seldom locally enforced.[74] Sheriffs, prosecutors, local witnesses, and jurors were sympathetic to white supremacy or afraid of retaliation.[75] Some attacks were even led by local police.[76] Thus, few KKK members ever went to prison for their crimes.[77] And while the federal Enforcement Acts of the early 1870s helped lead to the dissolution of the KKK, the Supreme Court largely nullified the Enforcement Acts with its 1876 decision in United States v. Cruikshank, which hindered federal prosecutions and enabled white supremacist violence.[78]

It is unknown how many Black people were killed by white supremacists during Reconstruction, though it is estimated to be in the high thousands, if not tens of thousands.

Second Iteration of the Ku Klux Klan

The second iteration of the Ku Klux Klan began in 1915, continued through the late 1920s and 1930s, and disbanded by 1944.[79] After the end of Reconstruction, the KKK remained dormant until 1915, when the California film industry played a unique role in reviving the KKK. That year, celebrated filmmaker D.W. Griffith released The Birth of a Nation, which was based on Thomas Dixon's novel The Clansman.[80] Made in and around Los Angeles, The Birth of a Nation is acknowledged both as one of the most pioneering and most racist films in cinematic history.[81] President Woodrow Wilson praised The Birth of a Nation and showed the film at the White House—a federal government endorsement of white supremacy and anti-Blackness.[82]

In writing The Clansman, Dixon openly wished to depict the "suffering" of white Southerners during Reconstruction and to advocate

COURTESY OF SCHOMBURG CENTER FOR RESEARCH IN BLACK CULTURE/THE NEW YORK PUBLIC LIBRARY

"Armed crowds searching for a negro," Chicago. (1922)

white supremacy.[83] The Birth of a Nation, recognized as historically inaccurate racist propaganda, adhered closely to the source material's racism.[84] For instance, the film portrayed lynching as rightful retribution against an African American man accused of sexually assaulting a white woman.[85] Griffith would later say that the heroic depiction of the KKK coming to rescue the South from African American advancement during Reconstruction "was needed to serve the purpose."[86]

The Birth of a Nation was a nationwide blockbuster, and its popularity led directly to the KKK's revival just months after its release.[87] During a five-year national roadshow of the film from 1915 to 1919, a scholar found that the film incited significant increases in racial violence.[88] The counties where the film was shown were five times more likely to have a lynching or race riot, and three times more likely to have a KKK chapter after the movie's arrival.[89] As a result of this surge in recruitment, there were four to five million KKK members by the mid-1920s.[90] The film remained a KKK recruiting tool for decades.[91]

Having supporters and members in prominent positions of power allowed the KKK to act with impunity. For example, the KKK was able to commit lynchings in front of a public audience and leave bodies on display—all without intervention by law enforcement.

Unlike the first iteration of the KKK, this version had a broader geographic base of support beyond the South, including in California.[92] This second version of the KKK was generally considered to be less violent, as it focused on gaining influence through the political process.[93] In this regard, it succeeded: during the 1920s, the KKK's membership included state government officials in Alabama, Colorado, Georgia, Indiana, Louisiana, Oklahoma, Oregon, and Texas.[94] Neither major political party was willing to formally repudiate the KKK out of fear of political repercussions.[95]

Regardless of its political turn, the second iteration of the KKK remained violent. In the summer of 1921, the KKK engaged in whippings and tar-and-feather raids.[96] According to the Southern Poverty Law Center, the KKK also "use[d] acid to brand the letters 'KKK' on the foreheads of [African Americans], Jews, and others" whom the KKK considered to be anti-American.[97] In the mid-1920s, the KKK launched a terror campaign including lynchings, shootings, and whippings against African Americans, Jews, Catholics, Mexicans, and other immigrant groups.[98]

Eventually, after a series of scandals, in-fighting, and a change in public perception of its image, the second iteration of the KKK lost credibility, and its membership declined in the late 1920s and 1930s.[99]

Third Iteration of the Ku Klux Klan and Hate Groups Today

A third version of the Ku Klux Klan arose in the 1950s and 1960s.[100] While the KKK still exists today, it has been in decline since the late 1980s.[101] This time, the KKK returned to its anti-Black roots to counter the social and political gains sought by the Civil Rights Movement.[102] This version of the KKK was particularly violent against African Americans and civil rights workers in the South.[103] For example, in 1963, the KKK detonated a bomb at a Birmingham Baptist church that killed four African American girls and injured several more.[104] KKK members also murdered three civil rights workers in Mississippi in 1964.[105] As recently as 1981, Klansmen in Mobile, Alabama lynched African American 19-year-old Michael Donald.[106] His mother brought a civil suit against the KKK and won a $7 million award after one of the perpetrators admitted he was carrying out an organization-wide directive to harass, intimidate, and murder African American people.[107]

An essential part of the success of the KKK is that their actions and ethos were sanctioned by white society—a recurring theme in the history of racial terror.[108] Rarely did the perpetrators face punishment, as ministers, editors, sheriffs, police officers, judges, and elected officials ignored or participated in the violence.[109] Having supporters and members in prominent positions of power allowed the KKK to act with impunity.[110] For example, the KKK was able to commit lynchings in front of a public audience and leave bodies on display—all without intervention by law enforcement.[111] Witnesses often obstructed any investigation or prosecution for these acts by refusing to give information.[112] Police not only refused to intervene, but also gave the KKK information about potential targets.[113] Thus, where the KKK led, white society followed, participated, and looked on.

While the KKK no longer enjoys the degree of sociopolitical power it once held,[114] contemporary white supremacist groups have taken up the KKK's mantle to threaten the dignified existence of African Americans and others. The 2017 white nationalist rally in Charlottesville,[115] the Proud Boys,[116] and a 2021 "White Lives Matter" rally in Orange County[117] have variously invoked the symbols, propaganda, and ideology of the KKK.

California

Neither racial terror nor the Ku Klux Klan were confined to the South.[118] During Reconstruction, the federal government did not send troops to California, as a non-slave state.[119] This allowed white supremacy groups to flourish in the West.[120] The western KKK complemented their southern counterparts by violently asserting white superiority against the perceived threat of racial outsiders.[121] As the African American population in California was relatively small at the time, the KKK and other hate groups mainly terrorized Chinese communities.[122]

In 1922, for example, Democrat Thomas Lee Woolwine lost his bid for California governor, suggesting that his fight against the KKK was a political liability. The KKK backed winning candidate Republican Friend Richardson—who was believed to have been a KKK member, and which he never denied.

During the second iteration of the KKK, California became a "strong Klan state" with a sizable and violent Klan resurgence in the 1920s.[123] Shortly after the release of The Birth of a Nation, the KKK emerged in San Francisco, establishing a KKK presence in California for the first time.[124] KKK chapters in Los Angeles, Oakland, Fresno, Riverside, Sacramento, Anaheim, and San Jose soon followed.[125]

The KKK's national magazine, Imperial Night-Hawk, shows that California ranked 11th out of all 48 states in terms of the number of KKK events held between March 1923 and November 1924.[126] By hosting 89 events in that 20month period, California even outranked the old enslavement states of Mississippi, Louisiana, North Carolina, and Tennessee.[127]

California's KKK consisted of prominent individuals who held positions in civil leadership and police departments.[128] Its members were largely middle-class, educated Protestants who, in socioeconomic terms, were not much different from their neighbors.[129] These KKK members registered to vote (in higher percentages than non-members), joined civic organizations like the Chamber of Commerce and rotary club, and sought political power by running for elected office or supporting candidates who sympathized with the KKK.[130]

The California KKK exerted significant political influence in the 1920s, winning seats on city councils, gaining control of the press and airwaves in some towns, and pressuring other public officials.[131] In 1922, for example, Democrat Thomas Lee Woolwine lost his bid for governor, suggesting that his fight against the KKK was a political liability.[132] The KKK backed winning candidate Republican Friend Richardson—who was believed to have been a KKK member, and which he never denied.[133]

While the KKK declined on a national scale in the 1930s with the Great Depression, and after the 1925 trial and conviction of the KKK's then-leader, California's KKK remained active through the 1940s and into the 1950s.[134] As detailed below, the KKK had branches—and spread terror—throughout the state, and exercised significant power in local governments.

The Ku Klux Klan in Southern California.

Los Angeles was the epicenter of Ku Klux Klan activity in California.[135] Prominent and numerous city government

COURTESY OF BETTMANN VIA GETTY IMAGES

About fifty members of the Ku Klux Klan held a cross burning ceremony on a small ranch outside of Sacramento. Gun-toting guards wearing Klan outfits and helmets surrounded the ranch, while members made speeches and paraded around the burning cross. (May 3, 1980)

officials were KKK members or had KKK ties, including the mayor, district attorneys, and police officers.[136] Due to aggressive recruitment efforts beginning in 1921, several KKK branches formed in Los Angeles.[137] KKK chapters also formed in the nearby communities of Santa Monica, Huntington Park, Redondo Beach, Hermosa Beach, Long Beach, Glendale, San Pedro, and Anaheim.[138]

By the 1920s, the Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD) was "a den of corruption" that was infiltrated with KKK members who practiced retaliatory policing in the city's African American neighborhoods.[139] "In speaking to the police, you are frequently talking to the Klan," warned the Eagle, an African American Los Angeles newspaper.[140] Los Angeles Deputy Sheriff Nathan Baker regularly recruited KKK members to the Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD) and was thought to be a member of the KKK himself.[141]

On April 22, 1922, more than 100 armed and hooded Klansmen broke into the Inglewood home of Spanish immigrants.[142] The Klansmen forced the couple's two teenage daughters to disrobe and ransacked the house.[143] The Klansmen then brutally beat, bound, and gagged the father and his brother, dragged them to a car, and dumped them six miles away.[144] Thirty-seven Klansmen were indicted for the Inglewood raid, but in a trial that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) called a "farce," all were acquitted.[145]

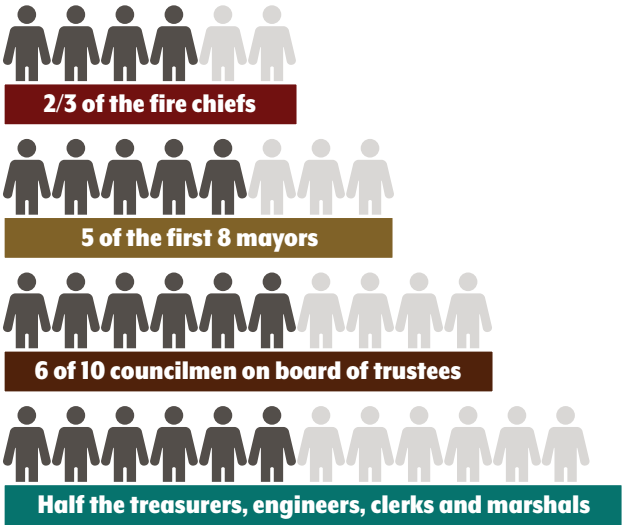
The raid prompted an investigation by the District Attorney, who obtained membership lists revealing that the KKK had infiltrated all levels of state and local government.[146] There were 3,000 KKK members in Los Angeles County, over 1,000 in the city limits, and three KKK members on the District Attorney's own staff.[147] LAPD Chief Louis D. Oaks and County Sheriff William I. Traeger were also identified as members.[148] Law enforcement from nearly every city in California appeared on the list, including 25 San Francisco police officers.[149]

Even after the Inglewood raid exposed the breadth of KKK membership, and after the Legislature passed an anti-KKK bill, the KKK still proceeded to hold nine events in Los Angeles between March 1923 and April 1924.[150] The raid and its aftermath inspired KKK members and caused the KKK to redouble its efforts.[151] In 1929, KKK supporters helped elect John C. Porter, who had a past with the KKK, as mayor of Los Angeles.[152] And in the 1930s, even after enthusiasm for the KKK began to subside, the KKK still remained active in Los Angeles and the surrounding community, with rallies attended by thousands of people and cross-burnings.[153]

In December 1939, the KKK ceremoniously marched through downtown Los Angeles burning crosses in full view of thousands of people.[154]

Beyond Los Angeles, the KKK was active throughout Southern California, including in Orange County, Riverside, and San Diego.[155]

KLANSMEN IN THE TOWN OF BREA 1924-1936



In Anaheim, by 1923, the KKK had almost 900 members,[156] out of a total city population of about 6,000.[157] Its members generally held more prestigious jobs than the rest of the white population and were politically and civically active.[158] The Anaheim KKK burned crosses and held rallies drawing thousands of people.[159] One such event, an initiation in July 1924, attracted 20,000 people and included a parade of Klansmen with a marching band, airplanes, and fireworks.[160] By spring 1924, the KKK dominated the Anaheim city council, which had initiated a program to replace non-KKK city employees with its own members. Their plan succeeded: ten new policemen, out of 15, were members of the KKK.[161]

In Brea, five of the town's first eight mayors were Klansmen, as were six of the 10 councilmen who sat on the board of trustees, half of the city's treasurers, half of the city's engineers, half of its city clerks, half of its city marshals, and two-thirds of its fire chiefs between 1924

In the 1920s, Los Angeles Deputy Sheriff Nathan Baker regularly recruited KKK members to the Los Angeles Police Department and was thought to be a member of the KKK himself.

and 1936.[162] And in Fullerton, from 1918 to 1930, seven of 18 city councilmen were Klansmen.[163]

The Riverside KKK were successful recruiters, claiming over 2,000 members in the 1920s.[164] In Riverside, the KKK held mass events that attracted thousands of people and included parades with marching bands, floats, and KKK members in full regalia.[165] The Riverside KKK prioritized policing interracial contact, which meant monitoring African American residents' activities.[166] For example, the KKK was preoccupied with the City's 1922 settlement with the NAACP to desegregate a white-only pool.[167] In response, they targeted African American swimmers with humiliation and violence.[168] The Riverside KKK gained political influence, and in 1927, helped elect a mayor, Edward M. Deighton, who openly boasted about his support from the KKK.[169] In the 1930s, Riverside Sheriff Carl Rayburn openly sympathized with the KKK, and "KIGY," meaning "Klan I Greet You," was painted on streets and sidewalks throughout the county.[170] The KKK's membership in Riverside decreased in the 1930s, but they still made appearances and burned crosses.[171]

The San Diego KKK, in the 1920s and 1930s, focused on using violence and other intimidating tactics to "chas[e] the wetbacks across the border."[172] The KKK in the 1930s also merged with other racist and fascist groups, such as the Silver Shirts League, that were focused on attacking African Americans, Latino Americans, and Jews.[173]

The Ku Klux Klan in the Central Valley

The Ku Klux Klan had an active presence in Fresno and Kern County.[174] As of 1922, a local Fresno newspaper reported over 240 alleged Klansmen in Fresno County, and the KKK held public events and parades with as many as 600 attendees during the early to mid-1920s.[175] The investigation in the aftermath of the Inglewood raid also revealed that a number of Fresno officials were KKK members.[176]

In the early 1920s, the KKK actively recruited in Kern County and developed what was considered the most violent KKK chapter in California.[177] In Kern County, in 1922 alone, there were over 100 cases of KKK violence, which included extrajudicial beatings, kidnappings, and tar-and-feathering.[178] In 1922, a local newspaper reported that several high-ranking officials in Kern County were associated with the KKK, including the deputy sheriff, the police chief, the Board of Supervisors chair, and a former assistant district attorney.[179] Although the KKK's influence started to decline in the 1930s,[180] white supremacist culture persisted in Kern County in the decades that followed.[181] As recently as the 1960s, a sign across the Kern River between Oildale and Bakersfield read "Nigger, Don't Let the Sun Set on You in Oildale."[182] There were also unconfirmed reports that a similar sign was spray painted on the same bridge as recently as the late 1990s.[183] In 1981, three KKK members were arrested for burning a cross on the front lawn of an African American family in the Kern County town of Boron, and KKK rallies were reported as recently as 1987.[184] In the early 1990s, African American motorists were attacked on the streets of Oildale by whites hurling racial slurs and epithets.[185] In the 2000s, members of the white supremacist group the Peckerwoods were involved in multiple violent attacks against African American, Hispanic, and Asian American residents that involved the use of racial slurs.[186]

During the 2000s in the California Central Valley, members of the white supremacist group the Peckerwoods were involved in multiple violent attacks against Black, Hispanic, and Asian American residents that involved the use of racial slurs.

The Ku Klux Klan in Northern California and the Bay Area.

The Ku Klux Klan established a presence in the Bay Area during the 1920s.[187] By 1922, there were KKK chapters in San Francisco, Oakland, and San Jose.[188] In addition to burning crosses, KKK chapters in the Bay Area held rallies, initiation events, and public parades, which were attended by thousands.[189] In Oakland, the politically active KKK took control of the city government to create policy that would limit African American home ownership, including by embracing restrictive covenants.[190] Between 1921 and 1924, the Oakland KKK grew to at least 2,000, and the chapter enjoyed political success well into the 1920s, winning an election for county sheriff in 1926 and city commissioner in 1927.[191] The Oakland KKK also operated as a vigilante group, accompanying federal agents on prohibition raids.[192]

IV. Forms of Racial Terror: Violent Tools of Social Control

Racial terror has taken many forms throughout its long history. Although the primary component of racial terror is physical violence, perpetrators of racial terror have also destroyed and repossessed African American property. And given the public nature of racial terror, overt action has often been unnecessary. Threats and intimidation have often successfully kept African Americans from voting, living in certain neighborhoods, and exercising other civil rights. As one scholar has argued, "fear of physical death not only hinders the possibility of freedom, but also limits productive and meaningful living.... [A]s [the oppressed] submit to oppression and preserve biological life, they invariably suffer a degree of psychological and social death."[193]

From Reconstruction onward, racial terror undermined African Americans' legal rights, with lasting social repercussions. By attacking African Americans who were never found guilty in a court of law, racial terror popularized the idea that African American people bear a presumption of guilt—contrary to the presumption of innocence, which the Supreme Court has described as "foundation[al]" to "our criminal law."[194] Many white lynch mobs killed African American criminal suspects who were later found to be innocent.[195] Some African American men were even lynched after a jury found them innocent of their alleged offense.[196] White people justified racial terror as a mode of self-defense against African Americans, as a tactic to deter future perpetrators, regardless of whether a crime had actually been committed.[197] This history of racial terror reinforced a view that African Americans were dangerous criminals who posed a threat to white society.[198]

Lynching

Key Features of Lynching

The most gruesomely iconic form of racial terror was lynching: violent and public acts of torture, which were largely tolerated by officials at all levels of government.[199] Such violence traumatized African American people throughout the country, although it most frequently occurred in the South.[200] Although lynchings were carried out against individual victims, the practice of lynching was ultimately aimed at the entire African American community.[201] Indeed, historians have described the trauma of lynching as a "contagion" that has a "multiplier effect" across families, communities, and generations.[202] Much like Jim Crow laws and racial segregation, lynching was primarily a method of enforcing the political, economic, and cultural exploitation of African Americans.[203] For instance, after Booker T. Washington visited the White House to meet with President Theodore Roosevelt, South Carolina Senator Benjamin Tillman remarked, "now that Roosevelt has eaten with that nigger Washington, we shall have to kill a thousand niggers to get them back to their places."[204]

Lynching was often carried out as a public spectacle. It did not simply involve hanging; rather, public lynching often featured the prolonged torture, mutilation, dismemberment, and/or burning of the victim.[205] These events attracted large crowds of white people, often numbering in the thousands, which included elected officials, prominent citizens, and entire families, including children.[206] Children were given front-row views of the victim, imprinting upon their minds for the rest of their life the concept that African American people do not deserve human dignity.[207] The white press justified and promoted these carnival-like events, while vendors sold food, and printers produced postcards featuring photographs of the lynching and corpse.[208] Spectators would fight over fingers, ears, toes, sexual organs, and other body parts as souvenirs.[209] The physical objects associated with a lynching were prized mementos for the crowd.[210]

COURTESY OF LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Large crowd looking at the burned body of Jesse Washington, 18 year-old African American, lynched in Waco, Texas. (May 15, 1916)

The publicity of lynchings not only terrorized African Americans, but also allowed white communities to economically and politically benefit. The terror of being lynched prevented African Americans from achieving political power, and preserved them as a compliant, intimidated workforce.[211] This, in turn, largely maintained the Southern economy as it was during enslavement.[212] And while lynching was overwhelmingly (though not exclusively) a Southern phenomenon,[213] its effects were felt throughout the United States—just as white supremacists intended to victimize and oppress all African Americans.[214]

Lynchings to Maintain White Supremacy

Lynchings were based on a broad range of perceived violations of the racial caste system. Hundreds of African American people were lynched after being accused of murder or rape, though almost none were legally convicted of their alleged crimes.[215] Regardless, lynching is never an acceptable form of punishment. Many lynchings were based on weak or contrived evidence.[216] For example, white men perpetuated the myth of the "unbridled, brutish, black rapist" to justify lynching African American men for allegedly sexually assaulting white women.[217] The lynchings of African American men accused of rape or sexual assault often involved castration, which underscored how white men felt threatened by African American men and used lynching to attack African American manhood.[218]

Judges contributed to these outcomes by presiding over a process that systematically excluded African Americans from juries, mistreated Black witnesses, and held trials in jurisdictions with a racist bias.

Many lynchings were based on much more minor accusations. According to the Tuskegee Institute, approximately 30 percent of lynching victims were accused of nonviolent "offenses."[219] Some victims were lynched only for minor social transgressions, or for demanding basic rights and fair treatment. African American victims were lynched for referring to a white police officer by name, associating with white women, accidentally bumping into a white woman, "passing" as white, speaking out about racial equality, testifying on behalf of an African American defendant, and refusing to take off an Army uniform after returning from World War I.[220]

African Americans were also lynched for asserting their labor rights and economic rights. For example, in 1918, an African American man in Earle, Arkansas refused to work on a white-owned farm without pay.[221] In response, the white citizens of the city cut him into pieces with butcher knives and hung his remains from a tree.[222] In numerous instances, African Americans were also lynched after disputes over wages or debts: in such disputes, if a white person became violent and an African American person reacted in self-defense, the African American person was often lynched for murder or assault.[223] By killing African Americans for seeking fair treatment or for trivial social disputes, white Americans continued to assert the total control they had held over African American lives during slavery.

Apart from responding to specific accusations, lynchings were used to drive African American residents from a community. For example, after a 1912 lynching in Forsyth County, Georgia, white vigilantes distributed leaflets demanding that all African American people leave the county or suffer deadly consequences.[224] As a result, the African American population dropped from 1,100 to 30 in eight years.[225] And in 1918, in Unicoi County, Tennessee, after lynching an African American man, a group of white men rounded up 60 African American residents—including children—and forced them to watch the corpse burn.[226] The white people told the African American people in the town to leave the county within 24 hours.[227]

Lynchings also united white Americans of all socioeconomic levels. The public violence of lynchings portrayed the white population as strongly allied against the perceived threat of African Americans.[228] White mobs asserted their racial superiority by publicly torturing and killing African American victims.[229] Through the Jim Crow period, white Americans experienced divisions along political, economic, and social lines.[230] Although poor white Americans may have lived in conditions more similar to those of poor African Americans, lynching helped prevent interracial class-based alliances by unifying white Americans around a core purpose and identity.[231]

Complicit Government Officials

Government actors, including police officers, prosecutors, judges, and elected officials, tacitly approved of or assisted in lynchings.[232] Law enforcement officers released African American people who had been incarcerated to mobs, placed African American prisoners in areas where lynch mobs were known to gather, joined mobs to find African Americans, and assisted with lynchings.[233] Prosecutors and law enforcement regularly failed to identify and try lynchers for their crimes.[234] Only one percent of all lynchings after 1900 resulted in a conviction.[235] Judges contributed to these outcomes by presiding over a process that systematically excluded African Americans from juries, mistreated African American witnesses, and held trials in jurisdictions with a racist bias.[236] Local coroners and coroners' juries refused to indict lynchers and made impossible conclusions—such as ruling a death was a suicide after an African American farmer was found riddled with bullets.[237]

Throughout the South, state and local politicians protected the perpetrators of violent acts instead of protecting African American Southerners from extrajudicial violence.[238] Some governors, rather than condemn lynchings, made statements that focused on the accused crime of the lynched African American person—suggesting that the lynching was justified—and in other cases, affirmatively supported the lynching.[239] And government officials outside the South did little to stop the campaign of widespread lynching.[240] National leaders, for their part, failed to pass even one of more than 100 anti-lynching bills that were proposed in Congress between 1852 and 1951.[241]

While there is no conclusive evidence proving that the death penalty replaced lynching in the South, data shows that executions increased as lynchings declined. Indeed, Southerners themselves referred to these executions as "legal lynchings," and Southern leaders argued that African Americans could be intimidated and controlled just as effectively with the death penalty.

The public was also complicit. Studies show that thousands of white people, at all levels of class and educational status, participated directly in lynch mobs. Many more participated as spectators, and millions did nothing.[242] Participants, meanwhile, were protected by a code of silence.[243] Because witnesses refused to cooperate with law enforcement, criminal investigations were thwarted, and the perpetrators of lynchings were able to avoid accountability.[244]

The Prevalence of Lynching over Time

Despite numerous efforts, it is impossible to know how many African American people were killed by lynching. In the late 19th century, Ida B. Wells started the Red Record Efforts to identify incidents of extreme racial violence for research, advocacy, and public policy purposes.[245] Other researchers and activists have followed Wells' lead, but there is disagreement on figures among those who study racial terror. Researchers use different criteria of what counts as a lynching, and perpetrators hide their crimes—to list just two reasons that there is no definitive number of African American lynching victims.[246] By any measure, however, lynching occurred in every region of the United States, with victims of all races and genders.[247] And despite disagreement over exact numbers, there is a consensus that between the Civil War and World War II, thousands of African Americans were lynched in the United States and were the primary targets of lynch mobs.[248] The nonprofit organization Equal Justice Initiative, for example, counts nearly 6,500 lynchings nationwide between 1865 and 1950.[249] Any count of lynchings, however, will fall short of the true number, as a result of inadequate reporting at the time, lack of documentation, cover-ups by perpetrators and local officials, and other gaps in the evidence.[250]

Equal Justice Initiative estimates 6,500 lynchings nationwide between 1865 and 1950, although any count is an underestimate because of gaps in the evidence like inadequate reporting at the time, lack of documentation, and cover-ups.

In the 1890s, when the frequency of lynchings peaked, an average of 104 African American people were estimated to have been killed each year by lynch mobs.[251] Then, as African American Southerners moved north and west, lynching rates steadily declined during the 1930s, 1940s, and 1950s, and lynchings eventually became extraordinary events.[252] Thus, when 15-year-old Emmett Till was lynched in 1954 for allegedly whistling at a white woman,[253] and when a white mob abducted Mack Charles Parker from his jail cell and lynched him in 1959,[254] the killings provoked national public outrage.[255] However, the decline in lynchings did not correspond with an end to the racial caste system that led to lynchings in the first place.[256] Rather, the decline can be attributed to strict segregation laws, tactics of disenfranchisement, and the surge of the death penalty.[257]

Beginning in the early 1900s, white Southerners began to fear that the barbaric imagery of lynching would harm the Southern economy.[258] The death penalty offered a more respectable form of violence and the appearance of the rule of law.[259] As early as the 1930s, lynchings were often avoided when government actors made clear that the accused would receive a swift judicial conviction and execution.[260] While there is no conclusive evidence proving that the death penalty replaced lynching in the South, data shows that executions increased as lynchings declined.[261] Indeed, Southerners themselves referred to these executions as "legal lynchings," and Southern leaders argued that African Americans could be intimidated and controlled just as effectively with the death penalty.[262] And "legal lynchings," like actual lynchings, disproportionately victimized African Americans.[263] From the 1890s to the 1950s, between 53 and 81 percent of lynchings and executions were of African Americans, although African Americans represented approximately only 10 percent of the entire U.S. population.[264]

By 1915, court-ordered executions outpaced lynchings in the former slave states for the first time, and by the 1930s, two-thirds of those executed were African American—a trend that would continue.[265] While African American people were executed for allegedly killing white people, the reverse was not true. As lynchings declined from 1930 to 1970, there was a sharp increase in the number of African Americans who were executed for rape, but there is no evidence that a white person was executed for raping an African American woman.[266] According to one study, out of more than 11,000 executions in the United States, only two white men were executed for killing an African American person.[267] Another study of approximately 15,000 executions, from colonial times to the 1990s, found that white people were executed for killing African American people in only 29 cases—and in most of those cases, the defendants had also killed white people.[268] These trends in executions reinforce a central theme of lynching: that the lives of African American people were worth less than those of white people.[269]

Postcard depicting the lynching of Lige Daniels, Center, TX. A mob of over 1,000 men stormed the county jail and took the young man who was both charged with and confessed to the murder of a local farmer's wife. (1920)

Mob Violence

Whereas lynching involves group action against a person as a response to that person's alleged wrongdoing, mob violence involves assaults by civilians of one ethnic group on members of another ethnic group on the basis of their ethnicity.[270] These tactics were often used together against the African American community.[271] Lynchings were sometimes followed by mob violence, with white mobs burning Black homes, devastating African American neighborhoods, and forcing African American residents to relocate.[272] Mob violence was motivated by the same objectives as lynchings, including extinguishing African Americans' political influence and economic gains, and maintaining social control over African Americans.[273]

A study of approximately 15,000 executions, from colonial times to the 1990s, found that white people were executed for killing Black people in only 29 cases—and in most of those cases, the defendants had also killed white people.

The racial hierarchy benefited from mob violence. Mob violence was a ritual that built a sense of community among white people and helped the South to sustain a cohesive culture of white supremacy and enforce legal segregation.[274] (As discussed above, mass participation was a typical element of lynchings, which drew upwards of thousands of spectators.[275]) But mass violence was not strictly a Southern phenomenon. White mob violence occurred in several Northern states prior to 1865, including New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio.[276] These Northern white mobs, which numbered in the hundreds or thousands, attacked and killed African American people and set fire to African American properties.[277] The violence was often accompanied by inaction or inadequate response by law enforcement.[278] Virtually none of the perpetrators were prosecuted or convicted; those that were, received extremely lenient punishments.[279]

When white Americans felt African Americans threatened their superiority, mob violence sometimes escalated into massacres, destroying cohesive African American communities and the prosperity that they built.[280] Historically, these attacks have often been called "riots" or "race riots," but these terms obscure the nature of this violence. Throughout Reconstruction, segregation, and the civil rights era, so-called riots were actually massacres. In these attacks, white mobs proactively killed African Americans and destroyed African American property, though the African American victims were often blamed for inciting the violence in the immediate aftermath.[281] This pattern of violence has evolved and continued through the 20th and 21st centuries, as is discussed in greater detail in Chapter 11 An Unjust Legal System.

Massacres inflicted tremendous damage upon African American lives and property.[282] It is estimated that over 100 such massacres occurred between the end of the Civil War and the 1940s.[283] Among several notable examples,[284] the 1921 Tulsa Race Massacre is especially prominent. In Tulsa, Oklahoma, in 1921, an African American man was arrested for allegedly assaulting a white woman.[285] In response, a white mob looted, burned homes and businesses, and murdered at least 300 Black people in Greenwood, a prosperous Black neighborhood known as "Black Wall Street."[286] Over the course of 24 hours on May 31 and June 1, the mob destroyed 35 square blocks, more than 1,200 Black-owned homes, over 60 businesses, a hospital, a public library, and a dozen African American churches.[287] Thousands of African American Tulsans were left homeless and placed in internment camps.[288] Lawyer and reparations advocate Eric J. Miller has testified that, in addition to death and destruction, the massacre inflicted catastrophic mental and emotional trauma upon the African American survivors and their descendants.[289] The destruction remained over generations as the city, state, and chamber of commerce worked to prevent rebuilding and turned away funding that could have benefited Greenwood.[290]

The Tulsa Race Massacre Commission confirmed that Tulsa officials not only did nothing to prevent the massacre, but also participated in the violence and provided firearms and ammunition to the mob.[291] Indeed, the city and county police deputized hundreds of white people to participate in the massacre, and the Oklahoma National Guard joined the massacre as well.[292] The Commission's report confirmed that no one prosecuted or punished any of the perpetrators for the violent acts that occurred, despite overwhelming evidence of their guilt.[293] Instead, the all-white grand jury falsely blamed African American people for the massacre.[294] As stated in the grand jury report: "There was no mob spirit among the whites, no talk of lynching and no arms. The assembly was quiet until the arrival of the armed Negros, which precipitated and was the direct cause of the entire affair."[295]

This example also highlights the role of the government, at all levels, in mob violence, just as government had once enforced the legal regime of slavery. By looking the other way, declining to prosecute mob members, or by actively fomenting and assisting mob violence, government officials enabled violent white mobs to devastate African American communities.

COURTESY OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY ARCHIVE/UNIVERSAL IMAGES GROUP VIA GETTY IMAGES

Photograph shows destroyed houses and billowing smoke during the Tulsa Race Massacre, when a white mob attacked the predominantly African American Greenwood neighborhood of Tulsa, Oklahoma. (1921)

Torture

Southern lynchings often included torture of the victim before death, in addition to burning, mutilation, and decapitation after death.[296] The torture preceding public killings usually lasted hours, and could involve shoving a hot poker iron down the victim's throat and pressing it against their body; gouging out eyes; castration; cutting off hands and feet; tearing into the flesh with a large corkscrew; and burning the victim alive.[297] As historian Leon F. Litwack explains: "The story of a lynching . . . is the story of slow, methodical, sadistic, often highly inventive forms of torture and mutilation."[298]

Torture was thus another method with which white people sought to punish African American people for stepping beyond their relegated social roles.[299] Victims were often tortured even if they were not convicted of any crime, such as when two brothers in Paris, Texas were tortured for trying to escape abusive work conditions.[300]

Like slave patrols, police violence during Jim Crow was intended to intimidate Black communities and subordinate African Americans within the segregated social order.

As lynching became less common, so too did the accompanying torture. But just as lynching was replaced with the "legal lynching" of state executions, the police used torture to extract confessions from African American suspects.[301] The police objective was to quickly convict the suspects.[302] Thus, even facing the death penalty, African American suspects were frequently denied a fair and impartial trial.[303]

For example, in 1938, Dave Canty, an African American man, was arrested for killing a white woman and wounding another in the course of a robbery in Montgomery, Alabama.[304] After hours of police questioning, Canty signed a written confession, admitting responsibility for the attack.[305] At trial, however, Canty testified from the witness stand that the police had forced him to confess by torturing him.[306] He gave detailed information about the torture and his torturers, and he showed his wounds and scars to the jury.[307] Police officers and prison staff, however, denied Canty's account of his torture, and at the conclusion of his three-day trial, Canty was sentenced to death.[308] After a new trial reduced his sentence to life in prison, Canty died in the same prison in which he claimed to have been tortured.[309]

Unlike lynching, this form of torture was not public.[310] In fact, hiding it was critical to supporting a racist system.[311] It was difficult for victims and advocates to realize the prevalence of torture, and denials and secrecy made it more difficult to fight the practice.[312] When torture was reported and individuals tried to bring charges, allegations and evidence were ignored and invalidated by white judges, prosecutors, and other officials.[313] While this practice occurred throughout the country, it was especially prevalent in large cities like Chicago and New York City, as well as the American South.[314] There were very rarely any consequences for violence used by police in coercing confessions.[315] Police officers often denied the use of such violence, while claiming that regulating police work would lead to an increase in crime.[316] Thus, the decline of lynching and public torture was not a sign of enlightenment.[317] Rather, lynching and torture developed into more modern forms of racial violence—namely, swift executions and coerced confessions.[318] Evidence suggests that police continue to coerce confessions from suspects, including Black suspects, leading to wrongful convictions and years of undeserved jail time.[319] From the early 1970s to the early 1990s, for example, then-Chicago Police Commander Jon Burge led officers in torturing over 125 suspects into confessing to crimes, most of whom were African American, and many of whom have said their confessions were false.[320] Burge was convicted for lying under oath about the torture.[321]

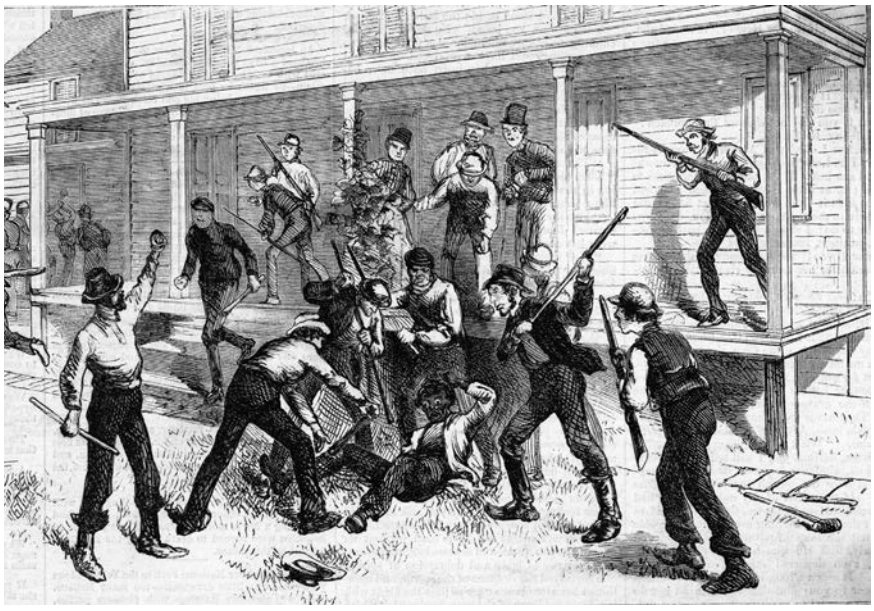
Police Killings and Vigilantism

State-sanctioned violence against African Americans continues today in the form of extrajudicial violence by police officers and vigilantes.

Police Violence as a Modern Form of Lynching

Throughout American history, including the present day, the police have held the power to strip African American people of their rights and lives for any reason—or for no reason at all. Police violence is a leading cause of death for African American people in America.[322] Today's extrajudicial killings have historical roots in the social control of slave patrols,[323] the lynchings of the late 1800s and early 1900s, and police violence against African American Southerners during legal segregation.[324] Slave patrols, which began in the early 1700s, were made up of white volunteers.[325] Patrollers were empowered to forcibly discipline enslaved persons, crush potential uprisings, and return enslaved persons who had escaped to their enslavers.[326] Like slave patrols, police violence during Jim Crow was intended to intimidate African American communities and subordinate African Americans within the segregated social order.[327]

COURTESY OF THEODORE R. DAVIS/BETTMANN VIA GETTY IMAGES



Print shows a scene during a riot between Irish American and African American railroad workers employed by the Easton and Amboy Railroad to build the Musconetcong Tunnel, in which Denis Powell, an African American man, is beaten to death by a mob of white men, during the Pattenburg Massacre, Pattenburg, New Jersey. (1872)

From the end of the Civil War through the early 20th century, racialized policing was often tailored to local concerns.[328] In urban areas, in response to growing economic competition between white workers and African American workers moving to cities, the police targeted African American residents with curfews, high incarceration rates, and violence—often deadly violence.[329] In rural areas, sheriffs and deputy sheriffs enjoyed essentially unchecked power from their white constituents.[330] As a result, the police violently enforced the racist social order against African American citizens, even for seemingly minor transgressions.[331]

As recognized by the United Nations Working Group of Experts on People of African Descent, "contemporary police killings and the trauma that they create are reminiscent of the past racial terror of lynching."[332] Recent incidents of police violence demonstrate this connection. The British Broadcasting Company has collected a list of recent high-profile killings of African Americans by police,[333] highlighting just a fraction of the more than 1,500 African Americans killed by police since 2015.[334] In 2016, after a Minneapolis police officer killed Philando Castile during a traffic stop,[335] Castile's sister said, "It's just like we're animals. It's basically modern-day lynching that we're seeing going on, except we're not getting hung by a tree anymore—we're getting killed on camera."[336] Similarly, in 2020, George Floyd was stopped for allegedly using a counterfeit $20 bill, which could have been handled with a ticket.[337] Instead, Floyd was killed by an officer kneeling on his neck for nine minutes and 29 seconds.[338] Historian Arica Coleman described Floyd's death as "a modern-day lynching."[339]

Vigilantism Continues Today

In addition to extrajudicial police violence, our country's history of lynching is reflected in the vigilantism taken against African American people, even when they have not committed any offense.[340] The Southern Poverty Law Center has compiled a list of African Americans (and white activists) killed during the Civil Rights Movement.[341] More recent examples of this violence are the killings of Trayvon Martin and Ahmaud Arbery. In 2012, George Zimmerman shot and killed the unarmed, 17-year-old Trayvon Martin, who Zimmerman described as a "suspicious person" in his neighborhood.[342] After Zimmerman was acquitted for the shooting, in the tradition of lynching, he auctioned his gun as a souvenir.[343]

In 2020, while Ahmaud Arbery was out for a jog, he was chased, attacked, and killed by three white men who claimed he resembled a suspect in local break-ins (although no police reports were filed about the alleged break-ins). Arbery was unarmed, and as he lay dying on the ground, one of the white men called him a "fucking nigger."[344] Arbery's family called the killing a lynching.[345] The three men attempted to use a citizen's arrest provision added into the Georgia Code of 1863.[346] The men argued that the 1863 provision allowed them to arrest another person if a crime was committed "within his immediate knowledge."[347] The Georgia Code was drafted in part by Thomas R.R. Cobb, a legal scholar who claimed that an African American mother "suffers little" when her children are stolen from her, since she lacked maternal feelings.[348] Cobb helped write principles of white supremacy into Georgia law, including a provision that presumed African Americans were enslaved people unless proven otherwise.[349] The citizen's arrest provision was significantly weakened in 2021 in the wake of Arbery's murder.[350]

As with lynchings, a lack of accountability appears to exist for police violence and vigilantism. The Guardian reports that out of 1,136 killings registered in 2015, only 18 law enforcement officers were charged with crimes.[351] Moreover, the United Nations found that federal, state, and county regulations on use of force and firearms do not comport with international standards, which makes it more likely that extrajudicial violence against African American individuals will continue.[352]

Moreover, the United Nations found that federal, state, and county regulations on use of force and firearms do not comport with international standards, which makes it more likely that extrajudicial violence against Black individuals will continue.

Sexual Violence and Eugenics

As further discussed in Chapter 12, Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect, the African American female body has been brutally and routinely compromised in the absence of legal protection. African American women faced forced procreation during enslavement, while after enslavement, African American women were forcibly sterilized.[353] As with other forms of racial terror, sexual violence served the social, economic, and political goals of white supremacy.

As discussed in Chapter 2 Enslavement, enslavers used sexual violence and the threat of sexual violence as a way to control enslaved African American people. Enslavers also used sexual violence and forced procreation to grow their fortunes.

While the end of enslavement as an institution may have removed an economic incentive for sexual violence, African American women have continued to suffer from the violence that arises from stereotypes projected upon them. During the Jim Crow era, white men used rape and threats of rape to oppress African Americans, and particularly African American women.[354] Throughout their daily routines, African American women and girls faced the threat of sexual violence by white men.[355] Rapes during Jim Crow were intended to maintain white domination and for white men's sexual gratification.[356] Some rapes also took place during other instances of racial violence, such as attacks to steal African American land and destroy African American property.[357] White men were rarely punished for committing sexual violence against African American women and girls, while African Americans frequently faced retaliation for reporting such attacks.[358]

As discussed in Chapter 11 An Unjust Legal System, Black women continue to be depicted through tropes of hypersexuality, creating a myth that Black women cannot credibly claim to be victims of sexual violence.[359]

African American women also suffered a different kind of sexual violence as a result of the eugenics movement. During the early 20th century, the eugenics movement, which claimed to be acting according to "scientific" principles and for the good of human society, scrutinized African American sexual behavior and reproduction. The result was that African American people, and especially African American women, were disproportionately forced into sterility.[360] This is discussed in detail in Chapter 12, Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect.

Family Separation and Violence Against Children

The threat of selling non-compliant enslaved people away from their families was one of the most terrifying tools of coercion that enslavers wielded to control enslaved persons and suppress rebellions.[361]As discussed above, under the laws of slave states, the status of a newborn followed the status of their mother.[362] Separation was horrifying and traumatic to the parents and their children.[363] Children and their parents were treated not as people, who loved and cared for each other, one generation after another, but as bodies used exclusively for labor.[364] Frederick Douglass said that he began to understand himself as a slave following the separation from his mother, as in the absence of nurturing kin, he was completely subjected to the will of others.[365] The practice of selling away infants was so common that it was a focus of the northern abolitionist movement, and according to Professor Laura Briggs, in the 1850s, many Southern states outlawed taking infants from their mothers in an effort to prove that slavery was not as bad as antislavery northerners claimed.[366]

After enslavement, Southern states re-enslaved African American children, removing them from their parents, and forcing them into so-called apprenticeships to white former enslavers.[367] The children, sometimes as young as six, worked for white families as if they were enslaved.[368] Throughout the 20th century, government officials disproportionately separated African American children from their families to threaten and coerce mothers into withdrawing from welfare programs.[369] A detailed discussion of family separation is in Chapter 8, Pathologizing the African American Family.

COURTESY OF SCHOMBURG CENTER FOR RESEARCH IN BLACK CULTURE/THE NEW YORK PUBLIC LIBRARY

"Whites stoning Negro to death," Chicago. (1922)

Mass incarceration, another tool of racist social control, has also had the consequence of breaking up African American families. The war on drugs, beginning with Richard Nixon's 1968 presidential campaign, was explicitly designed to target the antiwar left and African Americans.[370] Due to these policies, by 2015, one in nine African American children had at least one parent in prison.[371] At the same time, African American families were targeted by racist policing of parenting.[372] African American children were increasingly placed in the child welfare system due to parental neglect—but in reality, this "neglect" was often only poverty.[373] These two forms of racist policing combined to double and then triple the rate of incarceration of African American women during the 1980s.[374] Eighty percent of these women had children living with them at the time of the arrest, many of whom were then placed in foster care.[375] As a result, between 1985 and 1988, the number of children in out-of-home placement—foster care, psychiatric institutions, and the juvenile justice system—increased by 25 percent.[376]

Hundreds of white people were responsible for looting, killing, and destroying property, enabled and assisted by Tulsa government officials. The massacre caused $1.8 million in property damage—$25 million in today's dollars, though others estimate that the damage totaled $50 to $100 million in today's dollars. However, no one, except one white pawnshop, was given any compensation for the damage.

Finally, African American children have faced disproportionate police violence. As discussed above, law enforcement continues to treat Black people as a dangerous criminal group; Black children are no exception.[377] A 2020 study led by Children's National Hospital researchers found that Black youth are six times likelier than white youth to be shot and killed by police.[378] A detailed discussion of the criminalization of African American children is in Chapter 11, An Unjust Legal System.

Economic Terror

White people have used various types of racial violence in order to erase African American economic gains, allowing the unrestricted theft of African American labor during enslavement to carry on in new forms. In the 1890s, the prominent journalist and anti-lynching advocate Ida B. Wells conducted a detailed study of lynchings and found that the vast majority were not in response to sexual crimes, but were rather motivated by economic or political concerns.[379] For example, perpetrators initiated attacks as a form of economic intimidation against African Americans who disputed labor contracts.[380] Employers also whipped and lynched African American freedmen who argued with them or left the plantations where they were contracted to work.[381]

Once African Americans became successful, ran businesses, and owned homes, they were even more targeted. In the South, even before the Civil War, the Associated Press reports that 24,000 acres of land were stolen from 406 African American landowners, including by means of racial terror.[382] The success of African American neighborhoods and African American individuals triggered white mobs to initiate violence,[383] as white Americans felt threatened by the growing economic power and independence of African American communities.[384]

There are numerous historical examples of economically motivated violence against prosperous African American communities.[385] Perhaps the most significant example is the 1921 Tulsa massacre, discussed above in relation to mob violence, in which a white mob devastated the prosperous Black neighborhood of Greenwood.[386] In 1997, the Oklahoma legislature formed the 1921 Tulsa Race Riot Commission (recently renamed the Tulsa Race Massacre Commission[387]), which was tasked with investigating the Tulsa massacre and recommending methods for reparations.[388] The Commission confirmed that hundreds of white people were responsible for looting, killing, and destroying property, enabled and assisted by Tulsa government officials.[389] The Commission found that the massacre caused $1.8 million in property damage—$25 million in today's dollars, though others estimate that the damage totaled $50 to $100 million in today's dollars.[390] However, the Commission found that no one, except one white pawnshop, was given any compensation for the damage to their property, and there was no other benefit or restitution for victims.[391]

Economically motivated violence was also directed at prosperous African American individuals, not just communities and neighborhoods. An illustrative case is that of Elmore Bolling, a successful African American man in Lowenesboro, Alabama.[392] He owned a small fleet of trucks that ran livestock and made deliveries, and he also leased a plantation where he had a general store with a gas station and a catering business.[393] At the peak of his business, Bolling employed 40 other African American people.[394] In December 1947, a group of white men showed up at Bolling's home where he lived with his wife and seven children, shot him seven times, and left him in a ditch to die.[395] At the time of Bolling's death, the family had $40,000 in the bank and more than $5,000 in assets (approximately $500,000 in today's dollars), but creditors (or those who purported to be creditors) took the money, leaving the family with nothing.[396] As someone told the local newspaper at the time, "He was too successful to be a Negro."[397]

In addition to attacks on successful African American business owners, white people also committed racial violence against African American individuals who moved into white neighborhoods.[398] Their goal was to pressure the new African American residents to move away and maintain housing segregation, as discussed in Chapter 5, Housing Segregation.[399] Such violence consisted of pelting homes with rocks, throwing bricks and firebombs at homes, setting garages on fire, and beating African American neighbors in the streets.[400]

Political Terror

Just as groups of white people responded violently to African American economic gains, they also resorted to violence to set back African American political gains. African American voters, and political candidates favored by African American voters, were intimidated and sometimes murdered.[401] By using violence, white Americans kept their grip on political power. They used this power to oppress African Americans and prevent African Americans from achieving equal levels of wealth and political influence. In this way, even after slavery ended, African Americans were often prevented from achieving political power and influence.

COURTESY OF PHOTO12/UNIVERSAL IMAGES VIA GETTY IMAGES

Ku Klux Klan parade on Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington D.C. with the U.S. Capitol Building in the background. (1926)

Reconstruction—and the resulting political gains made by African Americans—provoked violent backlash from white southerners.[402] Violence typically soared right before elections, as the Ku Klux Klan and other white supremacist groups strategically targeted their violence to deny African American voters access to the polls, or to sway election results by forcing African American voters to vote for Democrats.[403] As white supremacists killed thousands of African Americans over numerous attacks during Reconstruction,[404] the balance of power began to shift against Reconstruction and Republicans.[405]

For example, in 1868, in response to growing African American support for Republican candidates in St. Landry Parish, Louisiana, white people terrorized the African American community.[406] Over the course of two weeks, the attacks left more than 100 African American people dead—and by some estimates, over 200.[407] The white attackers achieved their intended effect: although the parish gave 5,000 votes to the Republican governor in the spring 1868 election, there was not a single Republican vote counted in the fall 1868 election in the parish.[408] The Republican Party was unable to recover in the parish for the remainder of Reconstruction.[409]

White supremacists also assassinated political figures. On the eve of the 1868 election, KKK members murdered James Hinds, a white Republican member of the U.S. House of Representatives who advocated for African American civil rights.[410] This was the first-ever assassination of a U.S. congressman.[411] When Benjamin Franklin Randolph, an African American state senator from South Carolina, was assassinated in 1868, the Ku Klux Klan was suspected of his murder, though no one was convicted of the crime.[412] Similarly, in 1875, election results split the Florida legislature evenly between Republicans and Democrats.[413] White supremacist assassins broke the tie by killing E.G. Johnson, an African American state senator, to give the Democrats a majority.[414]

After Reconstruction, Southern white politicians sought to advance white supremacy in state governments and to push back against federal laws protecting African American voting rights.[415] They relied on lynching and vigilante violence to achieve these political goals.[416] As the national lynching rate soared, in 1892, the Southern-dominated Democratic Party was able to win the White

BECAUSE OF POLITICAL TERROR

BLACK VOTING IN SOUTH CAROLINA DECLINED 97% 1876-1900

IMAGE SUPPLIED BY BETTMANN/BETTMANN VIA GETTY IMAGES

House and a majority of Congress.[417] In response, the Republican Party abandoned racial equality as part of its platform.[418] White supremacists were thus able to take control of state governments and pass laws that, in combination with racial terror, suppressed African American voters.[419] For instance, while more than 90,000 African American citizens voted in South Carolina in 1876, by the end of the 19th century, less than 3,000 African American citizens voted.[420] While African American people represented a majority of registered voters in Mississippi in 1868, only six percent of eligible African American people were registered to vote in Mississippi in 1890.[421] And in Louisiana, the number of African American registered voters dropped from 130,344 to 5,320 between 1896 and 1900.[422]

Voter suppression was not always enough for white supremacists. In one instance, they also directly overthrew the local government. After the 1898 election in Wilmington, North Carolina, armed white men overtook the Republican-led city government.[423] A months-long voter suppression agenda culminated on Election Day, when armed white men patrolled Wilmington to intimidate African American voters and their allies, and white supremacists threatened poll workers as they counted ballots.[424] In one precinct, a group of 150 to 200 white men caused a scuffle, and in the process, stuffed ballot boxes to secure their party's victory.[425] After the election, African American people were massacred in the street.[426] A mob of nearly 2,000 white people indiscriminately murdered between 30 and 100 African American men, women, and children, and forced 2,000 other African American residents off their property.[427]

Meanwhile, a mob of over 100 white men occupied the Wilmington city hall and forced city officials to resign under threat of violence.[428] All of those elected officials resigned and were replaced by men selected by an all-white committee.[429] The new city leadership fired all African American municipal employees, and banned prominent African American leaders, African American businessmen, and white Republicans from the city.[430] There was no state investigation of the violence in Wilmington, and the federal investigation produced no indictments.[431] To date, this has been the only successful coup d'état of a U.S. American government.[432]

Similar political violence continued into the 20th century. In Ocoee, Florida, on Election Day 1920, a mob of 250 white people, including KKK members, killed dozens of African Americans, set fire to their homes, and drove them out of the city to prevent them from voting.[433] This massacre has been called the "single bloodiest election day in modern American history."[434]

Due to this extensive history of violence and political repression, it was not always necessary for the KKK or other white supremacists to take direct violent action to intimidate African American voters from the polls.

After the 1898 election in Wilmington, North Carolina, armed white men overtook the government, murdered between 30 and 100 Black men, women, and children, and forced 2,000 other Black residents off their property. To date, this has been the only successful coup d'état of a U.S. American government.

Threats were often just as effective. For example, in August 1922, just a year after the Tulsa massacre, the KKK reportedly flew over Oklahoma City in airplanes, dropping cards into Black neighborhoods, warning people to be cautious before heading to the polls.[435] That same year, the Topeka State Journal reported that the KKK committed to staking out polling places in Texas to "take careful note of the voting procedure."[436]

Racist voter intimidation continues in contemporary times. During the 2016 election, neo-Nazi and white supremacist groups, including the KKK and the Oath Keepers, organized poll watchers in all 50 states, focusing on urban areas.[437] In the 2020 presidential debate, President Trump told his supporters to "go into the polls and watch very closely," and told a white supremacist organization, the Proud Boys, to "stand by."[438]

The racist overtones that surrounded the 2020 election culminated in the January 6, 2021 Capitol Riot, where armed white people violently stormed the U.S. Capitol while Congress was counting the electoral vote.[439] The rioters shouted racist epithets at African American Capitol Police officers, paraded around the Capitol waving a Confederate flag,[440] and built a gallows to hang a noose in front of the Capitol building.[441] This was the first time the Confederate flag was brought into the Capitol as an act of insurrection, something that was not even done during the Civil War.[442]

Further discussion of the use of violence and terror to suppress the development and rise of African American political power is in Chapter 4, Political Disenfranchisement.

Cross-Burning and Other Forms of Intimidation

Even when not physical in nature, the perpetrators of racial terror used the threat of violence to intimidate African Americans and preserve the American racial hierarchy. The Ku Klux Klan, for example, often conducted masked rides through towns at night to frighten African American residents, an intimidation technique that mirrored antebellum slave patrols.[443] As discussed above, slave patrols used violence to discipline enslaved persons, prevent uprisings, and capture enslaved persons who managed to escape.[444] Furthermore, the KKK's disguises were designed to capitalize on the superstitions of formerly enslaved people, and their activities resembled plantation scare tactics.[445]

The KKK also frequently burned crosses.[446] While the cross-burning itself may not have physically harmed anyone, it undoubtedly became a well-known symbol of racial terror to intimidate minorities.[447] During oral argument in Virginia v. Black, a 2002 case contemplating whether a state could criminalize burning a cross, Justice Thomas made a point of connecting the "symbol" of cross-burning to its terrorizing effect: the burning cross is "unlike any symbol in our society . . . . There's no other purpose to the cross, no communication, no particular message."[448] As he explained, the burning cross "was intended to cause fear and to terrorize a population."[449] In his opinion in the case, Justice Thomas observed that a cross-burning could serve only to "terrorize and intimidate": "In our culture, cross burning has almost invariably meant lawlessness and understandably instills in its victims well-grounded fear of physical violence."[450]

Government entities have also used tactics of racial intimidation to subjugate African American citizens and enforce white supremacy. The State of Mississippi, for example, created the Mississippi State Sovereignty Commission, which formally existed from 1956 to 1977, and was funded from the state budget.[451] The Sovereignty Commission was an intelligence organization targeting civil rights activists and engaged in spying, intimidation, false imprisonment, and jury tampering.[452] The Sovereignty Commission served as a model for similar agencies fighting to oppose racial justice in other states.[453] The Sovereignty Commission's activity was involved in the false imprisonment of Clyde Kennard.[454] Kennard, an African American man, attempted to integrate a segregated local college in Hattiesburg, Mississippi.[455] Files of the Sovereignty Commission reveal that state officials openly discussed that they would prefer to kill or frame Kennard rather than allow him to enroll.[456]

California

Western Vigilantism

In its first decades of statehood, California had a reputation for vigilantism, including extralegal executions by hanging.[457] For example, the lynching of people who committed crimes was a common method of "justice" in gold mines,[458] and Placerville was originally known as "Hangtown."[459] As in the South, California lynchings involved active participation by law enforcement.[460]

Ken Gonzales-Day, an expert in California lynchings, found evidence of 352 lynchings that occurred between 1850 and 1935, including of eight African Americans, but mostly of Native, Chinese, and Latino Americans.[461] (As discussed above, counts of lynchings are lower than the true number, due to lack of documentation and cover-up efforts.[462]) As was the case elsewhere in the United States, African American Californians were often lynched in response to labor disputes or alleged crimes.[463] In the 1871 Chinese massacre, 10 percent of Los Angeles (500 people) formed a mob and lynched 17 Chinese men and boys because they believed that Chinese people had killed a white saloon owner.[464] Barely anyone was held accountable for these and the other many murders of people of color.[465]

A 1933 lynching of two white kidnappers in San Jose put a stamp of approval on lynching nationwide.[466] The lynching received more attention than any other lynching in U.S. history, partly because the victims were white—an anomaly for lynchings.[467] Then-California Governor James Rolph praised the lynchers and vowed to pardon them if they were charged.[468] Although the victims in the San Jose lynching were white, anti-lynching activists understood at the time that African Americans, who were the typical target of lynchings, would face the repercussions for the glorification of the San Jose lynching.[469] As such, they swiftly and widely condemned the lynching and the Governor's response.[470]

Fearful of a growing Black population, and emboldened by the silence and cooperation of police and government officials, the KKK initiated a new wave of violent activity in the late 1930s and 1940s to stem the influx of Black populations—or to keep Black people entirely out of white communities.

The anti-lynching activists were correct: mobs in other parts of the country followed the Governor's enthusiastic endorsement to perpetrate their own lynchings, mostly of African Americans.[471] The fact that the San Jose lynching occurred in the West underscored that lynching was a national, not solely Southern, problem.[472] But the lynching and the subsequent praise of the mob by the Governor also lent credibility to the practice of lynching and decoupled its exclusive association with Jim Crow.[473] The New York Times reported in 1933 that southerners widely reacted to the San Jose lynching by remarking, "California's my address from now on," or "those Westerners are learning how the South handles 'em."[474] The Times concluded that, by endorsing the practice of lynching, the Governor of California had gone further than some Southern governors who had sought to prevent lynchings.[475]

Backlash against African American Prosperity

As was the case elsewhere in the country, the Ku Klux Klan and other perpetrators of racial violence in California focused their attacks against those who threatened the system of racial and socioeconomic subjugation of African Americans—those African American people who found well-paying jobs, amassed wealth, bought homes, used public pools and parks, and otherwise engaged in civil society.

The surge of KKK activity, and its accompanying violence, was connected to the migration of over a quarter million African Americans to California during World War II—the state with the largest increase in its African American population during that time.[476] The "Great Migration" was inspired, at least in part, by the recurring incidents of racial terror throughout the South, as well as the poor economic, political, and social conditions that African American Southerners experienced.[477] California, which was experiencing a dramatic increase in manufacturing jobs during World War II, was an appealing destination.[478] California's African American wartime workers, as the African American press noted, had a higher standard of living compared to African American workers in the South.[479] Simultaneously, new KKK members moved to California during World War II just as African American homeowners renewed their offensive against restricted housing.[480]

The comparative freedoms that African American Californians enjoyed motivated white supremacists to organize against African American workers and homeowners (as well as other non-white veterans, such as Mexican and Japanese veterans, returning from the war).[481] White people were threatened by African Americans with good jobs who purchased property, voted, and inhabited public spaces and institutions.[482] Fearful of a growing African American population, and emboldened by the silence and cooperation of police and government officials, the KKK initiated a new wave of violent activity in the late 1930s and 1940s to stem the influx of African American populations—or to keep African American people entirely out of white communities.[483] For instance, the KKK's resurgence in the Inland Empire and Southern California in the 1940s was linked to the gains made by African American workers, homeowners, and civil rights activists.[484]

Throughout California, the revived KKK had one primary goal: to enforce racial segregation and maintain the social inferiority of African Americans.[485] They aimed to keep neighborhoods, schools, pools, parks, and beaches all-white and monitor people of color who transgressed racial boundaries.[486] For further discussion of residential segregation, see Chapter 5, Housing Segregation.

Violence Against African American Homeowners

Violence to stifle and reverse African American advancement was perhaps most evident in the attacks on African American homeowners during the 1940s. As new African American migrants were able to afford homeownership, white supremacist backlash grew.[487] The Ku Klux Klan sought to promote segregation and prevent the integration of African American residents into white neighborhoods.[488] Violence against African American homeowners in California peaked in the 1940s.[489] The KKK mainly relied on arson and physical attacks on homeowners to intimidate people of color from buying in majority-white neighborhoods.[490] This practice dates back to 1909, when white Pasadena residents set fire to the homes of African American arrivals in the neighborhood.[491]

This violence was thoroughly racist. The violence against African American homeowners was not caused by concern over a "lower social class of neighbors," as the African American homeowners were often of a higher occupational and social status than the white attackers.[492] Similarly, when African American homeowners moved into a neighborhood, they took better care of their homes and lawns than their white neighbors.[493]

The murder of O'Day Short, a refrigeration engineer, is emblematic of the racial terror perpetrated against African American communities during the 1940s in California. After he and his family moved into the white neighborhood of Fontana in 1945, Short was threatened by police, and a local vigilante group said it wanted the Shorts out of the neighborhood.[494] On December 6, 1945, two weeks after they moved in, the Shorts died in a house fire that killed the family of four.[495] As with much of the violence against African Americans, state officials failed to hold anyone accountable for the murder, and inexplicably blamed the fire on the Shorts.[496] ThenCalifornia Attorney General Robert W. Kenny investigated the murder, but the report failed to confirm that vigilantes caused the fire or that there was any vigilante activity in the community.[497] The NAACP called the report a "white wash."[498]

Violence against Black homeowners in California peaked in the 1940s. The KKK mainly relied on arson and physical attacks on homeowners to intimidate people of color from buying in majority-white neighborhoods. This practice dates back to 1909, when white Pasadena residents set fire to the homes of Black arrivals in the neighborhood.

The murder of the Shorts, and the subsequent failure to hold the perpetrators accountable, confirmed to the power of white supremacy in California. A Los Angeles Sentinel editorial said: "Jim Crow had kept Short from finding a home in Los Angeles; Jim Crow had cast him in the role of a violator of Community traditions if he built a house on the lot he purchased; Jim Crow had warped the sense of duty of deputy sheriffs to the extent that they themselves had joined in a plan to deprive an American citizen of his constitutional rights...All the Shorts are dead. Only Jim Crow is alive."[499]

Within months following the explosion at the Shorts' home, African American homeowners were increasingly under attack by the KKK in Southern California.[500] For example, the KKK staged a comeback in Big Bear Valley focused on restrictive covenants, violence, and cross burnings.[501] The KKK's stated goal was to achieve a "One Hundred Per Cent Gentile Community."[502]

Coercive Sterilization

As discussed in Chapter 12, Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect, California was one of the first states to begin forcibly sterilizing people in the early 1900s, and conducted by far the most sterilizations in the United States (one third of the nationwide total).[503] From 1909 to 1979, under the state eugenics law, California state institutions forcibly sterilized approximately 20,000 people deemed "unfit to produce."[504] While men made up the majority of sterilizations at first, by the 1930s, women were more frequently the subject of sterilizations, and in the middle of the century, nearly all of the operations were performed on women.[505] African American people were also disproportionately sterilized in California.[506] They constituted just over one percent of California's population in the 1920s, yet they accounted for four percent of total sterilizations by the State of California.[507]

Extrajudicial Police Violence

Scholars have argued that extrajudicial violence by police officers represents a modern form of lynching. In California, since 2015, 158 African American people were shot and killed by police, at least 16 of whom were known to be unarmed.[508] Among those whose race and ethnicity were known, African American people represent 18.9 percent of those killed by the police, despite representing only six percent of the population.[509] Those responsible for these killings have largely never been found to be criminally liable.[510] The Los Angeles Times reports, for example, that since 2001, Los Angeles County law enforcement has killed over 900 people—nearly 80 percent of whom were African American or Latino.[511] On average, one police shooting occurred every five days.[512] Out of all of those cases, only two officers were charged as a result of a civilian shot on duty, and in virtually all of the cases, the Los Angeles County District Attorney deemed the use of force legally justified.[513] Similarly, officers with the Vallejo Police Department killed 19 people from 2010 to 2020, but no Vallejo police officer has been found to be criminally liable for killing a civilian while on duty.[514]

Below are only a few examples of the hundreds of incidents where police have used extrajudicial violence in California to inflict pain or cause death, a topic that is discussed in greater detail in Chapter 11 An Unjust Legal System. In general, these acts of violence were often the result of officers enflaming or failing to de-escalate the situation, and sometimes occurred in a manner that appeared to show little regard for the African American lives harmed or killed. Taken together, these incidents can be understood to perpetuate the myth of African American criminality and function as a threat to the overall well-being of African American people, whom law enforcement may often consciously or unconsciously view as dangerous criminals.

- In 1991, four LAPD officers repeatedly beat Rodney King on the ground with batons for 15 minutes while a dozen officers stood by and watched.[515] He was unarmed.[516] The officers had used racial slurs to refer to King over the LAPD communications systems.[517] The officers who committed the beating—three of whom were white—were acquitted, which sparked local unrest.[518]

- In 1998, four officers were called to help Tyisha Miller, who had locked herself in the car and fallen asleep.[519] When the officers failed to wake her from outside, they broke her window to grab the firearm that was sitting in her lap.[520] That caused Miller to bolt upright, and the officers shot her out of fear—firing 24 bullets and shooting her 12 times in the chest.[521] While the officers were fired, the U.S. Justice Department's civil rights division—as well as the California Department of Justice, which was conducting a civil investigation into the police department as a whole—declined to bring charges against the individual officers.[522]

- On New Years' Day 2009, Bay Area Rapid Transit police officers responded to a report of fighting on a train.[523] One officer pinned Oscar Grant down with a knee on his neck.[524] While Grant was lying face-down, the other officer purportedly mistook his gun for a Taser and shot Grant.[525] The officer who shot Grant was convicted of involuntary manslaughter.[526]

- In November 2013, Tyler Damon Woods was shot by police while on his knees after fleeing a traffic stop by foot.[527] The officers believed he was armed, which was inaccurate, and shot at Woods approximately 39 times.[528] Nineteen bullets hit him, six of which were each individually enough to kill Woods.[529] The police continued to shoot him, claiming he exhibited superhuman resilience.[530]

- In 2019, Vallejo police responded to a wellness request for Willie McCoy, a 20-year-old African American man who was asleep in his car in a Taco Bell parking lot.[531] Six officers surrounded the cars when McCoy started to wake up.[532] The police claimed that McCoy was reaching for a firearm—which did not appear to be supported by the police video—and six police officers fired 55 shots at McCoy, killing him.[533] All of the officers involved in the shooting returned to their regular duties. McCoy's family said McCoy was "executed by a firing squad."[534]

In the 1990s, a federal district court found that a group of deputies in the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department, known as the Lynwood Vikings, was "a neo-Nazi, white supremacist gang" that engaged in "terrorist-type tactics" with the knowledge and acquiescence of their superiors. The court found that these gangs committed "systemic acts of shooting, killing, brutality, terrorism, house-trashing, and other acts of lawlessness and wanton abuse of power," particularly against Latinos and Black people.

- In August 2020, the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department stopped Dijon Kizzee for "riding a bicycle on the wrong side of the road" and "splitting traffic."[535] Kizzee refused to stop, abandoned his bicycle, and fled on foot.[536] The Sheriff's office claims that deputies fired when Kizzee reached back to pick up a gun he dropped, but video evidence appears to contradict this claim.[537] An independent autopsy concluded that Kizzee was struck 15 times by two deputies' 19 rounds.[538] After they fired, the deputies called for backup, and Kizzee bled to death on the street.[539]

There have also been incidents where law enforcement officers in California have participated in racist, nativist, and sexist social media activity online; showed white supremacist sympathies; or worse, systematically carried out attacks against minority members of the community.[540] In the 1990s, a federal district court found that a group of deputies in the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department, known as the Lynwood Vikings, was "a neo-Nazi, white supremacist gang" that engaged in "terrorist-type tactics" with the knowledge and acquiescence of their superiors.[541] The court found that these gangs committed "systemic acts of shooting, killing, brutality, terrorism, house-trashing, and other acts of lawlessness and wanton abuse of power," particularly against Latinos and African American people.[542] In 1996, the Sheriff's Department paid $9 million in fines and training costs to settle the matter.[543] Despite that settlement, according to independent reports, law enforcement gangs still allegedly thrive in low-income, high-minority areas of Los Angeles, where they have allegedly committed excessive force against minority members of the communities, sometimes using racial epithets while doing so.[544]

V. Legacy: Devaluing African American Lives

As discussed above, racial terror played a critical role in white efforts to subjugate African American people to an inferior economic, political, and social stature and maintain the caste structure that was established during enslavement. As such, racial terror has contributed to many racial inequities in America today.[545] While African American communities have remained resilient in the face of numerous structural, social, economic, and political barriers, the threat of racial violence continues to harm African Americans.[546]

Criminal Justice

The legacy of the Ku Klux Klan's infiltration of law enforcement continues today. Law enforcement officers in at least 14 states, including California, have been tied to white supremacist groups and far-right militant activities.[547] Advocates and scholars have argued that police killings of unarmed African American people should be understood as the modern-day equivalent of lynching. Just as the threat of lynching controlled African Americans, the threat of murder by police imposes controls on the lives of African Americans. Today, some African American parents feel compelled to educate their children early on about how to interact with racialized targeting by the police.[548] As was the case with lynchings, those involved in these extrajudicial killings are only rarely held accountable for their actions.[549]

Created during enslavement in order for white enslavers to control African American enslaved people, and perpetuated through lynchings, the racist myth that African American people are criminals continues today. As discussed in Chapter 11, An Unjust Legal System, this myth of African American criminality still contributes to racial disparities between African Americans and white Americans in arrests, convictions, and imprisonment.[550] The death penalty, which scholars argue is a vestige of racialized violence against African Americans, also discussed in Chapter 11 An Unjust Legal System, disproportionately kills African Americans.[551] Death penalty lawyer Stephen B. Bright argues that capital punishment in the United States is so thoroughly compromised by bias and racial disparities that it must be understood as "a direct descendent of lynching."[552]

Economic Effects

Violence and terror targeting African Americans has directly destroyed African American wealth—which has a compounding effect over time to prevent African Americans from amassing more wealth and thus contributing greatly to the wealth gap.[553] The disparities are stark: white Americans have seven times the wealth of African Americans.[554] Although African American people make up nearly 13 percent of the U.S. population, they hold less than three percent of the nation's wealth.[555] The median family wealth for white people is $171,000, compared to $17,600 for African American people.[556] And 19 percent of African American households have zero or negative net worth, compared to nine percent of white families.[557]

The effect of violence by the Ku Klux Klan, buttressed by the support of law enforcement, real estate brokers, and federal loan programs, paved the way for segregated neighborhoods with unequal city services for Black neighborhoods.

Lynchings, police brutality, and other forms of violence and intimidation were used to seize land from African American farmers, rendering African Americans landless and unable to accumulate generational wealth.[558] Although African American farmers collectively increased their land holdings at a greater rate than whites between 1900 and 1920, African American farm owners lost 57 percent of their land, whereas white farm owners lost 22 percent of their land, from 1900 to 1978.[559]

Images of mutilated bodies on public display or dragged through the streets traumatized the psyche of African Americans. These images left an especially indelible impression on Black children, framing their view of the world as a dangerous and unpredictable place, and causing lifelong damage.

Similarly, rates of African American homeownership have stagnated and declined. In 1909, 36 percent of African American residents of Los Angeles were homeowners before the implementation of policies and carrying out of violent acts designed to prevent African American home ownership.[560] By 2021, the rate of African American homeownership had declined to 34 percent.[561]

The effect of violence by the Ku Klux Klan, buttressed by the support of law enforcement, real estate brokers, and federal loan programs, paved the way for segregated neighborhoods with unequal city services for African American neighborhoods.[562] In Los Angeles, for example, African American residents were pushed to neighborhoods like Watts, while the city stopped running street cars that would have transported African American workers to shipyard and aircraft jobs in other parts of the city, limiting African American employment opportunities.[563] Even though KKK activities declined after the 1940s, the KKK had already succeeded in restricting African American opportunities for wealth and homeownership at a time of significant economic opportunity after the end of World War II.[564]

Although the 1968 Fair Housing Act made violence to prevent neighborhood integration a federal crime, and the U.S. Department of Justice prosecuted several cases, frequent attacks on African Americans attempting to move into predominantly white areas continued into the 1980s, with 130 cases of move-in violence in 1989 alone.[565] Not until the late 1980s were a majority of these crimes prosecuted.[566] The broad lack of enforcement sent a message that these crimes were tolerable, which emboldened perpetrators to continue their violent actions.[567]

Impact on Health and Family Life

Fear of racial terror, past and present, has also resulted in trans-generational trauma for African Americans. African American families and communities were profoundly affected by lynchings.[568] The constant threat of lynching affected interpersonal interactions.[569] Family members of victims could not obtain justice out of fear that they too would be lynched, and they were often frightened to even attend a funeral of their lynched loved one.[570] Images of mutilated bodies on public display or dragged through the streets traumatized the psyche of African Americans.[571] These images left an especially indelible impression on African American children, framing their view of the world as a dangerous and unpredictable place, and causing lifelong damage, including sleep disturbances, flashbacks, and emotional detachment.[572]

These psychological traumas have extended across generations. Violence has reinforced white supremacist cultural and institutional systems, while the arbitrary nature of lynching socialized African American people to understand that any act of perceived insubordination could be a matter of life or death.[573] In this way, racial terror was a powerful tool for social, educational, and political control, as it encouraged African American people to change their own behavior and avoid opportunities for advancement, lest they risk being the victim of violence.[574] African Americans continue to experience the effects of trauma induced by racial terror today, including heightened suspicion and sensitivity to threat, chronic stress, decreased immune system functioning, and greater risks of depression, anxiety, and substance use.[575]

The history of racial terror has influenced the use of violence by both white people and African American people in the present day.[576] For example, in Mississippi and North Carolina, studies show that African American people are killed at a higher rate in counties that had more lynchings and anti-civil-rights violence.[577] The legacy of racial terror encourages vigilante violence among white communities.[578] And, in African American communities, the government's failure to protect African Americans from lynching has fostered the use of violence for self-help.[579] As a result, criminologists have linked higher rates of African American involvement in crime with the violent racial subordination of African Americans.[580]

VI. Conclusion

As a badge of slavery, racial terror has enforced the domination of a racial hierarchy set in place in service of slavery. After the formal end of slavery, racial terror became a method by which white Americans and the nation as a whole sought to keep African Americans as poor and powerless as they had been while enslaved. From slavery through to the present day, racial terror has gravely harmed African Americans mentally and physically.

Racial terror often takes direct forms, such as physical assault, threats of injury, and destruction of property. It also inflicts psychological trauma on those who witness the harm and injury.[581] Lynchings and other forms of racial terror occurred in communities where African Americans today remain marginalized, disproportionately poor, overrepresented in prisons and jails, and underrepresented in positions of influence. The traumatic experience of surviving mass violence creates insecurity, mistrust, and alienation—psychological harms that were amplified by the dangers inherent in navigating Southern racial boundaries.[582] Lynchings in the American South were not isolated hate crimes committed by rogue vigilantes. Lynchings were targeted racial violence that formed part of a systematic campaign of terror perpetrated in furtherance of an unjust social order. Selective public memory compounds the harm of officials' complicity in lynching and maintains the otherness of African American people.[583]

The same is true of other forms of racial terror such as mob violence, torture, extrajudicial violence, sterilization and sexual violence, and economic and politically influenced terror. Racialized terror is woven into the fabric of America, and although many racial groups have been victims, perhaps no racial group has been targeted more than African Americans. From the violence of enslavement to contemporary police killings, both actual and threatened violence against African Americans has functioned to establish and maintain white supremacy.[584] Federal, state, and local governments have been complicit in the infliction of terror through silence, failure to hold the perpetrators accountable, and even on some occasions, endorsement of the actions. California is no exception; the state, its local governments, and its people have played a significant role in enabling racial terror and its legacy to persist here in California.

The tactics of white supremacy at any time in history are simultaneously overtly violent and subversively traumatic for African Americans. Racial terror remains the constant backdrop and tool for other forms of discrimination intended to exert control of African Americans—from redlining and segregated schools to disparate healthcare and denial of bank loans—that has prevented many African Americans throughout history from living a dignified life of equal opportunity.

Endnotes

[1] See Equal Justice Initiative (EJI), Lynching in America: Confronting the Legacy of Racial Terror (2015), p. 3 (as of April 4, 2022) (EJI 2015).

[2] Ibid. at p. 3.

[3] Coates, The Case for Reparations, The Atlantic (June 2014) (as of April 4, 2022) (Case for Reparations); Byman, The Failure of Counterterrorism After the Civil War, Lawfare (Aug. 22, 2021) (as of April 4, 2022) (Lawfare); Niraj Chokshi, Racism at American Pools Isn't New: A Look at a Long History, N.Y. Times (Aug. 1, 2018) (as of April 4, 2022).

[4] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 3, 7; EJI, Lynching in America: Confronting the Legacy of Racial Terror: Third Edition (2017), pp. 48-50, 65, 73 (as of April 4, 2022) (EJI 3d ed.); Wilkerson, Caste: The Origins of Our Discontents (2020), p. 151 (Caste); Lee, How America's Vast Racial Wealth Gap Grew: By Plunder, N.Y. Times, (Aug. 14, 2019) (as of April 4, 2022) (Lee); Case for Reparations, supra; Lawfare, supra.

[5] EJI 3d ed., supra, at pp. 65, 68-69.

[6] EJI 2015, supra, at pp. 19-20, 22-23; EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 65.

[7] Niedermeier, The Color of the Third Degree (2019), pp. 17-19 (Third Degree); United Nations General Assembly, Report of the Working Group of Experts on People of African Descent on its mission to the United States of America (Aug. 18, 2016), p. 16 (U.N. Working Group Report); Love, The Trayvon Martin case reveals a vigilante spirit in the US justice system, The Guardian, (Apr. 7, 2012) (as of April 4, 2022) (Trayvon Martin).

[8] Lee, supra.

[9] Bump, The long history of black voter suppression in American politics, The Washington Post, (Nov. 2, 2016) (as of April 4, 2022) (Bump); Buhl, Donald Trump's Call to Militia to 'Watch' Polling Places Raises Fears of Voter Intimidation, Newsweek, (Oct. 17, 2020) (as of April 4, 2022).

[10] Caste, supra, at p. 17.

[11] Ibid.

[12] Id. at pp. 19, 52.

[13] Id. at p. 151.

[14] Ibid.

[15] U.S. Const., 10th Amend.; United States v. Morrison (2000) 529 U.S. 598, 618.

[16] Caste, supra, at pp. 151, 153; EJI 2015, supra, at p. 18.

[17] Id. at pp. 152, 154.

[18] Id. at pp. 153-55.

[19] Ibid.

[20] Id. at pp. 151-154.

[21] See, e.g., Thomas Wentworth Higginson, The Story of Denmark Vesey The Atlantic (June 1861) (as of April 4, 2022) (Higginson).

[22] Ibid.

[23] Ibid.

[24] Ibid.

[25] Ibid.; see also Michael P. Johnson, Denmark Vesey and His Co-Conspirators (Oct. 2001) 58(4) William and Mary Quarterly 915, 919, 945-48 (Johnson).

[26] Johnson, supra, at p. 949.

[27] Higginson, supra.

[28] See generally Johnson, supra.

[29] Philip D. Morgan, Conspiracy Scares (Jan. 2002) 59(1) William and Mary Quarterly 159, 163.

[30] EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 10.

[31] Foner, South Carolina's Forgotten Black Political Revolution Slate (Jan. 31, 2018) (as of April 4, 2022); EJI 3d ed., supra, pp. 10-12.

[32] Lawfare, supra; Ifill, Creating a Truth and Reconciliation Commission for Lynching (Summer 2003) 21 Law & Ineq. 263, 273 (Ifill).

[33] Hinson, Land Gains, Land Losses: The Odyssey of African Americans Since Reconstruction (May-Sept. 2018) 77(3-4) Am. J. of Economics and Sociology 893, 909-10 (Hinson).

[34] Id. at p. 911, citing Schweninger, Black Property Owners in the South, 1790-1915 (1990), p. 176.

[35] National Center for Education Statistics, 120 Years of American Education: A Statistical Portrait (Jan. 1993), p. 21, tbl. 6 (as of April 4, 2022).

[36] Lawfare, supra.

[37] Third Degree, supra, at p. 16.

[38] Ibid.

[39] Case for Reparations, supra; Caste, supra, at p. 155; Third Degree, supra, at p. 17.

[40] U.N. Working Group Report, supra, at p. 16; Trayvon Martin, supra.

[41] Caste, supra, at p. 228.

[42] Ifill, supra, at p. 274.

[43] Lawfare, supra.

[44] Ifill, supra, at pp. 273-74; Lawfare, supra.

[45] Ifill, supra, at pp. 273-74; Lawfare, supra.

[46] Martha T. McCluskey, Facing the Ghost of Cruikshank in Constitutional Law (Nov. 2015) 65(2) Journal of Legal Education 278, 280-81 (McCluskey); see generally Michael S. Smith, The Lost Freedmen's Town of Hamburg, South Carolina (2021); see also Renetta DuBose, The Untold Story of Hamburg, SC, WJBF (Feb. 22, 2021) (as of April 4, 2022).

[47] McCluskey, supra, at pp. 280-81.

[48] Ibid.

[49] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 7.

[50] Ibid. at p. 7; EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 27.

[51] Caste, supra, at pp. 90-91, 151, 155; Third Degree, supra, at p. 20; Jordan, A History Lesson: Reparations for What? (2003) 58 N.Y.U. Ann. Surv. Am. L. 557, 593 (Jordan); Ward, Critical Race Theory and Empirical Methods: Microclimates of Racial Meaning: Historical Racial Violence and Environmental Impacts (2016) 2016 Wis. L. Rev. 575, 607-08 (Ward); Ifill, supra, at pp. 267, 279-80, 284.

[52] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 7; EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 73; Case for Reparations, supra; Klanwatch Project of the Southern Poverty Law Center, Ku Klux Klan: A History of Racism and Violence (2011), pp. 14, 18 (as of April 4, 2022) (SPLC History); Eckstrand, The Ugliness of Trolls: Comparing the Strategies/Methods of the Alt-Right and the Ku Klux Klan (2018) 10(3) Cosmopolitan Civil Societies: an Interdisciplinary J. 41, 46, (as of April 4, 2022) (Eckstrand).

[53] EJI 2015, supra, at pp. 3, 7; EJI 3d ed., supra, at pp. 48-50, 73; Case for Reparations, supra; SPLC History, supra, at pp. 14-15, 18; Eckstrand, supra, at pp. 46-47; Lawfare, supra; Human Rights Watch, The Case for Reparations in Tulsa, Oklahoma: A Human Rights Argument, at p. 6 (May 2020) (as of April 4, 2022) (Human Rights Watch).

[54] See, e.g., Tara McAndrew, The History of the KKK in American Politics, JSTOR Daily (Jan. 25, 2017) (as of April 4, 2022).

[55] SPLC History, supra, at p. 4.

[56] Id. at pp. 4-5, 7, 25-26, 51.

[57] See generally SPLC History.

[58] Id. at pp. 9, 15.

[59] Id. at pp. 8, 10.

[60] Ifill, supra, at pp. 272-274; Balleck. Hate Groups and Extremist Organizations in America: An Encyclopedia (2019), at pp. 179-180 (Hate Groups); Lawfare, supra.

[61] Hate Groups at p. 179.

[62] SPLC History, supra, at pp. 8, 10, 12, 14.

[63] Id. at pp. 10-11.

[64] Clarke, Without Fear or Shame: Lynching, Capital Punishment and the Subculture Violence in the American South (Apr. 1998) 28(2) British J. or Political Sci., at p. 277, (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Clarke).

[65] Hate Groups, supra, at pp. 179-80; SPLC History, supra, at p. 12.

[66] SPLC History, supra, at p. 15; Egerton, Terrorized African-Americans Found Their Champion in Civil War Hero Robert Smalls Smithsonian Magazine (Sept. 2018) (as of April 4, 2022).

[67] Lawfare, supra.

[68] SPLC History, supra, at pp. 14-15.

[69] Ibid. at p. 15; United States Senate, The Enforcement Acts of 1870 and 1871, United States Senate (as of April 4, 2022).

[70] SPLC History, supra, at p. 15; Hate Groups, supra, at pp. 179-180.

[71] Clarke, supra, at p. 277; SPLC History, supra, at p. 15; Lawfare, supra.

[72] SPLC History, supra, at p. 15.

[73] Clarke, supra, at p. 277.

[74] Lawfare, supra.

[75] Ibid.

[76] SPLC History, supra, at p. 13.

[77] Ibid. at p. 15.

[78] McCluskey, supra, at pp. 280-81.

[79] SPLC History, supra, at pp. 17, 22-23; Hate Groups, supra, at p. 180.

[80] Corliss, D.W. Griffith's The Birth of a Nation 100 years Later: Still Great, Still Shameful Time (Mar. 3, 2015) (as of April 4, 2022) (Corliss).

[81] Ibid.; SPLC History, supra, at p. 21.

[82] Roy Rosenzweig Center for History and New Media, The Birth of a Nation and Black Protest (April 17, 1915) (as of April 5, 2022) (Rosenzweig); SPLC History, supra, at p. 21.

[83] Rosenzweig, supra.

[84] Brody, The Worst Thing About "Birth of a Nation" Is How Good It Is The New Yorker (Feb. 1, 2013) (as of April 4, 2022); NPR, 100 Years Later, What's The Legacy Of 'Birth Of A Nation'? (Feb. 8, 2015) (as of April 4, 2022) (NPR Birth of a Nation); SPLC History, supra, at p. 21; Corliss, supra.

[85] Ifill, supra, at p. 277.

[86] Corliss, supra.

[87] Ibid.; Rosenzweig, supra; Hate Groups, supra, at p. 180; SPLC History, supra, at p. 21.

[88] James F. Smith, Lessons on Dangers of Using Media to Spread Racial Hatred and Violence (Feb. 9, 2021) (as of April 4, 2022) (Using Media).

[89] Ibid.

[90] Hate Groups, supra, at p. 180.

[91] NPR Birth of a Nation, supra; Hudson, West of Jim Crow: The Fight Against California's Color Line (2020), p. 171 (Hudson).

[92] Bringhurst, The Ku Klux Klan in a Central California Community: Tulare County During the 1920s and 1930s (Winter 2000) 82(4), Southern California Quarterly 368 (Bringhurst).

[93] Ibid.

[94] Hate Groups, supra, at p. 180.

[95] Ibid.

[96] SPLC History, supra, at p. 18.

[97] Ibid.

[98] Id. at p. 20.

[99] Gillett, A Woman's Work (July 2019) History Today, p. 46 (Gillett); Hate Groups, supra, at p. 180.

[100] SPLC History, supra, at pp. 25, 45; Hate Groups, supra, at pp. 181, 183.

[101] SPLC History, supra, at pp. 25, 45; Hate Groups, supra, at pp. 181, 183.

[102] Hate Groups, supra, at p. 180; Gillett, supra, at p. 46.

[103] Hate Groups, supra, at p. 180.

[104] Id. at pp. 180-81.

[105] Id. at p. 181.

[106] SPLC History, supra, at pp. 41-43.

[107] Ibid.

[108] Id. at pp. 14, 18.

[109] Ibid.

[110] Ibid.

[111] Ibid.; Eckstrand, The Ugliness of Trolls: Comparing the Strategies/Methods of the Alt-Right and the Ku Klux Klan (2018) 10(3) Cosmopolitan Civil Societies: an Interdisciplinary J. 41, 46, (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Eckstrand).

[112] Eckstrand, supra, at p. 46.

[113] Id. at p. 47.

[114] Hate Groups, supra, at pp. 181-183.

[115] Lois Beckett, The year in Nazi propaganda: images of white supremacy in Trump's America The Guardian (Dec. 27, 2017) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[116] Southern Poverty Law Center, Proud Boys (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[117] Cardine, Turner, Szabo, A KKK propaganda drop and a planned White Lives Matter rally rattle 2 O.C. communities L.A. Times (Mar. 31, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[118] Waite, The Forgotten History of the Western Klan The Atlantic (Apr. 6, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Waite); Bringhurst, supra, at 365, 368.

[119] Waite, supra.

[120] Ibid.

[121] Ibid.

[122] Ibid.

[123] Kent, The Hidden History of Culver City Racism Streets Blog LA (Apr. 5, 2019) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[124] Bringhurst, supra, at p. 370.

[125] Hudson, supra, at pp. 171-72.

[126] Id. at p. 172.

[127] Ibid.

[128] Ibid.

[129] Ibid.

[130] Id. at p. 173.

[131] Ibid.

[132] Id. at p. 182.

[133] Ibid.

[134] Id. at p. 188.

[135] Bringhurst, supra, at pp. 369-70.

[136] Brenda Elaine Stevenson, The Contested Murder of Latasha Harlins: Justice, Gender, and the Origins of the LA Riots (2013), p. 186; Hudson, supra, at p. 179.

[137] Bringhurst, supra, at pp. 369-70.

[138] Id. at pp. 370.

[139] Hudson, supra, at p. 180.

[140] Ibid.

[141] Id. at p. 178.

[142] Id. at pp. 177-78.

[143] Harrison, From the Archives: Ku Klux Klan images from 1920s Southern California LA Times (Oct. 4, 2017) (as of Apr. 4, 2022) (Harrison).

[144] Ibid.

[145] Id. at pp. 181-82.

[146] Id. at pp. 169, 179.

[147] Id. at p. 179.

[148] Ibid.

[149] Id. at p. 180.

[150] Id. at p. 183.

[151] Ibid.

[152] Ibid.; L.A. Burrito, The Los Angeles Mayor Who Was Also a KKK Leader L.A. TACO (July 8, 2020) (as of Apr. 4, 2022) (Los Angeles Mayor).

[153] Ku Klux Klan Makes Its Reappearance in Full Regalia in Los Angeles, Jewish Daily Bulletin (July 28, 1932), p. 2, (as of Apr. 5, 2022); Los Angeles Mayor, supra.

[154] Hudson, supra, at p. 189.

[155] Bringhurst, supra, at p. 370.

[156] Hudson, supra, at p. 173.

[157] See Anaheim Public Library, 1950s – 1980s (1980s subsection), City of Anaheim (as of Mar. 23, 2022).

[158] Hudson, supra, at p. 173.

[159] La Tour, A Brief History of the Ku Klux Klan in Orange County: Note on the Banality of Evil Fullerton Observer (Jan. 7, 2019) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Orange County KKK History).

[160] Ibid.

[161] Hudson, supra, at p. 173.

[162] Orange County KKK History, supra.

[163] Ibid.

[164] Hudson, supra, at p. 187.

[165] Id. at p. 183.

[166] Id. at p. 186-187.

[167] Id. at p. 186.

[168] Ibid.

[169] Id. at p. 187.

[170] Id. at p. 186.

[171] Id. at p. 187.

[172] Larralde and Castillo, San Diego's Ku Klux Klan (Spring/Summer 2000) 46(2-3) San Diego Historical Society Quarter (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (San Diego KKK).

[173] Ibid.

[174] Bringhurst, supra, at p. 370.

[175] Ramirez, "Violators of Almost Every Right": Analyzing the Ku Klux Klan of 1920's (2017) 26 Ex Post Facto: J. of the History Students at San Francisco State Univ. 145, 147, > (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Ramirez), citing District Attorney Announces Names On Kleagle's Lists, Fresno Morning Republican (May 5, 1922).

[176] Bringhurst, supra, at p. 370.

[177] Id. at p. 393.

[178] Ibid.; Eissinger, Kern County: California's Deep South (March 2011) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) at pp. 7-8 (Eissinger); Ramirez, supra, at p. 155, citing Night Riders Halt Raids But Marked Victims Still Flee, Fresno Morning Republican (Mar. 6, 1922); Hudson, supra, at p. 180.

[179] Ramirez, supra, at p. 155, citing Chief of Police, Supervisor Head, Among Members, Fresno Morning Republican (May 7, 1922).

[180] Hate Groups, supra, at p. 180; SPLC History, supra, at pp. 22-23.

[181] Eissinger, supra, at pp. 10-19.

[182] Id. at p. 19.

[183] Ibid.

[184] Ibid.

[185] Id at p. 20.

[186] Id. at pp. 20-21.

[187] Eli Moore et al., Roots, Race & Place: A History of Racially Exclusionary Housing in the San Francisco Bay Area (Oct. 2019), Haas Institute, p. 26, (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Haas).

[188] Hudson, supra, at p. 172.

[189] Haas, supra, at p. 26; Rhomberg, White Nativism and Urban Politics: The 1920s Ku Klux Klan in Oakland, California (Winter 1998) 17(2) J. of Am. Ethnic History 39, 44-46 (Rhomberg).

[190] Hudson, supra, at p. 174.

[191] Rhomberg, supra, at pp. 39, 44.

[192] Id. at pp. 44-46.

[193] Hussein Abdilahi Bulhan, Frantz Fanon and the Psychology of Oppression (1985), p. 122.

[194] Coffin v. United States, 156 U.S. 432, 453 (1895); see also EJI 2015, supra, at p. 20.

[195] Jordan, supra, at p. 588-589.

[196] Id. at p. 588.

[197] EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 61.

[198] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 21.

[199] Id. at pp. 3, 7. The Task Force recognizes that "lynching" has been defined differently at various points in history by the entities who recorded incidents of lynching. This has presented challenges in terms of tracking lynching data and assessing the complete impact of racial terror. Hudson, supra, at p. 135. For the purposes of this section, the Task Force uses "lynching" to refer to acts of terrorism, specifically the murder of one or more individuals by hanging, where the public or community supported the action. Hudson, supra, at p. 135. Lynchings are distinct from other forms of racial violence and hate crimes that were prosecuted as criminal acts.

[200] Ibid.; EJI 3d ed., supra, at 65.

[201] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 5.

[202] Donald G. Mathews, At the Altar of Lynching: Burning Sam Hose in the American South (2018), p. 6.

[203] EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 27.

[204] Ifill, supra, at p. 280.

[205] Markovitz, Legacies of Lynching: Racial Violence and Memory (2004) (Markovitz); Caste, supra, at pp. 93-94; EJI 2015, supra, at p. 12.

[206] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 12; Ifill, supra, at p. 285. Children were involved and given front row position of the victim, psychologically tainting their view of African American people from a young age.

[207] Jordan, supra, at pp. 565-66; Ifill, supra, at pp. 285, 297-99.

[208] EJI 2015, supra, at pp. 12, 14; Caste, supra, at pp. 93-94.

[209] EJI 2015, supra, at pp. 12, 14; Jordan, supra, at p. 592; Ifill, supra, at pp. 285-86.

[210] Jordan, supra, at p. 592; Ifill, supra, at pp. 285-86.

[211] Ifill, supra, at p. 294.

[212] Ibid.

[213] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 21.

[214] Id. at p. 5; EJI 3d ed., supra, at pp. 27, 38; see also Hudson, supra, pp. 131-133.

[215] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 11.

[216] Ibid.; Clarke, supra, at p. 280.

[217] Third Degree, supra, at p. 20; EJI 2015, supra, at p. 10; Clarke, supra, at p. 280.

[218] Ifill, supra, at p. 278.

[219] Clarke, supra, at pp. Without Fear or Shame: Lynching, Capital Punishment and the Subculture Violence in the American South (Apr. 1998) 28(2) British J. or Political Sci. 269, 269, 280 & fn. 34, (as of Oct. 20, 2021) (Clarke).

[220] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 11; EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 31; Jordan, supra, at p. 588; Ifill, supra, at p. 276-77.

[221] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 14.

[222] Ibid.

[223] Clarke, supra, at pp. 270, 280; Ifill, supra, at pp. 278-79.

[224] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 14.

[225] Ibid.

[226] Ibid.

[227] Ibid.

[228] Third Degree, supra, at p. 20.

[229] Ibid.

[230] See Fox, supra, at p. 158.

[231] Ibid.

[232] Ifill, supra, at pp. 267-268.

[233] Jordan, supra, at pp. 585-87; Ifill, supra, at p. 300.

[234] Ifill, supra, at pp. 300-301.

[235] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 18.

[236] Ifill, supra, at p. 301.

[237] Id. at pp. 300-01.

[238] Id. at pp. 301-02.

[239] Ibid.

[240] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 18.

[241] Ifill, supra, at pp. 294, 302-03.

[242] Clarke, supra, at p. 281; Ifill, supra, at p. 296.

[243] Jordan, supra, at pp. 579-80.

[244] Ibid.

[245] Ward, supra, at pp. 582-83.

[246] Id. at pp. 585, 596-97.

[247] Hudson, supra, at p. 133. But these statistics often left out lynching of non-Black people, Native Americans, Mexicans, and Chinese. Hudson, supra, at p. 136.

[248] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 3.

[249] EJI, Overview of Reconstruction in America (2020) (as of Apr. , 2022). For the full report, see EJI, Reconstruction in America: Racial Violence After the Civil War (2020) (as of Mar. 15, 2022) (EJI 2020). See also EJI 3d ed., supra, at pp. 40, 44 (counting 4,084 lynchings in the South, and 341 lynchings elsewhere, between 1877 and 1950).

[250] See Ward, supra, at pp. 596-598; see also EJI 2020, supra.

[251] Third Degree, supra, at p. 19.

[252] Markovitz, supra, at pp. xxviii-xxix.

[253] Ifill, supra, at p. 302

[254] See generally Smead, Blood Justice: The Lynching of Mack Charles Parker (1988).

[255] Markovitz, supra, at pp. xxviii-xxix.

[256] Clarke, supra, at p. 282.

[257] Id. at pp. 282-285.

[258] Id. at pp. 282-83.

[259] Id. at pp. 284-85; Third Degree, supra, at p. 24.

[260] Third Degree, supra, at p. 24; Proposed Brief of Amicus Curiae The Honorable Gavin Newsom in Supp. of Def. and Appellant McDaniel, People of the State of California v. McDaniel, No. S171393, at pp. 36-37 (Oct. 26, 2020) (Newsom Amicus Brief); Frampton, The Jim Crow Jury (2018) 71 Vand. L. Rev. 1593, 1612-14.

[261] Clarke, supra, at p. 285.

[262] Id. at pp. 284-85.

[263] Third Degree, supra, at pp. 24-25.

[264] Clarke, supra, at p. 286.

[265] EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 63.

[266] Third Degree, supra, at pp. 23-24; Clarke, supra, at p. 286.

[267] Clarke, supra, at p. 288.

[268] Ibid.

[269] Ibid.

[270] Jordan, supra, at pp. 607-08.

[271] Ifill, supra, at p. 267.

[272] Id. at pp. 291-92.

[273] Fox, Intimations of Citizenship: Repression and Expressions of Equal Citizenship in the Era of Jim Crow (Fall 2006) 50 How. L.J. 113, 184-185 (Fox).

[274] Id. at pp. 158-59.

[275] Jordan, supra, at p. 573.

[276] Colbert, Challenging the Challenge: Thirteenth Amendment as a Prohibition Against the Racial Use of Peremptory Challenges (Nov. 1990), 76 Cornell L. Rev. 1, 30 & n. 137 (Colbert).

[277] Ibid.

[278] Id. at pp. 30-31.

[279] Ibid.

[280] Fox, supra, at p. 185.

[281] Human Rights Watch, supra, at p. 9; Mack, Over a century later, facts of 1898 race riots released Star News Online (Dec. 16, 2005) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (archived Aug. 27, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (1898 Race Riot Facts).

[282] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 7; EJI, Political Violence and Racial Inequity in America (Jan. 19, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (EJI 2021); 1898 Race Riot Facts, supra; Lee, How America's Vast Racial Wealth Gap Grew: By Plunder N.Y. Times (Aug. 18, 2019) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Lee); Kuo, Bringing in the State: Toward a Constitutional Duty to Protect from Mob Violence (Winter 2004) 79 Ind. L. J. 177, 226.

[283] Hodge et al., Burned from the Land: How 60 Years of Racial Violence Shaped America CNN (May 30, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[284] Brockell, Tulsa Isn't the Only Race Massacre You Were Never Taught in School. Here Are Others. The Washington Post (June 1, 2021), Washington Post (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[285] Human Rights Watch, supra, at p. 5.

[286] Fain, The Devastation of Black Wall Street JSTOR Daily (July 5, 2017) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Fain); Human Rights Watch, supra, at p. 6.

[287] Human Rights Watch, supra, at pp. 1, 6.

[288] Id. at p. 7.

[289] Reparations Task Force, Witness Testimony of Eric J. Miller (Dec. 7, 2021), (as of Feb. 9, 2022), 7:35-7:46.

[290] Reparations Task Force, supra, at 7:46-7:57.

[291] Human Rights Watch, supra, at p. 8.

[292] Reparations Task Force, supra, at 7:20-7:35.

[293] Human Rights Watch, supra, at p. 8.

[294] Id. at p. 9.

[295] Ibid.

[296] EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 17; Ifill, supra, at pp. 281-82.

[297] EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 35; Jordan, supra, at pp. 589-90.

[298] EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 17.

[299] Id. at p. 68.

[300] Id. at p. 37.

[301] Third Degree, supra, at p. 24.

[302] Ibid.

[303] Ibid.

[304] Id. at pp. 41-42.

[305] Id. at p. 42.

[306] Id. at p. 43.

[307] Id. at pp. 44-45.

[308] Id. at pp. 46-47.

[309] Niedermeier, "All These Scars, There and There." Fighting Forced Confessions in the Pre-1954 South University of North Carolina Press Blog (Nov. 25, 2019) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[310] Third Degree, supra, at pp. 9-12.

[311] Ibid.

[312] Id. at p. 9.

[313] Id. at p. 11.

[314] Id. at p. 7.

[315] Ibid.

[316] Ibid.

[317] Id. at pp. 24-25.

[318] Id. at p. 25.

[319] Andrew Cohen, Confessing While Black The Marshall Project (Dec. 12, 2014) (as of Apr. 5, 2022); Al Jazeera, Coerced to Confess: How US Police Get Confessions (Mar. 20, 2019) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[320] Logan Jaffe, The Nation's First Reparations Package to Survivors of Police Torture Included a Public Memorial. Survivors Are Still Waiting ProPublica (July 3, 2020) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Survivors of Police Torture).

[321] Survivors of Police Torture, supra.

[322] Hasbrouck, Abolishing Racist Policing with the Thirteenth Amendment (2020) 67 UCLA L. Rev. 1108, 1110, (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[323] United Nations Human Rights Office of the High Commissioner, UN experts condemn modern-day racial terror lynchings in US and call for systemic reform and justice (June 5, 2020) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[324] Third Degree, supra, at pp. 17-19.

[325] Hassett-Walker, The racist roots of American policing: From slave patrols to traffic stops The Conversation (updated June 2, 2020) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Slave Patrols).

[326] Ibid.

[327] Third Degree, supra, at p. 18.

[328] Id. at pp. 18-19.

[329] Ibid.

[330] Id. at p. 19.

[331] Ibid.

[332] U.N. Working Group Report, supra, p. 16.

[333] BBC, George Floyd: Timeline of black deaths and protests (Apr. 22, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[334] Washington Post, Fatal Force: Police shootings database 2015-2021 (updated Nov. 11, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[335] Lopez, Philando Castile Minnesota police shooting: officer cleared of manslaughter Vox (June 16, 2017) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Castile Vox Article).

[336] CBS News, Victim's sister: Minnesota police shooting "modern day lynching" (July 8, 2016) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[337] Groves, Explainer: Use-of-force experts evaluate Floyd arrest AP News

(Mar. 31, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (AP Floyd Article).

[338] Ibid.; Nicholas Bogel-Burroughs, Prosecutors Say Derek Chauvin Knelt on George Floyd for 9 Minutes 29 Seconds, Longer Than Initially Reported N.Y. Times (March 30, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[339] Brown, 'It was a modern-day lynching': Violent deaths reflect a brutal American legacy National Geographic (June 3, 2020) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (National Geographic Floyd Article).

[340] Love, The Trayvon Martin case reveals a vigilante spirit in the US justice system The Guardian (Apr. 7, 2012) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[341] Southern Poverty Law Center, Civil Rights Martyrs (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[342] Pearson and Botelho, 5 things to know about the George Zimmerman-Trayvon Martin saga CNN (Feb. 26, 2013) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (CNN Martin Article).

[343] DeBerry, Lynching and the ghastly precedent to George Zimmerman auctioning gun that killed Trayvon Martin NOLA.com (May 13, 2016) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[344] Nathan Layne, White defendant used racial slur after shooting Ahmaud Arbery, investigator testifies Reuters (June 4, 2020) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[345] BBC News, Ahmaud Arbery: What do we know about the case? BBC News (June 5, 2020) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[346] Hurt, In Ahmaud Arbery's Name, Georgia Repeals Citizen's Arrest Law NPR (May 11, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[347] Ibid.

[348] Briggs, supra, at 25-26.

[349] Morriss, "Georgia Code (1861),"in Slavery in the United States: A Social, Political, And Historical Encyclopedia, vol. 2, ed. Junius P. Rodriguez (Santa Barbara: ABC-CLIO, 2007), 314-315.

[350] Fausset, Ahmaud Arbery Shooting: What to Know About the Trial and More N.Y. Times (Feb. 7, 2022) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[351] U.N. Working Group Report, supra, at p. 17.

[352] Ibid.

[353] Washington, Medical Apartheid: The Dark History of Experimentation on African Americans from the Colonial Era to the Present (2007), p. 648 (Medical Apartheid); see also Health Section, infra.

[354] Thompson-Miller & Picca, "There Were Rapes!": Sexual Assaults of African American Women and Children in Jim Crow (2017) Violence Against Women, 935.

[355] Id. at p. 936.

[356] Ibid.

[357] Ibid.

[358] Ibid.

[359] Norwood, Mapping the Intersections of Violence on Black Women's Sexual Health within the Jim Crow Geographies of Cincinnati Neighborhoods (2018) 39(2) Frontiers (Boulder) 97, pp. 1-2 (as of Sept. 8, 2021) (Norwood).

[360] See Health Section, infra.

[361] Briggs, Taking Children: A History of American Terror (2020) pp. 18-19 (Taking Children).

[362] Id. at pp. 19-20.; Adrienne D. Davis, "Don't Let Nobody Bother Yo' Principle": The Sexual Economy of American Slavery in Black Sexual Economies: Race and Sex in a Culture of Capital (2019) pp. 20.

[363] Id. at pp. 24-25.

[364] Id. at p. 22.

[365] Id. at p. 21.

[366] Id. at p. 27.

[367] Id. at p. 28.

[368] Ibid.

[369] Id. at pp. 30, 33-35.

[370] Id. at pp. 107-108.

[371] Id. at p. 103.

[372] Id. at pp. 108-109.

[373] Id. at p. 108.

[374] Id. at pp. 108-109.

[375] Ibid.

[376] Id. at pp. 114-15.

[377] See Phillip Atiba Goff et al., The Essence of Innocence: Consequences of Dehumanizing Black Children (2014) 106(4) Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 526, 526-527, 539-540 (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[378] Heyward and Costa, Black children are 6 times more likely to be shot to death by police, study finds CNN (Dec. 17, 2020) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[379] Ward, supra, at p. 588.

[380] Case for Reparations, supra.

[381] EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 15.

[382] Case for Reparations, supra.

[383] Ifill, supra, at p. 188.

[384] Fox, supra, at pp. 146-147.

[385] Fox, supra, at p. 147-148; North Carolina Department of Cultural Resources Office of Archives and History, 1898 Wilmington Race Riot Report (May 31, 2006), p. 445-458 (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Wilmington Race Riot Report); EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 45; Brown, Red Summer: When Racist Mobs Ruled PBS (Feb. 4, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Red Summer); Case for Reparations, supra; Lee, supra; Ellis, J. Edgar Hoover and the "Red Summer" of 1919 (Apr. 1994) 28 J. of Am. Studies 39, 52-54, (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[386] Fain, supra.

[387] Human Rights Watch, supra, at p. 2.

[388] Oklahoma H.J.Res. No. 1035 (1997), § 1; Human Rights Watch, supra, at p. 38.

[389] Human Rights Watch, supra, at p. 8.

[390] Id. at p. 11.

[391] Ibid.

[392] Lee, supra.

[393] Ibid.

[394] Ibid.

[395] Ibid.

[396] Ibid.

[397] Ibid.

[398] Case for Reparations, supra.

[399] Ibid.

[400] Ibid.

[401] Ibid.

[402] Lawfare, supra.

[403] Ibid.

[404] Ibid.; EJI 3d ed., supra, at pp. 9, 12; Boissoneault, The Deadliest Massacre in Reconstruction-Era Louisiana Happened 150 years Ago Smithsonian Magazine (Sept. 28, 2018) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Boissoneault); Rhodes, America Is No Stranger to Election Violence The New Republic (Nov. 7, 2016) (as of Apr. 5, 2022); Ifill, supra, at p. 274.

[405] Lawfare, supra.

[406] EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 12.

[407] Ibid.; Boissoneault, supra.

[408] Ibid.; Lawfare, supra.

[409] Boissoneault, supra; Lawfare, supra.

[410] Ibid.

[411] Ibid.

[412] William C. Hine, Randolph, Benjamin Franklin South Carolina Encyclopedia (Nov. 28, 2016) (as of Apr. 5 2022).

[413] Lawfare, supra.

[414] Ibid.

[415] EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 50.

[416] Ibid.; Ifill, supra, at p. 276.

[417] EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 50; see also Desmond S. King & Rogers M. Smith, Racial Orders in American Political Development (Feb. 2005), 99(1) The American Political Science Review 75, 87.

[418] EJI 3d. ed., supra, at p. 50.

[419] Lawfare, supra.

[420] Ibid.

[421] Ifill, supra, at p. 275.

[422] Ibid.

[423] 1898 Race Riot Facts, supra.

[424] EJI 2021, supra.

[425] Ibid.; 1898 Race Riot Facts, supra.

[426] EJI, Political Violence and Racial Inequity in America (Jan. 19, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (EJI 2021); 1898 Race Riot Facts, supra.; Lee, supra.

[427] EJI 2021, supra; 1898 Race Riot Facts, supra; Lee, supra.

[428] EJI 2021, supra.

[429] 1898 Race Riot Facts, supra.

[430] Ibid.

[431] Ibid.

[432] EJI 2021, supra.

[433] Kaur, On this day 100 years ago, a White mob unleashed the deadliest Election Day violence in US history CNN (Nov. 2, 2020) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Kaur).

[434] Caste, supra, pp. 228-29; Kaur, supra.

[435] Bump,supra.

[436] Ibid.

[437] Schreckinger, White nationalists plot Election day show of force Politico (Nov. 2, 2016) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[438] Buhl, supra

[439] Lisa Mascaro et al., Pro-Trump mob storms US Capitol in bid to overturn election Associated Press (Jan. 2021—though n.b. the listed date of publication is obviously an error) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[440] Montanaro, Capitol Police Officer Testifies To The Racism He Faced During The Jan. 6 Riot NPR (July 27, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022); Morrison, Racism of rioters takes center stage in Jan. 6 hearing AP News (July 28, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[441] MacFarlane, Noose Displayed at Capitol Insurrection in FBI's Custody NBC Washington (Nov. 1, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[442] Cramer, Confederate Flag an Unnerving Sight in Capitol N.Y. Times (Jan. 14, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[443] SPLC History, supra.

[444] Slave Patrols, supra.

[445] Robb, Two Men in KKK Disguises: A Photograph from Reconstruction Alabama (July 2017) 70(3) Ala. Review 222, 238-39 (Robb).

[446] Anti-Defamation League, Burning Cross (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[447] Koerner, Why Does the Ku Klux Klan Burn Crosses? Slate (Dec. 17, 2002) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[448] Greenhouse, An Intense Attack by Justice Thomas on Cross-Burning N.Y. Times (Dec. 12, 2002) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Greenhouse).

[449] Ibid.

[450] Virginia v. Black (2003) 538 U.S. 343, 391, 394 (dis. opn. of Thomas, J.).

[451] Kevin Sack, Mississippi Reveals Dark Secrets of a Racist Time N.Y. Times (March 18, 1998) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Sack).

[452] Ibid.

[453] Ibid.

[454] Adam Liptak, Pardon Unlikely for Civil Rights Advocate N.Y. Times (May 4, 2006) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Liptak).

[455] Ibid.

[456] Ibid.

[457] Hudson, supra, at p. 134

[458] Ibid.

[459] Ibid.

[460] Newsom Amicus Brief, supra, at p. 36, citing Carrigan & Webb, The Lynching of Persons of Mexican Origin or Descent in the United States, 1848 to 1928 (2003) 37 J. Soc. Hist. 414-17.

[461] Hudson, supra, at p. 136.

[462] See Ward, supra, at pp. 596-598; see also EJI 2020, supra.

[463] Rudolph M. Lapp, Blacks in Gold Rush California (1977), p. 261; Lynching Case at Newtown Daily Alta California (Mar. 14, 1852), Vol. 3, No. 72, p. 2 (as of Apr. 5, 2022); Louise Amelia Knapp Smith Clappe, The Shirley Letters from California Mines in 1851-52 (1922), pp. 272-73; Hanging at Nicolaus Daily Alta California (June 15, 1852), Vol. 3, No. 166, p. 2 (as of Apr. 5, 2022); Great Excitement at Mormon Island Sacramento Daily Union (Jan. 29, 1853), Vol. 4, No. 578, p. 2 > (as of Apr. 5, 2022). Please review these links – they don't work and I was unable to find them on Google.

[464] Wallace, Forgotten Los Angeles History: The Chinese Massacre of 1871 Los Angeles Public Library (May 19, 2017) (as of Apr. 5, 2021) (Chinese Massacre of 1871) see also Dorland, Chinese Massacre at Los Angeles in 1871 (1894) 3(2) Annual Publication of the Historical Society of Southern California, Los Angeles, 22-26(as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[465] Chinese Massacre of 1871, supra (charges on eight rioters were overturned on a legal technicality); Newsom Amicus Brief, supra, at p. 35, citing Carrigan & Webb, supra, at 411, 417 (noting "almost no white man was ever made to stand trial for a lynching of a Mexican").

[466] Hudson, supra, at p. 145.

[467] Id. at p. 11.

[468] Id. at p. 144.

[469] Id. at pp. 144-45.

[470] Id. at pp. 144-45, 148.

[471] Id. at p. 145.

[472] Id. at p. 147.

[473] Id. at p. 165.

[474] Id. at p. 146.

[475] Ibid.

[476] Id. at p. 189.

[477] Ifill, supra, at p. 293; Hudson, supra, at p. 188.

[478] Hudson, supra, at p. 188.

[479] Id. at p. 190.

[480] Id. at p. 169.

[481] Id. at pp. 169, 190.

[482] Id. at p. 207.

[483] Id. at pp. 174-75, 188.

[484] Id. at pp. 201-203.

[485] Id. at p. 190.

[486] Id. at pp. 168-69, 190.

[487] Id. at pp. 189-90.

[488] Ibid.

[489] Id. at p. 168.

[490] Id. at p. 190.

[491] Id. at p. 13.

[492] Rothstein, The Color of Law: A Forgotten History of How Our Government Segregated America (2017), p. 251 (Color of Law).

[493] Ibid.

[494] Hudson, supra, at p. 193.

[495] Ibid.

[496] Ibid.

[497] Id. at p. 197, 205.

[498] Id. at p. 205.

[499] Id. at p. 199.

[500] Ibid.

[501] Id. at p. 202.

[502] Ibid.

[503] Hawkins, California once forcibly sterilized people by the thousands. Now the victims may get reparations The Washington Post (July 9, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Hawkins).

[504] Jindia, Belly of the Beast: California's dark history of forced sterilizations The Guardian (June 30, 2020) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[505] Hawkins, supra.

[506] Stern, Sterilized in the Name of Public Health: Race, Immigration, and Reproductive Control in Modern California (July 2005) 95(7) Am. J. of Pub. Health. 1128, 1131, (as of Apr, 5, 2022) (Stern); see also Health Section, infra.

[507] Stern, supra, at p. 1131.

[508] Fatal Force, The Washington Post (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Fatal Force).

[509] Fatal Force, supra; U.S. Census, Quick Facts: California (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[510] Levin, Los Angeles officers shot at Ryan Twyman 34 times. He was one of four they killed that day The Guardian (Aug. 15, 2019) > (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Levin).

[511] Los Angeles Times, Los Angeles Police Killings Database (last updated Nov. 4, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[512] Levin, supra; Sen. Com. on Pub. Safety, Analysis of Assem. Bill No. 1506 (1999-2000 Reg. Sess.) Aug. 11, 2020, p. 7, (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (AB 1506 Analysis).

[513] AB 1506 Analysis, supra, at p. 7.

[514] Ibid.

[515] Sastry and Bates, When LA Erupted in Anger: A Look Back at the Rodney King Riots NPR (Apr. 26, 2017) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Rodney King Riots).

[516] Ibid.

[517] Orlov, Police messages unearthed – Comments by officers called racist Los Angeles Daily News (Mar. 19, 1991) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[518] Rodney King Riots, supra.

[519] Rosenzweig, No Charges in Killing of Tyisha Miller L.A. Times (Dec. 13, 2002) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Killing of Tyisha Miller). L.A. Times, No Charges in Killing of Tyisha Miller (as of Nov. 12, 2021) (Killing of Tyisha Miller).

[520] Ibid.

[521] Ibid.

[522] Ibid.

[523] Leonard, Former BART officer convicted of involuntary manslaughter L.A. Times (July 8, 2010) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Leonard).

[524] Los Angeles Times, Investigation reopens into death of Oscar Grant, a Black man killed by a BART transit officer in 2009 L.A. Times (Oct. 6, 2020) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Killing of Oscar Grant); Leonard, supra.

[525] Killing of Oscar Grant, supra.

[526] Malaika Fraley, Oscar Grant Case: Civil Jury Rules in Favor of Johannes Mehserle, Denies Award to Slain Man's Father (updated Aug. 12, 2016) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[527] Moxley, Socal Cops Are Still Defending 39-Bullet Barrage on Unarmed Man OC Weekly (Mar. 14, 2018) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Moxley).

[528] Ibid.

[529] Ibid.

[530] Ibid.

[531] Guevarra, The Life and Death of Willie McCoy KQED (Aug. 19, 2019) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Death of Willie McCoy).

[532] Ibid.

[533] Ibid.

[534] Levin, 'Executed by firing squad': video shows police firing a dozen shots at man The Guardian (Feb. 14, 2019) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[535] Moon, Independent autopsy shows Dijon Kizzee was struck 15 times by LA Sheriff's deputies, according to family attorneys CNN (Sept. 23, 2020) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Killing of Dijon Kizzee).

[536] Ibid.

[537] Ibid.

[538] Ibid.

[539] Ibid.

[540] German, Hidden in Plain Sight: Racism, White Supremacy, and Far-Right Militancy in Law Enforcement Brennan Center for Justice (Aug. 27, 2020) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Brennan Center).

[541] Tobar, Deputies in 'Neo-Nazi' Gang, Judge Found: Sheriff's Department: Many at Lynwood office have engaged in racially motivated violence against blacks and Latinos, jurist wrote. L.A. Times (Oct. 12, 1991) (as of Apr. 5, 2022) (Deputies in Neo-Nazi Gang).

[542] Ibid.

[543] O'Connor and Daunt, The Secret Society Among Lawmen L.A. Times (Mar. 24, 1999) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[544] See, e.g., Loyola Law School Loyola Marymount University Center for Juvenile Law & Policy, 50 Years of Deputy Gangs in the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department (Jan. 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022); Lockhart, A new lawsuit describes a violent gang in LA County. Its members are deputy sheriffs Vox (Oct. 11, 2019) (as of Apr. 5, 2022); Joseph, Rakia, and Corey, Claims of Racism and Brutality Dog Los Angeles County Sheriff 'Deputy Gangs' The Appeal (Sept. 28, 2018) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[545] Ward, supra, at p. 611

[546] Id. at p. 609; Ifill, supra, at p. 287-88.

[547] Brennan Center, supra (citing numerous news articles).

[548] Utah v. Strieff, (2016) 136 S. Ct. 2056, 2070 (Sotomayor, J., dissenting) (discussing how Black and Brown parents have given children "the talk" for generations, citing Du Bois, Baldwin, and Coates).

[549] AB 1506 Analysis, supra, at p. 7.

[550] EJI 3d ed., supra, at p. 61.

[551] Bright, Discrimination, Death, and Denial: The Tolerance of Racial Discrimination in Infliction of the Death Penalty (1995) 35 Santa Clara L.Rev. 433, 433-435 (Bright).

[552] Id. at pp. 439, 442-466.

[553] Lee, supra.

[554] Ibid.

[555] Ibid.

[556] Ibid.

[557] Ibid.

[558] Newkirk, The Great Land Robbery The Atlantic (Sept. 2019) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[559] Hinson, supra, at p. 916.

[560] Fleischer, Opinion: Want to tear down insidious monuments to racism and segregation? Bulldoze L.A. freeways L.A. Times (June 24, 2020) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[561] Munoz and Manthey, Black families own homes at a lower rate than white families in SoCal. Here's why that matters ABC 7 News (July 16, 2021) (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[562] Hudson, supra, at p. 206.

[563] Id. at pp. 206-07.

[564] Id. at p. 207.

[565] Color of Law, supra, at p. 147.

[566] Ibid.

[567] Id. at pp. 257-58.

[568] Ifill, supra, at p. 289.

[569] Ibid.

[570] Ibid.

[571] Id. at pp. 289-90.

[572] Id. at p. 291.

[573] Ward, supra, at p. 607-08; Ifill, supra, at p. 287.

[574] Ifill, supra, at p. 287.

[575] See Walter Howard Smith, Jr., The Impact of Racial Trauma on African Americans The Heinz Endowments (2010) (as of Apr. 5, 2022), p. 5 (Impact of Racial Trauma).

[576] Ward, supra, at p. 608.

[577] Id. at p. 615.

[578] Id. at p. 608.

[579] Ibid.

[580] Id. at pp. 608-09.

[581] Impact of Racial Trauma, supra, at p. 4; Erlanger A. Turner & Jasmine Richardson, Racial Trauma Is Real: The Impact of Police Shootings on African AmericanAfrican-Americans (July 14, 2016), American Psychological Association, Psychology Benefits Society, (as of Apr. 5, 2022).

[582] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 23.

[583] Ibid.

[584] See Hudson, supra, at p. 133.

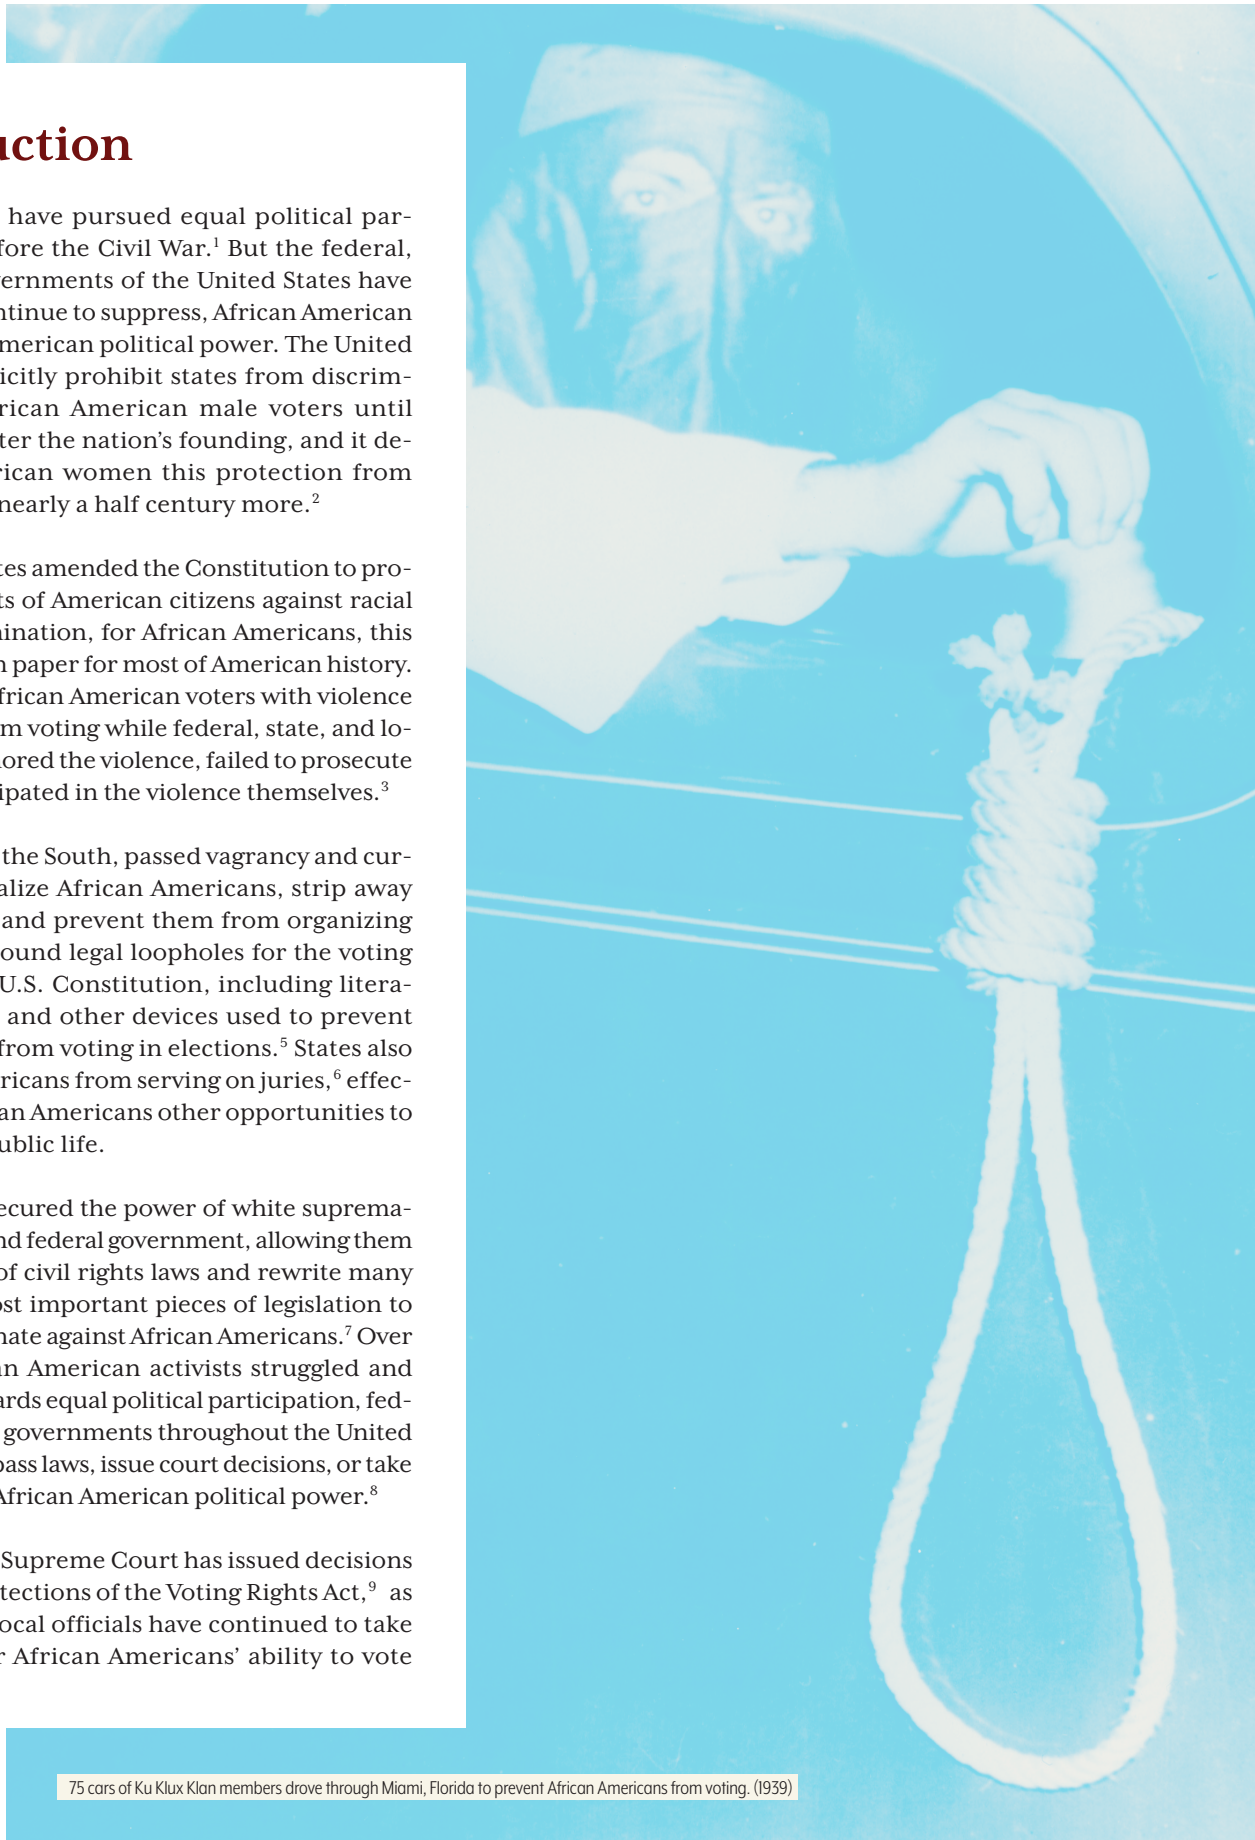
CHAPTER 4 Political Disenfranchisement

COURTESY OF IMAGNO/HULTON ARCHIVE VIA GETTY IMAGES



I. Introduction

African Americans have pursued equal political participation since before the Civil War.[1] But the federal, state, and local governments of the United States have suppressed, and continue to suppress, African American votes and African American political power. The United States did not explicitly prohibit states from discriminating against African American male voters until almost a century after the nation's founding, and it denied African American women this protection from discrimination for nearly a half century more.[2]

After the United States amended the Constitution to protect the voting rights of American citizens against racial and gender discrimination, for African Americans, this right existed only on paper for most of American history. Whites terrorized African American voters with violence to prevent them from voting while federal, state, and local governments ignored the violence, failed to prosecute offenders, or participated in the violence themselves.[3]

States, especially in the South, passed vagrancy and curfew laws to criminalize African Americans, strip away their right to vote, and prevent them from organizing politically.[4] States found legal loopholes for the voting protections in the U.S. Constitution, including literacy tests, poll taxes, and other devices used to prevent African Americans from voting in elections.[5] States also barred African Americans from serving on juries,[6] effectively denying African Americans other opportunities to serve in civic and public life.

These restrictions secured the power of white supremacists in local, state, and federal government, allowing them to block hundreds of civil rights laws and rewrite many of the country's most important pieces of legislation to exclude or discriminate against African Americans.[7] Over centuries, as African American activists struggled and made advances towards equal political participation, federal, state, and local governments throughout the United States continued to pass laws, issue court decisions, or take actions to smother African American political power.[8]

In recent years, the Supreme Court has issued decisions eliminating the protections of the Voting Rights Act,[9] as federal, state, and local officials have continued to take actions that impair African Americans' ability to vote and express their political voice. Despite the historical advancements African Americans have made in political participation, African Americans remain underrepresented, both in elected office[10] and in the policies enacted to meet African American communities' needs.[11]

75 cars of Ku Klux Klan members drove through Miami, Florida to prevent African Americans from voting. (1939)

California imposed similar restrictions on African American political participation throughout its history.[12] Though California professed to be a free state when it joined the union, white and African Americans did not possess the same freedoms. California refused to ratify the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments for nearly a century,[13] and it built many of the same barriers to African American political participation as those used in the South, such as poll taxes, literacy tests, and the disenfranchisement of people convicted of felonies.[14] The state also enacted other legal barriers, such as its law banning any non-white person from testifying in any court case involving a white person.[15] While California eventually eliminated many of these restrictions,[16] its adoption of these discriminatory practices has had longstanding effects on Black political participation, representation, and the current inequalities that persist within the state.[17]

This chapter begins in section II by discussing the long history of white officials portraying African American political participation as a threat to undermine African American political power and maintain racial subordination. Section III discusses the early history of African American political participation, from America's founding to the end of Reconstruction. Section IV and V describes the many devices that local, state, and federal official have used to suppress African American political power, as well as the voting rights legislation that the United States and California have enacted after centuries of African American sacrifice and struggle. This chapter ends in Section VI by describing the consequences of both past and present efforts to suppress African American political participation, and how the exclusion of African Americans from political power have produced deep inequalities in the policies that shape America and the lives of African Americans.

Senator Richard Nixon promised "law and order" during the presidential campaign of 1968, preying on white fears of social upheaval amidst the civil rights movement. Nixon's victory in 1968 began what became known as the Republican "Southern Strategy": winning votes from the South by appealing to racial prejudice.

II. Political Demonization of African Americans

White politicians have long portrayed African American political participation as a threat in order to undercut African American political power and maintain the racial hierarchy of enslavement, even after Emancipation.[18]

During and after Reconstruction, white southern Democrats used fears of African American political power to propel themselves into office.[19] For example, in 1870, West Virginia Democrats used the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment to provoke fear that African Americans would threaten the "white man's government."[20] After Democrats won the governor's seat and control of the state legislature in West Virginia, one Republican observed that "[h]ostility to negro suffrage was the prime element of our defeat."[21] In 1901, the President of the Alabama Constitutional Convention warned against the "menace of negro domination" to justify the state's efforts "to establish white supremacy in this State."[22]

White politicians continued to employ the same tactics throughout the 20th century and into the 21st century. Despite the nonviolent protests led by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and others during the civil rights movement in the 1950s and 1960s, white Americans portrayed African American civil rights activists as violent rioters and criminals.[23] Exploiting this racist imagery, then-Senator Richard Nixon promised "law and order" during the presidential campaign of 1968, preying on white fears of societal upheaval amidst the civil rights movement.[24] This move contributed to Nixon's victory in the 1968 election, beginning what became known as the "Southern Strategy": the Republican strategy to win votes from the South by appealing to the racial prejudice of white southerners.[25]

In 1981, Republican campaign strategist Lee Atwater described the evolution of the Southern Strategy, shifting from express racial discrimination to more indirect dog whistles: "You start out in 1954 by saying, 'Nigger, nigger, nigger.' By 1968 you can't say 'nigger'—that hurts you, backfires. So you say stuff like, uh, forced busing, states' rights, and all that stuff, and you're getting so abstract. Now, you're talking about cutting taxes, and all these things you're talking about are totally economic things and a byproduct of them is, [B]lacks get hurt worse than whites.... 'We want to cut this,' is much more abstract than even the busing thing, uh, and a hell of a lot more abstract than 'Nigger, nigger.'"[26]

Lee Atwater continued this strategy in the presidential election of 1988. With George H.W. Bush trailing his rival by 15 points in the polls, Atwater convinced the campaign to shift gears and go on the attack.[27] The weapon they would use: an African American man named Willie Horton.[28]

Released from penitentiary in the state governed by Bush's rival, Willie Horton was convicted and incarcerated for sexually assaulting a white woman.[29] Preying on stereotypes and fears of African American criminality and African American assault on white womanhood, Atwater and the Bush campaign played television ads prominently displaying Horton's African American face over ominous warnings, to great success. In focus groups, half of prospective voters almost immediately switched to supporting Bush after seeing the ad.[30] In practice, the ad helped transform Bush's 15 point deficit into a presidential victory, 426 electoral votes to 111.[31] When critics pointed out the racial fearmongering of the Horton ad, the Bush campaign tried to distance itself from it.[32]

The federal government erased the humanity of enslaved Black people in many ways. The 1850 and 1860 federal censuses did not list most enslaved people by their own name, but by the name of their enslavers.

Today, the same stereotypical imagery persists in American politics. Echoing the language of elections past, Donald Trump declared himself the "law and order candidate."[33] After the police murder of George Floyd in the summer of 2020, Trump called protesters in Minnesota "thugs" and said that "when the looting starts, the shooting starts," using the exact same phrase that a white Miami police chief repeated in response to African American protestors in 1968.[34] When peaceful protesters marched in D.C., the Trump administration met those protests with tear gas, smoke bombs, and beatings.[35]

III. Reconstruction and the Constitution

Nationally

From its beginning, the United States excluded enslaved African American people from American citizenship, declining to count them as full people.[36] As discussed in Chapter 2, Enslavement, in 1789, the U.S. Constitution included a "Three Fifths Clause," counting enslaved African American persons as "three[-]fifths of all other persons" for the purpose of establishing the number of representatives each state would have in Congress, as well as the number of electoral votes each state would cast in a presidential election.[37]

On the one hand, the Three-Fifths Clause dehumanized enslaved African Americans by not counting them as a full person. On the other hand, by allowing proslavery southerners to partially count enslaved people toward their total number of electoral votes and representatives in Congress, even though enslaved people could not vote or express any political voice, the Constitution gave the states that enslaved them much more power than they would have had otherwise.

For example, southerner Thomas Jefferson would not have won the presidential election in 1801 without the additional electoral votes given to southern states based on the number of African Americans they enslaved within their borders.[38] Further, the manner in which the federal government counted the enslaved population of African Americans erased their humanity. The 1850 and 1860 federal censuses did not list most enslaved people by name, as they did for white Americans, but by the name of their enslavers.[39]

While denying enslaved African Americans their citizenship, the United States also denied free African Americans the right to vote. When the Framers signed the Constitution in 1787, they left voting laws to the states—whose laws protected the right to vote only for white, male property owners.[40] Though a few northern states would eventually extend the right to vote to African Americans, by the time of the American Civil War, most states, including every southern state, prohibited African Americans from voting.[41]

During Reconstruction (1865 to 1877), the federal government aimed to give newly freed African Americans access to basic civil rights. The Civil Rights Act of 1866 granted citizenship to anyone born in the United States regardless of color, or previous enslavement.[42] The Fourteenth Amendment made birthright citizenship and civil rights permanent.[43] By achieving these changes, African Americans not only redefined their own citizenship—they redefined citizenship for all Americans.[44] Birthright citizenship might not have come into existence in the United States without African Americans' struggle against slavery, and it helped open the door to citizenship for all immigrants and their U.S. born children.[45]

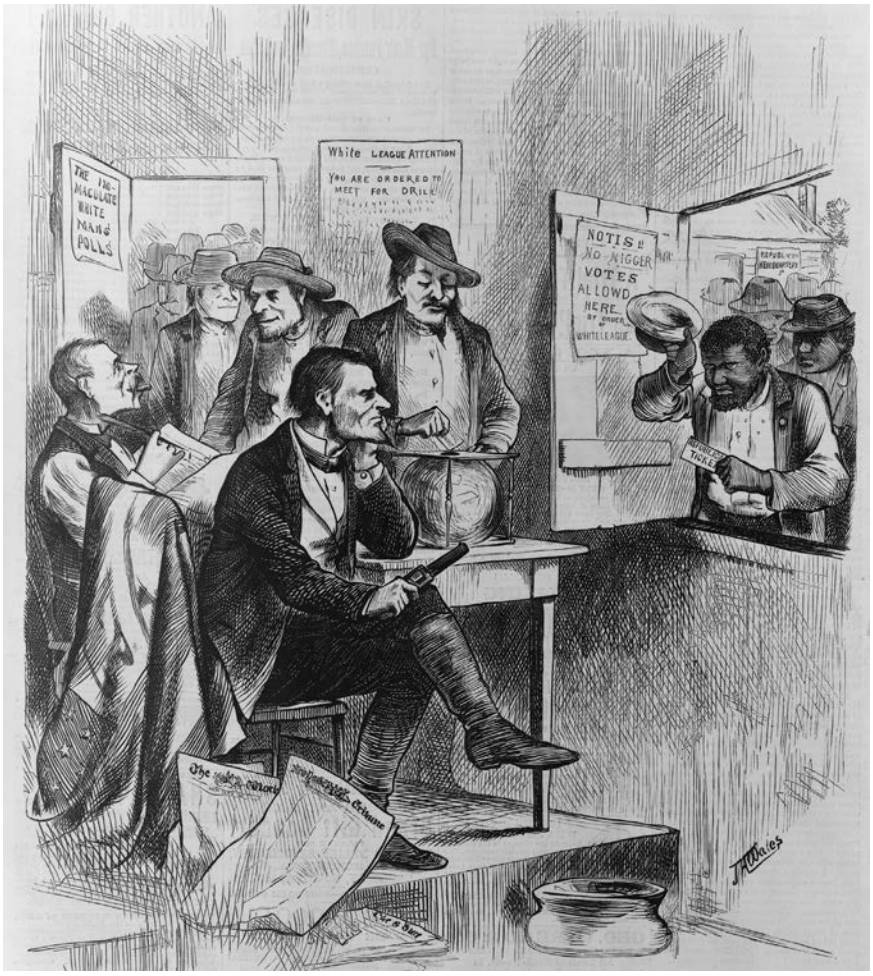
Congress also recognized that political rights were essential to African American civil and economic rights,[46] so the Fifteenth Amendment was ratified in 1870 which prohibited states from discriminating against voters based on "race, color, or previous condition of servitude."[47]

However, the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments had limitations. The Fourteenth Amendment did not protect African Americans' right to vote.[48] Instead, the Fourteenth Amendment only punished states that legally denied male citizens the right to vote by reducing their number of representatives in Congress,[49] a penalty that has never been enforced.[50] While the Fifteenth Amendment prohibited states from denying a person's right to vote based on race, it contained no enforcement mechanism without an act of Congress.[51]

In 1870 and 1871, Congress passed several Enforcement Acts, giving the federal government the authority to prosecute violations of the Fifteenth Amendment.[52] But in 1875, the U.S. Supreme Court held that because the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments only empowered the federal government to prohibit discrimination by the states, it did not empower the federal government to prosecute the private white militants who used racial terror to suppress African American voting.[53] And to the extent that the Fifteenth Amendment protected African American men in the right to vote, it did not extend the same protection to African American women, who would have to wait another half century for the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920.[54]

African Americans responded by taking full advantage of their new political rights. African Americans held conventions across the country[55] and participated in state constitutional conventions to secure their voting rights.[56] Republicans in Congress increasingly began to believe that they needed to overhaul southern governments and ensure that ex-Confederates did not return to power.[57] As a result, Congress passed a series of laws from 1867 to 1868 called the Reconstruction Acts, which required most ex-Confederate states to hold constitutional conventions and write new state constitutions acknowledging African American civil rights.[58]

COURTESY OF JAMES ALBERT WALES/HARPER'S WEEKLY VIA LIBRARY OF CONGRESS



"Every thing points to a democratic victory this fall" (Oct. 31, 1874)

The Reconstruction Acts guaranteed African American men the right to vote for constitutional delegates and on the new constitutions.[59] Across the South in 1867, African American turnout ranged from 70 percent in Georgia to 90 percent in Virginia.[60] African American votes were nearly unanimous in support of ballot measures to hold constitutional conventions to amend their state constitutions to guarantee equal rights.[61] Hundreds of African American men served in the southern state constitutional conventions under the Reconstruction Acts, and they participated alongside white Republicans in writing new constitutions which protected equal voting rights, civil rights, and educational rights (although usually in segregated facilities) for African Americans.[62] By 1868, more than 700,000 African American men were registered to vote in the South.[63] One white Republican in Alabama said that African Americans "voted their entire walking strength—no one stayed at home that was able to come to the polls."[64]

With African American voters came African American elected officials. During Reconstruction, over 1,400 African Americans held federal, state, or local office, and more than 600 served in state assemblies.[65] Many of these new African American officials were formerly enslaved, and many took seats formerly held by men who had enslaved others.[66] The ranks of elected African American officials included 16 African American men elected to Congress, 14 to the U.S. House of Representatives and two to the U.S. Senate.[67]

White politicians—including Republicans who had favored Emancipation and Black enfranchisement—treated Black elected officials as junior partners in government. In 1874, 16 Black politicians in Louisiana publicly complained of being excluded from "any knowledge of the confidential workings of the party and government" and "not infrequently humiliated in our intercourse with those whom we have exalted to power."

The election of African Americans into office, however, did not translate to full political representation. African Americans took a lower share of elected seats in both state and federal office relative to their proportion of the electorate, and rising presence in office did not always carry greater power at the highest levels of state government.[68] White politicians—including Republicans who had favored Emancipation and African American enfranchisement—treated African American elected officials as junior partners in government.[69] In 1874, 16 African American politicians in Louisiana publicly complained of being excluded from "any knowledge of the confidential workings of the party and government" and "not infrequently humiliated in our intercourse with those whom we have exalted to power."[70]

Over time, white northern support for Reconstruction collapsed. Southern Democrats intensified violent insurrection, and white northerners tired of the economic and military costs necessary to enforce equal rights.[71] An economic depression in the 1870s further weakened the federal government's resolve and undermined support for pro-Reconstruction officials in the south.[72] To regain support, President Ulysses S. Grant shared power with southern Democrats who opposed Reconstruction, causing one northerner to complain that the government was filling "every Dep[artment]" with southern Democrats to "placate the rebels and get their votes."[73]

These pressures came to a head in the presidential election of 1876, when both the candidates—Republican Rutherford B. Hayes and Democrat Samuel Tilden—claimed to have won due to contested votes in the southern states where election violence and fraud was high.[74] Southern Democrats contested the results, threatening revolt.[75] To avoid another civil war, the Republicans and Democrats reached a compromise: the Democrats stopped contesting the presidential election and the Republicans agreed to withdraw federal troops from key locations in the south, effectively ending Reconstruction.[76] As the chairman of the Kansas state Republican committee wrote, "I think the policy of the new administration will be to conciliate to the white men of the South. Carpetbaggers to the rear, and niggers take care of yourselves."[77] An article published in The Nation predicted, "[t]he negro… will disappear from the field of national politics. Henceforth, the nation, as a nation, will have nothing more to do with him."[78]

California

The State of California entered the union in 1850, and its constitution proclaimed that "neither slavery, nor involuntary servitude, unless for the punishment of crimes, shall ever be tolerated in this State."[79] But that very same document gave only "white male citizen[s]" the right to vote.[80] From the beginning, freedom in California meant something different for white and African American Californians. As detailed in Chapter 2 Enslavement, despite California's prohibition on slavery, enslavers forced hundreds of enslaved African Americans into the state.[81] California became one of the few free states to pass a fugitive slave law, authorizing and even enforcing the ability of white Californians to kidnap and traffic African American Californians to southern enslaving states.[82]

Meanwhile, free African American Californians faced other restrictions on their ability to participate in civic life. California banned African Americans and other nonwhite people from testifying in court against a white person.[83] In some cases, this law allowed a white man to get away with murder. In 1854, the California Supreme Court overturned the murder conviction of a white man because he was convicted based upon the testimony of Chinese witnesses.[84]

Admitting that California designed the law to protect white defendants from justice, California's Supreme Court defended the law as a matter of public policy, warning that allowing any non-white person to testify "would admit them to all the equal rights of citizenship, and we might soon see them at the polls, in the jury box, upon the bench, and in our legislative halls," a prospect that the Court viewed as an "actual and present danger."

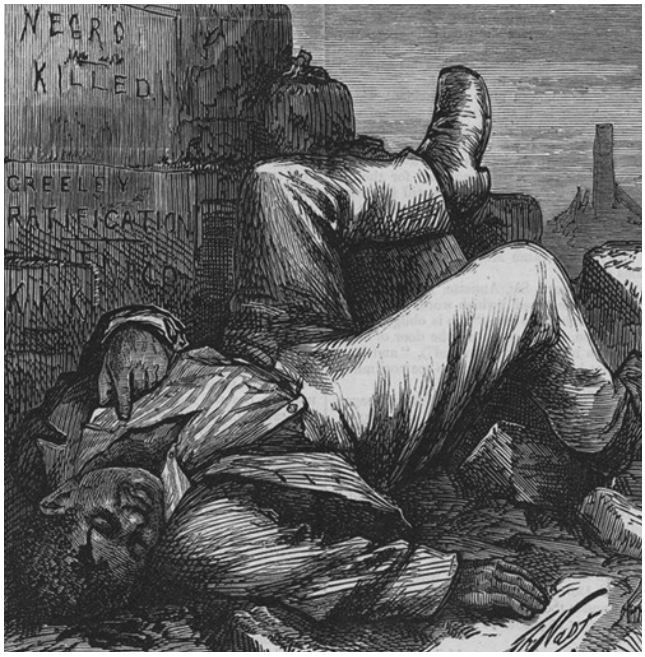
Reversing the murder conviction, the California Supreme Court explained: "In using the words, 'No Black, or Mulatto person, or Indian shall be allowed to give evidence for or against a White person,' the Legislature... adopted the most comprehensive terms to embrace every known class or shade of color, as the apparent design was to protect the White person from the influence of all testimony other than that of persons of the same caste."[85] Admitting that California designed the law to protect white defendants from justice, California's Supreme Court defended the law as a matter of public policy, warning that allowing any non-white person to testify "would admit them to all the equal rights of citizenship, and we might soon see them at the polls, in the jury box, upon the bench, and in our legislative halls," a prospect that the Court viewed as an "actual and present danger."[86]

One case drew public attention to the law and its effects on African American Californians. In 1861, a white man named Rodney B. Schell robbed a Black-owned business.[87] When George W. Gordon, an African American barber, complained to the police, Schell shot and murdered Gordon in his shop.[88] At Schell's murder trial, his attorneys used California's ban on non-white testimony to exclude the prosecution's key witness, hiring two "hairologists" who examined the witness's hair under a microscope and claimed that the witness had "African blood in his veins."[89] Consequently, the court excluded the key testimony, resulting in Schell's conviction for second-degree murder, rather than first-degree murder.[90]

A Black-owned local newspaper called the case a "Mockery of Justice" in "one of the most deliberate and cold-blooded murders that ever disgraced California, even in her rudest and most lawless days."[91] One California legislator observed that Schell had murdered Gordon, knowing that African American testimony against him would be barred in court.[92] Another legislator proclaimed that the law banning African American testimony served as "a legislative license for the commission of crimes."[93] Though the Schell trial generated a firestorm of controversy, California's Legislature refused to change the law that year.[94]

Many other African American Californians suffered crimes without recourse to testimony and justice in court. When Jim Howard, a white man, stole from an African American laundryman named Albert Grubbs, Grubbs testified and helped secure Howard's conviction for grand larceny.[95] On appeal, the Chief Justice of the California Supreme Court, Stephen J. Field—who would later become a Justice on the U.S. Supreme Court—overturned the conviction, declaring that California's law categorically barred any African American testimony, even if "crime may go unpunished."[96]

COURTESY OF RICHMOND WHIG /THE NEW YORK PUBLIC LIBRARY DIGITAL COLLECTION



"One vote less" (1872)

Discriminated against by both the laws and those who would break it, many African American Californians, like Peter Lester—who was assaulted and robbed in his store but unable to testify against the perpetrators—left the state.[97] From San Francisco alone, some 200 African American families, a substantial portion of the 4,000 total African Americans who had settled in California between 1850 and 1860,[98] left during the 1850s in a mass exodus to British colonies in what is now Canada.[99]

Other African American Californians organized in response to these restrictions. African American citizens formed the Colored Executive Committee and founded their own weekly newspaper, Mirror of the Times.[100] Drawing from African American activism in other parts of the nation, African American Californians held the first of four "Colored Citizens' Conventions" in 1855 at the St. Andrews African Methodist Episcopal Church in Sacramento.[101] At this convention and later meetings, they advocated against slavery, urged repeal of California's law barring African American testimony against whites in state courts, and petitioned for the right to vote.[102]

After an eight-year campaign, convention delegates convinced the California Legislature to repeal its ban on African American testimony in 1863.[103] As soon as the ban on African American testimony ended, African American Californians spearheaded legal efforts to protect their rights in court. African American women organized legal efforts to file charges against streetcar drivers who refused to pick up African American riders or harassed them on the car.[104]

In other cases, African American testimony proved crucial to preventing African American Californians from being enslaved. Thirteen years after California entered the union as a free state, in 1863, an enslaver purchased and trafficked a 12-year-old African American girl, Edith, selling her to a farmer in Sacramento County.[105] But a free African American man named Daniel Blue intervened on her behalf, filing a case in court.[106] With his testimony and the testimony of other African American citizens, he persuaded the Sacramento probate judge to remove Edith from the enslaver's custody.[107]

After the repeal of the ban on African American testimony in 1863,[108] and the abolition of slavery in 1865,[109] African American activists in California turned their attention to voting rights. The California Colored Citizens' Convention of 1865 petitioned the state legislature for a constitutional amendment to give African Americans voting rights.[110] But when a Republican State Senator presented the petition to the state legislature, its members never discussed it.[111]

In the following two years, African American activists drafted another petition asking the state Legislature to grant voting rights to African American men, if approved by a two-thirds vote by the state assembly and the state senate.[112] But by then, the Democrats had taken over the legislature after campaigning on anti-African American and anti-Chinese platforms.[113] African American activists could not find a single member of the state legislature who would agree to present the petition for the state legislature's consideration.[114]

California continued to deny equal rights for its African American citizens. When the United States adopted the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution in 1868, guaranteeing the equal protection of law to African Americans, the California Legislature ignored the Amendment and never ratified it.[115] Similarly, California later refused to ratify the Fifteenth Amendment, which prohibited states from discriminating against voters on the basis of race.[116]

California continued to deny equal rights for its Black citizens. When the United States adopted the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution in 1868, guaranteeing the equal protection of law to African Americans, the California Legislature ignored the Amendment and never ratified it. Similarly, California later refused to ratify the Fifteenth Amendment, which prohibited states from discriminating against voters on the basis of race.

Nevertheless, enough states voted for the Fifteenth Amendment to make it the law of the country in 1870, and upon its ratification,[117] African American Californians registered to vote in droves.[118] But California officials openly refused to abide by the Fifteenth Amendment.[119] California's Attorney General Joseph Hamilton instructed county clerks not to register African American voters until Congress passed legislation commanding them to do so.[120]

When African American Californians and their allies protested in response, in some areas, county clerks caved to public pressure and eventually permitted African American Californians to vote.[121] Others resisted more firmly. In southern California, Louis G. Green was the first African American Californian in Los Angeles who tried to register to vote.[122] When the Los Angeles County Clerk refused to allow him to do so, Green filed suit in court.[123] The County Judge—who was the brother-in-law of the County Clerk being sued—upheld the Clerk's refusal to register Green.[124]

Recognizing the resistance to African American voting in California and other states, Congress enacted the Enforcement Act of 1870, a federal law imposing penalties for states who violated the Fifteenth Amendment.[125] Only after the passage of this law did California officials submit and allow African American men to register to vote.[126] It would take California nearly another decade to change its constitution to partly conform to the Fifteenth Amendment's requirements in 1879,[127] and nearly another century to formally ratify the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution in 1959 and 1962, respectively.[128]

IV. Devices Used to Suppress African American Political Participation

Though African Americans strove to build and maintain the promise of African American citizenship after Emancipation, the end of Reconstruction left them unprotected against the white supremacists who had previously enslaved them. After Reconstruction, white Americans in both the North and South employed a host of devices to reassert white supremacy and suppress African American political power. As a result, African Americans who had already been voting for many years were barred from voting.

Racial Terror to Suppress African American Political Power

As Chapter 3 Racial Terror details, white Americans resorted to kidnapping, mass murder, and other forms of racial terror to reassert white supremacy and destroy African American political power all across the southern states.[129] The federal and Republican-run state governments tried to suppress this violence, but white local officials and law enforcement across the South often turned a blind eye or even participated in the violence themselves.[130] Federal and state officials themselves have used their power to target and terrorize civil rights leaders.[131]

As violence intensified in the South President Grant's cabinet urged him to "wash the hands of the Administration entirely of the whole business." For much of America history, the federal government sacrificed the lives and rights of African Americans in exchange for political stability.

Even during Reconstruction, about 10 percent of African American political officials reported receiving violent threats and suffered physical assaults.[132] At least 35 African American officials were murdered by the Ku Klux Klan or similar terrorist organizations.[133] Though the federal government intervened to stop early violence in Louisiana, white Americans in both the North and South began to protest federal military intervention in local affairs.[134] According to one historian, "[t]he spectacle of soldiers 'marching into the Hall... and expelling members at the point of bayonet' aroused more Northern opposition than any previous federal action in the South."[135]

President Grant's cabinet urged the President to "wash the hands of the Administration entirely of the whole business," referring to the repeated white insurrections in Louisiana, and white political backlash made Congressional Republicans wary of further military intervention in the south.[136] When the Republican Governor of Mississippi, a member of Grant's own party, requested federal aid against white supremacist insurrection, President Grant wrote, "[t]he whole public are tired out with these annual autumnal outbreaks in the South... [and] are ready now to condemn any interference on the part of the Government."[137]

For much of American history, then, the federal government sacrificed the lives and rights of African Americans for political stability while white Americans in the South wrought racial violence to oppress African Americans.

Despite the many threats to their lives, African American activists organized in response to these campaigns of racial terror. They formed organizations like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), a group of African American intellectuals and activists who partnered with white liberals to pursue African American civil rights and equality, pursuing legal challenges against many of the devices described throughout this chapter.[138] State governments sought to sabotage these efforts. Mississippi, for instance, created the Mississippi State Sovereignty Commission, an agency created to resist the civil rights movement and preserve racial segregation.[139] The Commission planted clerical workers in the offices of civil rights attorneys, spied on civil rights organizations, obstructed African American voter registration, and encouraged police harassment of African Americans.[140]

The federal government, at times, targeted and terrorized civil rights leaders as well. During the 1950s and 1960s, for instance, when Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. urged nonviolent protest to pursue racial justice, Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) Director J. Edgar Hoover viewed Dr. King as a communist threat and ordered the electronic surveillance of Dr. King and his staff.[141] While doing so, the FBI produced reports claiming that one of Dr. King's advisors was a communist, suggesting that international communists might be controlling Dr. King.[142] Though the FBI's surveillance uncovered no evidence of communist influence, it uncovered evidence of Dr. King's extramarital affairs, and used this information not only to try and discredit Dr. King as a leader of the civil rights movement, but also to attempt to convince Dr. King to take his own life.[143] "They are out to break me," Dr. King confided to a friend, "[t]hey are out to get me, harass me, break my spirit."[144]

The federal government continued to surveil and sabotage other African American activists and organizations. In the 1960s and 1970s, the federal government took extensive measures to surveil the Black Panther Party, using undercover agents to infiltrate the group and sow discord, contributing to its collapse.[145] Though public exposure of the FBI's surveillance activities forced the government to enact several reforms, those reforms weakened over time, and the FBI has reportedly resumed similar programs surveilling African American activists, including those in the Black Lives Matter movement.[146]

Black Codes and Vagrancy Laws

As discussed later in Chapter 11 An Unjust Legal System, southern states passed a series of laws between 1865 and 1866—which historians refer to collectively as the "Black Codes"—to criminalize freed African Americans for engaging in ordinary activity and force them back into forms of enslaved labor.[147] During Reconstruction, Republicans in Congress managed to remove these Black Codes with the Civil Rights Act of 1866 and the Fourteenth Amendment.[148] But after the end of Reconstruction, former Confederate states began passing a flurry of laws similar to the post-Civil War Black Codes, that while racially neutral on their face, added up to slavery-like conditions in practice.[149] Every former Confederate state except Tennessee enacted vagrancy laws, between 1890 and 1909, which criminalized "idle" behavior and forced African Americans back into conditions of enslavement,[150] limiting the formation of African American businesses and spaces that provided the foundation for African American community and political consciousness.[151] By criminalizing African Americans for everyday conduct, these laws suppressed African American political participation in two ways: African Americans convicted of a crime could not vote or serve on juries, and African Americans were prevented from organizing to protest these laws, because these laws made such gatherings illegal.[152]

When Mississippi adopted literacy tests, among other voting restrictions, in its 1890 constitutional convention, the president of the convention declared: "Let us tell the truth if it bursts the bottom of the Universe. We came here to exclude the negro."

Literacy Tests

Because the Fifteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution declared that a person's right to vote shall not be denied "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude,"[153] states created many laws designed to block African American voting without referring to race.[154] One of these methods was the literacy test: voting registrars or poll workers would test a person's reading or writing capabilities before permitting them to register or vote. Usually, these tests required a prospective voter to either write down a certain piece of text (such as a part of the Constitution) or to write down answers to written questions.[155] Following Reconstruction, at least 21 states in both the North and South used literacy tests to deny African Americans their voting rights.[156]

As described in Chapter 6 on Separate and Unequal Education, states and local governments deprived African Americans of educational resources and opportunities during enslavement and after Emancipation.[157] Consequently, states adopted literacy tests knowing that such barriers would primarily exclude African American voters.[158] At the South Carolina constitutional convention of 1895, Senator Ben Tillman explained that the literacy test was intended to take the vote away from "ignorant [B]lacks."[159] When Mississippi adopted literacy tests, among other voting restrictions, in its 1890 constitutional convention, the president of the convention declared: "Let us tell the truth if it bursts the bottom of the Universe. We came here to exclude the negro."[160]

Even when many African Americans were well-equipped to pass ordinary literacy tests, states excluded African American voters by requiring them to satisfy more complex requirements than those required for white voters;[161] asking subjective questions that gave white officials the discretion to exclude African American voters;[162] or requiring African American voters to answer impossible questions, such as "how many bubbles are in a bar of soap?"[163] One Georgian official boasted, "I can keep the President of the United States from registering [to vote], if I want to. God, Himself, couldn't understand that sentence [in the literacy test]. I, myself, am the judge."[164]

African Americans challenged these literacy tests in court but met with little success. In 1898, the United States Supreme Court upheld Mississippi's literacy test in a case called Williams v. Mississippi.[165] After an all-white jury convicted Henry Williams, a African American man, of murder, Williams appealed, arguing that he did not receive a fair trial because African Americanss were excluded from the jury.[166]

Because the jury list was drawn from the state's voter registries, the Court examined whether Mississippi's literacy tests had illegally blocked African Americans from registering to vote.[167] The Court approved of the literacy tests, holding that the literacy test did not mention race and therefore did not discriminate based on race.[168] The strategy pursued by Mississippi and other states worked: states could pass racist laws designed to deny African American votes, and so long as the laws did not mention race, those laws would be upheld in court.

With the Supreme Court's approval, states continued to use literacy tests to restrict African American voting through the 20th century.[169] It took 100 years after the end of Reconstruction for the federal government to permanently ban literacy tests nationwide through an amendment to the Voting Rights Act in 1975.[170] Despite this federal prohibition, some states, like North Carolina, still have unenforceable literacy tests on the books today.[171]

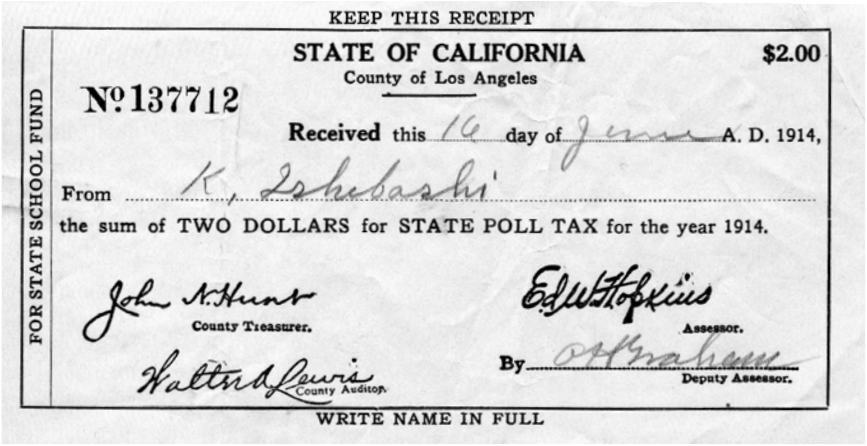
Thus, while states enacted literacy tests after Reconstruction in the late 1800s, these voting restrictions lasted well until the late 20th century, shaping the lives of Americans who currently live and serve in public office. President Joseph Biden, and at least 80 out of the 100 current U.S. Senators, were alive when literacy tests were still legal in the United States.[172]

Property Requirements and Poll Taxes

States also used property requirements and poll taxes to prevent African Americans from voting.[173] Beginning in early American colonial history, states required individuals to own a certain amount of land or property before they could vote.[174] After American independence, more states removed or relaxed these laws, and many new states never adopted them at all.[175] But to prevent free African American men from voting, many states began limiting voting only to white men.[176] The Fifteenth Amendment forced states to eliminate this express racial discrimination, but with the end of Reconstruction, states in both the North and South reenacted these property restrictions or created new ones, imposing poll taxes to require potential voters to make a payment before they could cast their ballot.[177]

While these laws had the effect of excluding all poor voters—white and African American alike—the law specifically exploited the fact that African Americans, newly freed from slavery, often began their free lives without any wealth, preventing them from affording the costs of the poll tax. Additionally, some states, such as Alabama, required a person to pay poll taxes for prior elections in which they had not voted, a penalty that directly targeted African Americans, who could not have voted until after Emancipation.[178]

COURTESY OF ISHIBASHI COLLECTION/CALIFORNIA STATE UNIVERSITY



KEEP THIS RECEIPT

STATE OF CALIFORNIA $2.00

County of Los Angeles

No 137712

Received this 14 day of June A. D. 1914,

From K. Ishibashi

the sum of TWO DOLLARS for STATE POLL TAX for the year 1914.

John A. Hunt County Treasurer.

Edw. Hopkins Assessor.

Walter A. Lewis County Auditor.

By O. H. Graham Deputy Assessor.

FOR STATE SCHOOL FUND

WRITE NAME IN FULL

The receipt of Kumekichi Ishibashi's payment of $2 for the State Poll Tax in year 1912.

Despite repeated challenges from civil rights activists, poll taxes remained a persistent barrier to the right to vote until 1965.[179] In 1937, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the use of state poll taxes, declaring that poll taxes did not deny any constitutional right because the "[p]rivilege of voting is... conferred by the state and... the state may condition suffrage as it deems appropriate."[180]

Recognizing the effects poll taxes had on voting, Congress attempted to ban poll taxes in some fashion in 1942, 1943, 1945, and 1947.[181] None of those laws passed the Senate due to southern senators' use of the filibuster—a Senate rule requiring a two-thirds majority before debate could end and a vote could be taken on a bill.[182] The southern senators' reasoning behind their defense of the poll tax was simple: the poll tax was one of the devices used to suppress African American voters and keep the senators in power.

Although the poll tax affected whites more than African Americans, the southern senators believed that repeal of the poll tax would provide momentum to removing other barriers blocking African American voting in the South.[183] It took decades more of activism and litigation before Congress prohibited poll taxes in 1965[184] and the Supreme Court ruled poll taxes to be unconstitutional in 1966.[185]

Virginia enacted its first challenger law in 1870, a few months after the end of Reconstruction. The state reenacted the law in 1904, following its 1901 to 1902 constitutional convention, which the state held "mainly for the purpose of disenfranchising the Negro voter."

Challenger Laws and Witness Requirements

To exclude African American voters, states also used "challenger laws" and laws requiring witnesses to attest to a voter's qualifications.[186] Challenger laws allow private citizens to contest another person's qualifications to vote, usually by making a complaint before the local or state officials charged with registering voters or administering the polls during election day.[187] Many states enacted such laws before the Civil War, some as far back as the American Revolution.[188] Following Reconstruction, however, states in both the North and South used these laws to allow white supremacists to challenge, intimidate, and suppress African American votes.[189]

Virginia enacted its first challenger law in 1870, a few months after the end of Reconstruction.[190] The state reenacted the law in 1904, following its 1901 to 1902 constitutional convention,[191] which the state held "mainly for the purpose of disenfranchising the Negro voter."[192]

In Florida, lawmakers enacted laws in 1877 requiring voters challenged at the polls to produce two witnesses "personally known" to at least two polling officials.[193] Because Florida's polling officials were almost exclusively white, few African American citizens could provide witnesses known to them, meaning that Florida's challenger law allowed any white citizen to block an African American voter from casting their ballot.[194] Though many of these challenger and witness laws have been modified through time, they remain prevalent today: as of 2012, 46 states have laws that permit private citizens to challenge other citizens' voting eligibility.[195]

Grandfather Clauses

Many southern states understood that the onerous voting requirements they imposed, if applied fairly, could exclude white voters, too. To ensure that these restrictions primarily excluded African American voters, a half-dozen states in the South created so-called grandfather clauses.[196] Grandfather clauses allowed voters to vote, even if they could not pay the poll tax or otherwise would not have passed a literacy test, as long as they had been entitled to vote prior to 1866 or 1867, or were descended from someone who had been entitled to vote prior to 1866 or 1867.[197]

In effect, this meant that African Americans—who had not been eligible to vote prior to 1866 or 1867 in most of these states—would be the ones subject to the new voting restrictions. The Supreme Court ruled these grandfather clauses to be discriminatory and unconstitutional in 1915.[198] While grandfather clauses had a relatively shorter lifespan than literacy tests or poll taxes, they presented one of many tools used in combination with others to prevent African Americans from exercising their right to vote, revealing how states enacted many of their supposedly race neutral laws with the purposeful design of disenfranchising African American voters.

Exclusion from State Primary Elections

White Americans also prevented African American voters from participating in state party primary elections.[199] Since the late 1890s, political parties in the United States have held primary elections to allow voters to determine the candidates from their party who would run for office.[200] In 1910, state legislatures and state Democratic party chapters in the South created the "white primary," excluding all African American voters from the state primary election process.[201]

For states dominated by a single political party, determining who would run from that party essentially determined who would ultimately hold office. Because Democrats dominated state elections in the South in the late 1800s and early 1900s, the exclusion of African American voters from Democrat state primaries in the South during this period essentially excluded African Americans from having any say in their elected representatives.[202]

The NAACP brought legal challenges against the white primary and won a case in 1927 when the U.S. Supreme Court held it unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment for a state government to pass laws excluding African American citizens from a state primary election.[203] However, because the Fourteenth Amendment applied only to state actions, southern Democratic party leaders skirted around the Supreme Court's decision by excluding African American voters through the rules of its political party, which was considered a private organization.[204]

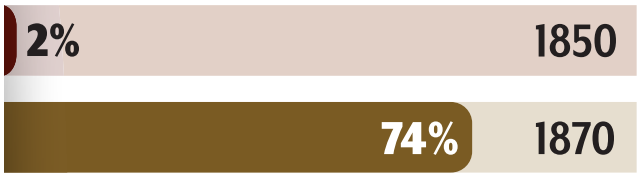
In 1944, the Supreme Court closed the loophole and ruled that states could not allow private political parties to exclude African Americanss from voting in state primaries.[205] Following the end of the all-white primary, a record 35,000 African Americans voted in the 1948 Democratic primary in South Carolina.[206]

Laws Disqualifying People Convicted of Felonies from Voting

States throughout the country have long disqualified people convicted of felonies from voting. Together with America's discriminatory criminal justice system, described in Chapter 11, An Unjust Legal system, states throughout America have used these laws to prevent African Americans from voting and continue to do so today.[207]

Laws denying people convicted of felonies their right to vote have existed since at least the colonial period of American history, finding roots in earlier English, European, and Roman law.[208] Although early U.S. state constitutions gave their legislatures the power to pass laws disenfranchising people who had committed crimes, many states—including Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Florida, and South Carolina—only passed such laws after the Civil War to deny African Americans their newly gained right to vote.[209]

NONWHITE PRISON POPULATION ALABAMA



Following Reconstruction, state governments sought to maintain white supremacy by using vagrancy laws, curfews, and other restrictions to target African Americans with criminal laws as a form of social control.[210] Because states targeted African Americans for prosecution, and because convicted African Americans were stripped of their ability to vote, states effectively used criminal laws to not only control African Americans, but also to deprive them of their right to vote.

Because states targeted African Americans for prosecution, and because convicted African Americans were stripped of their ability to vote, states effectively used criminal laws to not only control African Americans, but also to deprive them of their right to vote.

After the Civil War, in many southern states, the percentage of nonwhite people imprisoned nearly doubled between 1850 and 1870.[211] In Alabama, for example, two percent of the prison population was nonwhite in 1850, but by 1870, 74 percent of the prison population was nonwhite, even though the total nonwhite population increased by only three percent.[212] Ever since the Civil War era, states have imprisoned African Americans at higher rates than white Americans.[213] One study examining historical data found that when more of the people imprisoned by a state are African American, the state is significantly more likely to enact laws removing their right to vote if they have been convicted of a felony.[214]

Many states made clear that they targeted African Americans with their laws removing the right to vote from people convicted of felonies. According to the North Carolina Democratic Party's Executive Committee Handbook in 1898, North Carolina's restriction originates from the state's efforts "to rescue the white people of the east from the curse of negro domination."[215] The Mississippi constitutional convention in 1890 changed its disenfranchising provision from one that included "any crime" to one affecting only certain offenses like burglary or theft, a change that the Mississippi Supreme Court explained as one made "to obstruct" African American voting by targeting certain crimes the state believed that African American residents committed more frequently.[216]

Other southern states expressly tied disenfranchisement to "furtive offenses... peculiar to the Negro's low economic and social status."[217] Some scholars suggest that because denying the vote for those convicted of crimes was narrower in scope than literacy tests or poll taxes, and easier to justify than grandfather clauses, states used criminal disenfranchisement laws as "insurance"

if courts decided to strike down other, more blatantly discriminatory laws.[218]

Most of these disenfranchisement laws continue to exist across the country in some form to this day. Though the Supreme Court has recognized that "[c]itizenship is not a [right] that expires upon misbehavior,"[219] the Supreme Court has not extended that same logic to the right to vote.[220]

In 1974, the Supreme Court upheld California's law disenfranchising people convicted of felonies, concluding that the removal of their voting rights is consistent with the Fourteenth Amendment.[221] Though the Supreme Court eventually struck down a part of Alabama's disenfranchisement law a decade later, it only struck down a specific provision—applying to crimes of "moral turpitude"—that it found had the specific intent and impact of preventing African American citizens from voting.[222] In that limited decision, the Court expressly declined to reconsider its decision in Richardson v. Ramirez, which continues to generally permit the disenfranchisement of people convicted of felonies.[223]

Today, people convicted of felonies—a disproportionate number of whom are African American—represent the largest single group of Americans disqualified from voting.[224] For example, although the majority of illegal drug users and dealers nationwide are white, three-fourths of all people imprisoned for drug offenses are African American or Latino.[225] Another study found that states with greater African American and Latino prison populations are more likely to ban formerly incarcerated and returning citizens from voting than states with proportionally fewer nonwhites in the criminal justice system.[226]

As of 2020, approximately 5.2 million Americans are barred from voting due to laws that disenfranchise citizens convicted of felony offenses.[227] All states but Maine and Vermont have some restriction tied to felony conviction, probation, and parole.[228] And while some states restore the right to vote once people have completed their sentence, these states condition that restoration of rights upon a person paying all fines and fees associated with their sentence, an economic burden that scholars and voting rights advocates have described as a modern day poll tax.[229] In a country that professes a commitment to freedom, the country's rates of mass incarceration and the corresponding increase in disenfranchisement reflect a conflict between its democratic ideals and its actual practice.

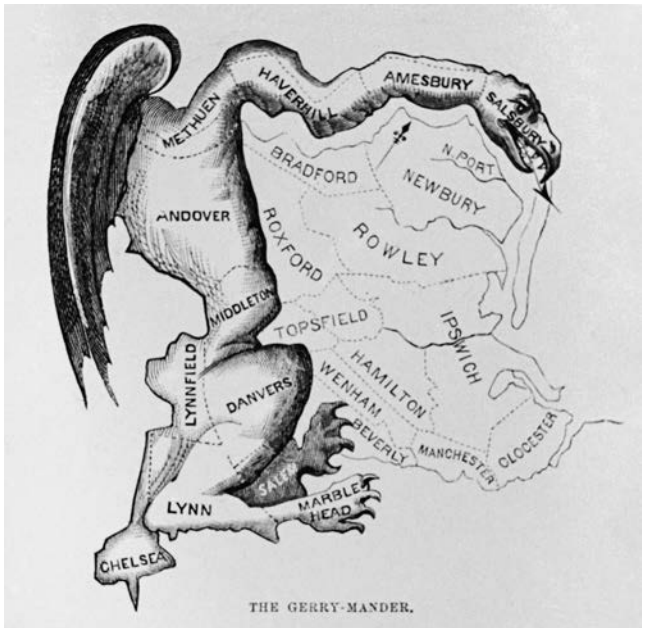
Gerrymandering

States also manipulated the shape of voting districts, through a process called gerrymandering, to dilute the voting power of African Americans.[230] Generally, states divide their regions into districts for the election of certain local, state, and federal representatives.[231] States can redraw those areas from year to year,[232] and government officials have used this process to substantially dilute and weaken the political power of African Americans.[233]

Ordinarily, states draw electoral districts by drawing generally oval or square-shaped districts of neighboring communities with borders based on geographic barriers, like rivers and highways.[234] However, politicians began manipulating this process by drawing electoral districts in more unnatural shapes to include more voters from a certain race or political party to ensure that group's victory in an election.[235]

This process, known as "gerrymandering," is named after Elbridge Gerry, an American vice-president who, as Massachusetts Governor in 1812 redrew voting districts in a way that caused the Boston-area district to resemble a salamander.[236] Or, as one local newspaper dubbed it, a Gerry-mander.[237] Gerrymandering has existed since this nation's infancy, and politicians have used it nearly as long to deny African American communities representation in government. After the end of Reconstruction, white government officials drew gerrymandered districts to purge African American politicians from state legislatures all across the south.[238]

COURTESY OF BETTMANN VIA GETTY IMAGES



The term "gerrymander" stems from this Gilbert Stuart cartoon of a Massachusetts electoral district twisted beyond all reason. Stuart thought the shape of the district resembled a salamander, but his friend who showed him the original map called it a "Gerry-mander" after Massachusetts Governor Elbridge Gerry, who approved rearranging district lines for political advantage. (1812)

For example, although African Americans made up a majority of South Carolina's population in the 1870s and 1880s, white government officials redrew the state's electoral map to pack nearly all of the state's African American neighborhoods into one of the state's seven districts that had a African American majority, and it included nearly all of the state's African American neighborhoods in the awkward shape of a snake.[239]

Drawing the map this way had the effect of ensuring that only one of the state's seven legislators were African American, despite African Americans making up more than 60 percent of the state's total population. White government officials drew similarly gerrymandered congressional districts across the south, including in North Carolina, Alabama, and Mississippi.[240] The Mississippi government drew the African American electoral district in the shape of what one newspaper called a "shoestring."[241]

Gerrymandering continued in the 20th century. After World War II, a thriving African American community began organizing politically in Tuskegee, Alabama.[242] But white segregationists responded by proposing a bill to redraw the boundary lines of Tuskegee to exclude all neighborhoods with African American residents and exclude African American voters from having any input into the city's elections.[243] African American residents fought back, bringing a case that reached the Supreme Court in 1960, where the Court struck down the racially gerrymandered map as a violation of the Fifteenth Amendment[244] A few years later, Congress enacted the Voting Rights Act in 1965, which prohibits states from diluting the voting strength of African Americans, including through redistricting plans that dilute the voting strength of African American communities.[245]

Gerrymandering has existed since this nation's infancy, and politicians have used it nearly as long to deny Black communities representation in government.

Despite prohibitions by both Congress and the Supreme Court, states continued to try and find ways to gerrymander state maps to limit African American representation. In the 1980s, Georgia State Representative Joe Mack Wilson declared, "I don't want to draw nigger districts."[246] A little more than a decade later, the Supreme Court would strike down North Carolina's efforts to gerrymander on the basis of race, stating it was "unsettling how closely the North Carolina plan resembles the most egregious racial gerrymanders of the past."[247] Meanwhile, states continue to engage in two other forms of legally sanctioned racial gerrymandering: partisan gerrymandering and prison gerrymandering.

Political, or partisan, gerrymandering refers to the process of drawing districts to benefit one political party over another.[248] As of September 2021, 38 states allow partisan actors—state legislatures or their appointees—to redraw their districts.[249] While those who engage in partisan gerrymandering claim not to directly target African American voters, the fact that most African American voters register to vote as Democrats, today, means that partisan gerrymandering often affects African American representation as well.

Though African Americans had historically supported the Republican party through post-Reconstruction due to the party's role in Emancipation and Reconstruction, the Republican party's apathy and mistreatment toward African Americans during the Hoover Administration opened the door to their entry into the Democratic party during the New Deal, as northern Democrats like President Franklin Roosevelt promised economic aid amidst the Great Depression.[250]

African American support for the Democratic party then surged in the 1960s, when Democratic President Lyndon B. Johnson ushered in the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965.[251] President Johnson's embrace of civil rights legislation caused many of the southern white supremacists in the Democratic party to defect to the Republican party, cementing African American support for Democrats to this day.[252] From 1994 to 2019, over 80 percent of African American registered voters have leaned toward or identified as Democrats.[253]

Because most African American voters today register to vote as Democrats, partisan gerrymandering harms African American representation. In the last decade, more than two dozen African American officials have had their districts redrawn in ways that could cost them their seats, leading the former chair of the Congressional Black Caucus to declare partisan gerrymandering a "five-alarm fire" for African American representation.[254]

Moreover, unlike earlier forms of racial gerrymandering, neither Congress nor the U.S. Supreme Court have prohibited partisan gerrymandering.[255] As scholars and advocates have observed, the Supreme Court's refusal to strike down political gerrymandering permits legislators to get away with racial gerrymandering in places where race and party are highly correlated, simply by claiming that they made their redistricting decisions for partisan reasons, rather than racial ones.[256]

Prison gerrymandering refers to the practice of counting incarcerated people as part of the population in the region imprisoning them, rather than the location of their actual community.[257] Because the government allocates greater numbers of political representatives and resources to places with greater populations, prison gerrymandering benefits districts that engage in mass incarceration, skewing resources and representation to areas with prisons at the expense of the communities to which those imprisoned people belong.[258]

This process particularly affects African Americans, who are disproportionately imprisoned. In 2019, African Americans made up about 33 percent of the United States's imprisoned population,[259] despite representing about 14 percent of the total population.[260] Given the effects of prison gerrymandering, advocates describe it as akin to or worse than the Constitution's Three-Fifths Clause, which counted enslaved people in the Census for the purpose of allowing states to amass more pro-slavery representatives, despite the fact that enslaved people were not allowed to vote and had no basic legal rights.[261]

Because most Black voters today register to vote as Democrats, partisan gerrymandering harms Black representation. In the last decade, more than two dozen Black officials have had their districts redrawn in ways that could cost them their seats, leading the former chair of the Congressional Black Caucus to declare partisan gerrymandering a "five-alarm fire" for Black representation.

The Myth of Voter Fraud and Voter ID Laws

Claims of voter fraud have also been used to justify laws that suppress African American voting—most prominently, voter identification (ID) laws. While voter fraud has long been invoked throughout American history to justify restrictions on voting, such claims have made a recent resurgence, including in the 2020 election, despite the lack of any evidence to support allegations of widespread fraud.[262] In recent years, states have used this claim to enact a number of strict ID laws that disproportionately impact African American and other nonwhite voters, hindering their ability to vote.[263]

States and politicians have invoked the specter of voter fraud since at least the late 1800s to justify the various rules they imposed disenfranchising African American and other nonwhite communities.[264] The Ku Klux Klan and other white supremacists claimed voter fraud to justify the violence they inflicted upon African Americans. One southern historian claimed in 1901 that "the white man of the lately dominant class in the South… saw his former slaves repeating at elections," and quoted with favor a white supremacist leader and his announcement that he and his militants had violently suppressed African American voters such that "[f]ew negroes voted that day; none twice."[265] Thus, white supremacists have long used accusations of voter fraud as an excuse to justify the suppression of African American political participation.[266]

More recently, the idea of voter fraud and voter identification laws became popular following the 2000 election.[267] The U.S. Attorney General at the time, John Ashcroft, pushed the U.S. Department of Justice to prioritize voter fraud as an issue,[268] even though the U.S. Department of Justice itself found only a 0.00000132 percent rate of voter fraud.[269]

Congress enacted the Help America Vote Act in 2002, which required voter identification to register to vote and deferred to states' requirements for voter identification.[270] Many civil rights organizations opposed the bill for its discriminatory impact, arguing that the requirement would mirror a poll tax.[271] In 2005, Georgia and Indiana became the first states to enact photo identification voting laws, opening the floodgates for similar laws throughout the country.[272] In 2000, only 11 states required all voters to show some form of identification; this increased to 18 states in 2008,[273] and, as of 2021, 35 states have laws requesting or requiring voters to show identification at the polls.[274]

Although voter identification laws may appear race neutral, they disproportionately burden African American voters due to disparities in both access and enforcement. According to one nationwide study, 20 percent of African Americans did not possess a valid photo ID, compared to seven percent of whites.[275] Due to segregation and unequal access, many elderly African American voters were not born in hospitals, resulting in many never being issued a birth certificate—and this fact, in turn, limits their ability to obtain other forms of photo identification.[276]

Additionally, states disproportionately enforce voter ID laws against African American voters. National studies have found that 70 percent of all African American voters were asked to show photo identification at the polls during the 2008 election, as opposed to only 51 percent of white voters.[277] These disparities in enforcement forced African American voters to file provisional ballots at four times the rate of white voters.[278] Provisional ballots, in turn, are more likely to go uncounted.[279] In 2016, nearly 700,000, or 28.5 percent of all provisional ballots went uncounted; in 2018, nearly 790,000, or 42.6 percent of all provisional ballots were not counted.[280]

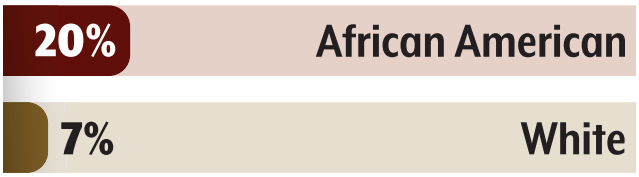
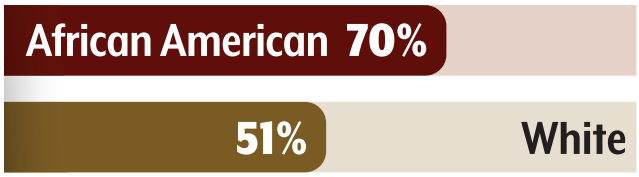
VOTER IDENTIFICATION BY RACE

Percent of voters who do not have a valid photo ID



Additionally, citizens with ready access to voter identification might underestimate the burdens that voter ID requirements impose. But as the American Civil Liberties Union has calculated, for those who need to procure a voter ID, the combined cost of time, travel, and documentation ranges from $75 to $175,[281] a steep cost to consider when poll taxes "of as little as $1.50 have been deemed an unconstitutional burden on the right to vote."[282] Even obtaining "free" identification cards may require a person to not only purchase a birth certificate,[283] but to travel to a DMV, which in some regions could be as far as 250 miles away.[284]

2008 ELECTION
REQUEST FOR PHOTO IDENTIFICATION BY RACE



In many cases, states intentionally use voter ID laws to discriminate against African American voters and people with lower incomes, perpetuating America's legacy of creating barriers to African American voting.[285] For example, when crafting North Carolina's voter identification laws, one state representative expressly asked a university official to provide information "about the number of Student ID cards that are created and the [percent] of those who are African American," and a federal appeals court characterized these restrictions as targeting African American voters with "almost surgical precision."[286]

As one scholar points out, it is no coincidence that the states with the most rigid voter identification laws also happen to be states with substantial African American populations and a history of post-Reconstruction-style discrimination at the polls.[287] Multiple Republican strategists have admitted that voter ID laws have nothing to do with voter fraud, and are instead part of a strategy of ensuring that Democrats cannot vote.[288] Because African American voters identify overwhelmingly with the Democratic Party,[289] political strategists openly seeking to disenfranchise Democrats will necessarily target African American voters.[290] Ultimately, scholars have found that strict voter ID laws substantially decrease voting turnout for African American and Latino voters, doubling the voting gap between white and African American voters.[291]

Exclusion from Juries

In addition to barring African Americans from voting, post-Reconstruction states in both the North and South also excluded African Americans from serving on juries. The Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution guarantees criminal trials by an "impartial jury."[292] Juries serve the essential role of balancing government power by giving citizens the authority to determine a just outcome in a case of law.[293]

In the 1800s, many states, such as Tennessee and West Virginia, expressly allowed only white men to serve on juries.[294] While many states in the North did not have laws excluding African American jurors, one historian observed that "[i]n most of the North, custom and prejudice... combined to exclude Negroes from jury service."[295] During Reconstruction, Congress partially undid these restrictions with the Civil Rights Act of 1875, which prohibited states from expressly discriminating based on race in the selection of juries in state court.[296]

However, the Act did not address the many other methods that states used to exclude African American jurors.[297] For example, states ordinarily required a jury decision to be unanimous to determine whether someone is guilty or innocent of a crime.[298] But this meant that the presence of a single African American juror could prevent a white jury from convicting an African American defendant. To get around this, states like Louisiana and Oregon passed laws allowing a jury to convict a defendant if only 10 of the 12 jurors voted to convict.[299]

As the U.S. Supreme Court observed in Ramos v. Louisiana (2020), states like Louisiana and Oregon removed jury unanimity requirements after Reconstruction "to ensure that African-American juror service would be meaningless," since one or two African American jurors could not outvote a white majority.[300] In many states, only registered voters can serve on juries, so because these states denied African Americans the ability to register to vote, they denied them access to the jury box as well.[301] Finally, many states excluded African American jurors through various state rules that allowed judges, court officials, and local prosecutors to prevent a person from serving on a jury without giving a reason.[302] As discussed in Chapter 11, An Unjust Legal system, these methods produced deep disparities in the number of African Americans convicted of crimes, including wrongful convictions.[303]

California

Though California amended its constitution in 1879 to allow nonwhite men to vote, the state adopted many laws similar to those adopted by northern and southern states to suppress the political participation of African Americans.[304] California added a poll tax into its constitution in 1879, requiring payment of an average half-day's wage before someone could vote.[305] The poll tax continued until repealed in 1914.[306] In 1894, California added a literacy test for voting to its constitution to prevent Chinese residents from voting.[307] Unsurprisingly, anti-Chinese and anti-Black racism in California frequently intertwined. The California state Democratic party, for instance, pledged in 1867 to establish "no Negro or Chinese suffrage,"[308] and its racist pledge enabled Democrats to sweep state elections that year.[309]

In the years after World War II, the African American population in California rose dramatically.[310] With a growing presence in the state, African American communities in California continued pushing for greater political representation. But they faced resistance and retaliation along the way. California, like the federal government, frequently treated African American activism as a threat.[311] In 1966, when civil rights protesters used the slogan of "Black power" to advocate for racial equality, the Republican Candidate for Lieutenant Governor, Robert Finch, declared that "it's wrong, if... any minority, including the Negro people, think they can blackmail or blackjack their way into acceptance into our society, they're just dead wrong, and the American people will not tolerate this kind of thing."[312]

That same year, Huey P. Newton and Bobby Seale formed the Black Panther Party in Oakland, California, seeking African American economic empowerment and the end of police brutality.[313] To pursue these goals, the Panthers adopted a number of community service programs, including health care clinics, a free breakfast program for school children,[314] and police observation patrols.[315]

As with Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., the federal government and California viewed the Black Panthers as a threat.[316] Vice President Spiro Agnew labeled the Black Panthers an "anarchistic group of criminals."[317] Federal Bureau of Investigation Director Hoover declared that the Black Panther Party "without question, represents the greatest threat to the internal security of the country."[318] Through its counterintelligence program (COINTELPRO), the FBI surveilled and sabotaged the Black Panthers.[319] The FBI sent anonymous, inflammatory letters to restaurants, grocery stores, and churches to dissuade them from providing food or facilities for the free breakfast program.[320]

To suppress the Black Panthers' newsletter activities, the FBI ordered the Internal Revenue Service to audit the organization and any income they received from distributing newsletters.[321] Further, the FBI infiltrated the group with undercover agents and spread misinformation, paranoia, conflict, and distrust within the party.[322] Californian law enforcement also repeatedly arrested Black Panther members on harassment and public disorder charges, disrupting the organization and sapping resources away from its community service initiatives.[323] These efforts contributed to the organization's collapse in 1982.[324]

Like many states in the North and South, California also stripped individuals of their right to vote when they were convicted of a felony, embedding such a provision in its constitution since 1849.[325] It took 125 years before California eventually changed this wholesale denial of voting rights in 1974, amending its constitution to allow individuals convicted of felonies to vote if they had completed their sentence and parole.[326] In 2016, the state legislature restored voting rights to people convicted of a felony offense housed in jail, but not in prison.[327]

Californian law enforcement also repeatedly arrested Black Panther members on harassment and public disorder charges, disrupting the organization and sapping resources away from its community service initiatives. These efforts contributed to the organization's collapse in 1982.

Still, in 2020, approximately 243,000 Californians were barred from voting due to felony convictions.[328] Of that number, 50,000 (or about 20 percent) are African American.[329] Only recently, in 2020, did California voters approve Proposition 17, which amended the state's constitution to restore the right to vote to all individuals who have completed their prison term, even if they are still on parole.[330]

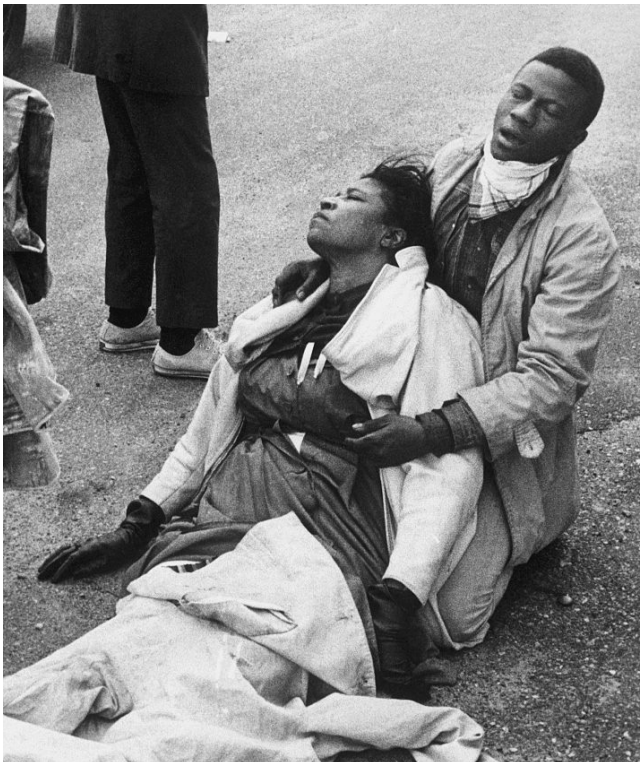
V. Voting Rights Legislation

As African American Activists Fought for Civil Rights, White Americans Reacted with Violence

After the end of Reconstruction, African Americans, facing increased threats to their liberty, organized and mobilized to assert their equal rights. Groups like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) used protest and litigation to advance the civil rights of African Americans and secure the rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments.[331] Much of the NAACP's legal work focused on defending African Americans from wrongful convictions and bringing lawsuits to hold white perpetrators of racial terror accountable for their crimes.[332] The NAACP also brought legal challenges to end many of the devices states used to suppress African American political power, such as the all-white primary.[333]

COURTESY OF BETTMANN VIA GETTY IMAGES



A civil rights marcher suffering from exposure to tear gas, holds an unconscious Amelia Boynton Robinson after mounted police officers attacked marchers in Selma, Alabama as they were beginning a 50 mile march to Montgomery to protest race discrimination in voter registration.(1965)

In these efforts, NAACP lawyers played a critical role in using litigation to end racial segregation, most famously through Brown v. Board of Education, where the NAACP convinced the U.S. Supreme Court to strike down racial segregation in public schools as unconstitutional.[334] In addition to its litigation, the organization lobbied the federal government to enact civil rights legislation, including anti-lynching laws, voting rights laws, and other civil rights laws that would ensure the equal protection of African Americans.[335]

African American women, too, played a critical role in early African American activism. During the 1896 election in North Carolina, for instance, Sarah Dudley Pettey canvassed the African American sections of Raleigh to urge African American women to persuade their husbands, brothers, and sons to vote.[336] In 1898, the "Organization of Colored Ladies" in Wilmington declared that for "Every Negro who refuses to register his name… that he may vote, we shall make it our business to deal with him in a way that will not be pleasant. He shall be branded a white-livered coward who would sell his liberty."[337]

When the United States ratified the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920, African American women registered in large numbers to vote.[338] For instance, in Kent County, Delaware, one local paper reported "unusually large" numbers of African American women who showed up to vote, though officials would prevent many of them—and many others across the country—from voting.[339]

World War II contributed to a surge in African American civil rights activism.[340] The service and sacrifice of African Americans—both abroad in the military and at home in factories and fields—underscored the moral imperative for equal treatment, especially given America's war against the Nazism and white supremacy abroad.[341]

With renewed energy, African American organizations pushed to secure voting rights, continuing efforts to organize, educate, and register African American voters, despite the threats of violence and the other barriers that states had created after Reconstruction.[342] African American women like Ella Baker led and directed civil rights campaigns and voter registration drives for some of the nation's largest civil rights groups, including the NAACP, Southern Leadership Conference, and Student

Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.[343] In addition, interracial labor unions in the South played a part in registering African American voters.[344] In 1947, Local 22 of the Food and Tobacco Workers in Winston-Salem, North Carolina helped register 3,000 African American residents in the city, helping elect the first African American alderman to the city's board since Reconstruction.[345]

But African American veterans demanding equal treatment returned home to fierce resistance.[346] In Decatur, Mississippi, a white senator, Senator Theodore Bilbo, warned African American residents to stay away from the polls for the Democratic primary in 1946, calling for "every red-blooded white man to use any means to keep the niggers away from the polls."[347]

A mob of white people waving pistols turned five returning World War II veterans away from voting during that primary.[348] A group of civil rights organizations complained to the U.S. Senate about Senator Bilbo's intimidation tactics, prompting a Senate committee to hold four days of hearings in Jackson, Mississippi.[349] Two hundred African Americans, most of them veterans, packed the federal courtroom in Jackson to share their experience of violence and voter suppression.[350]

African Americans faced similar threats in other places. In March 1948, the Ku Klux Klan paraded around Wrightsville, Georgia, warning that "blood would flow" if African Americans tried to vote in the forthcoming election.[351] Seven months later, two whites threatened Isaac Nixon, an African American veteran, telling him not to vote.[352] He refused to heed their warning, cast his ballot shortly after sunrise, and by nightfall he had been murdered.[353] Though Nixon's murderers later stood trial, an all-white jury acquitted them.[354]

In Florida, on the Christmas Eve of 1951, the KKK bombed the home of the state's NAACP director, murdering Harry T. Moore and his wife.[355] During the 1963 civil rights protests in Birmingham, Alabama, white policemen and firefighters unleashed hounds and blasted protestors with high pressure water hoses that stripped the clothes off their backs.[356]

In Greenwood, Mississippi, white citizens and officials responded to African American voter registration efforts by cutting off food supply to African American communities, imprisoning African American people for "breach of peace," setting fire to African American businesses, and firing gunshots at African American activists in their cars, their offices, and their homes.[357] When African American activists organized the Freedom Vote and the Freedom Summer of 1964 in Mississippi,[358] local sheriffs arrested three activists and turned them over to KKK members, who proceeded to murder the activists, burn their car, and bury their remains.[359]

On March 7, 1965, future Congressman John Lewis led some 600 protestors on a march from Selma to Montgomery, Alabama.[360] That "Bloody Sunday," Alabama state troopers attacked.[361] Awaiting the protestors on the Edmund Pettus Bridge, state troopers rushed into the crowd with nightsticks.[362] Troopers beat and bloodied protestors, knocking many unconscious.[363] Troopers fractured Lewis's skull in the assault.[364] "I thought I was going to die on that bridge," he later recalled.[365] The bloodshed at Selma prompted outrage across the nation, becoming the tipping point that spurred the federal government to enact the Voting Rights Act that year.[366]

When Black activists organized the Freedom Vote and the Freedom Summer of 1964 in Mississippi, local sheriffs arrested three activists and turned them over to KKK members, who proceeded to murder the activists, burn their car, and bury their remains.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965

The centuries-long African American struggle for freedom led to the passage of the Voting Rights Act, a landmark law that prohibited many of the barriers described in this chapter, allowing millions of African Americans to vote.[367] In 1964, prior to the protections of the Voting Rights Act, 57 percent of eligible African Americans remained unregistered to vote.[368] The passage of the Voting Rights Act resulted in a 21 percent increase in African American voter registration—the largest gains were recorded in the south, where the percentage of registered African American voters increased from below 31 percent to over 66 percent by 1984.[369]

The Voting Rights Act empowered the United States Department of Justice to enforce voting rights, authorized individual voters to sue in federal court to enforce their voting rights, and authorized the federal government to send examiners to register voters.[370] Among the Act's most important provisions:

- Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act prohibits any voting restriction that "results in" the denial of the right to vote based on race, regardless of whether a state intended to discriminate;[371]

- Section 4 of the law identified certain state and local governments that had a history of discrimination against African Americans. State and local entities that demonstrated such past discrimination were "covered jurisdictions" subject to greater oversight from the federal government;[372] and

- Section 5 provided that "covered jurisdictions" were required to obtain approval—or "preclearance"—from the Department of Justice or a federal court in Washington, D.C. before passing any voting rights related law. The covered jurisdiction had to demonstrate that the proposed voting change did not have a discriminatory purpose or a discriminatory effect on African American or other nonwhite voters.[373]

Altogether, these provisions represented what the United States Department of Justice called "the most successful piece of civil rights legislation ever adopted by the United States Congress," due to its role in eliminating many of the devices that had been used to deny Americans their right to vote.[374]

Within the last decade, however, the United States Supreme Court has removed or weakened key pillars of the Voting Rights Act.[375] In Shelby County v. Holder (2013), the Supreme Court struck down section 4 of the Act as unconstitutional.[376] And because section 5's preclearance requirements only applied to areas identified through Section 4, the Supreme Court effectively eliminated Section 5 as well. Though admitting that "voting discrimination still exists," the Court felt that enough had been done because 40 years had passed and minority voting rates had improved.[377]

Thus, the Court found Section 4 to no longer be necessary, despite Congress's renewal of Section 4 in 2006 by an overwhelming majority (the House voted 390 in favor to 33 opposed; the Senate passed it unanimously), and despite Congress's finding that "40 years has not been a sufficient amount of time to eliminate the vestiges of discrimination following nearly 100 years of disregard for the dictates of the 15th amendment[.]"[378] The Court's decision prompted Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg to protest in dissent that striking down this provision of the Voting Rights Act "when it has worked and is continuing to work" is "like throwing away your umbrella in a rainstorm because you are not getting wet."[379]

Eight years later, the Court weakened Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act as well.[380] Though Section 2 prohibits any voting law that "results in" the denial of voting rights based on race, the Court, in Brnovich v. Democratic National Committee, rewrote the law to limit its reach.[381] While Section 2 speaks only to voters' rights, and the need to protect them against racial discrimination, the Supreme Court created a new requirement for courts to consider the "strength of the state interests."[382] By inserting the state's goals into the equation, the Supreme Court flipped the Voting Rights Act from a civil rights act into a balancing act, allowing voting rights to be sacrificed if a court believed the state's goals to be worthy enough.[383]

The Court also declared that the legality of a voting restriction should be evaluated partly based on whether the law "has a long pedigree" or was in "widespread use" as of 1982, the year Congress amended the Voting Rights Act to prohibit laws that "result in" racially discriminatory denials of the right to vote.[384] But, as detailed in this chapter, many racially discriminatory voting restrictions have had a long and widespread pedigree in this nation's history. Poll taxes and literacy tests existed for almost 100 years—some restrictions even longer.[385] By considering a voting restriction's use in the past as a basis for accepting it, the Supreme Court's decision enables discriminatory restrictions to remain in place, simply because they had been used previously.

The Supreme Court's elimination or weakening of the anti-discrimination protections in Sections 2, 4, and 5 of the Voting Rights Act has opened the floodgates for laws restricting voter access across the nation. Hours after the Shelby County v. Holder decision, Texas implemented a strict photo ID law that had previously been rejected under Section 5.[386]

Within the last decade, however, the United States Supreme Court has removed or weakened key pillars of the Voting Rights Act. In Shelby County v. Holder (2013), the Supreme Court struck down Section 4 of the Act as unconstitutional.

That summer, the North Carolina legislature also passed a sweeping law that instituted a stringent photo ID requirement, eliminated same-day voting registration, and cut back on early voting.[387] Over the four years following Shelby County, jurisdictions previously covered under Section 5 closed 1,173 polling places, many in districts with majority Latino and African American voters.[388] States also limited voting hours, limited the ability to vote via mail-in ballots, and purged voter registration rolls.[389]

While these restrictions limited voting access for all Americans, they also targeted or specially affected African Americans. The removal of polling places in Ohio ensured that "African Americans in Ohio wait[] in line for fifty-two minutes to vote, while whites wait[] only eighteen minutes."[390] After record turnout of African American voters in Georgia helped flip federal elections in favor of Democrats in 2020, Georgia's Republican state legislature passed a law limiting drop boxes for mail ballots, introducing more rigid voter identification requirements for absentee ballots, and criminalizing the act of providing food or water to people waiting in line to vote.[391] In a recent lawsuit filed in federal court, the U.S. Department of Justice asserts that Georgia enacted these restrictions specifically to target African American voters.[392]

As one Virginia Senator explained, these restrictions were meant "to discriminate to the very extremity of permissible action under the limitations of the Federal Constitution, with a view to the elimination of every negro voter who can be gotten rid of, legally, without impairing the numerical strength of the white electorate."

Overall, states across the country introduced 389 restrictive voting laws from January to May 2021, alone.[393] With the Supreme Court's recent limitations of the Voting Rights Act, laws like Georgia's are becoming the new norm across the country.[394]

California

In the latter half of the 20th century, California began taking steps to expand voting access. California encouraged county and volunteer voting registration efforts in the 1950s and 1960s, and it amended its constitution to eliminate its literacy test in 1970.[395] In the 1970s, California relaxed its rules for requesting absentee ballots and for remaining on the voter registries from year to year.[396] More recently, the state enacted the California Voting Rights Act in 2001, which permits citizens to file suit in state court to challenge racially discriminatory restrictions in at-large elections without having to demonstrate the higher evidentiary standards required under the federal Voting Rights Act.[397]

Despite the state's efforts to advance voting access, the federal government has observed that California and some of its cities and counties have continued to engage in voting discrimination throughout the late 20th century. The U.S. Attorney General determined that California's use of a statewide literacy test to restrict voting during the November 1968 election violated the federal Voting Rights Act.[398]

From 1968 to 1976, the United States Department of Justice also identified Kings County, Monterey County, and Yuba County as engaging in discriminatory practices, monitoring these counties and objecting to various new voting restrictions proposed by these counties well into the 2000s.[399] As another example, the United States Department of Justice objected to Merced County's redistricting plan in 1992, a plan opposed by both African American and Latino communities because it would have denied them the opportunity to elect their preferred candidate.[400] Thus, while California has enacted laws expanding voting rights, equal access to the ballot box continues to be an ongoing challenge in parts of the state.

VI. Effects of Restrictions on African American Political Participation

Before the Voting Rights Act of 1965

When adopting the numerous voting restrictions described in this chapter, states made their intent clear. As one Virginia Senator explained, these restrictions were meant "to discriminate to the very extremity of permissible action under the limitations of the Federal Constitution, with a view to the elimination of every negro voter who can be gotten rid of, legally, without impairing the numerical strength of the white electorate."[401]

These methods proved effective. Once Louisiana adopted a number of these restrictive rules in its 1898 constitution, the number of African American voters in Louisiana plummeted from 130,000 to 5,000.[402] In Virginia, the number dropped from 147,000 to 21,000.[403] Mississippi's constitutional convention cut African American voter enrollment from about 147,000 to around 8,600.[404]

In 1906, five years after Alabama designed its exclusionary rules, only two percent of African American voters remained on the state's voter registries.[405] With the suppression of African American votes, African American representation in Congress quickly dwindled. During Reconstruction, 16 African American men held seats in Congress.[406] From 1887 to 1901, just five members of Congress—in either the House of Representatives and Senate—were African American.[407] From 1901 to 1929, not a single African American served in Congress.[408] No African American congressman would be elected again from the South until the 1970s.[409]

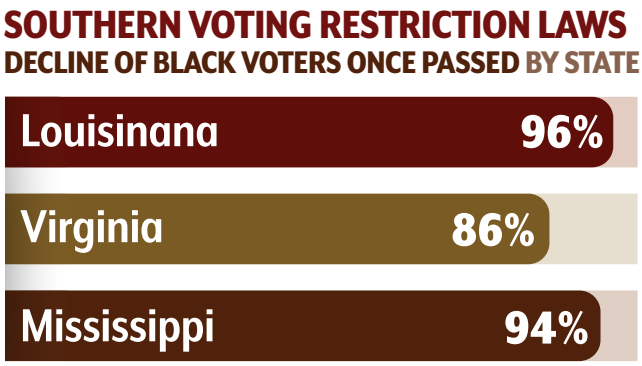
These barriers prevented African Americans from governing, while securing the power of southern white supremacists in Congress, who voted down civil rights legislation and embedded racism into federal laws that built modern America. Near the end of Reconstruction in the 1870s, white southerners formed the "Southern Bloc" in the Senate—a unified front of white Democratic Senators from the former confederate states.[410] After the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment in 1870, progressive senators proposed hundreds of pieces of civil rights legislation to remedy discrimination against African Americans in education, employment, housing, transportation, public accommodations, and voting.[411] But for 87 years, every attempt but one died in Congress, many blocked by the white "Southern Bloc" of the Senate, who vigilantly thwarted any effort to advance African American civil rights.[412]



Not only did white southern lawmakers vote down civil rights legislation, they also rewrote watershed pieces of legislation to exclude African Americans. Many historians and economists consider the New Deal responsible for creating the modern middle class and many of the programs that Americans depend upon today, such as Social Security.[413] But the New Deal excluded African Americans from many of its benefits.[414] At the time, 90 percent of the southern Black workforce, and 60 percent of nation's total Black workforce, worked as farm laborers or domestic servants.[415]

During the legislative process to pass various parts of the New Deal, southerners on the Senate Finance Committee excluded farm laborers and domestic servants from programs providing Social Security, minimum wage, unemployment insurance, and workers' compensation.[416] As several historians explain, the exclusion of farm laborers and domestic servants was "racially coded . . . Southern politicians, reported one architect of the new law, were determined to block any 'entering wedge' for federal interference with the handling of the Negro question."[417] Thus, southern politicians rewrote the New Deal to exclude African Americans from its benefits, fearing that federal benefits would discourage African American workers from taking low-paying jobs in their fields, factories, and kitchens.[418]

In one of the final parts of the New Deal, the government spent $95 billion in the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 (GI Bill) to give millions of veterans returning from World War II the ability to attend college, receive job training, start businesses, and purchase homes.[419] Yet, one report from the 1940s observed that it was "as though the GI Bill had been earmarked 'For White Veterans Only.'"[420]

During drafting, the chair of the House Veterans Committee, a white supremacist Congressman from Mississippi, ensured that the GI Bill was administered by states instead of the federal government to guarantee that states could direct its funds solely to white veterans.[421] Similar results arose in housing and healthcare. For both the Hill Burton Act, which underwrote the creation of a modern health care infrastructure,[422] and the Housing Act of 1949, Congress included segregation clauses or rejected anti-discrimination clauses to avoid southern lawmakers' opposition, which otherwise would have doomed the legislation.[423]

Thus, by barring African American political participation after Reconstruction, white supremacists seized state, local, and federal power, perpetuated discriminatory policies, blocked efforts to redress discrimination, and excluded African Americans from most of the major economic legislation that produced the modern economy of the United States.[424]

After the Voting Rights Act

Since the passage of the Voting Rights Act, African American voters have been among the most stable voting blocs, despite historic and ongoing efforts to restrict their ability to vote.[425] African American support has proved critical, in particular, in modern elections. In the last three presidential elections, African American voter turnout was 67 percent in 2012, 60 percent in 2016, and 63 percent in 2020.[426] African American voter turnout in each of these elections was higher than Latino and Asian Americans, and higher than whites in 2012.[427]

Though African Americans represent about 12.4 percent of the U.S. population today,[428] many political pundits recognized that the African American electorate played a significant role in determining the outcome in the presidential election in 2020.[429]

Nevertheless, these longstanding limitations on African American political participation have deeply shaped the lives of African Americans. If the goal of political participation is to ensure a government is responsive to the needs of its citizens, African American political participation is particularly important to serve the needs of African American communities who experience the persisting effects of slavery and segregation. But the suppression of African American political participation has prevented African Americans from exercising their democratic voice, perpetuating policies that entrench racial inequalities.

When African Americans gain greater representation, African Americans have a greater ability to request and enact policies that meet their economic and educational needs. One recent study—the first to examine the effects of African American politicians on public finances during Reconstruction—found that Reconstruction-era communities with more Black politicians had higher local tax revenue, as well as higher Black literacy rates.[430] In other words, the study suggests that communities with more African American politicians increased their tax revenue, which in turn increased investment in local education and African American education.

Another study found that the passage of the Voting Rights Act led to some reduction in racial wealth disparities, especially in covered jurisdictions subject to greater federal oversight.[431] Comparing neighboring counties—where one county was a covered jurisdiction subject to heightened oversight under the Voting Rights Act and the other was not—the study found that the Voting Rights Act narrowed the Black-white wage gap 5.5 percent between 1965 and 1970, a change driven primarily by increases in African American wages.[432]

By protecting African American voting rights, the Act helped drive increases in wages by giving African Americans greater voice to seek public employment opportunities and enabling African Americans to ask for public funds to be invested in their communities.[433] The Act also allowed African American communities and their representatives to implement affirmative action and anti-discrimination laws to protect African Americans and their ability to access equal employment opportunities and equal wages.[434] According to the study, the Voting Rights Act contributed to about one-fifth of the overall decline in the wage gap between African American and white Americans in the South between 1965 and 1970.[435]

Yet, African Americans can secure the benefits of political participation only to the extent that government policies respond to their voices. Despite modern gains in political participation and representation—including Barack Obama, the first African American man to be elected President in 2008, and Kamala Harris, the first African American woman to be elected Vice President in 2020—African Americans have not seen a similar rise in policies responsive to their needs.[436]

Studies show that Black support for a policy actually decreases the chances that the government will enact it. Scholars have found evidence that members of Congress are less responsive to their Black voters than to their white voters.

Studies examining more recent years have shown that not only do African Americans hold less political sway than white Americans when it comes to influencing the government, African American support for a policy actually decreases the chances that the government will enact it.[437] Scholars have found evidence that members of Congress are less responsive to their African American voters than to their white voters.[438]

Recent events underscore the government's failures to heed African American voices. For example, despite national and bipartisan support for police reform following the murder of George Floyd, Congress failed to enact any police reform legislation.[439] Similarly, Congress failed to pass any voting rights legislation—including bills with bipartisan support—to counteract the slew of state laws increasing voting restrictions after the 2020 election.[440]

Likewise, Congress has consistently failed to pass legislation redressing the economic disparities faced by African Americans. African American households, on average, still earn one-tenth that of white households.[441] Chapter 13, The Wealth Gap delves into the wealth gap between African American and white families and its causes. Many of these problems can be traced to the discriminatory laws and policies that continue to be felt today. Take, for example, housing segregation. Laws that historically enforced or sanctioned racial housing segregation have produced neighborhood segregation that persists today.[442] Because modern life revolves around a family's neighborhood—including access to employment, credit scores, housing values, the amount of funding for local schools or parks, and policing—the racist policies that produced neighborhood segregation have created a discriminatory foundation upon which other laws have been built.[443]

Although increased political representation can allow African American communities to try to change these systems, undoing these discriminatory systems is not a matter of flipping a switch. Discriminatory policies have piled over decades and centuries, and undoing these systems is much like undoing the literal concrete underlying a city and its streets and sidewalks.[444] It requires many years, if not decades, of durable and long-term commitment to both change the old system and design a new one. The sustained, long-term commitment required for change means that the election of any one or several Black politicians is not enough to fix the problematic policies at the root of racial inequalities.[445] Political participation therefore represents just one piece of the puzzle when it comes to identifying the ongoing legacies of slavery, systemic discrimination, and what needs to be done to redress them.

Discriminatory policies have piled over decades and centuries, and undoing these systems is much like undoing the literal concrete underlying a city and its streets and sidewalks. It requires many years, if not decades, of durable and long-term commitment to both change the old system and design a new one.

California

During California's early history, African American Californians struggled to gain representation in political office or to have a voice in party politics. Beginning in 1870, most Black Californians belonged to the Republican Party, the party that had abolished slavery.[446] But the white members of California's Republican Party ignored Black Californians' requests to serve in elected or appointed political offices.[447] Some Black voters protested by joining the Democratic Party in the 1880s.[448] But Democrats, too, refused Black men the offices that they had promised in order to lure Black voters to their side.[449] Though Black men secured the formal right to vote in 1870, it would take nearly a half century before California's first Black legislator, Frederick M. Roberts, was elected to the California State Assembly in 1918.[450] From 1918 to 1965, only six Black male Californians were elected to the California Legislature.[451] California did not elect its first Black female legislator, Yvonne Brathwaite Burk, until 1966.[452]

In more recent years, California has made many strides in expanding voting rights access. As of January 2022, the number of Black elected officials in California's legislature is now proportional to the state's Black population.[453] But as described in later chapters of this report, the state still has not addressed many of the socioeconomic disparities that have resulted from these longstanding barriers, disparities that profoundly shape the lives of Black Californians. While Black Californians may have a greater ability to vote in the ballot box today, Black Californians also have voted with their feet: many have left the state for opportunities elsewhere, reflecting continued failure to address their needs.[454]

VII. Conclusion

Despite the promise of American democracy, the United States has excluded African Americans from equal participation in self-government. By doing so, government officials and private parties sought to recreate the racial hierarchy that existed during enslavement. Though African Americans organized to pursue their equal citizenship, government officials resisted, retaliated, and undercut Black political power through the many means and methods described in this chapter. Many of these methods persisted for nearly a century—others persist to this day. But all of these methods have limited the country's efforts to redress the legacy of slavery and racial discrimination, producing deep inequalities in the politics and policies that shape America and the lives of African Americans today.

Endnotes

[1] Nat. Park Service, U.S. Dept. of the Interior, Civil Rights in America: Racial Voting Rights (2009), p. 4 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[2] Id. at p. 8.

[3] See, e.g., Foner, Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863-1877 (1988), pp. 569-76 ("Foner, Reconstruction)

[4] See Cohen, Negro Involuntary Servitude in the South, 1865-1940: A Preliminary Analysis (1976) 42 J. of Southern History 31, 48-54.

[5] See, e.g., Nat. Park Service, supra, at pp. 10-14.

[6] See, e.g., Hoag, An Unbroken Thread: African-American Exclusion from Jury Service, Past and Present (2020) 81 La. L. Rev. 55, 58-59.

[7] See Caro, Master of the Senate (2009), pp. xiii-xiv; Katznelson, When Affirmative Action was White (2005), p. 113.

[8] See, e.g., Agraharkar, 50 Years Later, Voting Rights Act Under Unprecedented Assault, Brennan Center for Justice (Aug. 2, 2015) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Blackmon, Silent Partner: How the South's Fight to Uphold Segregation was Funded up North, Wall Street Journal (Jun. 11, 1999), Eastern edition, A1; Brnovich v. Democratic Nat'l Comm. (2021) 141 S. Ct. 2321; Garrow, Bearing the Cross (Vintage Books Media 1988), p. 255.

[9] See, e.g., Brnovich v. Democratic Nat'l Comm. (2021) 141 S. Ct. 2321; Shelby Cnty. v. Holder (2013) 570 U.S. 529.

[10] Noe-Payne, Black Representation in Politics is Poor Nationwide, Except in State Houses (Aug. 15, 2020) NPR (as of Apr. 8, 2022).

[11] Stephanopoulos, Political Powerlessness (2015) 90 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1527, 1583 (Stephanopoulos, Political Powerlessness).

[12] See Katz, et al., Reckoning with our Rights: The Evolution of Voter Access in California, UCLA Luskin Center for History and Policy (Sept. 2020), pp. 3, 7 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[13] Smith, California's Last Slave Case, N.Y. Times (Mar. 5, 2014) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[14] Katz, et al., supra, at pp. 3, 7.

[15] Cal. Dept. of Education, Key Points in Black History and the Gold Rush (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Hudson, West of Jim Crow: The Fight Against California's Color Line (2020), p. 8 (as of Mar. 31, 202

[16] See, e.g., Katz, et al., supra, at pp. 20-27.

[17] See, e.g., Hepler, The Hidden Toll of California's Black Exodus, S.F. Chronicle (Jul. 25, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[18] See, e.g., Foner, Reconstruction, supra, at p. 417.

[19] Ibid.

[20] Ibid.

[21] Ibid.

[22] Behrens, et al., Ballot Manipulation and the "Menace of Negro Domination": Racial Threat and Felon Disenfranchisement in the United States, 1850-2002 (2003) 109 Am. J. Soc. 559, 571.

[23] Garrow, Bearing the Cross (Vintage Books Media 1988), p. 255; Cronin, Martin Luther King Jr Cartoon Sheds Light on the Harsh Scrutiny He Faced from 1960s Media, CBR.com (Sep. 2, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[24] Mayer, Nixon Rides the Backlash to Victory: Racial Politics in the 1968 Campaign (2002) 64 The Historian 351, 351; McAdam and Kloos, Race and the Modern GOP, Politico (Sep. 25, 2014) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[25] Maxwell and Shields, The Long Southern Strategy Explained: How Chasing White Voters in the South Changed American Politics (2019), pp. 2-8.

[26] Perlstein, Exclusive: Lee Atwater's Famous 1981 Interview on the Southern Strategy, The Nation (Nov. 13, 2012) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[27] Cramer, What It Takes (Vintage Books 1993), p. 996-1000.

[28] Ibid.

[29] Ibid.

[30] Ibid.

[31] Federal Election Commission, Federal Elections 88 (Jun. 1989) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[32] Baker, Bush Made Willie Horton an Issue in 1988, and the Racial Scars are Still Fresh, N.Y. Times (Dec. 3, 2018) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[33] Nelson, Trump: 'I am the Law and Order Candidate', Politico (Jul. 11, 2016) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[34] Sprunt, The History Behind 'When the Looting Starts, the Shooting Starts' NPR (May 29, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[35] Easley, How Trump Cleared the Park Around the White House for a Photo Op, The Hill (Jun. 1, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Goldberg, James Mattis Denounces President Trump, Describes Him as Threat to the Constitution, The Atlantic (Jun. 3, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[36] U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 3.

[37] U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 3.

[38] Amar, The Troubling Reason the Electoral College Exists, Time (Oct. 29, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[39] Campbell, Making Black Los Angeles: Class, Gender, and Community, 1850-1917 (2016), p. 8; U.S. Census Bureau, History: 1850 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[40] Engerman and Sokoloff, The Evolution of Suffrage Institutions in the New World (2005) 65 J. Econ. History 891, 895; Keyssar, The Right To Vote: The Contested History of Democracy in the United States (2000), pp. 8-21, 54-60; Waldman, The Fight to Vote (2016), pp. 7-8.

[41] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 4; Cobb and Jenkins, Race and the Representation of Blacks' Interests During Reconstruction (2001) 54 Pol. Research Quarterly 181, 184.

[42] Foner, Forever Free: The Story of Emancipation and Reconstruction (First Vintage Books 2006), pp. 114-115 ("Foner, Forever Free").

[43] Id. at pp. 117-118.

[44] See generally Jones, Birthright Citizens (201

[45] Jones, The Real Origins of Birthright Citizenship, The Atlantic (Oct. 31, 2018) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[46] Foner, Reconstruction, supra, at pp. 444-449.

[47] U.S. Const., 15th Amend., § 1.

[48] See generally U.S. Const., 14th Amend.

[49] U.S. Const., 14th Amend., § 2.

[50] Maltz, The Forgotten Provision of the Fourteenth Amendment: Section 2 and the Evolution of American Democracy (2015) 76 La. Law Rev. 149, 150, 178.

[51] Darity and Mullen, From Here to Equality (2020), pp. 91-92.

[52] Enforcement Act of 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. 141 (1870); Enforcement (Ku Klux Klan) Act of 1871, ch. 22, 17 Stat. 13 (1871).

[53] United States v. Cruikshank (1875) 92 U.S. 542, 552.

[54] U.S. Const. 19th

[55] Nat. Park Service, supra, at pp. 5-6.

[56] Ibid.

[57] Foner, Forever Free, supra, at pp. 121-22.

[58] Ibid.

[59] Nat. Park Service, supra, at pp. 5-6.

[60] Foner, Forever Free, supra, at p. 143.

[61] Ibid.

[62] Id. at pp. 143-44.

[63] Cobb and Jenkins, supra, at p. 184.

[64] Foner, Forever Free, supra, at p. 143.

[65] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 6; Facing History and Ourselves, Black Officeholders in the South (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[66] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 6.

[67] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 6; Facing History and Ourselves, Black Officeholders in the South (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[68] Foner, Reconstruction, supra, at pp. 318, 538.

[69] Id. at pp. 544-45.

[70] Id. at p. 538.

[71] Id. at pp. 511-63.

[72] Ibid.

[73] Id. at p. 528.

[74] Id. at pp. 575-76.

[75] Id. at p. 576.

[76] Id. at pp. 581-82.

[77] Id. at p. 581.

[78] Id. at p. 582.

[79] Cal. Const. of 1849, art. I, § 18.

[80] Cal. Const. of 1849, art. II, § 1; Katz, Modern California is All about Voter Access. History reveals a Far Grimmer Voting-Rights Past, L.A. Times (Nov. 3, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[81] Smith, California's Last Slave Case, N.Y. Times (Mar. 5, 2014) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[82] Smith, Remaking Slavery in a Free State: Masters and Slaves in Gold Rush California (2011) 80 Pacific Historical Rev. 28, 31.

[83] Cal. Dept. of Education, Key Points in Black History and the Gold Rush (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Hudson, West of Jim Crow: The Fight Against California's Color Line (2020), p. 8 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[84] People v. Hall (1854) 4 Cal. 399; Moore, "We Feel the Want of Protection": The Politics of Law and Race in California, 1848-1878 (2003) 81 Cal. History 96, 114.

[85] Hall, supra, 4 Cal. 399, 403.

[86] Id. at p. 404.

[87] Chandler, Friends in Time of Need: Republicans and Black Civil Rights in California During the Civil War Era (1982) 24 J. of the Southwest 319, 325.

[88] Ibid.

[89] Hudson, supra, at pp. 37-38; see also Chandler, supra, at p. 325.

[90] Chandler, supra, at p. 326.

[91] Hudson, supra, at p. 38.

[92] Chandler, supra, at pp. 326-27.

[93] Ibid.

[94] Ibid.

[95] People v. Howard (1860) 17 Cal. 63, 64; Chandler, supra, at p. 324.

[96] People v. Howard (1860) 17 Cal. 63, 64; Chandler, supra, at p. 324.

[97] Adkins, African Americans of San Francisco (2012), p. 19.

[98] Gates, Jr., The African-American Migration Story, PBS (as of Nov. 18, 2021).

[99] Id. at p. 20.

[100] Chandler, supra, at p. 320.

[101] California African American Museum Web Staff, #Blackhistory: On November 20, 1855, Delegates Representing Ten of California's Twenty-Seven Counties Met at St. Andrews AME Church in Sacramento for the First California Colored Convention, California African American Museum (Nov. 20, 2019) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[102] ACLU of Northern California, Gold Chains: The Hidden History of Slavery in California (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[103] Ibid.

[104] Hudson, supra, at p. 8.

[105] Smith, California's Last Slave Case, N.Y. Times (Mar. 5, 2014) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[106] Ibid.

[107] Ibid.

[108] ACLU of Northern California, supra.

[109] U.S. Const., 13th Amend.

[110] Colored Conventions Project, Proceedings of the California State Convention of the Colored Citizens, Held in Sacramento on the 25th, 26th, 27th, and 28th of October, 1865 (1865), pp. 15-19 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[111] Shaffer, California Reluctantly Implements the Fifteenth Amendment: White Californians Respond to Black Suffrage, March – June 1870, Cal Poly Pomona (2020), p. 1 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[112] Petition, Elevator (Oct. 11, 1867) p. 2.

[113] Smith, Freedom's Frontier: California and the Struggle over Unfree Labor, Emancipation, and Reconstruction (2013), pp. 209-11.

[114] Our Petition, Elevator (Mar. 27, 1868) p. 2 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[115] Waite, Early California Lawmakers also Preached #Resistance — But Against Immigration, L.A. Times (Aug. 3, 2018) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[116] Goldberg, California's Shameful 1870 Vote on Black Suffrage, L.A. Times (Feb. 28, 2021), A18.

[117] Ibid.

[118] Shaffer, supra, at pp. 41-65.

[119] See Report of the Attorney-General for the Years 1868 and 1869 (Sacramento: D.W. Gelwicks, c. 1870), pp. 6-7.

[120] Ibid.; Shaffer, supra, at pp. 42-43.

[121] Shaffer, supra, at pp. 41-62.

[122] Id. at pp. 62-65.

[123] Ibid.

[124] Ibid.; Colman, John Ballard and the African American Community in Los Angeles, 1850-1905 (2012) 94 Southern Cal. Quarterly 193, 215-17.

[125] Enforcement Act of 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. 141 (1870).

[126] Shaffer, supra, at pp. 41-62.

[127] Cal. Const. of 1879, art. II, § 1.

[128] Smith, California's Last Slave Case, N.Y. Times (Mar. 5, 2014) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[129] See, e.g., Foner, Reconstruction, supra, at pp. 569-76.

[130] See, e.g., Foner, Reconstruction, supra, at p. 550.

[131] See, e.g., German, The FBI Has a History of Targeting Black Activists, The Guardian (Jun. 26, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[132] Foner, Forever Free, supra, at p. 134.

[133] Ibid.

[134] Foner, Reconstruction, supra, at p.

[135] Ibid.

[136] Coffey, The Reconstruction Years: The Tragic Aftermath of the War (2014), p. 259.

[137] Foner, Reconstruction, supra, at p. 560.

[138] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 14.

[139] Blackmon, Silent Partner: How the South's Fight to Uphold Segregation was Funded up North, Wall Street Journal (Jun. 11, 1999), Eastern edition, A1.

[140] Ibid.

[141] Garrow, supra, at p. 195.

[142] Ibid.

[143] Id. at p. 373-74.

[144] Ibid.

[145] Morrison, Decades Later, a New Look at the Black Panthers and Their Legacy, Associated Press (Oct. 31, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[146] German, supra.

[147] Stewart, Black Codes and Broken Windows: The Legacy of Racial Hegemony in Anti-Gang Civil Injunctions (1998) 107 Yale L. J. 2249, 2258-61.

[148] Foner, Forever Free, supra, at pp. 109-111, 114-15, 163-64.

[149] Id. at p. 202.

[150] Cohen, Negro Involuntary Servitude in the South, 1865-1940: A Preliminary Analysis (1976) 42 J. of Southern History 31, 48-54.

[151] See Harris-Perry, Barbershops, Bibles, and BET: Everyday Talk and Black Political Thought (2010), pp. xvii-xxiii.

[152] Cammett, Shadow Citizens: Felony Disenfranchisement and the Criminalization of Debt (2012) 117 Penn State Law Rev. 350, 360-61; Goluboff, The Forgotten Law that Gave Police Nearly Unlimited Power, Time (Feb. 1, 2016) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Jackson-Gleich, Rigging the Jury: How Each State Reduces Jury Diversity by Excluding People with Criminal Records, Prison Policy Initiative (Feb. 18, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[153] U.S. Const. 15th Amend., § 1.

[154] See, e.g., Nat. Park Service, supra, at pp. 10-

[155] See, e.g., United States Com. on Civil Rights, Report of the United States Commission on Civil Rights (1959) pp. 31-32, 67-68, 123-25, 144 (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Nat. Park Serv., supra, at p. 12.

[156] Hearings before Senate Com. on Jud., Subcom. on Constitutional Rights, Bills Relating to Literacy Tests and Voter Requirements in Federal and State Elections, 87th Cong., 2nd Sess., p. 395 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[157] Oregon v. Mitchell (1970) 400 U.S. 112, 133.

[158] South Carolina v. Katzenbach (1966) 383 U.S. 301, 333–34.

[159] Goldman, The Modern-Day Literacy Test?: Felon Disenfranchisement and Race Discrimination (2004) 57 Stan. L. Rev. 611, 621.

[160] McMillen, Dark Journey: Black Mississippians in the Age of Jim Crow (1990), p. 41.

[161] U.S. Com. on Civil Rights Report, Voting (1961), p. 84 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[162] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 12.

[163] Ibid.

[164] Myrdal, An American Dilemma: The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy, Vol. 1 (Routledge 2017), p. 1325 fn. 34.

[165] Williams v. Mississippi (1898) 170 U.S. 213.

[166] Ibid.

[167] Ibid.

[168] Id. at 223.

[169] Ervin, Jr., Literacy Tests for Voters: A Case Study in Federalism (1962) 27 Law and Contemporary Problems 481, 483 & fn. 7; Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 29.

[170] Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1975, Pub. L. No. 94-73, §§ 101-102, 89 Stat. 400, 400 (1975).

[171] Robertson, North Carolina Lawmakers Begin Pushing Literacy Test Repeal, Associated Press (Mar. 30, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[172] See The White House, Joe Biden (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Roberts, This Senate is the Oldest in American History. Should we Do Anything About It? Wash. Post (June 2, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); United States Senate, Senators (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[173] See Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 9.

[174] Waldman, Fight to Vote (2016), pp. 8, 11-13.

[175] Onuf, Thomas Jefferson: The American Franchise, Miller Center (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[176] Ibid.

[177] Walker, The Poll Tax in the United States (1923) 9 The Bulletin of the Nat. Tax Association 46, 47-48.

[178] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 22.

[179] Id. at p. 22-23, 70-71.

[180] Breedlove v. Suttles (1937) 302 U.S. 277, 283.

[181] Nat. Park Service, supra, at pp. 23-24.

[182] Ibid.

[183] Id. at p. 23.

[184] 52 U.S.C. § 10306.

[185] Harper v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections (1966) 383 U.S. 663, 670.

[186] See generally Riley, Voter Challengers, Brennan Center (2012) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[187] Id. at p. 1.

[188] Id. at 7.

189 Id. at 2.

[190] Id. at p. 10.

[191] Ibid.

[192] The Virginia Election: Convention Proposition Carried – To Disfranchise Negroes – Odd Features of the Voting, N.Y. Times (May 25, 1900) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[193] Riley, supra, at p. 8.

[194] Ibid.

[195] Id. at p. 1.

[196] Greenblatt, The Racial History of the 'Grandfather Clause', NPR (Oct. 22, 2013) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[197] Ibid.; Nat. Park Service, supra, at pp. 13, 15; United States Com. on Civil Rights, Report of the United States Commission on Civil Rights (1959) p. 34 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[198] Guinn v. United States (1915) 238 U.S. 347, 347, 364-65.

[199] See generally Hasen, Do the People or the Parties Own the Electoral Process? (2001) 149 U. Penn. Law Rev. 815.

[200] Id. at p. 821; Reynolds, The Hustling Candidate and the Advent of the Direct Primary: A California Case Study (2013) 12 The Journal of the Gilded Age and Progressive Era 31.

[201] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 16.

[202] United States Com. on Civil Rights, Report of the United States Commission on Civil Rights (1959) p. 109 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[203] Nixon v. Herndon (1927) 273 U.S. 536, 541.

[204] See, e.g., Grovey v. Townsend (1935) 295 U.S. 45, 53.

[205] Smith v. Allwright (1944), 321 U.S. 649.

[206] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 21.

[207] See generally Goldman, The Modern-Day Literacy Test?: Felon Disenfranchisement and Race Discrimination (2004) 57 Stan. L. Rev. 611.

[208] Behrens, et al., Ballot Manipulation and the "Menace of Negro Domination": Racial Threat and Felon Disenfranchisement in the United States, 1850-2002 (2003) 109 Am. J. Soc. 559, 562-63; see also Brooks, Felon Disenfranchisement: Law, History, Policy, and Politics (2005) 32 Fordham Urb. L.J. 101, 102–03.

[209] Behrens, et al., supra, at pp. 563, 566-69.

[210] See, e.g., Cohen, supra; Shofner, Custom, Law, and History: The Enduring Influence of Florida's "Black Code" (1977), 55 The Fla. Historical Quarterly 277, 278-83.

[211] Behrens, et al., supra, at p. 598.

[212] Ibid.

[213] Id. at p. 560.

[214] Manza and Uggen, Locked Out: Felon Disenfranchisement and American Democracy (2006), pp. 37-39, 235.

[215] Levine, A Black Woman Faces Prison Because of a Jim Crow-Era Plan to 'Protect White Voters', The Guardian (Dec. 16, 2019) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[216] Ratliff v. Beale (1896) 20 So. 865, 868; Goldman, supra, at pp. 626-27.

[217] Goldman, supra, at pp. 626-27.

[218] Id. at p. 626.

[219] Trop v. Dulles (1958) 356 U.S. 86, 92.

[220] Richardson v. Ramirez (1974) 418 U.S. 24, 54.

[221] Ibid.

[222] Hunter v. Underwood (1985) 471 U.S. 222, 228-33.

[223] See, e.g., Simmons v. Galvin (1st Cir. 2009), 575 F.3d 24, 32.

[224] Goldman, supra, at pp. 632–33.

[225] Alexander, The New Jim Crow (2010), p. 98.

[226] Goldman, supra, at p. 635.

[227] Chung, Voting Rights in the Era of Mass Incarceration: A Primer, The Sentencing Project (July 28, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[228] Ibid.

[229] Wood and Trivedi, The Modern-Day Poll Tax: How Economic Sanctions Block Access to the Polls (2007) 41 Clearinghouse Rev. J. of Poverty Law and Policy 30, 31, 35-41.

[230] See generally Cox and Holden, Reconsidering Racial and Partisan Gerrymandering (2011) 78 U. Chi. Law Rev. 553

[231] Id. at 557-58; Crocker, Congressional Redistricting: An Overview, Congressional Research Service (Nov. 21, 2012), at pp. 1-2 (as of Mar. 31, 2022); see also, e.g., Rucho v. Common Cause (2019) 139 S.Ct. 2484, 2491-93.

[232] Ibid.

[233] Cox and Holden, supra, at p. 577.

[234] Crocker, supra, at p. 2.

[235] Draper, The League of Dangerous Mapmakers, The Atlantic (Oct. 2012) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[236] Ibid.; Li and Lo, What is Extreme Gerrymandering, Brennan Center (Mar. 22, 2019) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[237] Ibid.

[238] Hearings before House Com. on Jud., Subcom. on Civil & Constitutional Rights, on Extension of the Voting Rights Act, 97th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 2007-2014 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[239] Id. at p. 2013.

[240] Ibid.

[241] Chalmers and His Tale, N.Y. Times (May 26, 1882) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[242] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 38.

[243] Ibid.

[244] Gomillion v. Lightfoot (1960) 364 U.S. 339, 346-47.

[245] Thornburg v. Gingles (1986) 478 U.S. 30, 47-51.

[246] Draper, supra.

[247] Shaw v. Reno (1993) 509 U.S. 630, 641.

[248] Draper, supra.

[249] Li, et al., Who Draws the Maps? Brennan Center for Justice (Sep. 16, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[250] Sears, African Americans and the New Deal (1976) 10 The History Teacher 89; Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 19.

[251] Apple, Jr., G.O.P. Tries Hard to Win Black Votes, But Recent History Works Against It, N.Y. Times (Sep. 19, 1996); McAdam and Kloos, Race and the Modern GOP, Politico (Sep. 25, 2014) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[252] Kloos, supra.

[253] Igielnik and Budiman, The Changing Racial and Ethnic Composition of the U.S. Electorate, Pew Research (Sep. 23, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[254] Corasaniti and Epstein, Map by Map, G.O.P. Chips Away at Black Democrats' Power, N.Y. Times (Dec. 18, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[255] Rucho v. Common Cause (2019) 139 S. Ct. 2484, 2500-08.

[256] Clarke and Greenbaum, Gerrymandering Symposium: The Racial Implications of Yesterday's Partisan Gerrymandering Decision, SCOTUSBlog (June 28, 2019) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Okonta, Race-Based Political Exclusion and Social Subjugation: Racial Gerrymandering as a Badge of Slavery (2018) 49 Colum. Human Rights L. Rev. 255, 285.

[257] Bohrs, Prison Gerrymandering and the 2020 Census, Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties L. Rev. (Nov. 15, 2019) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[258] Ibid.

[259] E. Ann Carson, Prisoners in 2019, Bureau of Justice Statistics (October 2020) table 3 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[260] Tamir, et al., Facts About the U.S. Black Population, Pew Research (Mar. 25, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[261] Blakinger, What Is Prison Gerrymandering and How Does It Impact Elections? Criminologist John Pfaff Explains, Houston Chronicle (Mar. 6, 2018) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[262] Cassidy, Far Too Little Vote Fraud to Tip Election to Trump, AP Finds, Associated Press (Dec. 14, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[263] See Minnite, The Misleading Myth of Voter Fraud in American Elections, Scholars Strategy Network (2014), pp. 1-2 (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Nat. Conference of State Legislatures, Voter Identification Requirements: Voter ID Laws (2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[264] Cunningham, Who are to be the Electors? A Reflection on the History of Voter Registration in the United States (1991) 9 Yale L. & Policy Rev. 370, 379 & fn. 49, 383-85.

[265] Brown, The Ku Klux Movement, The Atlantic (May 1901) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[266] Cunningham, supra, at pp. 379 & fn. 49, 383-85.

[267] Redden, Changing Focus and Exposing a Solution: Using Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act to Defeat Tennessee's Voter Photo ID Law (2013) 44 U. Mem. L. Rev. 229, 235-236; Zoch, Then and Now: How 8 Election Policies Have Changed Since 2000, Nat. Conference of State Legislatures (Feb. 16, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[268] Klarman, The Supreme Court 2019 Term Foreword: The Degradation of American Democracy—And the Court (2020) 134 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 48.

[269] See Minnite, The Misleading Myth of Voter Fraud in American Elections, Scholars Strategy Network (2014), pp. 1-2 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[270] 52 U.S.C. §§ 20901-211

[271] See Ruda, Picture Perfect: A Critical Analysis of the Debate on the 2002 Help America Vote Act (2003) 31 Fordham Urb. L.J. 235, 246-253.

[272] Klarman, supra, at p. 49.

[273] Daniels, A Vote Delayed Is a Vote Denied: A Preemptive Approach to Eliminating Election Administration Legislation that Disenfranchises Unwanted Voters, 47 U. Louisville L. Rev. 57, 79-80 (2008).

[274] Nat. Conference of State Legislatures, Voter Identification Requirements: Voter ID Laws (2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[275] Government Accountability Office, Elections: Issues Related to State Voter Identification Laws (Sep. 2014), p. 25 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[276] Haygood, The Past as Prologue: Defending Democracy Against Voter Suppression Tactics on the Eve of the 2012 Elections (2012) 64 Rutgers L. Rev. 1019, 1039.

[277] Id. at pp. 1054-1056.

[278] Ibid.

[279] Desilver, Most Mail and Provisional Ballots Got Counted in Past U.S. Elections—But Many Did Not, Pew Research Center (Nov. 10, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[280] Ibid.

[281] American Civil Liberties Union, Fact Sheet on Voter ID Laws (2017), p. 1 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[282] Haygood, supra, at p. 1051.

[283] United States Gov. Accountability Office, Issues Related to State Voter Identification Laws (Sept. 2014), p. 32 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[284] Klarman, supra, at p. 50; see also Sobel, The High Cost of 'Free' Photo Voter Identification Cards, Charles Hamilton Houston Institute for Race & Justice (2014), p. 21 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[285] Trotter, Vote of Confidence: Crawford v. Marion County Election Board, Voter Identification Laws, and the Suppression of a Structural Right (2013) 16 N.Y.U. J. Legis. & Pub. Pol'y 515, 552; see also Ross, Pouring Old Poison into New Bottles: How Discretion and the Discriminatory Administration of Voter ID Laws Recreate Literacy Tests (2014) 45 Columbia Human Rights L. Rev. 362, 366-367; Ellis, The Cost of the Vote: Poll Taxes, Voter Identification Laws, and the Price of Democracy (2009) 86 Denver U. L. Rev. 1023, 1025-26, 1038.

[286] Wan, Inside the Republican Creation of the North Carolina Voting Bill Dubbed the 'Monster' Law, Wash. Post (Sep. 2, 2016) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[287] Trotter, supra, at p. 553.

[288] See Bouie, Republicans Admit Voter ID Laws Are Aimed at Democratic Voters, The Daily Beast (July 11, 2017) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Wines, Some Republicans Acknowledge Leveraging Voter ID Laws for Political Gain, N.Y. Times (Sept. 17, 2016) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[289] Pew Research Center, Party Affiliation Among Voters: 1992-2016, (2016) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[290] See Wan, supra.

[291] Hajnal, et al., Voter Identification Laws and the Suppression of Minority Votes (2017), p. 16 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[292] U.S. Const., Sixth

[293] Amar, Jury Service as Political Participation Akin to Voting (1995) 80 Cornell L. Rev. 203, 218-21; Ramos v. Louisiana (2020) 140 S. Ct. 1390, 1394-97.

[294] Hoag, An Unbroken Thread: African-American Exclusion from Jury Service, Past and Present (2020) 81 La. L. Rev. 55, 58-59.

[295] Litwack, North of Slavery: The Negro in the Free States, 1790-1860 (1961), p. 94; see also Strauder v. West Virginia (1879) 100 U.S. 303.

[296] U.S. House of Representatives, History, Art, and Archives, Civil Rights Act of 1765 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[297] See Equal Justice Initiative, Race and the Jury: Illegal Discrimination in Jury Selection (Nov. 2005), p. 15 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[298] See Ramos v. Louisiana (2020) 140 S. Ct. 1390, 1396.

[299] Id. at 1394.

[300] Ibid.; Frampton, The Jim Crow Jury (2018) 71 Vanderbilt L. Rev. 1593, 1605, 1607.

[301] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 13.

[302] See, e.g., Frampton, supra, at p. 1598; Hoag, supra, at pp. 62-63.

[303] See generally Equal Justice Initiative, Race and the Jury: Illegal Discrimination in Jury Selection, supra (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[304] Katz, et al., Reckoning with our Rights: The Evolution of Voter Access in California, UCLA Luskin Center for History and Policy (Sept. 2020), pp. 3, 7 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[305] Id. at p. 9.

[306] Ibid.

[307] Id. at pp. 11-12.

[308] Smith, California's Last Slave Case, supra.

[309] Ibid.; Wheeler, Black California: The History of African-Americans in the Golden State (1993), p. 121.

[310] Moore, African Americans in California: A Brief Historiography (1996) 75 Cal. History 194, 195.

[311] See, e.g., Jones, The Political Repression of the Black Panther Party 1966-1971: The Case of the Oakland Bay Area (1988) 18 J. of Black Studies 415, 415-416 (Jones, The Political Repression of the Black Panther Par

[312] KNTV Channel 11 News Reels Aug. 23, 1966 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[313] Morrison, Decades Later, a New Look at the Black Panthers and Their Legacy, Associated Press (Oct. 31, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[314] Blakemore, How the Black Panthers' Breakfast Program Both Inspired and Threatened the Government, History (Jan. 29, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[315] Jones, The Political Repression of the Black Panther Party, supra, at p. 417.

[316] Id. at pp. 415-416.

[317] Id. at p. 416.

[318] Abdelfatah, et al., The Real Black Panthers, NPR (Apr. 15, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[319] Jones, The Political Repression of the Black Panther Party, supra, at pp. 415-416.

[320] Id. at pp. 428-31.

[321] Ibid.

[322] Ibid.

[323] Jones, The Political Repression of the Black Panther Party, supra, at pp. 421-25.

[324] Morrison, Decades Later, a New Look at the Black Panthers and Their Legacy, Associated Press (Oct. 31, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[325] Cal. Const. of 1849, art. II, § 5.

[326] 7 Witkin, Summary 11th Constitutional Law § 277 (2021); see also Ramirez v. Brown (1974) 12 C.3d 912, 117 C.R. 562, 528 P.2d 378.

[327] Uggen, et al., 6 Million Lost Voters: State-Level Estimates of Felony Disenfranchisement, 2016 The Sentencing Project (Oct. 6, 2016), p. 4 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[328] Id. at p. 16.

[329] Id. at p. 17.

[330] McGreevy, Proposition 17, Which Will Let Parolees Vote in California, Approved by Voters, L.A. Times (Nov. 3, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[331] Meier and Bracey, Jr., The NAACP as a Reform Movement, 1909-1965 (1993) 59 J. of Southern History 3, 4.

[332] Id. at pp. 8-10.

[333] Id. at pp. 4, 8, 10.

[334] Id. at pp. 14-15, 25.

[335] Id. at pp. 8, 23-25.

[336] Gilmore, Gender and Jim Crow: Women and the Politics of White Supremacy in North Carolina, 1896-1920 (1996), p. 102.

[337] Id. at p. 107.

[338] Jones, What the 19th Amendment Meant for Black Women, Politico (Aug. 26, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Nat. Park Service, supra, at pp. 16-17.

[339] Jones, For Black Women, the 19th Amendment Didn't End Their Fight to Vote, Nat. Geographic (Aug. 7, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[340] Meier and Bracey, Jr., supra, at p. 21.

[341] Kluger, Simple Justice (Knopf 2011), p. 12; Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 20.

[342] See, e.g., Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 20; Garrow, supra, pp. 97-100, 163-64.

[343] Scelfo, On MLK Day, Honor the Mother of the Civil Rights Movement, Too, Time (Jan. 16, 2017) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[344] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 27.

[345] Ibid.

[346] Id. at p. 28.

[347] Fleegler, Theodore G. Bilbo and the Decline of Public Racism, 1938-1947 (2006) 68 J. Miss. History 1, 1.

[348] Id. at p. 20.

[349] Id. at p. 22.

[350] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 25.

[351] Id. at p. 28.

[352] Ibid.

[353] Ibid.

[354] Ibid.

[355] Ibid.

[356] Garrow, supra, at p. 249.

[357] Nat. Park Service, supra, at pp. 50-52.

[358] Id. at p. 44.

[359] Ibid.

[360] May, Bending Toward Justice (2013), p.

[361] U.S. Dept. of Justice, History of Federal Voting Rights Laws (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Nat. Park Service, supra, at pp. 65-68

[362] May, supra, at p. 87.

[363] Ibid.

[364] Rojas, Selma Helped Define John Lewis's Life. In Death, He Returned One Last Time, N.Y. Times (Jul. 28, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[365] Ibid.

[366] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 70.

[367] Berman, The Lost Promise of the Voting Rights Act, The Atlantic (Aug. 5, 2015) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[368] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 65

[369] Tate, From Protest to Politics: The New Black Voters in American Elections (1998), p. 1.

[370] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 69.

[371] 52 U.S.C. § 10301(a); see also SCOTUSBlog, Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act: Vote Dilution and Vote Deprivation (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[372] Avila, et al., Voting Rights in California: 1982-2006 (2007) 17 Southern Cal. Rev. of Law and Social Justice 132, 137.

[373] Ibid.

[374] U.S. Dept. of Justice, Introduction to Federal Voting Rights Laws (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[375] See Shelby Cnty. v. Holder (2013) 570 U.S. 529; Brnovich v. Democratic Nat. Com. (2021) 141 S. Ct. 2321.

[376] Shelby Cnty. v. Holder (2013) 570 U.S. 529.

[377] Id. at pp. 547-57.

[378] Id. at pp. 565, 593 (dis. opn. Ginsburg, J.).

[379] Id. at p. 590 (dis. opn. Ginsburg, J.).

[380] See Brnovich v. Democratic Nat. Com. (2021) 141 S. Ct. 2321.

[381] Id. at pp. 2337-2341.

[382] Id. at pp. 2339-40.

[383] Brnovich v. Democratic National Committee (2021) 135 Harv. L. Rev. 481; Charles and Fuentes-Rohwer, The Court's Voting-Rights Decision Was Worse than People Think, The Atlantic (Jul. 8, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[384] Brnovich, supra, 141 S. Ct. 2321, 2338-39.

[385] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 29.

[386] Agraharkar, 50 Years Later, Voting Rights Act Under Unprecedented Assault, Brennan Center for Justice (Aug. 2, 2015) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[387] Ibid.

[388] The Leadership Conference Education Fund, Democracy Diverted: Polling Place Closures and the Right to Vote (Sep. 2019), p. 10 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[389] Brennan Center for Justice, Voting Laws Roundup: December 2021 (Dec. 21, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); see also Brnovich v. Democratic Nat. Com. (2021) 141 S. Ct. 2321, 2337-2341.

[390] Klarman, supra, at pp. 59-60.

[391] Fausset, et al., Why the Georgia G.O.P.'s Voting Rollbacks Will Hit Black People Hard, N.Y. Times (Mar. 25, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[392] U.S. Department of Justice, Justice Department Files Lawsuit Against the State of Georgia to Stop Racially Discriminatory Provisions of New Voting Law (Jun. 25, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[393] Brennan Center for Justice, State Voting Bills Tracker 2021 (May 28, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[394] See Brennan Center for Justice, Voting Laws Roundup: December 2021 (Dec. 21, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[395] Katz, et al., supra, at pp. 20-27.

[396] Ibid.

[397] Avila, et al., supra, at p. 152.

[398] 35 Fed. Reg. § 12354 (1970); see Lopez v. Monterey County (1999) 525 U.S. 266, 271.

[399] U.S. Dept. of Justice, Jurisdictions Previously Covered by Section 5 (as of Mar. 31, 2022); U.S. Dept. of Justice, Voting Determination Letters for California (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[400] Assistant Attorney General John R. Dunne, Letter to Merced County Clerk Kenneth L. Randol (Apr. 3, 1992) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[401] Report of the Proceedings and Debates of the Constitutional Convention, State of Virginia: Held in the City of Richmond, June 12, 1901 to June 24, 1901 (Vol. 2, Hermitage Press 1906), pp. 3076-77.

[402] Nat. Park Service, supra, at p. 14.

[403] Ibid.

[404] Ibid.

[405] Ibid.

[406] Id. at p. 6; Facing History & Ourselves, Black Officeholders in the South (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[407] Wasniewski, U.S. House of Representatives, Office of History and Preservation, African Americans in Congress: 1870-2007 (2008), pp. 3-4.

[408] Id. at pp. 2, 4.

[409] Ibid.

[410] Caro, Master of the Senate (2009), pp. xiii-xiv; Grantham, The Life and Death of the Solid South: A Political History (1992).

[411] Caro, supra, at pp. xiii-xiv.

[412] Ibid.

[413] See, e.g., Katznelson, When Affirmative Action was White (2005), p. 113; Krugman, Paul Krugman - New Deal Created the Middle Class (Apr. 1, 2011) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Mettler, Soldiers to Citizens: The G.I. Bill and the Making of the Greatest Generation (2005), p. 9.

[414] Katznelson, supra, at p. 113; California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 13, 2021), Witness

Testimony - Jacqueline Jones, Ph.D , 7:20-8:55 (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[415] Thomas, The Hill-Burton Act and Civil Rights: Expanding Hospital Care for Black Southerners, 1939-1960 (2006) 72 J. of Southern History 823, 827-28; Lichtenstein, et al., Who Built America? Working People and the Nation's Economy, Politics, Culture, and Society (Vol. 2, 2000), p. 429.

[416] Boyle, The President Proposes..., N.Y. Times (Apr. 5, 2013) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Kotz, 'When Affirmative Action was White': Uncivil Rights, N.Y. Times (Aug. 28, 2005) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Lichtenstein, et al., Who Built America? Working People and the Nation's Economy, Politics, Culture, and Society—Volume 2: Since 1877 (2000), p. 429.

[417] Lichtenstein, et al., supra.

[418] Ibid.

[419] Kotz, supra.

[420] Katznelson, supra, at pp. 113-15; see also Blakemore, How the GI Bill's Promise was Denied to a Million Black WWII Veterans, History (Apr. 20, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[421] Katznelson, supra, at p. 121.

[422] Thomas, supra, at p. 823.

[423] Id. at 836; Von Hoffman, A Study in Contradictions: The Origins and Legacy of the Housing Act of 1949 (2000) 11 Housing Policy Debate 299, 309.

[424] Bateman, et al., Southern Nation: Congress and White Supremacy After Reconstruction (2018), p. 385.

[425] Griffin, et al., States of Change, How Demographic Change is Transforming the Republican and Democratic Parties, Center for American Progress (June 2019), pp. 9-10 (as of Mar. 31, 2022); see also Ray and Whitlock, Setting the Record Straight on Black Voter Turnout, Brookings Institution (Sept. 12, 2019) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[426] Fabina, Despite Pandemic Challenges, 2020 Election Had Largest Increase in Voting Between Presidential Elections on Record, U.S. Census Bureau (Apr. 29, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[427] Ibid.

[428] Jones, et al., 2020 Census Illuminates Racial and Ethnic Composition of Country, U.S. Census Bureau (Aug. 12, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[429] Stafford, et al., 'This is Proof': Biden's Win Reveals Power of Black Voters, Associated Press (Nov. 9, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Wiltz, 2020: The Year Black Voters Said, 'Hold Up,' Politico (Jan. 2, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Igielnik, et al., Behind Biden's 2020 Victory, Pew Research Center (Jun. 30, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[430] Logan, Do Black Politicians Matter? Evidence from Reconstruction (2020) 80 J. of Econ. History 1, 2-3, 22-33.

[431] Aneja and Avenancio-Leon, The Effect of Political Power on Labor Market Equality: Evidence from the 1965 Voting Rights Act, Wash. Center for Equitable Growth (Oct. 16, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[432] Id. at p. 17.

[433] Id. at pp. 23-30.

[434] Ibid.

[435] Id. at p. 18.

[436] Stephanopoulos, The False Promise of Black Political Representation, The Atlantic (Jun. 11, 2015) (as of Mar. 31, 2022) (Stephanopoulos, The False Promise).

[437] Stephanopoulos, Political Powerlessness (2015) 90 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1527, 1583; Griffin and Newman, Minority Report: Evaluating Political Equality in America (2008).

[438] Griffin and Newman, Minority Report: Evaluating Political Equality in America (2008), p. 81-107.

[439] Sonmez and DeBonis, No Deal on Bill to Overhaul Policing in Aftermath of Protests Over Killing of Black Americans, Wash. Post (Sep. 22, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); The Editorial Board, Why National Police Reform Failed, Wall Street Journal (Sep. 27, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[440] Logan, John Lewis Voting Rights Bill Fails in the Senate Amid Rise of GOP-Led State Restrictions, L.A. Times (Nov. 3, 2021) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[441] Rosalsky, What a 1968 Report Tells Us about the Persistence of Racial Equality, NPR (Jun. 9, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[442] Loh, et al., The Great Real Estate Reset, Brookings Institute (Dec. 16, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 13, 2021), Witness Testimony - Paul Austin (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[443] See, e.g., Godoy, In U.S. Cities, The Health Effects of Past Housing Discrimination are Plain to See, NPR (Nov. 19, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022); Mitchell and Franco, HOLC "Redlining" Maps: The Persistent Structure of Segregation and Economic Inequality, National Community Reinvestment Coalition (Mar. 20, 2018) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[444] See generally Caro, The Power Broker (1974).

[445] Guinier, The Triumph of Tokenism: The Voting Rights Act and the Theory of Black Electoral Success (1991) 89 Mich. L. Rev. 1077, 1134-1153.

[446] Daniels, Pioneer Urbanites: A Social and Cultural History of Black San Francisco (1990), p. 50.

[447] Ibid.

[448] Id. at pp. 50-51.

[449] Ibid.

[450] California Legislative Black Caucus, Past Members (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[451] Ibid.

[452] Ibid.; see also California Research Bureau, Women of Color in California's Legislature. Increasing, But Still Not Representative (Aug. 2015) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

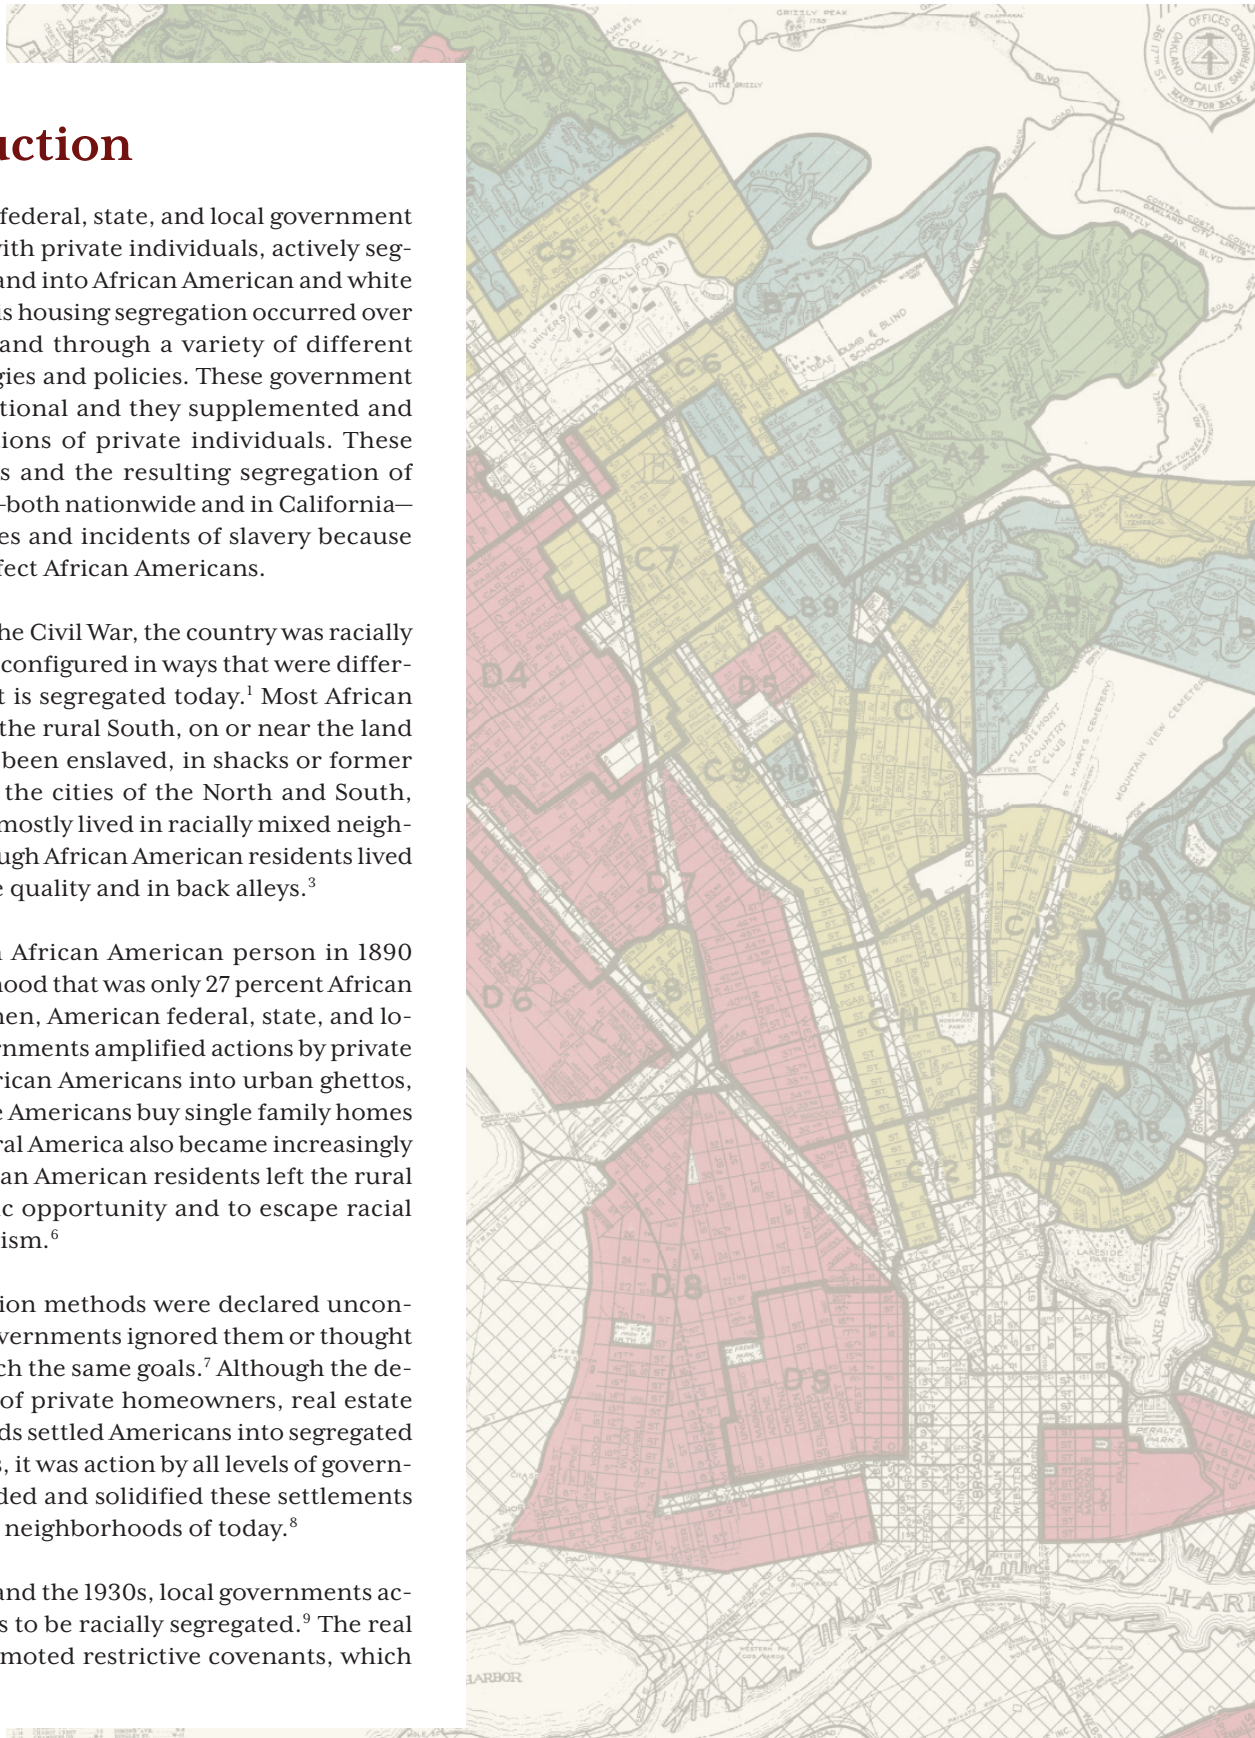
[453] Compare California Legislative Black Caucus, supra, with U.S. Census Bureau, Race (2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

[454] Hepler, The Hidden Toll of California's Black Exodus, S.F. Chronicle (Jul. 25, 2020) (as of Mar. 31, 2022).

CHAPTER 5 Housing Segregation

COURTESY OF "NOT EVEN PAST: SOCIAL VULNERABILITY AND THE LEGACY OF REDLINING"/ HTTPS://DSL.RICHMOND.EDU/SOCIALVULNERABILITY



Homeowner's Loan Corporation map of Oakland, CA. (1939)

I. Introduction

After the Civil War, federal, state, and local government officials, working with private individuals, actively segregated American land into African American and white neighborhoods. This housing segregation occurred over almost 200 years, and through a variety of different government strategies and policies. These government actions were intentional and they supplemented and intensified the actions of private individuals. These widespread actions and the resulting segregation of African Americans—both nationwide and in California—are enduring badges and incidents of slavery because they continue to affect African Americans.

Immediately after the Civil War, the country was racially and geographically configured in ways that were different from the way it is segregated today.[1] Most African Americans lived in the rural South, on or near the land on which they had been enslaved, in shacks or former slave quarters.[2] In the cities of the North and South, African Americans mostly lived in racially mixed neighborhoods, even though African American residents lived in housing of worse quality and in back alleys.[3]

The average urban African American person in 1890 lived in a neighborhood that was only 27 percent African American.[4] Since then, American federal, state, and local municipal governments amplified actions by private citizens to force African Americans into urban ghettos, while helping white Americans buy single family homes in the suburbs.[5] Rural America also became increasingly segregated, as African American residents left the rural South for economic opportunity and to escape racial violence and terrorism.[6]

As certain segregation methods were declared unconstitutional, local governments ignored them or thought up new ways to reach the same goals.[7] Although the decisions of millions of private homeowners, real estate agents, and landlords settled Americans into segregated residential patterns, it was action by all levels of government which expanded and solidified these settlements into the segregated neighborhoods of today.[8]

Between the 1900s and the 1930s, local governments actively planned cities to be racially segregated.[9] The real estate industry promoted restrictive covenants, which were clauses written into deeds that prohibited non-white residents from living in the house.[10]

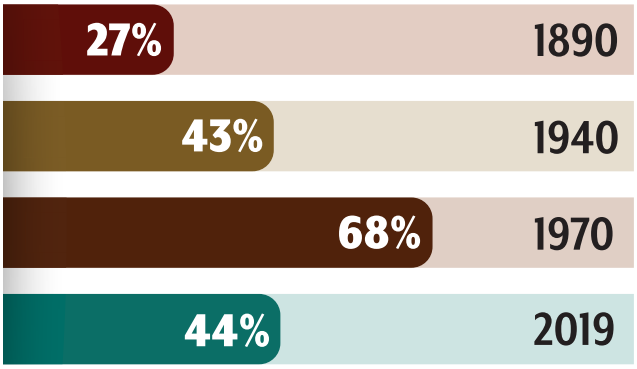
By 1940, the average urban African American person lived in a neighborhood that was 43 percent African American.[11] From the 1930s to the 1970s, the United States federal government built public housing for white Americans, but not African Americans. The federal government helped white Americans, but not African Americans buy houses in the suburbs. Throughout American history, up until the 1970s, white residents terrorized their African American neighbors by destroying their property, bombing their houses, and burning crosses on their lawns to scare them away from living in white neighborhoods.[12] For a more detailed discussion, please see Chapter 3, Racial Terror.

By 1970, the average urban African American person lived in a neighborhood that was 68 percent African American.[13] Even after the passage of the Federal Housing Act, which outlawed housing discrimination, urban renewal and other uses of local government actions funded by the federal and state governments maintained residential segregation.[14]

The problem of segregation has never been corrected. America is as segregated in 2019 as it was in the 1940s, with the average urban Black person living in a neighborhood that is 44 percent black.[15]

INTENSITY OF SEGREGATION IN AMERICA



In California, the population of African Americans remained small until World War II, when African Americans moved to the state to find jobs in the war industry.[16] On the one hand, Southern California is an African American success story.[17] As W. E. B. Du Bois wrote of Los Angeles and Pasadena in 1913, "Nowhere in the United States is the Negro so well and beautifully housed, nor the average efficiency and intelligence in the colored population so high."[18]

In 1910, 36 percent of African Americans in Los Angeles owned homes, far more than most cities at the time.[19] On the other hand, all success is relative. Federal, state, and local government in California helped create segregation through discriminatory federal housing policies, zoning ordinances, decisions on where to build schools and a discriminatory federal mortgage policy called redlining.[20] As Robert Joseph Pershing Foster, a migrant from the small town of Monroe, Louisiana who moved to Los Angeles in the 1950s said of his first days in California, "I came all this way running from Jim Crow, and it slaps me straight in the face[.]"[21]

Like elsewhere in the country, the effects of these government policies at all levels continue to this day. In 2021, in Los Angeles and Orange counties, only 34 percent of Black households owned homes,[22] less than in 1910.

LOS ANGELES
PERCENT OF AFRICAN AMERICANS WHO OWNED HOMES

Section III of this chapter describes the history of U.S. Supreme Court decisions which allowed residential segregation to intensify over the last 170 years. Section IV describes the state of residential segregation at the end of the Civil War, before government and private action segregated the American landscape. Section V, VI and VII explains how migration patterns across the country led states, cities and communities to exclude African Americans, how African Americans establish their own communities in response and the racism that they faced in doing so. Sections VIII – XIII details the various mechanisms used by federal, state and local governments to segregated America throughout history. Sections XIV and XV describes the state of housing segregation today and its effects. Section XVI concludes that residential segregation in America is a result of white supremacist beliefs created to support enslavement and is the root of many modern-day racial disparities. Section XVII is an appendix of relevant data for reference. Each of these sections show the persisting effects of slavery in the context of housing.

II. Constitutionally Sanctioned Housing Discrimination

The reason housing segregation has never been fixed in America is due in part to the Supreme Court. As discussed in Chapter 2, Enslavement, and Chapter 4, Political Disenfranchisement, although the Civil Rights Act of 1866 and the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution banned actions that continued the effects of slavery, the Supreme Court of the United States decided in 1883 that the federal government could not prohibit racial discrimination by individual business owners and private parties.[23] This ruling later applied to housing.[24] As a result, government and private actors essentially ignored the Civil Rights Act of 1866 and Fourteenth Amendment protections against racial discrimination until Congress passed the Fair Housing Act in 1968.[25]

The story did not end here. At the height of segregation in the 1970s, the U.S. Supreme Court popularized the myth that the American government had no role in creating housing segregation, and therefore should not and could not fix the personal choices of millions of private citizens.[26]

III. The End of the Civil War

Immediately after the Civil War, the country was racially and geographically configured in ways that were different from the way it is segregated today.[27] Immediately after the Civil War, between 1860 and 1900, almost 90 percent of African Americans lived in the South,[28] and 80 percent of those who lived in the South lived in rural areas.[29] Many African American workers lived in former slave quarters, on the same plantation on which they had been enslaved.[30]

Most modern-day scholars agree that white and African Americans lived in the same geographic area in the cities at this time, although in unequal quality of housing.[31] White families lived in front streets and broad avenues and African American families generally could only live in backyards, alleys, side streets, or their houses were separated by physical barriers.[32] Impoverished shanty towns of unemployed African Americans also appeared around southern cities in undesirable areas like swamps, near city dumps, and next to cemeteries and railroad tracks.[33] "Ghettos were built up in nearly all Southern cities, not always sharply defined but pretty definite, and in these, Negroes must live," wrote Du Bois.[34]

At the same time, less than 10 percent of African Americans lived in the North and less than 0.4 percent lived in the western states.[35] Most lived in urban areas[36] that were much more segregated by neighborhood than in the South,[37] and in worse housing conditions than white Americans.[38]

In 1899, W. E. B. Du Bois's landmark sociological study of Philadelphia summed up the situation: "[H]ere is a people receiving a little lower wages than usual for less desirable work, and compelled, in order to do that work, to live in a little less pleasant quarters than most people, and pay for them somewhat higher rents."[39] Some families used up to 75 percent of their income on rent, as real estate agents raised the rent for African American tenants because they knew many landlords did not rent to African American tenants.[40] Most African Americans living in the North were only able to find jobs serving white families, and thus were forced to pay higher rents in the more expensive neighborhoods close to their employers.[41]

In California around the end of the Civil War, African Americans were few in number compared to other racial groups: the 1860 census counted 4,086 "[t]otal free colored," 17,798 "Indian," and 34,933 "Asiatic" people in California.[42] As a result of their small numbers, African American Californians at the time generally lived in multiethnic communities[43] and occasionally also lived in small predominantly African American communities.[44] For example, a group of 44 settlers, half of whom were of African descent, who traveled from Sinaloa, Mexico, established a settlement that later became Los Angeles in 1781.[45] During the Mexican War, from 1846 to 1848, Los

COURTESY OF DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE/NATIONAL ARCHIVES

An old farm house with slave house in the foreground.

Angeles had a significant African American population as former enslaved African Americans were brought to the area.[46] In Northern California, there was also a concentrated African American population along the banks of the Sacramento River in a neighborhood comprised of Mexican and Chinese settlers.[47] In that neighborhood, "rowdy young men and boys" attacked all three groups and vandalized African American and Chinese businesses.[48] African Americans also lived and worked in multiethnic mining communities such as Little Negro Hill near Folsom Lake, California.[49] California had four counties with fewer than 10 African American residents in 1890.[50] By 1930, California had eight counties with fewer than 10 African American residents, which author James Loewen argues is the result of intensified segregation[51] Author Richard Rothstein argues that after the large influx of African Americans to the state in World War II, government actions in California imposed racial segregation where it had not previously existed.[52]

Many towns across the country became known as sundown towns, where African Americans were not allowed to stay after dark. Although these rules were often unwritten, local sheriffs and armed, white mobs enforced them. According one scholar, California had more sundown towns than the entire South.

IV. The Great Migration

Between 1870 and 1900, many African Americans moved from rural to urban areas in the South, looking for better paying jobs.[53] Over the next seven decades, as violence targeting African Americans intensified in the South, and as Southern states passed laws that relegated African Americans in nearly every aspect of life to worse conditions than white Americans, the promise of better jobs and the illusion of racial equality pulled African Americans out of the South to the North and the West.[54] This is called the Great Migration and, at its peak, 16,000 African American people left the South each month.[55]

Historians have identified three migration paths out of the South (though not all African Americans followed these paths exactly).[56] The eastern path carried people from Florida, Georgia, the Carolinas, and Virginia to Washington D.C., Philadelphia, New York, and Boston.[57] The Midwest path carried people from Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee, and Arkansas to Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, and Pittsburgh.[58] The western path carried people from Louisiana and Texas to California and the rest of the West Coast.[59] More African American people moved to California in the 1940s than in the entire previous century of statehood combined.[60] The African American population of California mushroomed form 124,306 in 1940 to 1,400,143 in 1970.[61] By the end of the Great Migration in the 1970s, 47 percent of African Americans lived outside of the South.[62] Although many African Americans left the South to escape discrimination, the lingering legacy of slavery, reinforced by government actions at all levels, followed them across the country. Historians have argued that the Great Migration led to an increase in racial violence in the North and West, and an intensification of residential segregation.[63]

V. Exclusion or Destruction of African American Communities

Nationally

As African Americans left the South, entire states like Indiana and Oregon outright banned African Americans from living in the state.[64] Peter Burnett, who later became the first governor of the State of California, was involved in passing these Oregon laws to ban Black residents from living in Oregon.[65]

In addition to entire states, many towns across the country became known as sundown towns, where African Americans were not allowed to remain after dark.[66] Although these rules were often unwritten, local sheriffs and armed, white mobs enforced them.[67] Sundown towns were created largely between 1890 to 1940 and they legally continued to exist through 1968.[68] The sociologist James Loewen argued that most suburbs in America began as sundown towns and that the hometowns of nine out of the 32 candidates for president in the 20th century were sundown towns.[69] For example, Harry Truman grew up in Lamar, Missouri, a legal segregation town of 3,000 without a single African American family.[70] George W. Bush lived in Highland Park, a sundown suburb of Dallas that only welcomed its first African American homeowners in 2003.[71]

California

Much like Indiana and Oregon outright banned African Americans from living in the state as they left the south,[72] California also tried to pass laws banning African Americans from settling in the state.[73] Although the laws did not pass, the California legislature, dominated by white southerners at the time, sent the clear message that African Americans were not welcome.[74] (For further discussion, see Chapter 2, Enslavement.)

Later, as residential segregation reached its height between 1940 to 1970, local governments and residents created scores of sundown towns and suburbs in California,[75] some by ordinance and some by force.[76] Loewen found evidence that eight California counties effectively excluded African American people.[77] White Californians rioted to expel African American residents from California towns.[78] According to Loewen's research, California had more sundown towns than the entire South, which Loewen attributes to the culture of racism in the South preferring to exploit rather than exclude African American residents.[79]

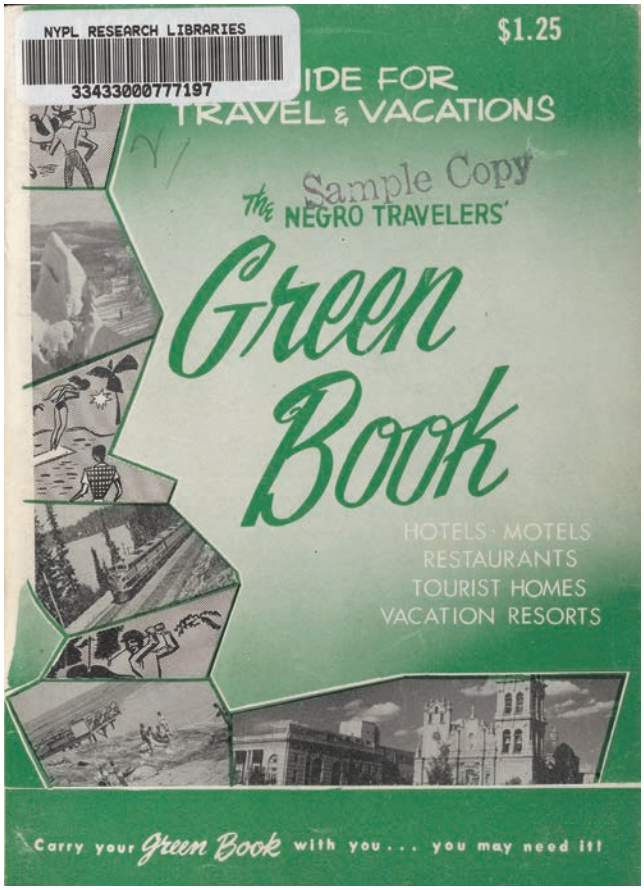
California sundown towns included most of the suburbs of Los Angeles and San Francisco, and most of Orange County.[80] Some of these places gained a national reputation as sundown towns.[81] Loewen has collected research on numerous sundown towns throughout California.[82] A list of the sundown towns identified by Loewen is included in Table 3 in the Appendix to this chapter.

Fliers for the Maywood Colony, a suburban development surrounding Corning, California, announced: "GOOD PEOPLE - In most communities in California you'll find Chinese, Japs, Dagoes, Mexicans, and Negroes mixing up and working in competition with the white folks. Not so at Maywood Colony. Employment is not given to this element."[83]

In South Pasadena, in the late 1940s, the city administration, local civic leaders, and realtors tried to cover South Pasadena with racially restrictive covenants.[84] A 1947 newspaper article noted the unusual and extreme extent of this effort; the goal was to blanket the entire city with racially restrictive covenants.[85]

As a matter of official policy, African Americans and other nonwhite persons were only allowed to work in South Pasadena if they left by dusk.[86] Limited exceptions were made for live-in servants and caretakers, but they could not live in the city on their own, and often could not bring their children to live with them.[87] This campaign to exclude all nonwhite residents from South Pasadena only failed after the Supreme Court ruled that racially restrictive covenants could not be enforced.[88]

COURTESY OF SCHOMBURG CENTER FOR RESEARCH IN BLACK CULTURE/THE NEW YORK PUBLIC LIBRARY



The Negro Travelers' Green Book. The annual guide is for services and places relatively friendly to African-Americans. (1959)

VI. Freedmen's Town

Nationally

Banned from settling in entire geographic areas, and escaping discrimination and racial violence, African Americans began building all African American towns in the 19th Century in the Southwest, Midwest, and West.[89] Also known as Freedmen's Towns, these towns developed in order to, in the words of one Black town newspaper editor, exercise freedom "as freedom was understood by [African Americans]."[90] Approximately 100 such towns were built between early-1800s and mid-1900s.[91] A particularly large number of African Americans migrated to Kansas.[92] Oklahoma had over 30 all-African American towns.[93] Other states with such towns included Texas, Iowa, New Mexico, and Michigan, as well as some in the former enslavement states of Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, and Tennessee.[94]

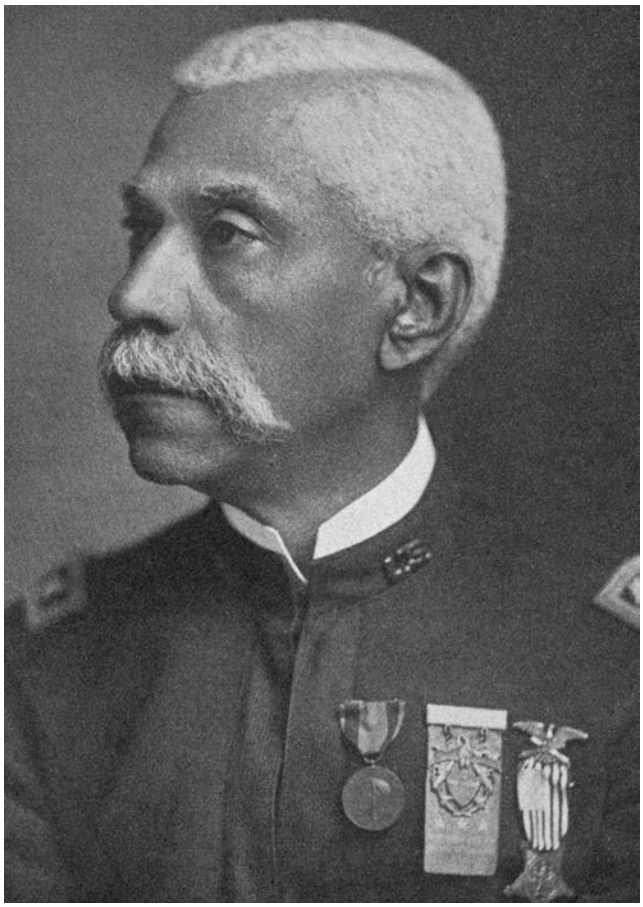
California

Although there is not much research on this topic, some records suggest that there were at least 15 African American towns in California between 1850 and 1910.[95] The best known and most successful was Allensworth, 40 miles north of Bakersfield.[96] Allen Allensworth, a formerly enslaved Lieutenant Colonel from the U.S. Army, founded Allensworth with others in 1908.[97] The town attracted disillusioned African American migrants who had fled the South, but found a different type of discrimination in California.[98]

COURTESY OF IRMA AND PAUL MILSTEIN DIVISION OF UNITED STATES HISTORY/THE NEW YORK PUBLIC LIBRARY



Lieutenant Colonel Allen Allensworth founded an all Black town outside of Bakersfield with four other settlers. Today, Allensworth is a California State Park. (1926)

Unlike other African American towns in California, Allensworth was self-governing, and at the height of its success before the Great Depression, over 300 families constructed churches, a library, a school, and a general store.[99] African American midwives cared for the health of the community, as most doctors in nearby towns refused to take African American patients unless the patient was employed by a white rancher.[100]

Allensworth spent more money on its schools than its neighboring school districts.[101] Cornelius Pope, who lived in Allensworth and attended school there as a child, remembered that his teacher Alworth Hall "welcomed [him] to the Allensworth School and with open arms and asked, 'Learn something for me today.'"[102] When Pope left Allensworth, he said, "it didn't take me long to find out that I was equal to the very best. I was just as powerful, could think just as good, there was nothing inferior about me. I was pretty hard to stop from there on in."[103]

Despite Allensworth's success, it was never truly independent; it had to rely on the government and white-owned companies that controlled the water, the railroad, and job markets.[104] In testimony to the Task Force, Terrance Dean argues that water, land, and railroad companies discriminated against the town, leading to its demise.[105] The Pacific Farming Company, after first selling land plots to the African American settlers at inflated prices, then prohibited land sales to African Americans, which limited the town's growth.[106] Despite its promises, the Pacific Water Company built only four water wells for Allensworth, compared to the 10 wells it built in a neighboring white town.[107] The water dried up within two years and was contaminated with alkaline at first, then arsenic in 1967.[108] The founders maintained that the settlers were victims of a racist scam and were sold land that would never have enough water.[109]

When it was founded, Allensworth was on the Santa Fe railroad's main line, which allowed the town to derive revenue from the rail stop.[110] In 1914, the rail line was diverted away from Allensworth.[111] Not being able to earn revenue from the railroad stop or farming alone, residents worked multiple jobs in the surrounding, discriminatory white communities.[112] Young people left the town to find jobs elsewhere, and Allensworth slowly died and disappeared as economic opportunities decreased and the water calcified.[113] It was established as a state park in 1974, but remained critically underfunded and unbuilt until the 2000s.[114]

VII. City Planning for Segregation

Nationally

Anti-Black Zoning Ordinances

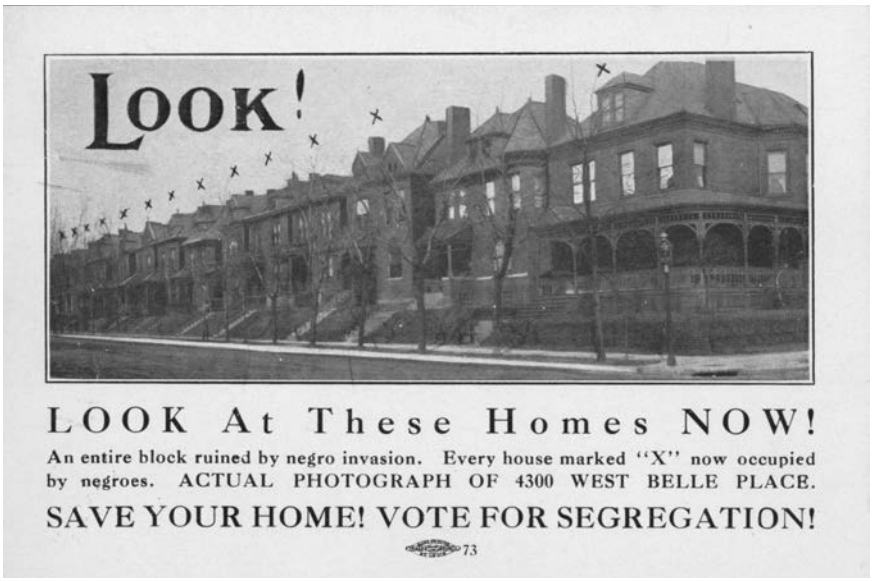
From the Civil War into the 1960s, as local governments planned the layout of their cities, they used planning regulations called zoning ordinances to prevent African Americans from living in certain neighborhoods.[115] First, city officials in southern cities in the early 1900s passed African American and white zoning ordinances to ban African Americans from living in white neighborhoods.[116] When the U.S. Supreme Court found that these explicitly race-based zoning ordinances violated the federal Constitution in 1917, city officials used other zoning ordinances as proxies for race in order to maintain all-white neighborhoods.[117]

From the 1860s to 1900s, when African Americans first left the rural South for the urban South, racial violence escalated, leading to a number of large scale race violence and massacres across the South.[118] Soon after, anti-Black zoning ordinances were enacted in the South and nearby cities..[119] In 1910, Baltimore enacted the city's anti-Black zoning ordinance, making it illegal for African American people to move to blocks that were more than half white, and vice versa.[120] Edgar Allan Poe, Baltimore's city attorney and grandnephew of the famous poet, declared that the zoning was constitutional, and the city's mayor stated, "Blacks should be quarantined in isolated slums in order to reduce the incidents of civil disturbance, to prevent the spread of communicable disease into the nearby White neighborhoods, and to protect property values among the White majority."[121]

Numerous other southern cities followed Baltimore's example, including Winston-Salem, Atlanta, Oklahoma City, Miami, Birmingham, Dade County (Miami), Charleston, Dallas, Louisville, New Orleans, Richmond, and St. Louis.[122] Although only about 10 percent of African Americans lived in the North at this time, anti-Black ordinances were popular nationwide.[123] In 1915, the New Republic argued for residential racial segregation until "Negroes ceased wanting to 'amalgamate' with whites..."[124]

Although the U.S. Supreme Court declared racial zoning ordinances unconstitutional in 1917, states and cities ignored the decision for years.[125] In 1927, Texas passed a law authorizing cities to pass ordinances segregating African Americans and whites.[126] Other cities, like Atlanta, Austin, Kansas City, and Norfolk, made discriminatory zoning decisions based on official city planning maps that explicitly labeled neighborhoods African American, until as late as 1987.[127]

COURTESY OF HISTORY MUSEUM OF MISSOURI



Leaflet distributed in St. Louis Missouri advocating residents to vote for more stringent racial voting laws. Those homes marked with an "x" represent where Black families lived. (1916)

Company Towns

Beginning in the late 18th century, large corporations planned and built entire towns for their workers and attracted them with benefits including housing and mortgages.[128] When companies began hiring African Americans after the Great Migration, these companies typically offered African American workers housing that was lower in quality.[129]

In company towns like Gary, Indiana and Sparrows Point in Baltimore County, Maryland, the best housing and jobs were reserved for American-born white managers.[130] The worst jobs and the smallest, shabbiest housing went to African Americans.[131] In Sparrows Point, Maryland, the site of Bethlehem Steel, African American residents were segregated from white residents.[132] Two room bungalows with outhouses originally constructed for African American workers, were given to white immigrants when there was a housing shortage.[133] African Americans workers were forced to rent bunks in shanties that were originally intended as temporary housing.[134]

Racialized Neighborhood Zoning

After the Supreme Court declared explicit racial zoning unconstitutional in 1917, city officials developed new strategies to segregate African American residents from white residents by neighborhood.

The federal government joined this effort. In 1933, President Franklin D. Roosevelt's appointment to the National Land Use Planning Committee, Alfred Bettman, explained that cities and states needed to establish planning commissions for zoning to "maintain the nation and the race."[135] These new zoning strategies included:

- City officials zoned neighborhoods for single family homes, without change for decades.[136] This prevented apartment complexes from being built, which effectively kept out African Americans who were less likely to afford single family homes.[137] Influential experts like Columbia Law School professor Ernst Freund stated that "the coming of colored people into a district" was the "more powerful" reason for the use of zoning, rather than the creation of single family neighborhoods.[138] The United States Supreme Court decided that this type of zoning law was constitutional in 1977.[139]

- City officials relaxed or did not enforce zoning laws against white residents, but strictly enforced them against African Americans and other people of color and effectively chased African Americans out of certain neighborhoods.[140]

- City officials zoned African American residential communities as commercial or industrial regardless of their residential character.[141] This created a vicious cycle. African American residential communities zoned as commercial or industrial attracted polluting industries and lowered property values.[142] White families would be less likely to move into the industrial zone, as white families generally had more money.[143] As a result, it became increasingly difficult to remove the commercial or industrial zoning for these African American residential communities.[144]

- City officials limited new buildings by banning or imposing large fees on new construction, apartment buildings, mobile homes, or factory-built houses,[145] a practice known as "snob zoning."[146] Cities also demanded development or architectural specifications.[147] These ordinances had the effect of keeping poor people, large families, older residents, single individuals, and people of color out of particular areas.[148]

- City officials used dead-end streets, highways, cemeteries, parks, industrial spaces, and rail lines to create boundaries between African American and white neighborhoods.[149] African American people were even prohibited from burying the dead in white cemeteries[150] and from using parks.[151]

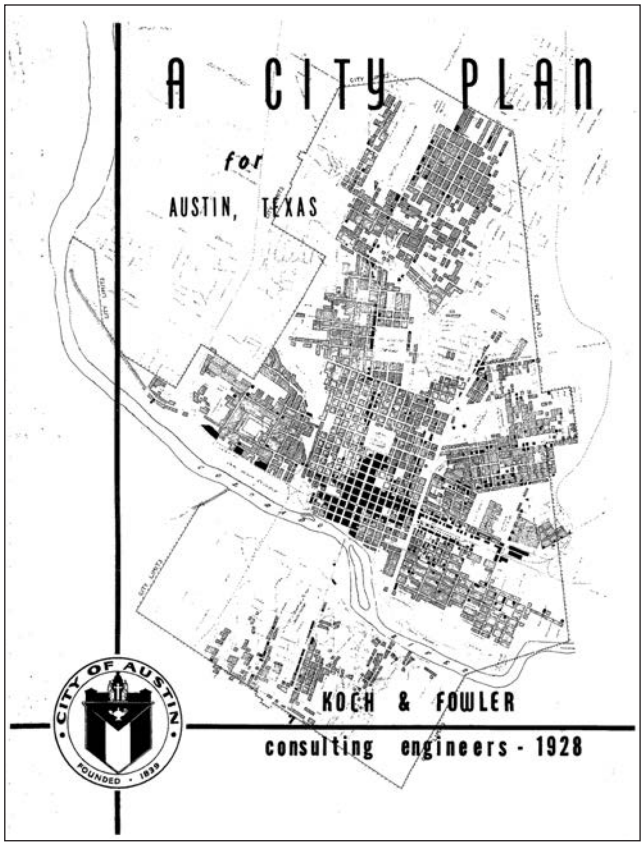
These strategies were often used in combination to maintain the segregated nature of a neighborhood. For example, in the St. Louis metropolitan area where 18-year-old Michael Brown was shot in 2014, city officials used a planning map that listed the race of each building's occupants to zone African American neighborhoods and the land next to African American neighborhoods for industrial development in 1919.[152] The author of the city planning map explained that the goal was to prevent the movement into "finer residential districts . . . by colored people."[153] In order to navigate the racial hostility that this segregation caused, African Americans created their own maps, travel guides, and other publications.[154] For more information on this form of counter-mapping, see Chapter 11, An Unjust Legal System.

White neighborhoods were zoned as residential, and the single family homes in those neighborhoods used restrictive covenants, as discussed below, to prevent African American residents from moving in.[155] This ensured that the neighborhood stayed white.[156] The African American neighborhoods were zoned to permit polluting industry, liquor stores, and brothels, which were banned in white neighborhoods.[157] Later, the federal government cited the fact that African American neighborhoods were close to industry and vice as a risk to property values.[158] Based on the federal government's analysis, private banks refused mortgages to African Americans in a process called redlining.[159]

In 1928, the city of Austin, Texas, adopted a master plan to create a "negro district." The mechanism worked well. In 1930, Wheatsville, a racially mixed community in Austin founded by a formerly enslaved person, was 16 percent Black. In 1950, the Black population of Wheatsville was one percent.

School Siting Policy

City officials used the decision of where to build a school as a way to concentrate African Americans in poor neighborhoods with underfunded schools.[160] This strategy is referred to as a school siting policy.[161] Cities first banned African American families from sending their children to white schools, then moved the only school that African American students were allowed to attend into designated African American neighborhoods and did not pay to transport African American students who lived outside the African American neighborhoods.[162]



The adopted 1928 city plan of Austin, Texas created a "negro district" as "the nearest approach to the solution of the race segregation problem.

In 1928, the city of Austin, Texas, adopted a master plan to create a "negro district," in order to implement segregation, which the plan warned "cannot be solved legally under any zoning law known to us at present."[163] The mechanism worked well. In 1930, Wheatsville, a racially mixed community in Austin founded by a formerly enslaved person, was 16 percent African American.[164] In 1950, the African American population of Wheatsville was one percent.[165]

After city officials segregated Austin, the "negro district"[166] on the east side had more unpaved streets, broken sewers, and fewer public transportation.[167] The city did not enforce the residential zoning ordinances, so the neighborhood became increasingly industrial.[168]

City officials in Atlanta used segregation maps to guide the school board's decisions on which schools to close and where to build new schools.[169]

California

Some scholars have argued that the first known attempt by an American city to segregate on the basis of race was in 1890, when the San Francisco Board of Supervisors voted unanimously to move all Chinese people within San Francisco to a neighborhood set apart for Chinese residents and businesses.[170] As African Americans arrived in California during the Great Migration, California used segregation to reinforce the racial hierarchy created by slavery.

Northern California

In 1953, when the Ford Motor Company moved its plant to Milpitas, California, and the labor union tried to build housing for its African American workers, the city rezoned the site for industrial use.[171] The city also adopted a zoning ordinance banning apartment buildings.[172] Anaheim, Costa Mesa, Orange, and Santa Ana zoned African American residential communities as industrial to maintain neighborhood segregation.[173]

In 1958, the Sequoia Union High School District built a high school in segregated East Palo Alto, further entrenching segregation in Palo Alto.[174]

Southern California

In California, the then-prosperous Los Angeles neighborhood of Sugar Hill is another example of the effects of racialized zoning. Prominent African Americans like Hattie McDaniel, the first African American to win an Oscar for her role as Mammy in Gone with the Wind, and Norman Houston, co-founder of what became the largest African American-owned insurance company in the West lived and singer Ethel Waters lived in the neighborhood.[175] Waters remembered the day she moved into her house: "During the day the moving men had brought my things, and when I saw that they had placed each chair and table exactly where I wanted, I burst into tears[.] 'My house,' I told myself. The only place I've ever owned all by myself ... I felt I was sitting on top of the world. I had a home at last."[176]

In 1945, the white neighborhood association sued to apply its restrictive covenant and evict the African American families living there.[177] When the white neighbors lost their lawsuit, the Los Angeles City Council stepped in and rezoned the neighborhood for rentals despite the protests of the affluent African American families living there.[178] In 1954, the city built the Interstate 10 Santa Monica Freeway through Sugar Hill and succeeded, finally, in destroying the African American community.[179]

When South Central Los Angeles became an African American community in the 1940s, it had a mix of industrial plants and residential homes.[180] The City of Los Angeles rezoned much of the neighborhood for commercial use.[181] A plant explosion killed five local residents, 15 white workers, and destroyed more than 100 homes.[182] When the pastor of an African American church protested the industrial zoning near his church, a city official replied, "Why don't you people buy a church somewhere else?"[183]

VIII. Eminent Domain

From the 1855 construction of iconic Central Park in New York City to urban renewal in the 1970s, America built parks, highways, and new economic developments that destroyed African American or integrated neighborhoods. Government officials used a legal concept called eminent domain to confiscate private land owned by African Americans for these public uses.[184] The U.S. constitution demands that the government pay the landowner "just compensation," which is usually fair market value, but often a disputed sum.[185]

These government decisions evicted African Americans from their homes and destroyed African American wealth.[186] It shuttered thriving businesses[187] and severed community ties.[188] Alfred Johnson, the executive director of the American Association of State Highway Officials and a lobbyist who worked on the 1956 Highway Act, put it this way: "Some city officials expressed the view in the mid-1950s that the urban Interstates would give them a good opportunity to get rid of the local niggertown."[189]

When South Central Los Angeles became a Black community in the 1940s, it had a mix of industrial plants and residential homes. The City of Los Angeles rezoned much of the neighborhood for commercial use. A plant explosion killed five local residents, 15 white workers, and destroyed more than 100 homes. When the pastor of a Black church protested the industrial zoning near his church, a city official replied, "Why don't you people buy a church somewhere else?"

Scholars disagree over whether federal, state, and local governments racially targeted African American neighborhoods for destruction, or whether these public works projects were situated in the area of least political resistance, which were incidentally African American neighborhoods.[190] Regardless of intention, the effect is clear: one study in 2007 found that between 1949 and 1973, 2,532 eminent domain projects in 992 cities displaced a million people, two-thirds of whom were African American.[191] African Americans made up only 12 percent of the American population at the time, and so they were five times more likely to be displaced than they should have been when considering their portion of the population.[192]

From 1949 to 1973, compared to white Americans, African Americans were

5x MORE LIKELY to be displaced by eminent domain

These government actions destroyed the social, political, cultural, and economic networks created by a neighborhood.[193] Evicted African American residents struggled to find a new place to live, as the compensation offered by the government was often not high enough to buy or rent in other parts of the city.[194] Evicted African American businesses lost their location and client base and were not usually compensated.[195] Urban renewal displaced cultural centers, and in certain industries like jazz venues, it threatened the entire industry.[196] Forced evictions also are associated with increased risk of stress-related diseases like depression and heart attack.[197]

Park Construction

The construction of parks in the United States has been used to harm African American people in many different ways. Parks have been used to destroy African American or integrated neighborhoods and act as a barrier between African American and white neighborhoods.[198] The residents of these destroyed integrated neighborhoods were then resettled into segregated neighborhoods.[199] African American neighborhoods themselves lacked green spaces, as discussed in Chapter 7, Racism in Environment and Infrastructure, leading to negative health effects. African Americans were often banned from public spaces, as discussed in Chapter 9, Control over Spiritual, Creative, and Cultural Life.

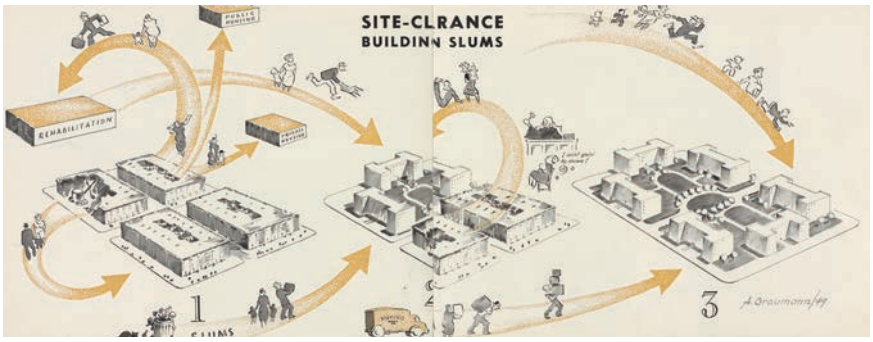
Central Park in Manhattan was one of the most prominent examples of racial segregation by park construction. Cities across the country copied Central Park's policies, regulations, and design.[200] In 1855, about 1,600 people lived in the area in mixed race neighborhoods called Seneca Village, Yorkville, and Pigtown.[201] Even though state law at the time prevented African American New Yorkers from owning land, more than half the African American households owned their homes in Seneca Village.[202] The community included two African American churches and one racially mixed Episcopal church, a cemetery, and an African American school.[203] City officials destroyed all of it by 1857 to build Central Park with an all-white, male workforce.[204]

In 1855, about 1,600 people lived in the area in mixed race neighborhoods called Seneca Village, Yorkville, and Pigtown. Even though state law at the time prevented Black New Yorkers from owning land, more than half the Black households owned their homes in Seneca Village. The community included two Black churches and one racially mixed Episcopal church, a cemetery, and a Black school. City officials destroyed all of it by 1857 to build Central Park with an all-white, male workforce.

In California, at least one current park is on the site of a formerly thriving African American neighborhood. On the land that is currently Belmar Park in Santa Monica, the City of Santa Monica took away and burned down the homes and businesses of people in the African American neighborhood of Belmar Triangle through eminent domain for the construction of the city's expanded civic center, auditorium, and the Los Angeles County Courthouse.[205] Now there is a park commemorating the neighborhood.[206]

The 1938 Underwriting Manual issued by the U.S. Federal Housing Administration (FHA) states: "A location close to a public park or area of similar nature is usually well protected from infiltration of business and lower social occupancy coming from that direction."[207]

COURTESY OF GENERAL RESEARCH DIVISION/THE NEW YORK PUBLIC LIBRARY



New York City Housing Authority. (January 1946- July 1949)

Slum Clearance

Throughout American history and across the country, government officials, who are often white (see discussion in Chapter 4, Political Disenfranchisement), labeled African American communities as slums, regardless of what the neighborhood was actually like.[208] This allowed government officials to demolish so-called "slums" to make way for commercial development, upscale residences, parks, universities, hospitals, and corporate headquarters.[209]

The federal government funded this strategy with the 1934 Housing Act,[210] and then again, comprehensively, with the 1949 Housing Act, which provided $13.5 billion for slum clearance and urban redevelopment between 1953 and 1986.[211] At the height of urban renewal in 1967, the government destroyed 404,000 housing units, but only built 41,580 as replacements.[212]

For example, in 1953 the Memphis Housing Authority declared that 46 acres of middle-class Black-owned single-family homes was a slum and replaced it with 900 units of public housing.[213] Homeowners had paid off their mortgages, improved their homes, and created a neighborhood; "[t]he home owners are sick and distressed beyond measure," pleaded one resident in a letter to city authorities.[214]

In another example, after African Americans rebuilt in Tulsa following the 1921 Tulsa massacre, city officials declared the Greenwood community to be a slum, and destroyed it again.[215] Highway construction and urban renewal also appear to have compounded the economic collapse of the Greenwood community.[216]

Freeway Construction

The Federal Aid Highway Act of 1956 built 41,000 miles of interstate highways and was the largest American public works program at the time.[217] By the 1960s, highway construction was destroying 37,000 urban housing units per year.[218] From 1956 until 1965, the federal government did not provide any assistance to people whose homes were destroyed.[219] During the first 20 years of interstate highway construction, more than a million people were displaced.[220]

In 2021, the U.S. Secretary of Transportation acknowledged there is "racism physically built into some of our highways" because the federal highway system was built specifically to cut through neighborhoods where property values were lowest.[221] In most cities, federal highways were routed through African American neighborhoods.[222] For example, between 1948 and 1956, 86,000 people were displaced in Chicago, 66 percent of whom were African American, even though at the time, African American people only made up approximately 20 percent of the city's population.[223]

In 1962, Detroit razed African American communities to build the Interstate 75 expressway, a plan that the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights warned in advance would displace 4,000 families, 87 percent of whom were African American.[224] U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development officials knew that they would destroy African American homes and did nothing to help these African American families.[225] The government did little to help these mostly African American families, businesses, churches, and schools.[226]

COURTESY OF ROY H. WILLIAMS/MEDIANEWS GROUP/OAKLAND TRIBUNE VIA GETTY IMAGES

Interstate 980 severed the predominantly Black neighborhoods of West Oakland from the rest of the city, setting the stage for underfunding of municipal projects in the area. Excavation site of Interstate 980. (1976)

The formerly-thriving African American neighborhood of Greenwood in Tulsa, Oklahoma—infamous for the deadly anti-Black massacre of 1921—is now divided by Interstate Highway 244.[227] Greenwood now has one block of businesses today.[228] Before the highway's construction, the neighborhood had 35 blocks of businesses and homes.[229] Whenever affirmative infrastructure of this sort is constructed in African American neighborhoods, the initial construction-related harms created are compounded by the environmental pollution that is created and generated on an ongoing basis.[230]

From 1956 until 1965, the federal government did not provide any assistance to people whose homes were destroyed. During the first 20 years of interstate highway construction, more than a million people were displaced.

Highway construction not only destroyed African American neighborhoods, government officials also used it to fence African Americans into certain neighborhoods.[231] A federal manual recommends that "[a] high-speed traffic artery or a wide street parkway may prevent the expansion of inharmonious uses to a location on the opposite side of the street."[232] The term "inharmonious racial or nationality groups" was used by the federal government to describe communities of color.[233]

In Chicago, 28 identical 16-story apartment buildings known as the Robert Taylor Homes were a national symbol of failed public housing and concentrated poverty.[234] The project housed 27,000 residents, nearly all of whom were African American.[235]

The City of Chicago used the Day Ryan expressway to cut off the Robert Taylor Homes from the surrounding neighborhoods.[236] Studies have shown that interstate highways also fenced in African American neighborhoods in Memphis, Richmond, Kansas City, Atlanta, Tulsa, and Charleston.[237]

California

In California, eminent domain was used against African American communities, as well as other communities of color. As in the rest of the country, California used park construction, slum clearance, and freeway construction to destroy African American communities.

On September 23 and 24, 2021, California residents Jonathan Burgess and Dawn Basciano testified before the Task Force that state officials built the Marshall Gold Discovery State Historic Park in Coloma, California on their family's land without just compensation.[238] They also testified that the California Department of Parks and Recreation has not appropriately commemorated the history of the African American families who owned the land.[239]

In Southern California, the city of Manhattan Beach destroyed a racially integrated beach front neighborhood.[240] Willa Bruce, who was Black, had purchased the beach front property in 1912 to run a lodge, café, and dance hall.[241] White people in the area tried to push her out by slashing her tires, setting fire to a mattress under her deck, and posting "No Trespassing" signs and fake parking restrictions to chase away Black customers.[242]

In 1924, Manhattan Beach city officials confiscated the beach front property of several African American and white families, including the Bruces, citing an urgent need for a public park.[243] The Bruces sued for $120,000 and received $14,500.[244] The other families, African American and white, received between $1,200 and $4,200 per lot.[245] According the Bruce family lawyer, the city did not pay for years and barred them from purchasing new land in the area, forcing the Bruces to leave without any income.[246]

The land lay vacant for decades until a park was built in the 1950s.[247] The family moved to South Los Angeles and eventually left California.[248] Having lost their property, Willa and her husband Charles worked for other business owners for the remainder of their lives.[249] Estimates of the fair market value today of the Bruce family land is in the millions.[250] In the fall of 2021, the state of California authorized Los Angeles County to transfer the land back to the Bruce family after nearly 100 years.[251]

African Americans were pushed out of other beach cities, as described by Dr. Alison Rose Jefferson to the Task Force on December 8, 2021.[252] Initially, Santa Monica was not only home to a African American community; it was also a tourist destination for African Americans throughout the Los Angeles area.[253] But, in 1922, an African American investment group was blocked from developing a resort and amusement facility along the oceanfront.[254] After the African American investors could not build the facility, white developers purchased the land and constructed the Casa del Mar and the Edgewater clubs in the area.[255] African American investors were also unable to build a planned African American membership-based club in Santa Monica in 1958 because the city took over the land through eminent domain proceedings for a purported parking lot.[256] These investors asserted racial discrimination and attempted to stop the cities proceedings in court but lost.[257] Now, the upscale Viceroy hotel is located at the site.[258]

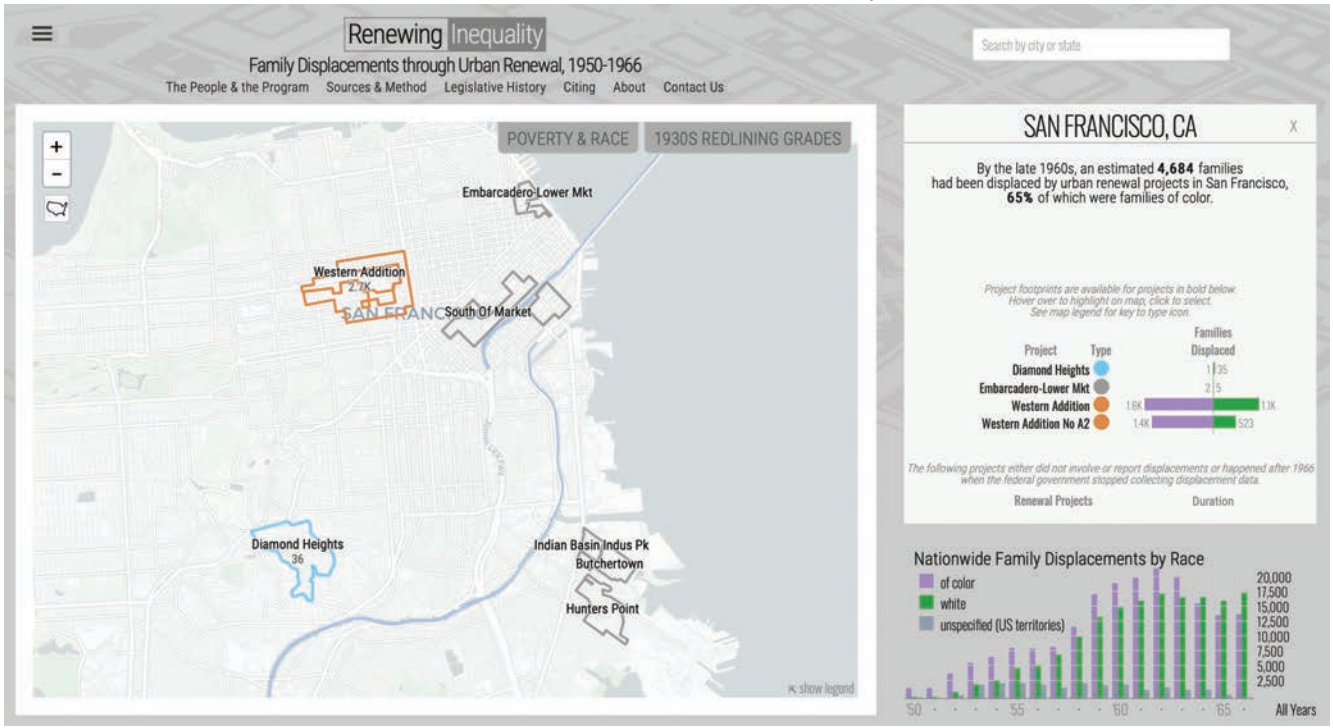
In 1945, California passed the Community Redevelopment Act, which allowed for the redevelopment of "blighted areas" in urban and suburban communities.[259] The law defined a "blighted area" as a social or economic liability that needed redevelopment for the "health, safety, and general welfare" of the communities in which they existed.[260] An area was deemed "blighted" if one of the following conditions was present:[261]

- Areas with buildings that had "faulty interior arrangement and exterior spacing," or housed a "high density population," leading to overcrowding and infectious disease outbreaks;[262]
- Areas with buildings that had "inadequate provision for ventilation, light, [or] sanitation, open spaces and recreation facilities" or dilapidation;[263]
- Areas with economic deterioration or underuse of valuable land;[264]
- Areas with "depreciated values" that could generate more tax revenue to fund public services for the residents;[265] and
- Areas that were "beyond remedy" and contributed "substantially" to problems of crime.[266]

Each of these conditions described the harms of residential segregation. As discussed above, buildings in African American neighborhoods are generally more likely to be overcrowded and are in poorer condition. As discussed in Chapter 7, Racism in Environment and Infrastructure, the effects of redlining made land in African American

City agencies declared that the Western Addition was blighted in 1948 and began tearing it down in 1956. The plan was one of the largest projects of urban renewal on the West Coast. The City of San Francisco closed 883 business, displaced 4,729 households, destroyed 2,500 Victorian homes and damaged the lives of nearly 20,000 people.

COURTESY OF UNIVERSITY OF RICHMOND DIGITAL SCHOLARSHIP LAB DIGITAL SCHOLARSHIP LAB, "RENEWING INEQUALITY," AMERICAN PANORAMA, ED. ROBERT K. NELSON AND EDWARD L. AYERS



Map of San Francisco depicting where family displacement occurs due to urban renewal. (Accessed April 2022)

neighborhoods less valuable than they actually were and local governments intentionally slowed and deprived these communities of services. Redlining concentrated poverty and crime into African American neighborhoods and implicit biases based in racist beliefs created during enslavement have, to this day, led the American public to associate African Americans with crime, and contribute to the over- and under-policing of African American communities.

In Northern California, this law was used to demolish the Fillmore, which was San Francisco's most prominent African American neighborhood and business district.[267] Known as the Harlem of the West, the Fillmore was an integrated neighborhood[268] that was famous for its jazz venues that hosted Ella Fitzgerald, Billie Holiday, Charles Mingus, and Louis Armstrong.[269]

City agencies declared that the Western Addition was blighted in 1948 and began tearing it down in 1956.[270] The plan was one of the largest projects of urban renewal on the West Coast.[271] The City of San Francisco closed 883 business, displaced 4,729 households, destroyed 2,500 Victorian homes[272] and damaged the lives of nearly 20,000 people.[273] "The agency would go to a house and give the head of household a certificate that said they would be given preference in housing built in the future," Benjamin Ibarra, a spokesman for the agency, said in 2008. "But there wasn't a lot of housing built for a long time."[274] The San Francisco city government left the land empty for many years.[275]

Another example of a predominantly African American community in Northern California that urban redevelopment destroyed is Russell City. Founded in 1853 along the Hayward shoreline in Alameda County, Danish immigrants initially lived in Russell City.[276] By World War II, Russell City became primarily African American and Latino.[277]

"We were left to fend for ourselves. We had no public sewer system, so you saw many homes with outhouses, we had wells with no running water, the electrical grid was so unstable that many times we were in the dark," said former Russell City resident Marian "Edie" Eddens, who stated that living in Russell City was "the major challenge of [her] life."[278]

While Russell City lacked basic infrastructure and was economically poor, it was a culturally rich community.[279] "Music and literature were my saving graces," recalled Gloria Bratton Sanders Moore, former resident of Russell City.[280] Blues legends like Ray Charles and Etta James were known to perform at Russell City clubs when touring the west coast.[281]

By the 1950s, Russell City was declared a "blight" by neighboring Hayward officials.[282] In 1963, the local governments of the City of Hayward and Alameda County forcibly relocated all Russell City residents, bulldozed the community, and rezoned the land for industrial use.[283] Descendants of Russell City residents claim that displaced homeowners were forced to sell their land without fair compensation.[284]

In 2021, the Hayward City Council passed a resolution formally apologizing to former Russell City residents for its participation in racially discriminatory housing practices such as racial steering and redlining.[285]

In Southern California, in 1950, the Los Angeles City Planning Commission planned to demolish 11 blighted areas; all but one were majority Mexican American or African American neighborhoods.[286]

Many of California's freeways were routed through African American neighborhoods. As noted above, the City of Los Angeles destroyed the prosperous African American neighborhood of Sugar Hill in 1954 by building the Interstate 10 freeway.[287] Former residents said that the amount that the government paid for their homes was inadequate, and below market value.[288] Los Angeles did it again in 1968 by building the Century Freeway through the African American neighborhoods of Watts and Willowbrook, displacing 3,550 families, 117 businesses, parks, schools, and churches.[289]

The Interstate 210 freeway destroyed an African American business district and racially diverse communities in Pasadena in the 1950s.[290] The city offered residents $75,000 for their homes, less than the minimum cost of purchasing a new home in Pasadena.[291] The freeway forced 4,000 African American and Mexican American residents to move back to inner-city Los Angeles.[292]

In Oakland, a total of 503 homes, 22 businesses, four churches, and 155 trees were demolished to construct Interstate 980.[293] Once completed in 1985, the highway severed the predominantly African American neighborhoods of West Oakland from the rest of the city, setting the stage for underfunding of municipal projects in the area.[294]

In Fresno, the construction of highways 41 and 99 destroyed blocks of homes where African American families lived.[295] In San Diego, much like in other parts of the state, the construction of freeways such as Interstate 5 disrupted African American communities.[296]

IX. Public Housing

The construction of government funded housing, or public housing, has contributed to housing segregation in two major ways throughout American history. First, from World War I until the 1950s, the federal government built high quality housing.[297] Generally, federal practices did not allow African Americans to live in these high quality buildings, often building separate, low quality units for African Americans.[298]

Then, from 1950s, as the federal government subsidized mortgages for white families to move to the suburbs and paid local governments to demolish racially integrated neighborhoods, it also built high-rise apartment buildings in urban neighborhoods that were cut off from the richer, white suburbs.[299] These high-rise public housing projects concentrated poverty in African American neighborhoods in the inner city.[300]

In 1937, the federal government revised its strategy and created the U.S. Housing Authority (USHA), which gave federal money to local governments to build public housing. Although the USHA manual stated that government housing projects should not segregate what were previously integrated neighborhoods, it also warned local officials not to build housing for white families "in areas now occupied by Negroes."

High Quality Public Housing for White Americans

Private real estate development stalled during the Great Depression due to the lack of available credit.[301] During the world wars, all available raw materials were directed towards military use and private housing construction was banned.[302] By the end of World War II, these conditions created severe housing shortages for all Americans, regardless of race.[303] In response, the federal government built low-rise buildings for middle-class Americans that were scattered throughout the city, but did not subsidize the rent or maintenance.[304] Instead, tenants paid full market price and for the building's maintenance, so the quality of public housing was high.[305] Federal agencies funded public housing, which either barred African Americans, or the housing available to African Americans was segregated and in worse condition.[306]

During World War I, the federal government-built housing for white workers in the war industries: 170,000 white workers and their families lived in 83 government-built housing projects across 26 states.[307] The federal government did not allow African American workers to live in this federally built housing and forced African American workers into overpopulated slums.[308] In 1933, the federal government created the Public Works Administration (PWA), which cleared slums and built houses using its "neighborhood composition rule" to require federal housing projects to maintain the racial make-up of the neighborhood.[309]

All across the country, in cities like Detroit, Indianapolis, Toledo, New York, Birmingham, and Miami, the PWA segregated African American residents from white residents either by project or by concentrating African Americans into high density, low-income neighborhoods.[310] Another federal agency, the Tennessee Valley Authority, built 500 comfortable houses and leased them to its employees and construction workers.[311] The federal government banned African American federal workers from the houses who lived in low quality barracks instead.[312]

In 1984, investigative reporters found that 10 million federally funded public housing residents in 47 states were almost always segregated by race and that every housing project where the residents were mostly white was better maintained, and had decent facilities, amenities, and services.

In 1937, the federal government revised its strategy and created the U.S. Housing Authority (USHA), which gave federal money to local governments to build public housing.[313] Although the USHA manual stated that government housing projects should not segregate what were previously integrated neighborhoods, it also warned local officials not to build housing for white families "in areas now occupied by Negroes."[314]

During World War II, the federal government-built housing for white workers in the defense industry.[315] African American workers were either left to live in slums or in lower quality segregated housing.[316]

Low Quality Housing for African Americans

Beginning in the 1950s, the government began subsidizing the rent in public housing and allowed only families making less than a certain amount to live in the buildings.[317] The buildings collected lower maintenance fees as a result and the quality of public housing deteriorated.[318] The federal government helped white families move out of the city and purchase single family homes in the suburbs by subsidizing their mortgage.[319] African American families were prevented from moving into the suburbs due to the racist federal housing policies and restrictive covenants, discussed in the section of this chapter on redlining[320] and racially restrictive covenants.[321]

The federal government began funding enormous, segregated high rise projects, like the Robert Taylor Homes in Chicago;[322] at the same time, a dozen states, including California, required local city approval of public housing projects.[323] In 1971, the Supreme Court ruled that this approval process did not violate the federal constitution,[324] so middle-class white communities rejected public housing projects.[325]

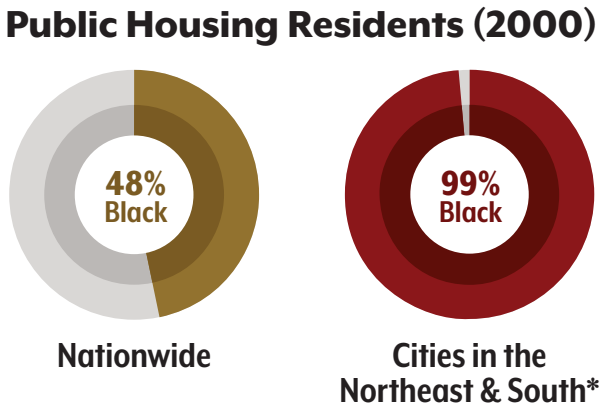
By 1973, President Richard Nixon announced that public housing projects were "monstrous, depressing places—rundown, overcrowded, crime-ridden."[326] In 1984, investigative reporters from the Dallas Morning News visited federally-funded developments in 47 metropolitan areas.[327] The reporters found that 10 million public housing residents were almost always segregated by race and that every housing project where the residents were mostly white was better maintained, and had decent facilities, amenities, and services.[328]

Although the Supreme Court of the United States decided in Brown v. Board of Education in 1954 that segregation was unconstitutional, Berchmans Fitzpatrick, general counsel of the federal housing agency at the time, responded to the decision by saying that the decision did not apply to housing.[329] Civil rights activists tried to bring suits against government segregation in public housing and the federal government announced anti-discrimination policies in name only. In practice, it continued to segregate.[330]

President John F. Kennedy tried to prohibit discrimination in housing by issuing Executive Order 11063, but the order only covered less than three percent of the total housing available in the United States.[331] Finally, the federal government, outlawed housing discrimination in 1964 with the passage of the Civil Rights Act, which was re-enforced by the Fair Housing Act in 1968.[332]

The Civil Rights Act and the Fair Housing Act did not change the reality on the ground, as civil rights advocates continued to file lawsuits over decades alleging that city housing authorities continued to discriminate in cities like Dallas, San Francisco, Yonkers, and

Baltimore.[333] In opinion after opinion, federal courts recognized that federal and local government created or maintained segregation.[334]



Following the recession of the 1990s, the government began to demolish these impoverished high rise public housing projects as part of multimillion dollar redevelopment efforts, often specifically choosing projects where Black families lived.[335] In 2000, 48 percent of public housing residents were Black nationwide, but in cities like Birmingham, Detroit, Memphis, New Orleans, and Washington D.C., 99 percent of public housing residents were Black.[336] Cities where housing prices have risen the fastest have been the most aggressive in tearing down public housing.[337]

These redevelopments have resulted in mostly white, but sometimes African American middle-class residents moving into and displacing low-income African American neighborhoods.[338] These government funded public housing demolitions not only displace the African American residents in the demolished buildings, but they speed up the gentrification of the surrounding neighborhood, and displace more African American residents.[339] Although scholars are unsure if these government demolitions cause the neighborhood to gentrify, research has shown that they are an important factor in the neighborhood's continued gentrification.[340]

The redevelopments usually have fewer units of public housing, so residents generally move to other low-income neighborhoods.[341] This approach has produced mixed results.[342] Although former residents report that they are more satisfied with the quality of their new housing and the reduction in crime, their children continue to attend racially and economically segregated schools, and their health and financial self-sufficiency reportedly did not improve.[343]

California

Segregation in California of African Americans intensified during World War II when African Americans arrived to work in the war industries. Unlike on the East Coast and in the Midwest, in California, because the African American population in California had been so small, there were no preset housing segregation patterns: Federal and local governments created segregation from a blank slate.[344]

Carey McWilliams, who had been California's housing commissioner in the early years of World War II, later wrote that "the federal government [had] in effect been planting the seeds of Jim Crow practices throughout the region under the guise of 'respecting local attitudes.'"[345]

In Northern California, one of the largest shipbuilders in the country during World War II was located in Richmond.[346] From 1940 to 1945, Richmond's population increased from 24,000 to 100,000 with defense industry workers.[347] Richmond's African American population increased from 270 in 1940 to 14,000 in 1945.[348]

As with the rest of the country, the federal government paid for segregated housing to be built for defense workers during World War II.[349] Housing available only to white workers was more likely to be better constructed, permanent, and further inland.[350] The federal government issued low interest loans for white homeowners to remodel and subdivide their houses, and leased spare rooms for white workers to move in as tenants.[351]

While white workers lived in rooms paid for by the federal government, Black war workers lived in cardboard shacks, barns, tents, or open fields. By 1947, half of the 26,000 Black residents of Richmond were living in temporary housing.

African American housing was close to the shipbuilding site, badly constructed, and there simply was not enough of it.[352] While white workers lived in rooms paid for by the federal government, African American war workers lived in cardboard shacks, barns, tents, or open fields.[353] By 1947, half of the 26,000 African American residents of Richmond were living in temporary housing.[354]

The federal government then helped white families finance suburban homes and leave temporary apartments near the shipyard.[355] For example, the federal government contracted with a private developer to build a new suburb called Rollingwood and forbade the developer from selling any of Rollingwood's 700 houses to African Americans.[356] In 1952, Wilbur Gary, an African American war veteran bought a house in Rollingwood, angering his white neighbors.[357] Three hundred white residents gathered in front of his house, shouted racial slurs, threw a brick through the window, and burned a cross on his front lawn.[358]

Some African American workers bought land in unincorporated North Richmond, but could not get construction loans because unlike for white Americans, the federal government refused to insure bank loans for African Americans.[359] Other African American families moved into the housing projects that white families had left behind.[360] By 1950, more than three-quarters of Richmond's African American population lived in the housing projects built during the war.[361]

In 1942, the United States Navy demanded that the San Francisco Housing Authority segregate housing built for the 14,000 workers and their families at the Hunters Point Naval Shipyard.[362] The San Francisco Housing Authority announced in 1942: "In the selection of tenants . . . [we shall] not insofar as possible enforce the commingling of races, but shall insofar as possible maintain and preserve the same racial composition which exists in the neighborhood where a project is located."[363]

San Francisco built five other segregated projects during World War II, four for whites only.[364] Apartments earmarked for white workers only sat empty as African American workers waited on long waiting lists.[365]

One of the few integrated neighborhoods where African Americans could live was the Western Addition,[366] which was torn down later as part of urban renewal, discussed above in the section on condemnation and eminent domain. When the federal government sent Japanese Americans living in the Western Addition to American concentration internment camps, African Americans moved in.[367]

In 1952, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People sued the San Francisco Housing Authority for continuing to build whites only housing.[368] The head of the agency testified that the city agency's intent was to "localize occupancy of Negroes" in the Western Addition and ensure that no African Americans would reside in projects inhabited by whites.[369] The NAACP won its legal case, but the city agency continued to build segregated housing in San Francisco.[370]

In some areas in California, the demolition of public housing occurred without replacement housing for displaced African Americans. For example, in Richmond, the city prioritized developments primarily occupied by African American families in its demolition plans.[371] The city abandoned plans to build over 4,000 permanent public housing units.[372] The demolition displaced 700 African American families from their homes in 1952 and only 16 percent of them could find a home in the private housing market.[373] By 1960, thousands of former public housing residents lost their homes.[374]

X. Redlining

Redlining refers to a federal and local governmental practice, acting together with private banks, to systematically deny home loans to African American people.[375] Redlining was accomplished at the federal level with three agencies: Federal Housing Administration, Veterans Administration (VA), and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation (HOLC).[376] The FHA helped new homeowners buy houses,[377] the VA helped veterans (World War II and others),[378] and HOLC helped prevent foreclosures as a result of the Great Depression for existing homeowners.[379]

These three federal agencies helped millions of mostly white Americans buy houses by insuring and subsidizing mortgages, while refusing the same opportunity to African Americans.[380] Or, in the words of the federal agencies, exclusion was directed at "inharmonious racial group or nationality groups."[381]

With a federally insured mortgage, the federal government protects lenders, like banks, against losing money. If the homeowner stops paying their mortgage,

African Americans received

2% of federal home loans between 1934 and 1962

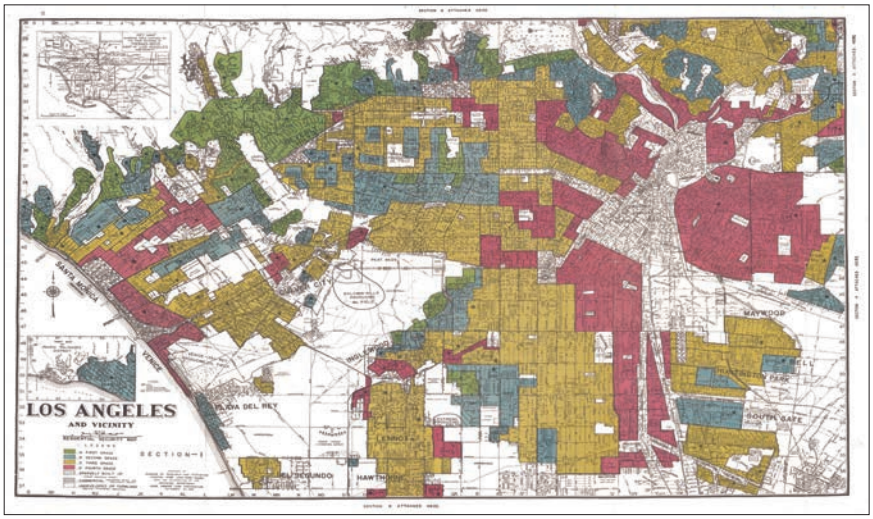
COURTESY OF DIGITAL SCHOLARSHIP LAB UNIVERSITY OF RICHMOND



A Homeowner's Loan Corporation map of Los Angeles detailing A, B, C and D grade areas of the city. An "A" rating, shaded in green, was for the best neighborhoods that were new and all white. A "D" rating, shaded in red, was the worst category, and reserved for all-Black neighborhoods, even if it was middle class. This process was called "redlining." (1939) the federal government would step in and pay the bank the amount of the unpaid principal in the loan.[382] As a result, banks were far more willing and likely to issue an insured mortgage to a white applicant, than an uninsured mortgage to an African American applicant.[383]

Enriched with these mortgages, white Americans moved out of America's city centers, taking with them their middle-class tax bases into the suburbs and leaving urban poverty in its wake.[384] Unable to access the same mortgages to reach the suburbs, African Americans remained in the impoverished urban centers.[385]

This practice continued legally until 1962, when President John F. Kennedy issued an executive order prohibiting the use of federal funds to support racial discrimination in newly constructed housing.[386] Between 1934 and 1962, the federal government had issued $120 billion in home loans, 98 percent of which went to white people.[387]

Although redlining is no longer legal, its effects appear to endure. One study has found associations between historically redlined neighborhoods, air pollution and cancer, asthma, poor mental health, and people without health insurance.[388] The same study also found that residents in certain historically redlined areas were close to twice as likely to have poor health when compared to areas that did not have redlining.[389]

Home Owners' Loan Corporation

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation refinanced tens of thousands of mortgages in danger of default or foreclosure and issued low-interest loans to help homeowners recover homes that were already foreclosed.[390] Between July 1933 and June 1935, HOLC used $3 billion to finance more than a million mortgages.[391]

HOLC examiners assessed real estate values and mortgage lending risks for 239 midsized cities between 1939 and 1945, and developed "Residential Security Maps" for the entire country.[392]

These maps rated neighborhoods from "A," for the best neighborhoods, to "D," the worst neighborhoods.[393] Grade "A" was shaded in green on the maps and assigned to blocks in neighborhoods that were new and all white.[394] HOLC assigned Grade "B," shaded in blue, to stable, outlying, Jewish and white working-class neighborhoods.[395] Grade "C" was for inner-city neighborhoods bordering mostly African American communities or neighborhoods that already had a small African American population and shaded yellow.[396] Grade "D" was the worst category, and reserved for all-Black neighborhoods, even if it was middle class, and shaded in red.[397] This process was called "redlining."[398]

Historians debate the level of direct influence these maps had on how banks made their decisions,[399] but generally agree that redlining resulted in the devaluation of African American homes across the entire country, making it difficult for African Americans to buy, build, or renovate their homes.[400]

Along with the 1939 Federal Housing Administration Underwriting manual, the HOLC Residential Security Maps cemented the federal government's support of the routine real estate industry practice of devaluing real estate owned by nonwhite property owners,[401] a practice that continues to this day.[402]

Californian homeowner Paul Austin testified during the October 13, 2021 Task Force meeting that a home appraiser valued the property of he and his wife at just below $1 million, which was much less than they expected because of significant improvements they had made to their home. They asked a friend to pretend to be his wife, removed anything in their house that would indicate their race, and hired a different appraiser. The new appraiser valued the property at just less than $1.5 million, which was nearly half a million more than the previous estimate. Austin also testified his grandparents migrated from the South to the Marin City area during the 1940s to work in the shipyards, but were trapped in that area because of redlining. He also testified that his paternal grandparents secretly purchased land and built a home in Mill Valley because African Americans were not allowed to buy property in the area.

The 1947 and 1958 versions of the FHA underwriting manual did not directly mention race, but instructed mortgage lenders to consider "physical and social attractiveness[]" and whether the families living in the neighborhoods were "congenial" when evaluating the credit risk. State-regulated insurance companies, like the Equitable Life Insurance Company and the Prudential Life Insurance Company, also declared that their policy was to not issue mortgages to whites in integrated neighborhoods.

Federal Housing Administration and Veterans Administration

Congress created the Federal Housing Administration in 1934 to insure bank mortgages for first time homeowners.[403] Where the Home Owners' Loan Corporation reinforced segregation by creating the Residential Security Maps, the FHA issued the FHA Underwriting Manual.[404] The 1936 Manual warned of the increased risk that a homeowner would not pay their mortgage in a neighborhood with "inharmonious racial groups."[405]

The 1947 and 1958 versions of the FHA underwriting manual did not directly mention race, but instructed mortgage lenders to consider "physical and social attractiveness[]" and whether the families living in the neighborhoods were "congenial" when evaluating the credit risk.[406] State-regulated insurance companies, like the Equitable Life Insurance Company and the Prudential Life Insurance Company, also declared that their policy was to not issue mortgages to whites in integrated neighborhoods.[407]

Because the FHA refused to insure mortgages for African Americans, banks shouldered additional risk if they loaned to African American families rather than white families, so they essentially did not do so.[408] Between 1935 and 1950, the FHA administered 2,761,000 home mortgages and only about 50,000 were made available to nonwhite Americans.[409]

In addition to encouraging banks to discriminate against African Americans in the credit assessment process, author Richard Rothstein argues that the FHA made its biggest impact when it financed the development of entire suburbs.[410] When the FHA reviewed plans for suburban development projects it demanded that the real estate developer not sell houses to African Americans and sometimes withheld approval of the projects if African American families lived in nearby neighborhoods.[411] Once the real estate developer built the housing development to the federal government's specifications, including a prohibition on selling to African American families, qualified white buyers did not need to have their new house appraised for the federal government to guarantee their mortgages.[412] Without FHA or Veterans Administration financing, developers built inferior neighborhoods without community facilities like parks and playgrounds.[413]

Further discussion of the health impact of a lack of green space is discussed in Chapter 7 on the environment. Because African Americans could not access mortgages, many houses in these neighborhoods were rental properties instead. African American families were deprived of this opportunity to build wealth.[414] A 1967 study showed that out of 400,000 housing units in FHA-insured subdivisions, only 3.3 percent had been sold to African American families.[415]

After World War II, Congress passed the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, commonly known as the GI Bill, offering education, small business and unemployment benefits to military veterans. The GI Bill also authorized the VA to insure mortgages for veterans as the FHA did for civilians. It adopted FHA housing policies, and VA appraisers relied on the FHA's Underwriting Manual.[416] The VA guaranteed approximately five million

When the FHA reviewed plans for suburban development projects it demanded that the real estate developer not sell houses to African Americans and sometimes withheld approval of the projects if Black families lived in nearby neighborhoods.

mortgages nationally.[417] By 1950, the FHA and VA together were insuring half of all new mortgages nationwide.[418]

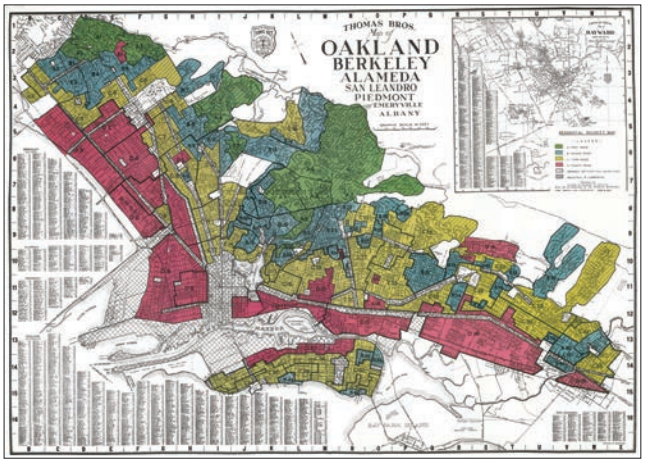
With Federal government approval, white veterans often did not need a down payment to buy a home.[419] Although the GI Bill itself did not contain "a single loophole for different treatment of white and [B]lack veterans[,]" reality was very different.[420] The approval of GI Bill benefits for each individual application was dependent in the South on the almost entirely white employees working at local VA centers, local banks, or public and private schools.[421] As an African American veteran in Texas wrote to the NAACP: "NO NEGRO VETERAN is eligible for a loan."[422] The VA refused to keep racial records.[423]

An Ebony survey of 13 cities in Mississippi showed that by mid-1947, only two of the 3,229 VA-guaranteed loans went to African American veterans.[424] In 1950, of the almost 70,000 VA mortgages issued in the New York-New Jersey area, "nonwhites" received less than 100.[425] Many African American World War II veterans never applied for GI Bill guaranteed mortgages because they knew that they would not be approved because of race.[426]

California

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation maps described many Californian neighborhoods in racially discriminatory terms. In Berkeley, the HOLC characterized an area north of the University of California, Berkeley "as High Yellow [C], but for infiltration of Orientals and gradual infiltration of Negroes from south to north."[427] In Pasadena: "This area is favorably located but is detrimentally affected by 10 owner occupant Negro families... Although the Negreos [sic] are said to be of the better class their presence has caused a wave of selling in the area and it seems inevitable that ownership and property values will drift to lower levels... The area is accorded a 'high red' solely on account of racial hazards. Otherwise a medial yellow grade would have been assigned."[428] In Oakland: "Detrimental Influences: Predominance of Negroes and Orientals. Also mixed classes of wage earners and colored professional people."[429] In San Diego: There were "servant's areas" of La Jolla and several areas "restricted to the Caucasian race."[430]

COURTESY OF DIGITAL SCHOLARSHIP LAB UNIVERSITY OF RICHMOND



A Homeowner's Loan Corporation redlining map of Oakland in 1937 detailing A, B, C and D grade areas of the city. (1937)

<1% of Federal Housing Administration loans went to Black people in Northern California from 1946 – 1960

Accordingly, many neighborhoods financed by the federal government were for white people only: Westlake in Daly City, south of San Francisco; Lakewood, south of Los Angeles; Westchester, south of Los Angeles and developed by Kaiser Community Homes; Panorama City, in the San Fernando Valley; and the "Sunkist Gardens" development in Southeast Los Angeles.[431]

In Milpitas, the Federal Housing Administration approved subdivision plans, and real estate developers built homes that African American workers could not buy due to the restrictions demanded by the FHA, so African American families were forced to move to a segregated neighborhood or live in nearby Richmond.[432] In Ladera, a neighborhood next to Stanford University, the FHA refused to finance the construction of a co-op suburb with African American members.[433] Without the government insuring its mortgages, the co-op could not find financing to build their homes, so they gave up, and the land was sold to a private developer.[434] Shortly after, the FHA approved the private developer's plans, which contained a guarantee that no homes would be sold to African American families.[435]

In Northern California, from 1946 to 1960, 350,000 new homes were built with support from the FHA, but fewer than 100 of these homes went to African American people.[436]

Not only did federal agencies refused to insure mortgages to African Americans, they also refused mortgages to white Americans who attempted to live alongside African Americans.

In 1954, a resident of the white only neighborhood of East Palo Alto sold his house to an African American family.[437] This sparked a phenomenon called blockbusting, in which local real estate agents exploited racial fears and manipulated white residents to sell their houses at a low price, then reselling the houses at a higher price to African American families.[438] As white residents fled the neighborhood, other white homeowners became desperate to sell their houses at even lower prices.[439]

A 1970 report concluded that the average markup African American families paid in blockbusted neighborhoods was 80 to 100 percent higher than neighborhoods not undergoing racial change.[440] In response to blockbusting in East Palo Alto, the California real estate commissioner stated that the commission did not regulate such "unethical practices."[441] FHA and Veterans Administration policies discouraged white residents from moving into neighborhoods in the process of being integrated like East Palo Alto at the time, since the government did not insure mortgages for white families in integrated neighborhoods where African American families lived.[442] Within six years, the population of East Palo Alto was 82 percent African American, and housing conditions had deteriorated markedly.[443]

The FHA advised the white homeowner that because he rented his house to a Black colleague, any future application from him "will be rejected on the basis of an Unsatisfactory Risk Determination made by this office on April 30, 1959."

In another example in 1958, an African American San Francisco schoolteacher named Alfred Simmons rented a house with a FHA-guaranteed mortgage from a fellow white schoolteacher in the Elmwood district of Berkeley.[444] The Berkeley police chief requested that the Federal Bureau of Investigation investigate how Mr. Simmons came to live in an all-white community, and the FBI referred the case to the U.S. Attorney.[445] The FHA advised the white homeowner that because he rented his house to an African American colleague, any future application from him "will be rejected on the basis of an Unsatisfactory Risk Determination made by this office on April 30, 1959."[446]

XI. Racially Restrictive Covenants

Racially restrictive covenants are legally binding contracts, usually written into the deed, that prohibit nonwhite people from living on a property or in a neighborhood.[447] For example, a deed in 2010, in Fairhaven, Massachusetts included the following clause, introduced in 1946: "The said land shall not be sold, leased or rented to any person other than of the Caucasian race or to any entity of which any person other than that of said race shall be a member, stockholder, officer or director."[448] By helping preserve segregation and a system of racial hierarchy, such covenants are yet another example of the enduring effects of slavery.

Between 1923 and 1924, real estate boards in Milwaukee, Detroit, Kansas City, Los Angeles, and other cities prohibited their realtors from selling or renting property in white neighborhoods to African Americans.

Racially restrictive covenants began appearing in the late nineteenth century and were first directed against Chinese and Punjabi residents in California.[449] By 1900, developers began inserting them into the deeds of homes built in new subdivisions all across the country.[450] Minneapolis, Minnesota had racially restrictive covenants as early as 1910 and late as 1955.[451] Further, between 1923 and 1924, real estate boards in Milwaukee, Detroit, Kansas City, Los Angeles, and other cities prohibited their realtors from selling or renting property in white neighborhoods to African Americans.[452]

In 1917, racial zoning, discussed earlier in this chapter, was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court,[453] but the Supreme Court declared that racially restrictive covenants did not violate the constitution in 1926.[454] The Supreme Court reasoned that the covenant was a contract between private individuals not subject to state control.[455]

Government officials began promoting racially restrictive covenants as an alternative, constitutional way to maintain segregation.[456] President Herbert Hoover opened the President's Conference on Home Building and Home Ownership by declaring that single-family homes were "expressions of racial longing" and "[t]hat our people should live in their own homes is a sentiment deep in the heart of our race."[457] Conference materials then recommended that all new neighborhoods include "appropriate restrictions," such as barring the sale of homes to African Americans.[458]

Federal officials also recommended homeowners form "'[r]estricted residential districts' [which] may serve as protection against persons with whom your family won't care to associate, provided the restrictions are enforced and are not merely temporary."[459] These racially restrictive districts appeared soon afterwards and functioned like bylaws in a neighborhood association and a neighbor could sue to evict an African American family that bought a house in the neighborhood.[460]

Scholars have found that wealthy white communities used restrictive covenants, while white working class communities used a combination of violence and covenants to keep African Americans from moving into their neighborhoods.[461]

Simultaneously, government actors and real estate agents often used different mechanisms to segregate a neighborhood. The 1936 Federal Housing Administration Underwriting Manual stated that zoning regulations alone are not enough "to assure a homogeneous and harmonious neighborhood.... Recorded deed restrictions should strengthen and supplement zoning ordinances... Recommended restrictions include . . . [p]rohibition of the occupancy of properties except by the race for which they are intended [and a]ppropriate provisions for enforcement."[462] The 1938 FHA Underwriting Manual stated clearly: "If a neighborhood is to retain stability, it is necessary that properties shall continue to be occupied by the same social and racial classes."[463] The Veterans Administration also recommended and frequently demanded that racial covenants be added into the deeds of the mortgages it sponsored.[464]

As a result, racially restrictive covenants appeared all over the country. By 1940, according to news reports quoted in the 1973 U.S. Commission on Civil Rights Report, 80 percent of homes in Chicago and Los Angeles contained restrictive covenants barring African American families.[465] A survey of 300 developments built between 1935 and 1947 in the suburbs of New York City found that 56 percent of the 300 developments and 85 percent of larger subdivisions had racially restrictive covenants.[466]

The University of Chicago subsidized the home owners' associations surrounding its campus. From 1933 to 1947, it spent $100,000 on legal services to defend racially restrictive covenants and evict African Americans who moved into the neighborhood.[467]

All over the country, white neighbors sued their African American neighbors to prevent them from moving into or to evict them from their legally purchased homes.[468] In 1942, the Oklahoma Supreme Court not only declared that the property purchased by an African American buyer was void due to a racial covenant, but it also ordered the African American buyer to pay for the court costs and attorney's fees of the white neighbor who sued.[469] In Westlake in Daly City, California, the total fine of $16,000 for selling to an African American family was greater than the typical home sale price.[470]

By 1940 80% of homes in Los Angeles contained restrictive covenants barring Black families

In 1948, the Supreme Court reversed course from its 1926 decision and held that although the government had no control over whether a racially restrictive covenant can be added to a deed, it is unconstitutional for American courts to recognize and enforce the covenants.[471]

Racially restrictive covenants were so widespread by then that three of the Supreme Court justices recused themselves from the case because they owned houses covered by racially restrictive covenants.[472]

Two weeks after the Court announced its decision, FHA commissioner Franklin D. Richards stated that the decision would "in no way affect the programs of this agency," which would make "no change in our basic concepts or procedures."[473] In 1952, the FHA commissioner stated that "it was not the purpose of [the FHA] to forbid segregation or to deny the benefits of the National Housing Act to persons who might be unwilling to disregard race, color, or creed in the selection of their purchasers or tenants."[474]

Although racially restrictive covenants were declared unconstitutional in 1948, their popularity continued for decades,[475] and racially homogenous neighborhoods continued after these covenants ceased to be enforced.[476] John F. Kennedy, Ronald Reagan, and George W. Bush all lived in neighborhoods or homes with racially restrictive covenants.[477] The home that George W. Bush bought in 2008 was located where the neighborhood association enforced a racially restrictive covenant until 2000.[478]

In Myers Park, a neighborhood in Charlotte, North Carolina, the housing association appeared to be enforcing its racially restrictive covenant in 2010, when it added the covenant to its website.[479]

California

Racially restrictive covenants and they were widely used throughout the state.[480] Like the rest of the country, although racially restrictive covenants were private contracts, they worked in conjunction with federal policy to devalue African American property and prevent African Americans from accessing home loans. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation maps for Pasadena devalued a neighborhood because its restrictive covenants had expired, potentially allowing African Americans to move in: "This district was originally much smaller but constant infiltration into other sections as deed restrictions expired has create[d] [sic] a real menace which is greatly concerning property owners of Pasadena and Altadena."[481]

In southern California, after its founding in 1903, the Los Angeles Realty Board campaigned to attach racially restrictive land covenants on as many new developments as possible.[482] Paul R. Williams, a prominent Black Los Angeles architect who designed houses for Frank Sinatra, Lucille Ball, Desi Arnaz, and Cary Grant, could not legally live in the neighborhoods he designed due to restrictive covenants.[483] Williams taught himself to draw upside down because his white clients were uncomfortable sitting next to him and toured construction sites with hands clasped behind his back to avoid the situation where someone would refuse to shake a Black man's hand.[484]

From 1937 to 1948, more than 100 lawsuits attempted to enforce covenants and evict African American families from their homes in Los Angeles.[485] In one 1947 case, an African American homeowner refused to leave the home he bought in violation of a covenant and he was jailed.[486] In Whittier, a Los Angeles suburb, the Quaker-affiliated Whittier College participated in a restrictive covenant applied to its neighborhood.[487]

John F. Kennedy, Ronald Reagan, and George W. Bush all lived in neighborhoods or homes with racially restrictive covenants. The home that George W. Bush bought in 2008 was located where the neighborhood association enforced a racially restrictive covenant until 2000.

In 1943, the city attorney of Culver City, an all-white suburb of Los Angeles, told a meeting of air raid wardens that when they went door to door to make sure families turned off the lights to avoid helping Japanese bombers find targets to also circulate documents in which homeowners promised not to sell or rent to African Americans.[488]

In 2021, AB 1466 was enacted to require county recorders to identify and redact racially restrictive covenants from California real estate records.[489]

XII. Racial Terrorism

Nationally

As discussed in Chapter 3, Racial Terror, white Americans used racial terror and vigilante violence to prevent African Americans from moving into white neighborhoods. The police often did not investigate or failed to arrest the perpetrators when crosses were burned on lawns, homes were bombed, and African American homeowners were murdered.[490]

California

Like elsewhere in the country, white Californians used violence to enforce the racial hierarchy created during slavery by preventing African Americans from moving into desirable white neighborhoods.[491] In fact, violent incidents in California rose in the 1950s and 1960s, after courts declared restrictive covenants unenforceable.[492]

COURTESY OF LOS ANGELES DAILY NEWS/UCLA LIBRARY DIGITAL COLLECTIONS

Los Angeles, CA., William Bailey and Roger Duncan look at the wreckage in Bailey's living room after a bomb exploded in the house. Duncan's house, directly across the street, was also bombed at the same time and a note was left threatening all the Black families on the street if they didn't move out. (1952)

Ku Klux Klan terror and violence reached a peak in the Los Angeles area in the spring of 1946.[493] Although KKK meetings were banned in California in May 1946 after the murder of the Short family who had been living in Fontana, California, as discussed in Chapter 3, Racial Terror, the ban had little to no effect because no one enforced it.[494] Of the 27 KKK actions (e.g., cross-burnings, fires, and threatening letters and phone calls) documented in Los Angeles in 1946, more than half occurred after the issuance of the ban.[495] In a span of two weeks in May 1946, there were four separate actions, ranging from cross-burnings to severe physical beatings.[496] One was targeted at an African American family that lived in an all-white neighborhood, and the others were targeted at other individuals who advocated against restrictive covenants.[497] Law enforcement and the mayor shrugged off the violence as "prank[s]."[498] When concerned residents and members of social justice organizations approached the mayor to address the incidents, the mayor accused them of prejudice against the KKK.[499]

Los Angeles continued to be the epicenter of the violence in California, as African American residents who moved into white neighborhoods were met with cross-burnings, bombings, rock throwing, graffiti, and other acts of violence.[500] Of the over 100 incidents of move-in bombings and vandalism that occurred in Los Angeles between 1950 and 1965, only one led to an arrest and prosecution.[501]

Los Angeles was not the only area where the KKK attacked African American homeowners. In 1946, for instance, a home built by an African American war veteran was burned down in Redwood City after threats and move-out demands.[502] In 1952, in a white Bay Area neighborhood, an African American family became the target of death threats, violence, and intimidation by white residents after the family refused a buyout of their home.[503] A KKK cross was placed on their lawn and a 300 to 400 person mob stoned their home and shouted threats.[504] Though the action happened in front of law enforcement, officers refused to make any arrests.[505] Even when the Governor, Attorney General, and local district attorney ordered the city police and county sheriff to provide the family with protection, protests and harassment continued for months without any arrests.[506] And in the 1950s, the weekend home of a San Francisco NAACP leader was mysteriously burned down.[507] The violence and subsequent silence surrounding the crimes committed against African American Californians demonstrates how white Californians viewed African American presence and homeownership as a threat to white dominance.[508]

XIII. Housing Segregation Today

Housing segregation and its effects have never been eliminated in the United States.[509] The racist housing policies and practices of the federal, state, and local governments have amplified private action and continue to shape the American landscape today.[510]

Although residential segregation between African Americans and white Americans in the United States peaked between 1960 and 1970,[511] America is about as segregated today for African Americans as it was in 1940.[512] By contrast, in 2010, the typical white person in a metropolitan region lived in a neighborhood that was 75 percent white.[513] Even though white areas have become less solidly white since 1980, they have not become significantly more African American.[514] Today, 90 percent of African Americans live in cities,[515] and 41 percent of the Black population of American metro areas live in city neighborhoods that are majority Black.[516]

Housing segregation is more intractable than other forms of segregation and discrimination.[517] Moving from an urban apartment to a suburban single family home is more difficult than registering to vote, eating at a restaurant, or even being bussed to a nearby school, and requires potentially generations of effort.[518] The Fair Housing Act of 1968 prohibited future discrimination, but did not fix the structures put in place by 100 years of discriminatory government policies.[519] Richard Rothstein argues that residential desegregation requires a massive effort of social engineering.[520]

America is more segregated today for African Americans than it was in 1940.

No such massive effort has occurred. Instead, the Supreme Court has made private lawsuits fighting housing discrimination more difficult,[521] and housing discrimination persists in new and different ways.[522] Policies that may not seem to discriminate at first glance have reinforced the structures put in place by past racist government actions.[523]

The Supreme Court

In 1977, the Supreme Court upheld a city's denial of request to rezone a tract of land in a mostly white suburb of Chicago, which banned the construction of apartment buildings anywhere except next to a commercial area.[524] The neighborhood in question had been zoned for single family houses without change since 1959.[525] This zoning ordinance had a "disproportionate impact on blacks" by effectively preventing lower income residents, who were more likely to be African American as compared to other Chicago area residents, from moving into the neighborhood.[526]

Even though the zoning decision meeting included comments from the public about the undesirability of rezoning so as to allow apartments that would "probably be racially integrated," the Supreme Court decided that the city council members themselves had no discriminatory intent when it voted for the zoning ordinance.[527] With Arlington Heights and the cases that followed, the Supreme Court essentially announced a rule that in order to prove that a law, regulation, or practice is unconstitutional, plaintiffs must prove that the decision makers intended to discriminate.[528]

This line of Supreme Court cases has made proving current housing discrimination and erasure of the effects of old government policies of housing segregation very difficult.[529] In other words, it very difficult to bring a successful housing discrimination lawsuit.

Continued Housing Discrimination

Mortgage and housing discrimination continues in many forms today. Researchers continue to find that African American residents are charged higher prices for identical units in the same neighborhood as white residents.[530] Lenders use predatory lending practices more often in minority neighborhoods than white neighborhoods.[531] Indeed, homeowners in segregated African American neighborhoods are more likely to have subprime mortgages.[532]

Before 2008, African American and Latino borrowers were four times more likely to receive a more expensive mortgage than white borrowers, a practice called reverse redlining.[533] Big banks across the country used reverse redlining to target communities of color with higher interest rates and fees.[534] Before 2008, banks specifically targeted African American and Hispanic homeowners to advertise toxic subprime mortgages and other predatory practices that triggered the Great Recession.[535] African American homeowners received toxic subprime mortgages at three times the rate of white mortgage lendees.[536]

Before 2008, compared to whites, African American and Latino borrowers were

4x MORE LIKELY to receive a more expensive mortgage

In Memphis, employees of Wells Fargo Bank referred to these loans as "ghetto loans," and bank supervisors targeted African American ZIP codes because they believed that residents "weren't savvy enough."[537] According to the U.S. Department of Justice in 2010, the more segregated a community, the more likely lenders targeted the homeowners for toxic loans, and the more likely the home was foreclosed.[538]

From July 2019 to June 2020, compared to white applicants, African American applicants were

2.5x MORE LIKELY to be rejected for mortgages

As a result, African American and Latino homeowners, were hit particularly hard by the 2008 crisis.[539] From 2001 to 2019, the rate of Black homeownership declined five times as much as the homeownership rate for white families,[540] erasing all the gains made since the passage of the Fair Housing Act in 1968.[541] Homes in African American neighborhoods were more likely to be foreclosed than homes in white neighborhoods.[542] By 2011, a quarter of African American homeowners had either lost their homes to foreclosure or were "seriously delinquent" on their mortgages.[543]

In settling a lawsuit against the Countrywide mortgage company, the federal Secretary of Housing and Urban Development said that due to Countrywide's discriminatory practices, "[f]rom Jamaica, Queens, New York, to Oakland, California, strong, middle-class African American neighborhoods saw nearly two decades of gains reversed in a matter of not years—but months."[544]

Before 2008, banks specifically targeted Black and Hispanic homeowners to advertise toxic subprime mortgages that triggered the Great Recession. In Memphis, employees of Wells Fargo Bank referred to these loans as "ghetto loans[,]" and bank supervisors targeted Black zip codes because they believed that residents "weren't savvy enough[.]"

Despite multiple lawsuits brought by the U.S. Department of Justice[545] and by cities like Baltimore,[546] Memphis,[547] and Cleveland,[548] the mortgage industry continues to discriminate against African American home buyers.

From July 2019 to June 2020, Black mortgage applicants were 2.5 times more likely than white applicants to be rejected for mortgages.[549] Studies continue to show that African American mortgage borrowers pay more in financing fees,[550] mortgage insurance,[551] and property taxes.[552]

Compared to white buyers, Black home buyers go into more debt for homes that are valued less.[553] Black homeowners who apply to refinance their homes are denied over 30 percent of the time, compared to 17 percent of white homeowners.[554] This makes it more difficult for African American homeowners to make necessary repairs to their homes and to move out of dilapidated homes.[555] These trends have continued even as mortgage lending has become more automated and internet based in recent years.[556]

California

California remains racially segregated,[557] although Black-white segregation has decreased since 1980 in cities like Los Angeles, Oakland, and Riverside.[558]

There is also evidence that lenders discriminate against African Americans in California. For example, one study found that in 2019, despite making up 5.5 percent of the state's population, African American Californians received only 3.28 percent of home purchase loans.[559] The magnitude of this disparity varies across metro areas in the state.[560] Another study found that in 2013, African American Californians made up 2.7 percent of all home mortgage loan applicants, received 2.4 percent of all home mortgage loans originated, and received 1.7 percent of all home mortgage loan dollars in the state.[561]

XIV. Effects

Once federal, state, and local governments, along with private actors, segregated the American landscape, they directed resources to white neighborhoods, and neglected African American neighborhoods. In 1967, President Lyndon B. Johnson appointed the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders to investigate the causes of the racial violence in the summer of 1967.[562] The report concluded that: "[S]egregation and poverty have created in the racial ghetto a destructive environment totally unknown to most white Americans."[563] The subsequent chapters on environment and infrastructure, education, health, labor, and wealth will discuss these persisting effects of slavery in detail.

Segregated African American communities have less access to public transit and must deal with longer commute times, which contributes to higher rates of unemployment among African Americans.[564] In the past, local governments delayed providing public services like water and sewage at first.[565] Once the services were eventually provided to African American neighborhoods, they were provided less often.[566] Today, many all-African American neighborhoods depend on aging water and sewage infrastructure and unreliable supplies.[567] Local governments did not invest as much in road and street services in African American neighborhoods, and the roads are less safe for pedestrians and cyclists.[568]

Black communities pay more for energy because they live in older, energy-inefficient homes.[569] Oil and gas extractions are more likely to be in African American neighborhoods, leading to environmental pollution.[570] Segregated African American neighborhoods are less likely to have access to parks and greenspace, and are less likely to have tree cover.[571] Tree cover cools neighborhoods during the summer and absorbs air pollution. Higher temperatures during the summer results in more heat related illnesses and exposure to more air pollution results in respiratory illness, both which occur more often in segregated neighborhoods.[572] A lack of greenspace also deprives African American communities, and especially poor African American communities, of the benefits of nature, especially beneficial for child development.[573]

Segregation has concentrated poverty in African American and Latino neighborhoods in America, and is associated with worse outcomes in almost every aspect of life. Neighborhood poverty rates are three times higher in segregated communities of color than in white neighborhoods.[574] Segregation is associated with lower high school graduation, lower earnings, and single motherhood among African Americans.[575] Residents of segregated neighborhoods have more illnesses and die younger.[576] Residential segregation is a major contributing factor to the African American and white wealth gap, as discussed in Chapter 13 on wealth. Homes in segregated African American neighborhoods tend to be older, smaller, and on more densely settled lots than in disproportionately white neighborhoods.[577] According to U.S. Census Bureau, the median home value in majority African American neighborhoods is $149,217, while the median home value in neighborhoods that are less than one percent African American is $306,511.[578] School districts are funded by local tax bases, which are determined by home values, so African American and Latino segregated local districts receive less funds, fewer resources, and less experienced teachers than white school districts. Further, as Joseph Gibbons testified during the December 7, 2021 Task Force meeting, gentrification has many negative effects on African Americans beyond the obvious displacement of African Americans, such as higher rates of stress and other adverse health effects.[579]

Some researchers have argued that segregation plays an important role in the racial disparity among unhoused individuals.[580] Throughout American history, significant numbers of African Americans have been unhoused,[581] although specific data based on race is not always available.[582] The story of African Americans experiencing homelessness has often been left out, underreported, or misrepresented.[583]

In the last decade, Black Californians were less likely to own a home than in the 1960s, when housing discrimination was legal.

Many enslaved people seeking freedom became unhoused after escaping bondage.[584] After the Civil War, close to four million African Americans were unhoused.[585] African Americans were hit the hardest during the Great Depression, were excluded from many private agencies offering aid and the benefits of the New Deal, and many became unhoused.[586] During the Post World War II period, between nine to 40 percent of Skid Row residents were African American men, depending on the city.[587] However, the number of African Americans who have been unhoused is relatively small when considering the number of impoverished or unemployed African Americans.[588] Scholars have attributed this to the robust family and neighborhood support systems of African American communities.[589]

In the last 50 years, the number of African American unhoused individuals has risen.[590] African Americans now make up 39 percent of people experiencing homelessness and 53 percent of families experiencing homelessness with children.[591] Scholars have attributed this to the compounding harms of urban renewal,[592] loss of blue collar jobs,[593] the crack cocaine epidemic,[594] historical and continued housing discrimination,[595] mass incarceration,[596] lack of access to health insurance and mental health services,[597] and lack of affordable housing.[598]

Due to the effects of government segregation policy, African Americans earn less and are more likely to be renters than white Americans, making them more vulnerable to homelessness.[599] This risk of homelessness is amplified by the fact that African American households are more likely than white households to be extremely low-income renters.[600] Because government policies have historically crippled the ability of African American households to purchase houses, they are more likely to be renters than white households.[601] One study found that African American renters continue to pay more than white renters for similar housing in similar neighborhoods.[602]

Because African American families are more likely to be impoverished, the housing shortage is more likely to affect African American households.[603] In the country, there are only 37 rental homes for every 100 extremely low-income renter households, defined as households with incomes at or below the poverty level or 30 percent of the median income of the geographic area.[604] Twenty percent of African American households are extremely low-income renters, compared with six percent of white non-Hispanic households.[605]

African American families are more likely to be rent burdened, which is generally defined as a household that spends more than 30 percent of pre-tax income on rent.[606] A majority of African American renter families in 2019 still spent over 30 percent of their income on rent.[607]

California

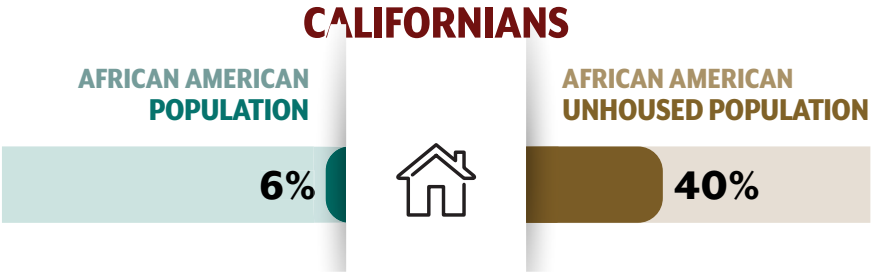
State and local urban renewal, highway construction, and gentrification have destroyed African American communities throughout the state. In the 1960s, vibrant communities like San Francisco's Fillmore district and Los Angeles's Sugar Hill have been reduced to rubble or an eight lane highway. Today, segregated neighborhoods in California are often populated by a mix of African American and Hispanic residents, and are more vulnerable to be displaced by gentrification.[608]

One study found that five of the 20 most rapidly gentrifying cities from 2013 to 2017 were in California: San Francisco-Oakland (1), San Jose (8), Sacramento (10), San Diego (14), and Los Angeles (15).[609] In many California cities today, gentrification (characterized by economic and demographic shifts in historically disinvested neighborhoods) is concentrated in formerly redlined neighborhoods.[610]

Close to 90 percent of currently gentrifying areas in San Francisco were formerly redlined or rated "definitely declining" by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, as were 83 percent of gentrifying areas in the East Bay and 87 percent of gentrifying areas in San Jose.[611] According to the U.S. census, in the 1970s, 10 percent of San Francisco's population identified as African American, compared to five percent today.[612]

Darrell Owens testified during the December 7, 2021 Task Force meeting that census data shows that African Americans have been displaced from California for decades.[613] In particular and more recently, African Americans are leaving Alameda County and Los Angeles County.[614] In addition to the residents who leave the state altogether, many are moving inland and many Black Californians are moving away from the more costly coastal cities in search of affordable housing.[615] For example, located just south of Sacramento, Elk Grove has seen a 5,100 percent increase in African American residents since 1990.[616] Similarly, as the population of African American residents plunged 45 percent in Compton, 43 percent in San Francisco, and 40 percent in Oakland, the San Joaquin-Sacramento Delta, Southern California's Inland Empire, and the Central Valley have all seen increases in their African American population.[617] Overall, the African American population in California is projected to increase almost 40 percent between 1999 and 2040, which is slower than the projected total population increase for the state of 72 percent.[618]

In writing about the gentrification of her historically Black neighborhood of Inglewood in Los Angeles, Erin Aubry Kaplan says, "Black presence has value — in every sense of the word, and on its own terms. That value should make the casual displacement of Black people untenable, even immoral."[619]



California has more individuals experiencing homelessness than any other state in the country.[620] Nearly a quarter of all unhoused Americans live in California.[621] African American Californians experiencing homelessness is a more acute crisis than in the rest of the country. Black people account for 6.5 percent of Californians but nearly 40 percent of the state's unhoused individuals.[622] Nationally, African American people account for 13.4 percent of the population and are 39.8 percent of the unhoused population.[623]

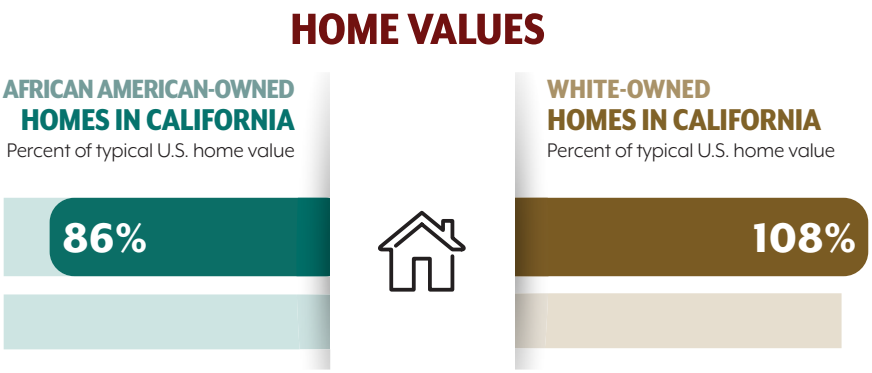
In addition to experiencing homelessness, as with the rest of the country, African American Californians are more likely to be renters than white Californians.[624] By 2019, Black Californians' homeownership rate was less than in the 1960s, when certain forms of housing discrimination was legal.[625] The African American homeownership rate in California has dropped almost 10 percent since 2004 and has not recovered.[626] Sixty-eight percent of white Californians own a home, compared with 41 percent of African American Californians.[627] One study shows that Proposition 13, which limits property taxes for homeowners by essentially freezing property tax assessment at the last date of purchase, has benefited white homeowners more than African American homeowners in California.[628] Fifty-eight percent of the state's African American renters spent more than 30 percent of their household income on rent.[629] In certain neighborhoods like South Los Angeles, over half of Black households pay more than 50 percent of their income on rent.[630]



As a likely result, despite constituting six percent of the state's population, African American Californians comprise nearly 40 percent of unhoused Californians. As Brandon Greene testified during the December 7, 2021 Task Force meeting, African Americans are disproportionately represented among the unhoused population throughout California.[631] Further, according to Greene, anti-homeless laws exclude African Americans from public spaces—like legal segregation laws—by empowering police to remove unhoused individuals from public spaces.[632]

As with the rest of the country, segregated neighborhoods have fewer access to public transportation by design.[633] For example, the Bay Area Rapid Transit (BART) trains run for almost three miles without stopping through Oakland's San Antonio neighborhood, the most racially diverse and densest part of the Bay Area.[634] In contrast, Walnut Creek and Pleasant Hill are less than half as dense in comparison, but the BART stations are only 1.75 miles apart.[635] The city designed the BART in the late 1960s to carry white commuters from the suburbs to their urban jobs, bypassing poor African American neighborhoods.[636]

Segregated communities have less greenspace and are more polluted. Fifty-two percent of African American Californians live in areas deprived of nature, compared to 36 percent of white Californians.[637] Their streets and sidewalks are more dangerous.[638] Segregated neighborhoods in California are more impoverished[639] and the homes are undervalued.

The typical Californian Black-owned home is worth 86 percent as much as the typical U.S. home, while the typical white-owned home is worth 108 percent as much as the typical U.S. home.[640] And a study has found that in the Los Angeles-Long Beach-Anaheim and San Francisco-Oakland-Hayward metropolitan areas, houses in majority African American neighborhoods are devalued by 17.1 percent and 27.1 percent, respectively.[641] This makes it particularly vulnerable to gentrification.[642]

XV. Conclusion

The American government reinforced the effects of slavery by maintaining a racialized caste system and effectuating segregation. Federal, state, and local governments across the country and in California, along with private actors, created separate and unequal cities and neighborhoods for African American and white Americans. Led by the federal government, local governments passed zoning ordinances and state courts enforced racially restrictive covenants to exclude African Americans from neighborhoods. These actions were amplified by federal housing policy.

When white supremacists burned crosses, bombed houses, harassed, and terrorized African American families moving into white neighborhoods, local governments rarely investigated and prosecuted the perpetrators. Funded by the federal government, local governments first built quality public housing exclusively for white Americans, then built and neglected enormous apartment complexes that concentrated poverty in African American neighborhoods. In the last three decades, local governments then chose to demolish these housing projects, intensifying gentrification and once again displacing African Americans.

This gentrification is part of a long history if displacement of African Americans. Erin Aubry Kaplan, a resident of the historically African American neighborhood of Inglewood, California wrote: "I thought about how fragile my feeling of being settled is. It didn't matter that I own my house, as many of my neighbors do. Generations of racism, Jim Crow, disinvestment and redlining have meant that we don't really control our own spaces. In that moment, I had been overwhelmed by a kind of fear, one that's connected to the historical reality of Black people being run off the land they lived on, expelled by force, high prices or some whim of white people."[643]

As Kaplan describes, wherever African Americans settled and prospered throughout American history, federal, state, and local governments, along with private actors, used numerous mechanisms: park and highway construction, slum clearance, and urban renewal to destroy those communities. Across the country, the federal government helped white Americans buy single family homes in the suburbs while crippling the ability for African Americans to access home loans and buy houses in the neighborhoods that white families left behind.

Almost 150 years of active, conscious federal, state, and local government action and neglect of duty have resulted in compounded harms that are unique to African Americans.[644] Housing segregation stole wealth from African Americans, while building the wealth of white Americans (discussed in Chapter 13, The Wealth Gap). Once segregated, government actors turned urban African American neighborhoods into ghettos by depriving them of public services (discussed in Chapter 7, Racism in Environment and Infrastructure), school funding (discussed in Chapter 6, Separate and Unequal Education), and encouraged polluting industries to move in (discussed in Chapter 7, Racism in Environment and Infrastructure). As a result, African Americans suffer higher rates of asthma and other diseases (discussed in Chapter 8, Pathologizing the African American Family). Housing segregation partially created the foundation and exacerbated the over-policing of African American neighborhoods, resulting in the injury and death of African Americans at the hands of police (discussed in Chapter 12, Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect).

These harms have never been adequately remedied.

Appendix

Table 1: Racial Disparities in Home Values, 2020 (Studied CA Metros)[645]

Metro Area	Value of the Typical Black-Owned Home as a Percentage of the Value of the Typical US Home (%)	Value of the Typical white-Owned Home as a Percentage of the Value of the Typical US Home (%)
Statewide	86	108
Los Angeles	81	118
Riverside	99	101
Sacramento	93	101
San Diego	81	106
San Francisco	78	107
San Jose	91	108

Table 2: Gap in Black Homeownership Rates (BHR) and white Homeownership Rates (WHR) in Formerly Greenlined Neighborhoods, 1980 vs. 2017 (Studied CA Metros)[646]

	1980			2017
Metro Area	BHR (%)	WHR (%)	Gap	BHR (%)	WHR (%)	Gap
Fresno	31.4	71.2	39.8 points	2.5	62.6	60.1 points
Los Angeles	49.8	69.1	19.3 points	46.2	67.1	20.9 points
Oakland	76.9	82.6	5.7 points	84.1	85.9	1.8 points
Sacramento	35.7	79.5	43.8 points	16.7	73.4	56.7 points
San Diego	7.9	64.0	56.1 points	17.0	60.9	43.9 points
San Jose	9.9	58.8	48.9 points	41.1	60.5	19.4 points

Table 2c: Gap in Median Home Equity in Formerly Greenlined and Formerly Redlined Neighborhoods, 2019 (Studied CA Metros)[647]

Metro Area	Median Home Equity in Formerly Greenlined Neighborhoods ($)	Median Home Equity in Formerly Redlined Neighborhoods ($)	Gap (% difference)
Fresno	282,000	158,000	78
Los Angeles	1,111,000	587,000	89
Oakland	1,300,000	752,000	73
Sacramento	778,000	522,000	49
San Diego	1,058,000	471,000	125
San Jose	1,329,000	854,000	56

Table 3 Sundown Towns identified in California from Sundown Towns: A Hidden Dimension of American Racism by James Loewen

- Brea[648]
- Bishop[649]
- Burbank[650]
- Maywood Colony, Corning[651]
- Culver City[652]
- Glendale[653]
- Hawthorne[654]
- La Jolla[655]
- Numerous suburbs of Los Angeles[656]
- Palos Verdes Estates[657]
- Richmond[658]
- San Marino[659]
- South Pasadena[660]
- Taft[661]
- Tarzana[662]

Endnotes

[1] Cutler et al., The Rise and the Decline of the American Ghetto (1999) vol. 107, No. 3, J. of Political Economy 455, 456 (Cutler).

[2] U.S. Census Bureau, Black Population 1790-1915 (1918) pp. 33, 80-90 (Black Population); Ransom & Sutch, One Kind of Freedom: The Economic Consequences of Emancipation (2001) p. 57 (Ransom); Du Bois, The Negro American Family (1908) pp. 45-51 (Negro American Family).

[3] Cutler, supra, at p. 456; Massey & Denton, American Apartheid: Segregation and the Making of the Underclass (1993) pp. 26, 41 (Massey); see generally Grigoryeva & Ruef, The Historical Demography of Racial Segregation (2015) vol. 80, No. 4, American Sociological Rev. 814-842 (Grigoryeva); Logan & Martinez, The Spatial Scale and Spatial Configuration of Residential Settlement: Measuring Segregation in the Postbellum South (2018) vol. 123, No. 4, American J. of Sociology, 1161-1203 (Measuring Segregation).

[4] Cutler, supra, at p. 456.

[5] Rothstein, The Color of Law (2017) pp. vii-xvii (Rothstein).

[6] Logan & Parman, The National Rise in Residential Segregation (2017) vol. 77, No. 1, J. of Economic History 127, 130, 155, 167; Taylor, The Environment and the People in American Cities, 1600s-1900s: Disorder, Inequality, and Social Change (2009) pp. 467-468 (Environment and People).

[7] Cal. EPA, Pollution and Prejudice: Redlining and Environmental Injustice in California (Aug. 16, 2021) (as of Apr. 4, 2022) (Cal. EPA).

[8] Rothstein, supra, at pp. vii-xvii.

[9] Cal. EPA, supra.

[10] Taylor, Toxic Communities: Environmental Racism, Industrial Pollution, and Residential Mobility (2014) p. 154 (Toxic Communities); Kilgore, Los Angeles Land Covenants, Redlining; Creation and Effects (June 22, 2020), Los Angeles Public Library (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[11] Cutler, supra, at p. 456.

[12] See, e.g., Coates, The Case for Reparations (June 2014), The Atlantic (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[13] Cutler, supra, at p. 456.

[14] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (October 12, 2021), Testimony of Stephen Menendian, (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[15] Frey, Neighborhood Segregation Persists for Black, Latino or Hispanic, and Asian Americans (Apr. 6, 2021), Brookings Institution (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[16] Wiate, The Forgotten History of the Western Klan (Apr. 6, 2021), Atlantic (as of Apr. 25, 2022); Hudson, West of Jim Crow: The Fight Against California's Color Line (2020) pp. 188-189 (Hudson).

[17] Hudson, supra, at p. 2.

[18] Du Bois, Editorial (July 1913) Crisis, at p. 131.

[19] Hudson, supra, at p. 2.

[20] See, e.g., Rothstein, supra, at pp. 11-14.

[21] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns: The Epic Story of America's Great Migration (2010) p. 210 (Wilkerson).

[22] Munoz & Manthey, Black Families Own Homes at a Lower Rate Than White Families in SoCal. Here's Why That Matters (July 15, 2021), abc7.com (as of Apr. 4, 2022).

[23] Rothstein, supra, at pp. viii-ix; see generally The Civil Rights Cases (1883) 109 U.S. 3 (Civil Rights Cases).

[24] Rothstein, supra, at pp. viii-ix; see generally Civil Rights Cases, supra, at fn. 23.

[25] Rothstein, supra, at pp. viii-ix; see generally Civil Rights Cases, supra, at fn. 23.

[26] Rothstein, supra, at pp. x-xi.

[27] Massey, supra, at p. 20; see also Cutler, supra, at p. 456.

[28] Black Population, supra, at p. 33.

[29] Id. at pp. 89-90.

[30] Ransom, supra, at p. 57; Negro American Family, supra, at pp. 45-51.

[31] Massey, supra, at pp. 20-21; see generally Grigoryeva, supra; Measuring Segregation, supra.

[32] Massey, supra, at p. 26; see generally Grigoryeva, supra; Measuring Segregation, supra.

[33] Measuring Segregation, supra, at pp. 5-6; Foner, A Short History of Reconstruction, 1863-1877 (2015) p. 37.

[34] Du Bois, Black Reconstruction in America: An Essay Toward a History of the Part Which Black Folk Played in the Attempt to Reconstruct Democracy in America, 1860-1880 (2013 ed.) p. 621.

[35] Black Population, supra, at p. 33.

[36] Id. at p. 90.

[37] Massey, supra, at pp. 20-21.

[38] Massey, supra, at pp. 19-20; see also Foner, Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863-1877 (1988) p. 472.

[39] Du Bois, The Philadelphia Negro: A Social Study (1899) p. 296.

[40] Id. at p. 295.

[41] Id. at pp. 295-296.

[42] U.S. Census Bureau, 1860 Census, California, p. 28 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[43] Taylor, In Search of the Racial Frontier: African Americans in the American West 1528-1990 (1999) p. 18 (Racial Frontier).

[44] Id. at p. 85.

[45] Id. at p. 34.

[46] Id. at p. 90.

[47] Id. at p. 89.

[48] Ibid.

[49] Racial Frontier, supra, at p. 85.

[50] Loewen, Sundown Towns: A Hidden Dimension of American Racism (2005) pp. 54-56 (Loewen).

[51] Ibid.

[52] Rothstein, supra, at p. 15

[53] Environment and People, supra, at p. 467.

[54] Id. at pp. 467-468.

[55] Id. at p. 468.

[56] Wilkerson, supra, at p. 178.

[57] Ibid.

[58] Ibid.

[59] Ibid.

[60] Id. at p. 187.

[61] Gibson & Jung, Historical Census Statistics on Population Totals by Race, 1790 to 1990, and by Hispanic Origin, 1970-1990, for the United States, Regions, Divisions, and States (2002) U.S. Census Bureau, Table 19 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[62] Wilkerson, supra, at p. 10.

[63] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 153.

[64] Id. at p. 180; McClintock, James Saules, Peter Burnett, and the Oregon Black Exclusion Law of June 1844 (1995) 86:3 Pacific Northwest Quarterly 121, 121-123 (McClintock).

[65] McClintock, supra, at p. 124.

[66] Loewen, supra, at p. 4.

[67] See id. at pp. 4, 15, 99-100.

[68] Id. at pp. 4, 6.

[69] Id. at pp. 13, 113.

[70] Id. at 13.

[71] Ibid.

[72] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 180; McClintock, supra, at pp. 121-123.

[73] Hudson, supra, at p. 21-22.

[74] Ibid.

[75] Loewen, supra, at p. 76.

[76] See, e.g., id. at pp. 9-10, 99-100.

[77] Id. at p. 76.

[78] See, e.g., id. at pp. 9-10.

[79] Id. at p. 70.

[80] Loewen, supra, at p. 76.

[81] Id. at p. 276.

[82] See id. at pp. 5, 14, 23, 29, 78, 100, 102-103, 220, 236, 239-240, 255, 258, 282, 293, 333, 338, 340, 410.

[83] Loewen, supra, at p. 49.

[84] Loewen, supra, at pp. 258, 282.

[85] Id. at p. 282.

[86] Loewen, supra, at pp. 258, 282.

[87] Id. at p. 282.

[88] Id. at p. 258.

[89] Hudson, supra, at pp. 98-99.

[90] Stuckey, Boley, Indian Territory: Exercising Freedom in the All-Black Town (Fall 2017) 102:4 J. of African American History 492, 493.

[91] Hudson, supra, at pp. 98-99.

[92] Arrington, Exodusters (Apr. 10, 2015), National Park Service (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[93] Hudson, supra, at p. 99.

[94] Ibid.

[95] Cox, The Archaeology of the Allensworth Hotel: Negotiating the System in Jim Crow America (Sept. 2007) 10:3 African Diaspora Archaeology Newsletter 1, 11.

[96] Hudson, supra, at pp. 94-95, 99-102, 104.

[97] Id. at pp. 94, 99-104.

[98] Id. at pp. 94-95, 98-99.

[99] Hudson, supra, at pp. 93-94, 106.

[100] Id. at p. 111.

[101] Hudson, supra, at p. 114.

[102] Ibid.

[103] Id. at p. 115.

[104] Hudson, supra, at p. 106.

[105] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 13, 2021), Testimony of Terrance Dean, Ph.D., (as of Apr. 25, 2022); see also Dean & Logan, The California Boomtown That Racism Destroyed (Sept. 30, 2021), Bloomberg (as of Apr. 25, 2022) (California Boomtown).

[106] California Boomtown, supra.

[107] Ibid.

[108] Hudson, supra, at pp. 94, 105, 124.

[109] Id. at p. 95.

[110] Hudson, supra, at pp. 122, 125-126.

[111] Id. at pp. 125-126.

[112] Id. at pp. 121-126.

[113] Id. at pp. 123-126.

[114] Id. at pp. 127-128.

[115] Cal. EPA, supra.

[116] Ibid.

[117] Ibid.

[118] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 153.

[119] Id. at pp. 152-153.

[120] Id. at pp. 155-156.

[121] Id. at pp. 156-57.

[122] See Toxic Communities, supra, at pp. 159-192 and Rothstein, supra, at p. 45.

[123] Rothstein, supra, at p. 45.

[124] Ibid.

[125] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 45-47.

[126] Toxic Communities, supra, at pp. 169-170.

[127] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 47-48.

[128] Environment and People, supra, at pp. 152-157.

[129] Id. at pp. 478-479.

[130] Environment and People, supra, at pp. 479-480.

[131] Ibid.

[132] Id. at p. 480.

[133] Ibid.

[134] Ibid.

[135] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 51-52.

[136] See Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 164.

[137] Ibid.

[138] Rothstein, supra, at p. 52.

[139] See, e.g., Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp. (1977) 429 U.S. 252 (The Court found the zoning plan in this case not unconstitutional noting "respondents failed to carry their burden proving that discriminatory purpose was a motivating factor in the Villages' decision [to maintain its commitment to single-family homes and deny the MHDC rezoning proposal].).

[140] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 184.

[141] Id. at pp. 184-186.

[142] Ibid.

[143] Ibid.

[144] Ibid.

[145] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 185.

[146] Winkler, 'Snob Zoning' Is Racial Housing Segregation by Another Name (Sept. 25, 2017), Washington Post (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[147] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 185.

[148] Ibid.

[149] Id. at p. 164.

[150] The Persistent Racism of America's Cemeteries (Jan. 16, 2017), Slate (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[151] Environment and People, supra, at p. 436.

[152] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 48-49.

[153] Id. at p. 49.

[154] See generally Alderman & Inwood, How Black Cartographers Put Racism on the Map (Feb. 24, 20201), Next City (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[155] Rothstein, supra, at p. 49.

[156] Ibid.

[157] Id. at p. 50.

[158] Ibid.

[159] Ibid.

[160] Rothstein, supra, at p. 132.

[161] Id. at p. 133.

[162] Id. at pp. 133-34.

[163] Koch & Fowler, A City Plan for Austin, Texas (1928) p. 57 (Koch).

[164] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 132-133.

[165] Ibid.

[166] Koch, supra, at p. 57.

[167] Rothstein, supra, at p. 133.

[168] Ibid.

[169] Id. at p. 135.

[170] McClain, In Re Lee Sing: The First Residential-Segregation Case (1990) 3 Western Legal History 179; see generally In re Lee Sing (N.D.Cal. 1890) 43 F. 359.

[171] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 184.

[172] Rothstein, supra, at p. 9.

[173] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 186.

[174] Madison, Is Bayshore a Color Line? School Fight Hinges on Issue, Redwood City Tribune (Sep. 5, 1958) p. 13, col. 1.)

[175] Chang et. al., Beneath The Santa Monica Freeway Lies The Erasure Of Sugar Hill, National Public Radio, (May 4, 2021), accessed April 27, 2022.

[176] Bogle, Bright Boulevards, Bold Dreams: The Story of Black Hollywood (2006) p. 263.

[177] Rothstein, supra, at p. 131.

[178] Ibid.

[179] Ibid.

[180] Rothstein, supra, p. 55.

[181] Ibid.

[182] Ibid.

[183] Ibid.

[184] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 228.

[185] See, e.g., Kirby Forest Indus. v. United States (1984) 467 U.S. 1.

[186] Here to Equality, supra, at pp. 217-221.

[187] Fullilove, Eminent Domain & African Americans: What Is the Price of the Commons? (2007), Institute for Justice (as of Apr. 5, 2022), p. 6 (Fullilove).

[188] Id. at p. 5.

[189] Rothstein, supra, at p. 128 (internal quotation marks omitted).

[190] Toxic Communities, supra, at pp. 228-229, 233.

[191] Fullilove, supra, at p. 2.

[192] Ibid.

[193] Fullilove, supra, at pp. 5-6.

[194] Id. at p. 5.

[195] Id. at p. 6.

[196] Ibid.

[197] Id. at p. 5.

[198] Environment and People, supra, at p. 365.

[199] Ib id

[200] Environment and People, supra, at p. 292.

[201] Id. at p. 276.

[202] Ibid.

[203] Ibid.

[204] Id. at p. 277.

[205] Santa Monica Conservancy, Belmar Neighborhood (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[206] Ibid.

[207] U.S. Federal Housing Administration, Underwriting Manual: Underwriting and Valuation Procedure Under Title II of the National Housing Act (1938) Part II, § 9, ¶ 935.

[208] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 229. ("Comstock's (1912) study of housing conditions in Black neighborhoods in Chicago described the communities as slums, despite the fact that 72% of the housing was in good or fair repair and only 28% was in bad repair.")

[209] Id. at pp. 229, 231, 246, 250.

[210] PBS/KQED, The Fillmore: Fillmore Timeline 1860-2001 (as of Apr. 25, 2022) (Fillmore Timeline).

[211] Rusk, Inside Game/Outside Game: Winning Strategies for Saving Urban America (1999) p. 90.

[212] Johnson, African Americans and Homelessness: Moving Through History, 40:4 Journal of Black Studies (2010) 595 (as of May 1, 2022).

[213] Darity Jr. & Mullen, From Here to Equality: Reparations for African Americans in the Twenty-First Century (2020) pp. 221-222 (Here to Equality).

[214] Ibid.

[215] Here to Equality, supra, at p. 222.

[216] Heath et al. , The Case for Reparations in Tulsa, Oklahoma: A Human Rights Argument (May 2020), Human Rights Watch (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[217] U.S. Senate, Congress Approves the Federal-Aid Highway Act (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[218] Mohl, The Interstates and the Cities: Highways, Housing, and the Freeway Revolt, Poverty & Race Research Action Council (Jan. 1, 2002) p. 2 (Mohl).

[219] Mohl, supra, at p. 43; Sonksen, Inglewood Today: The History of South Central Los Angeles and Its Struggle with Gentrification (June 20, 2018) Univ. of Southern Cal. Lusk Center for Real Estate (as of May 1, 2022).

[220] Here to Equality, supra, at p. 223.

[221] Ryan, Buttigieg Says Racism Built into US Infrastructure Was a "Conscious Choice" (Apr. 6, 2021), The Grio (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[222] Mohl, supra, at p. 2.

[223] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 250.

[224] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 128-129.

[225] Ibid.

[226] Rothstein, supra, at p. 131.

[227] McKelvey, Biden's Unlikely Plan to Use Roads to Fight Racism (Aug. 10, 2021), BBC (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[228] Ibid.

[229] Ibid.

[230] Ibid. ("Though activists from Syracuse to Los Angeles fought against the construction of these mega-roads, they were built anyway[,] and left communities wrecked - bombarded with noise and pollution, and split down the middle.")

[231] Toxic Communities, supra, at pp. 178-179.

[232] Cal. EPA, supra.

[233] Ibid.

[234] Hunt, What Went Wrong with Public Housing in Chicago? A History of the Robert Taylor Homes (2001) 94:1 J. of the Illinois State Historical Society 96, 96.

[235] Ibid.

[236] Toxic Communities, supra, at pp. 249-250.

[237] Bayor, Racism as Public Policy in America's Cities in the Twentieth Century, Reading Against Racism: A Berghahn Collection (2021) p. 71 -73.

[238] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Sept. 23, 2021), Testimony of Jon Burgess, (as of Apr. 25, 2022), (Burgess Testimony); California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Sept. 24, 2021), Testimony of Dawn Basciano (as of Apr. 25, 2022) (Basciano Testimony).

[239] Burgess Testimony, supra; Basciano Testimony, supra.

[240] See Xia, Manhattan Beach Was Once Home to Black Beachgoers, but the City Ran Them Out. Now It Faces a Reckoning (Aug. 2, 2020), L.A. Times (as of Apr. 25, 2022) (Xia I).

[241] Ibid.

[242] Ibid.

[243] Xia I, supra.

[244] Ibid.

[245] Ibid.

[246] Paskin, Officials Lead Effort to Return Bruce's Beach to the Black Family It Was Taken from 100 Years Ago (Apr. 9, 2021), LAist (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[247] Xia I, supra.

[248] Ibid.; see also Xia, A Tale of Two Reckonings: How Should Manhattan Beach Atone for Its Racist Past? (Mar. 28, 2021), L.A. Times (as of Apr. 25, 2022) (Xia II).

[249] Xia I, supra; see also Xia II, supra.

[250] Xia II, supra.

[251] See generally Sen. Bill No. 796 (2021-2022 Reg. Sess.

[252] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (December 8, 2021), Testimony of Dr. Alison R. Jefferson(as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[253] Ibid.

[254] Ibid.

[255] Ibid.

[256] Ibid.

[257] Ibid.

[258] Ibid.

[259] Stats. 1945, ch. 1326, p. 2478 et seq. (1945 C.R.A.). The law was amended numerous times over the next decades.

See Stats. 1951, ch. 710, p. 1922 et. seq.; Cal. Const., art. XVI, § 16; Cal. Health & Saf. Code § 33030, et. seq.); (Stats. 1993, Ch 942 (A.B. 1290).); (Stats. 2006, Ch. 113 (A.B. 782, § 1)); (Stats. 2006, Ch. 595, § 2 (S. B. 1206)); (Stats. 2010, Ch. 665, § 1 (A.B. 1641)). Today, the original 1945 set of conditions remains basically the same, but it also includes an anti-discrimination policy regarding the undertaking of community redevelopment projects. Cal. Health & Saf. Code § 33031, subd. (a)(1), (5); subd. (b)(1), (3); Cal. Health & Saf. Code § 3305

[260] 1945 C.R.A., §

[261] Ibid.

[262] Id., § 2, subd. (a).

[263] Ibid.

[264] Id., subds. (b), (d).

[265] Id., subd. (c

[266] Id., § 2 ("Further declarations").

[267] Fulbright, Sad Chapter in Western Addition History Ending, (Jul. 21, 2008), S.F. Chronicle (as of Apr. 25, 2021) (Fulbright).

[268] Taylor, How "Urban Renewal" Decimated the Fillmore District, and Took Jazz with It (Jun. 25, 2020), KQED (as of Apr. 25, 2022) (Decimated Fillmore).

[269] Fillmore Timeline, supra.

[270] Fulbright, supra.

[271] Decimated Fillmore, supra.

[272] Fulbright, supra.

[273] Decimated Fillmore, supra.

[274] Fulbright, supra.

[275] Ibid.

[276] Russell City Reparative Justice Project, City of Hayward (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[277] Hayward City Council, Resolution Apologizing for City's Racial Discrimination, Nov. 17, 2021 (Resolution).

[278] Marian "Edie" Eddens, Letter to California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans, Feb. 24, 202

[279] Russell City and the Blues (Feb. 2, 2017), City of Hayward (as of Apr. 26, 2022)

[280] Gloria Bratton Sanders Moore, Letter to California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans, Feb. 24, 202

[281] Whitney, Decades After "Cultural Genocide," Residents of a Bulldozed Community Get Apology from Hayward (Dec. 5, 2021), KQED (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[282] Resolution, supr

[283] Resolution, supra.

[284] Jessie Mae Patterson, Letter to California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans, Feb. 24, 2022.

[285] Resolution, supra.

[286] Pritchett, The "Public Menace" of Blight: Urban Renewal and the Private Uses of Eminent Domain (2003) 21 Yale L. and Policy Rev. 1, 33-34.

[287] Rothstein, supra, at p. 131.

[288] Chang et al., Beneath the Santa Monica Freeway Lies the Erasure of Sugar Hill (May 4, 2021), NPR (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[289] Mohl, supra, at p. 25.

[290] Ramirez, Black History in Pasadena (Mar. 15, 2021), A Noise Within (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[291] Ibid.

[292] Mohl, supra, at p. 25.

[293] Baldassari, Report: Oakland's I-980 on National "Top 10" List for Teardown (Feb. 14, 2017), Mercury News (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[294] Ibid.

[295] Tobias, How Fresno Is Confronting Its History of Racism (Sept. 16, 2020), CalMatters (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[296] Carrico et al., Centre City Development Corporation Downtown San Diego African-American Heritage Study (December 2004), Mooney & Associates (as of Apr. 6, 2022), pp. 11-13; Soliman, The Rise and Fall of Seventh Street in Oakland (2015), Found SF (as of April, 27, 2022).

[297] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 16-18.

[298] Id. at pp. 19-30.

[299] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 33-34.

[300] Ibid.

[301] Rothstein, supra, at p. 19.

[302] Ibid.

[303] Rothstein, supra, at p. 11.

[304] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 16-34.

[305] Ibid.

[306] Id. at pp. 19-30.

[307] Id. at p. 18.

[308] Rothstein, Ibid.

[309] Id. at p. 20.

[310] Id. at p. 23.

[311] Id. at p. 19.

[312] Ibid.

[313] Id. at pp. 23.

[314] Ibid.

[315] Id. at p. 25.

[316] Ibid.

[317] Id. at pp. 36-37.

[318] Ibid.

[319] Gross, A 'Forgotten History' of how the Federal Government Segregated America (May 3, 2017), NPR (as of May 1, 2022).

[320] See, infra, Section X.

[321] See, infra, Section XI.

[322] Rothstein, supra, at p. 32.

[323] Ibid.

[324] Ibid.

[325] Ibid.

[326] Rothstein, supra, at p. 37.

[327] Id. at p. 6.

[328] Ibid.

[329] Id. at p. 33.

[330] Ibid.

[331] Toxic Communities, supra, at pp. 254-255.

[332] Civil Rights Act of 1964, Pub.L. 88-352, 78 Stat. 241 (1964); Fair Housing Act of 1968 Section 801, 42 U.S.C. Section 3601; Fair Housing Act Overview and Challenges (October 23, 2018), National Low Income Housing Coalition (as of May 1, 2022).

[333] Rothstein, supra, at p. 35; See Otero v. New York City Housing Authority, 484 F.2d 1122 (1973), United States v. Yonkers Board of Education, 837 F.2d 1181 (1974), Young v. Pierce, 822 F.2d 1368 (1987), Walker v. HUD, 912 F.2d 819 (5th Cir. 1990), Thompson v. HUD, 220 F.3d 241 (4th Cir. 2000).

[334] Rothstein, supra, at p. 35; See Otero v. New York City Housing Authority, 484 F.2d 1122 (1973), United States v. Yonkers Board of Education, 837 F.2d 1181 (1974), Young v. Pierce, 822 F.2d 1368 (1987), Walker v. HUD, 912 F.2d 819 (5th Cir. 1990), Thompson v. HUD, 220 F.3d 241 (4th Cir. 2000).

[335] Goetz, Gentrification in Black and White: The Racial Impact of Public Housing Demolition in American Cities (2022) 48:8, Urban Studies 1581, 1581 (Goetz).

[336] Id. at pp. 1583-1584.

[337] See id. at p. 1582.

[338] Goetz, supra, at pp. 1583, 1600.

[339] Id. at p. 1600.

[340] Id. at p. 1601.

[341] Goetz, supra, at p. 1584.

[342] Id. at p. 1585.

[343] Ibid.

[344] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 5, 8, 12-14.

[345] Id. at pp. 71-72.

[346] Id. at p. 29.

[347] Id. at p. 31.

[348] Ibid.

[349] Ibid.

[350] Ibid.

[351] Id. at p. 32.

[352] Id. at p. 33.

[353] Ibid.

[354] Ibid.

[355] Ibid.

[356] Id. at p. 32.

[357] Id. at p. 3.

[358] Ibid.

[359] Id. at pp. 33-34.

[360] Id. at p. 33.

[361] Ibid.

[362] Id. at p. 57.

[363] Id. at p. 60.

[364] Id. at p. 59.

[365] Ibid.

[366] Ibid.

[367] Ibid.

[368] Id. at p. 61.

[369] Ibid.

[370] Id. at p. 62.

[371] Moore, et al., Roots, Race, & Place: A History of Racially Exclusionary Housing in the San Francisco Bay Area (Oct. 2, 2019), Othering & Belonging Institute (as of Apr. 25, 2022) (Moore).

[372] Ibid.

[373] Ibid.

[374] Ibid.

[375] Domonoske, Interactive Redlining Map Zooms In On America's History Of Discrimination, (Oct. 19, 2016) NPR (as of May 3, 2022); Jackson, What Is Redlining?, (Aug. 17, 2021) N.Y. Times (as of May 3, 2022).

[376] Gross, A 'Forgotten History' Of How The U.S. Government Segregated America, (May 3, 2017) NPR (as of May 3, 2022).

[377] Cal. EPA, supra; Rothstein, supra, at p. 64.

[378] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 239.

[379] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 236; Rothstein, supra, at p. 199.

[380] Moore, supra, at p. 1.

[381] Ibid.

[382] U.S. Dept. of Housing and Urban Development, Program Offices: The Federal Housing Administration (FHA) (as of May 1, 2022).

379 See Kane, The Constitutionality of Redlining: The Potential for Holding Banks Liable as State Actors, 2 Wm. & Mary Bill Rts. J. 527 (1993) (Kane).

[384] Lang et al., Legacy of the Housing Act of 1949: The Past, Present, and Future of Federal Housing and Urban Policy (2000) p. 296.

[385] Rothstein, supra, at p. 50.

[386] Id. at p. 88.

[387] Adelman, Real Life/Affirmative Action for Whites/The houses that racism built, SF Gate (June 29, 2003) (as of May 3, 2022).

[388] See, e.g., Nardone, et al., Historical Redlining and Urban Health Today in U.S. Cities (2020), 13 Environmental Justice 4 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[389] Ibid.; see also Lane, et al., Historical Redlining is Associated with Present-Day Air Pollution Disparities in U.S. Cities (2022), Environmental Science & Technology Letters (as of Apr. 25, 2022.)

[390] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 236.

[391] Ibid.

[392] Id. at 237.

[393] Cal. EPA, supra.

[394] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 236.

[395] Ibid.

[396] Ibid.

[397] Ibid.

[398] Ibid.

[399] Cal. EPA, supra; see also, Blumgart, Redlining Didn't Happen Quite the Way We Thought It Did (Sept. 21, 2021), Governing (as of May 1, 2022).

[400] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 237.

[401] Ibid.

[402] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (October 13, 2021), Testimony of Paul Austin (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[403] Cal. EPA, supra.

[404] Ibid.

[405] Ibid.

[406] Ibid.

[407] Rothstein, supra, at p. 13.

[408] See Kane, supra.

[409] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 241.

[410] Rothstein, supra, at p. 70.

[411] Id. at p. 71.

[412] Ibid.

[413] Id. at p. 73.

[414] Ibid.

[415] U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, 1973, at p. 7.

[416] Rothstein, supra, at p. 115.

[417] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 239.

[418] Rothstein, supra, at p. 115.

[419] Katznelson, When Affirmative Action Was White: An Untold History of Racial Inequality in Twentieth-Century America (2006) p. 115.

[420] Id. at pp. 118, 114-115.

[421] Id. at p. 128.

[422] Id. at p. 140.

[423] Cohen, A Consumers' Republic (2004) p. 171.

[424] Katznelson, On Race and Policy History: A Dialogue about the G.I. Bill (Sep. 2008) 4:6 Perspectives on Politics 523 (as of May 1, 2022).

[425] Cohen, A Consumers' Republic (2004), p. 171

[426] Id. at p. 15.

[427] Nelson, et al., Mapping Inequality: Redlining in New Deal America, American Panorama (as of May 1, 2022).

[428] Id.

[429] Id.

[430] Beal, Redlining in San Diego, Local Initiatives Support Corporation San Diego (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[431] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 72-73.

[432] Id. at pp. 9-10.

[433] Id. at p. 11.

[434] Ibid.

[435] Ibid.

[436] Adelman, Racial Preferences for Whites: The House that Racism Built, (June 29, 2003) SF Chronicle (as of May 3, 2022).

[437] Rothstein, supra, at p. 41.

[438] Gaspaire, Blockbusting (January 7, 2013), BlackPast (as of April 25, 2022).

[439] Ibid.

[440] Ibid.

[441] Rothstein, supra, at p. 12.

[442] Rothstein, supra, at p. 41.

[443] Id. at p. 42.

[444] Id. at p. 111.

[445] Ibid.

[446] Ibid.

[447] Toxic Communities, supra, at pp. 192-198.

[448] Id. at p. 223.

[449] Id. at p. 195 at fn. 62.

[450] Id. at p. 193.

[451] Ehrman-Solberg et al., Racial Covenants in Hennepin County (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[452] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 155.

[453] Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U.S. 60, 82 (1917).

[454] Corrigan v. Buckley, 271 U.S. 323, 331 (1926).

[455] Ibid.

[456] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 81-83.

[457] Id. at p. 61.

[458] Rothstein, supra, p. 82.

[459] Id. at p. 61.

[460] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 81-83.

[461] Brooks, Covenants and Conventions (Sept. 2002), Northwestern University Law School, p. 19 (as of May 3, 2022).

[462] Rothstein, supra, at p. 84.

[463] Federal Housing Administration, Underwriting Manual: Underwriting and Valuation Procedure Under Title II of the National Housing Act (Feb. 1938) ¶ 937, p. 110.

[464] Rothstein, supra, at p. 85.

[465] U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Understanding Fair Housing (Feb. 1973) p.

[466] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 79-81.

[467] Id. at p. 105.

[468] See, e.g., Corrigan, supra, 271 U.S. at p. 328; Torrey v. Wolfes (D.C. Cir. 1925), 6 Fed. 2d 702, 703; Russell v. Wallace, 30 Fed. 2d 981, 982 (D.C. Cir. 1929); Cornish v. O'Donogue (D.C. Cir. 1929), 30 Fed. 2d 983, 984; Edwards v. West Woodridge Theater Co., Inc. (D.C. Cir. 1931), 55 Fed. 2d 524, 525; Koehler v. Rowland (1918), 275 Mo. 573; Queensborough Land Co. v. Cazeaux (La. 1915) 67 So. 641, 642;; Porter v. Johnson (K.C. Ct. App. 1938), 232 Mo. App. 1150.

[469] Lyons v. Wallen (Okla. 1942) 133 P.2d 555, 557-58.

[470] Rothstein, supra, at p. 89.

[471] Shelley v. Kraemer (1948) 334 U.S. 1.

[472] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 217.

[473] Rothstein, supra, at p. 86.

[474] Rothstein, supra, at p. 88.

[475] Rose, Hidden In Old Home Deeds, A Segregationist Past (Feb. 6, 2010), NPR(as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[476] Loh, et al., The Great Real Estate Reset (Dec. 16, 2020), Brookings Institute (as of May 1, 2022).

[477] Toxic Communities, supra, at p. 223.

[478] Ibid.

[479] Ibid.

[480] Reft, How Prop 14 Shaped California's Racial Covenants (Sept. 20, 2017), KCET (as of May 2, 2022).

[481] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (December 7, 2021), Testimony of Joseph Gibbons (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Reft, Segregation in the City of Angels: A 1939 Map of Housing Inequality in L.A. (Nov. 14, 2017), KCET (as of May 2, 2022).

[482] Kilgore, Los Angeles Land Covenants, Redlining; Creation and Effects, (June 22, 2020) Los Angeles Public Library (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[483] Bates, A Trailblazing Black Architect Who Helped Shape L.A. (June 22, 2012), National Public Radio (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[484] Ibid.

[485] Rothstein, supra, at p. 81.

[486] Ibid.

[487] Id. at p. 105.

[488] Id. at p. 82.

[489] See generally Assembly Bill No. 1466 (2021-2022 Reg. Session).

[490] Ibid.

[491] Hudson, supra, at p. 326.

[492] LOS ANGELES CITYWIDE HISTORIC CONTEXT STATEMENT Context: African American History of Los Angeles, City of Los Angeles Department of City Planning Office of Historic Resources (Feb. 2018) p. 45.

[493] Hudson, supra, at p. 203.

[494] Id. at pp. 168, 205.

[495] Id. at p. 205.

[496] Id. at p. 203.

[497] Ibid.

[498] Ibid.

[499] Ibid.

[500] Rothstein, supra, at p. 147.

[501] Ibid.

[502] Moore, supra.

[503] Moore, supra; Rothstein, supra, at pp. 139-140.

[504] Rothstein, supra, at p.140.

[505] Ibid.

[506] Ibid.

[507] Moore, supra, at p. 27.

[508] Hudson, supra, at pp. 168, 207.

[509] Menendian et al., The Roots of Structural Racism Project: Twenty-First Century Racial Residential Segregation in the United States (June 21, 2021), Othering & Belonging Institute (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[510] Rothstein, supra, at p. 178.

[511] Logan & Stults, The Persistence of Segregation in the Metropolis: New Findings from the 2010 Census (Mar. 24, 2011) p. 2.

[512] Id. at pp. 2, 4.

[513] Id. at pp. 2-3.

[514] See Ibid.

[515] Perry et al., The Devaluation of Assets in Black Neighborhoods (Nov. 2018), Brookings, p. 10 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[516] Ibid.

[517] Rothstein, supra, at p. 179.

[518] Ibid.

[519] See id. at pp. 177-180.

[520] Ibid.

[521] See id. at pp. 53-54.

[522] Id. at pp. 179-180.

[523] Id. at p. 180.

[524] Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 254-255, 258 (1977).

[525] Id. at p. 269.

[526] Id. at p. 259.

[527] Id. at pp. 257-258, 270.

[528] Id. at pp. 270-271.

[529] Rothstein supra, at pp. 53-54.

[530] Early et al., Racial Rent Differences in U.S. Housing Markets: Evidence from the Housing Voucher Program (Dec. 20, 2018) 59 J. of Regional Science 669, 671 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[531] Aguirre Jr. et al., The Foreclosure Crisis, the American Dream, and Minority Households in the United States: A Descriptive Profile (2013) 40 Social Justice 6 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[532] Hyra et al., Metropolitan Segregation and the Subprime Lending Crisis (Dec. 21, 2012) 23 Housing Policy Debate 1, 182 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[533] Aguirre Jr., supra.

[534] See, e.g., U.S. DOJ, Justice Department Reaches $335 Million Settlement to Resolve Allegations of Lending Discrimination by Countrywide Financial Corporation (Dec. 21, 2011), Dept. of Justice (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Powell, Memphis Accuses Wells Fargo of Discriminating Against Blacks (Dec. 30, 2009), The New York Times (as of Apr. 26, 2022); U.S. DOJ, Justice Department Reaches Settlement with Wells Fargo Resulting in More Than $175 Million in Relief for Homeowners to Resolve Fair Lending Claims (Jul. 12, 2012), Dept. of Justice (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[535] Rothstein, supra, at pp. 110-111.

[536] Ibid.Id. at p. 111.

[537] Id. at p. 112.

[538] Powell, Blacks in Memphis Lose Decades of Gains (May 31, 2010), The New York Times (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[539] California Housing Finance Agency, Underserved Communities (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[540] McCargo, A Five-Point Strategy for Reducing the Black Homeownership Gap (Feb. 14, 2019), Urban Institute (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[541] Goodman et al., Are Gains in Black Homeownership History? (Feb. 15, 2017), Urban Institute (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[542] Mikhitarian, How the Housing Bust Widened the Wealth Gap for Communities of Color (Apr. 25, 2019), Zillow (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[543] Hearing before U.S. House of Representatives Committee On Financial Services, 116th Cong., 1st Sess., A Review of the State of and Barriers to Minority Homeownership (May 8, 2019), p. 2 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[544] Rothstein, A comment on Bank of America/Countrywide's discriminatory mortgage lending and its implications for racial segregation (Jan. 23, 2012), Economic Policy Institute (as of May 2, 2022).

[545] See, e.g., U.S. DOJ, Justice Department Reaches $335 Million Settlement to Resolve Allegations of Lending Discrimination by Countrywide Financial Corporation (Dec. 21, 2011), Dept. of Justice (as of Apr. 26, 2022); U.S. DOJ, Justice Department Reaches Settlement with Wells Fargo Resulting in More Than $175 Million in Relief for Homeowners to Resolve Fair Lending Claims (Jul. 12, 2012), Dept. of Justice (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[546] Rothacker et al., Wells Fargo to Pay $175 Million in Race Discrimination Probe (July 12, 2012), Reuters (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[547] Powell, Memphis Accuses Wells Fargo of Discriminating Against Blacks (Dec. 30, 2009), The New York Times (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[548] Pierog, Cleveland Sues 21 Banks Over Mortgage Foreclosures (Jan. 11, 2008), Reuters (as of May 2, 2022).

[549] National Association of Realtors, NAR Finds Black Home Buyers More Than Twice as Likely to Have Student Loan Debt, Be Rejected for Mortgage Loans Than White Home Buyers (Feb. 17, 2021), NAR (as of May 2, 2022).

[550] Chen, The Resilience of New York's Black Homeowners (Aug. 17, 2021), The New York Times (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[551] Aronowitz et al., The Unequal Costs of Black Homeownership, Massachusetts Institute of Technology Golub Center for Finance and Policy (Oct. 1, 2020), MIT (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[552] Ibid.

[553] Choi et al., Three Differences Between Black and White Homeownership that Add to the Housing Wealth Gap (Feb. 28, 2019), Urban Institute (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[554] Kapfidze, Black Homebuyers More Likely to Be Denied Mortgages Than Other Homebuyers (Jul. 7, 2020), Lending Tree (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[555] Toxic Communities, supra, at pp. 153, 179-180, 183, see also Carter, From Exclusion to Destitution: Race, Affordable Housing, and Homelessness, Cityscape: A Journal of Policy Development and Research, Vol. 13, No. 1 (2011) at p. 38.

[556] Consumer-Lending Discrimination in Fintech Era (November 2019), University of California Berkeley.

[557] 2020 Segregation and Integration Map (2020), Othering and Belonging Institute (as of May 1, 2022).

[558] Logan & Stults, supra, note 19, at pp. 6-9. See Appendix A for segregation measurements in these cities.

[559] Home Lending to Communities of Color in California (Feb. 2022), Greenlining Institute. p. 13, Figure 2.

[560] See Appendix A for data on inequity in home purchase loans in California metro areas. Home Lending to Communities of Color in California (Feb. 2022), pp. 59-82.

[561] Werblin et al., Greenlining Institute., Locked Out of the Market: Poor Access to Home Loans For Californians of Color (June 2017) p. 9. Table 1 and Figure 1, p. 9.

[562] National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders (1967). The Kerner Report. Princeton University Press. p. 2.

[563] National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders (1967). The Kerner Report. Princeton University Press. p. 2.

[564] Spieler, Racism Has Shaped Public Transit, and it's Riddled with Inequities, Rice University, Kinder Institute for Urban Research. August 24 2020; Sánchez, et al., Moving to Equity: Addressing Inequitable Effects of Transportation Policies on Minorities (2003), The Civil Rights Project at Harvard University (as of May 1, 2022).

[565] Montag, Water/Color: A Study of Race and the Water Affordability Crisis in America's Cities, (2019), p. 3, NAACP, The Thurgood Marshall Institute at the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund..

[566] Id. at pp. 10-12.

[567] Office of Environmental Health Hazard Assessment, Achieving the Human Right to Water in California: An Assessment of the State's Community Water Systems, California Environmental Protection Agency (Jan. 2021), pp. 105-107 (as of May 1, 2022).

[568] Love & Vey, To Build Safe Streets, We Need to Address Racism in Urban Design, (Aug. 28, 2019) Brookings Institute (as of May 1, 2022); Fighting For Equitable Transportation: Why It Matters, Safe Routes to School National Partnership (2015), pp. 1-2.

[569] Williams-Tack, From Redlining to Restorative Justice: Anti-Black Racism and Energy Insecurity Go Hand in Hand in America (Feb. 2021).

[570] Fleischman & Franklin, Fumes Across the Fence-Line: Health Impacts of Air Pollution from Oil and Gas Facilities on African American Communities, NAACP & Clean Air Task Force (Nov. 2017) pp. 9-11.

[571] Chapman et al., Parks and an Equitable Recovery: A Trust for Public Land Special Report (May 27, 2021); Rigolon, A complex landscape of inequity in access to urban parks: A literature review, (2016); Borunda, How 'nature deprived' neighborhoods impact the health of people of color, National Geographic (July 29, 2020).

[572] Hoffman et al., The Effects of Historical Housing Policies on Resident Exposure to Intra-Urban Heat: A Study of 108 US Urban Areas, (Jan. 13, 2020) Climate.

[573] Ibid.; Strife & Downey, Childhood Development and Access to Nature: A New Direction for Environmental Inequality Research (Mar. 2009) Organ and Environ.Vol. 22(1) 99-122.

[574] Gailes et al., The Roots of Structural Racism Project: Twenty-First Century Racial Residential Segregation in the United States, (June 21, 2021), Othering and Belonging Institute

[575] Carter, From Exclusion to Destitution: Race, Affordable Housing, and Homelessness, Cityscape: A Journal of Policy Development and Research, Vol. 13, No. 1 (2011), p. 37.

[576] Richardson et al., Nat. Community Reinvestment Coalition, The Lasting Impact of Historic "Redlining" on Neighborhood Health: Higher Prevalence of COVID-19 Risk Factors (2020) pp. 23, 26-27.

[577] Id. at 13.

[578] Id. at 11.

[579] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (December 7, 2021), Testimony of Dr. Joseph Gibbons(as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[580] Carter, From Exclusion to Destitution: Race, Affordable Housing, and Homelessness, Cityscape: A Journal of Policy Development and Research, Vol. 13, No. 1 (2011) at p. 37; Patel et al, Black, Homeless, and Burdened by L.A.'s Legacy of Racism, (Dec. 22, 2019) N.Y. Times.

[581] Johnson, African Americans and Homelessness: Moving Through History, (March 2010) 40:4 J. of Black Studies 583–605 (as of May 1, 2022).

[582] Id. at p. 596.

[583] Id. at p. 601.

[584] Id. at p. 584.

[585] Id. at p. 587.

[586] Id. at pp. 592-93.

[587] Id. at p. 596.

[588] Ibid.

[589] Ibid.

[590] Id. at p. 600.

[591] Henry et al, The 2020 Annual Homeless Assessment Report (AHAR) to Congress (Jan. 2021), p. 1.

[592] Johnson, supra, at p. 600.

[593] Ibid.

[594] Ibid.

[595] "Housing Discrimination against Racial and Ethnic Minorities 2012," HUD. 2013 Introduction pp. XI- XXIV.

[596] Wildeman, Parental Incarceration, Child Homelessness, and the Invisible Consequences of Mass Imprisonment, Princeton, pp. 2-6.

[597] HUD 2017 Continuum of Care Homeless Assistance Programs Homeless Populations and Subpopulations, U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (Nov. 7, 2017).

[598] Anderson et al, Providing Affordable Family Housing and Reducing Residential Segregation by Income: A Systematic Review (2003), American Journal of Preventive Medicine, p. 49.

[599] Los Angeles Homeless Services Authority, Report And Recommendations Of The Ad Hoc Committee On Black People Experiencing Homelessness (Dec. 2018), p. 19 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[600] National Low Income Housing Coalition, Racial Disparities Among Extremely Low-Income Renters (Apr. 15, 2019), NLIHC (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[601] Rothstein, supra, at pp.180-183.

[602] Early et al., Racial Rent Differences in U.S. Housing Markets: Evidence from the Housing Voucher Program (Dec. 20, 2018) 59 Journal of Regional Science 669, 671 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[603] National Low Income Housing Coalition, Racial Disparities Among Extremely Low-Income Renters (Apr. 15, 2019), NLIHC (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[604] Ibid.

[605] Ibid.

[606] Desilver, As National Eviction Ban Expires, A Look at Who Rents and Who Owns in the U.S. (Aug. 2, 2021), Pew Research Center (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[607] Wedeen, Black and Hispanic Renters Face Greatest Threat of Eviction in Pandemic (Jan. 11, 2021), Joint Center for Housing Studies of Harvard University (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[608] Urban Displacement Project, What Are Gentrification and Displacement (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[609] Richardson et al., Gentrification and Disinvestment 2020 (June 2020), National Community Reinvestment Coalition (as of May 2, 2022).

[610] Urban Displacement Project, What Are Gentrification and Displacement (as of May 2, 2022).

[611] Ibid.

[612] Decimated Fillmore, supra.

[613] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (December 7, 2021), Testimony of Darrell Owens(as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[614] Ibid.

[615] Hepler, The Hidden Toll of California's Black Exodus (Jul. 15, 2020) CalMatters (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[616] Ibid.

[617] Ibid.

[618] Reyes et al., A Portrait of Race and Ethnicity in California: An Assessment of Social and Economic Well-Being (2001), Public Policy Institute of California, p. 12 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[619] Kaplan, Is My Little Library Contributing to the Gentrification of my Black Neighborhood? (Dec. 5, 2019), N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[620] U.S. Interagency Counsel on Homelessness, California Homelessness Statistics (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[621] Ibid.

[622] Cimini, Black People Disproportionately Homeless in California (Feb. 27, 2021), CalMatters (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[623] Ibid.

[624] California State Assembly Housing and Community Development and Banking and Finance Committees, Addressing Racial Disparities in Housing Background Paper (Mar. 25, 2021), p. 4 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[625] California Housing Finance Agency, Black Homeownership Initiative: Building Black Wealth (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[626] California Housing Finance Agency, Underserved Communities (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[627] Ibid.

[628] Denney et al., Burdens and Benefits: Investigating Prop. 13's Unequal Impacts in Oakland (Feb. 2022), p. 4 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[629] California State Assembly Housing and Community Development and Banking and Finance Committees, Addressing Racial Disparities in Housing Background Paper (Mar. 25, 2021), p. 4 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[630] Patel et al., Black, Homeless, and Burdened by LA's Legacy of Racism (Dec. 22, 2019), N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[631] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (December 7, 2021), Testimony of Brandon Greene(as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[632] Ibid.

[633] Spieler, Racism Has Shaped Public Transit, and It's Riddled with Inequities (Aug. 24, 2020), Rice University Kinder Institute for Urban Research (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[634] Ibid.

[635] Ibid.

[636] Ibid.

[637] Rowland-Shea et al., The Nature Gap: Confronting Racial and Economic Disparities in the Destruction and Protection of Nature in America (July 21, 2020), Center for American Progress (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[638] Wilson, Stats Show Black and Indigenous People Suffer Disproportionate Road Deaths (Jun. 23, 2021), Streetsblog USA (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[639] Tanner, An Overview of Poverty and Inequality in California (Oct. 21, 2021), CATO Institute (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[640] Manhertz, Home Value Disparities Between Races are Shrinking, but Remain Very Wide (Dec. 19, 2020), Zillow (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[641] Perry, supra.

[642] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (December 7, 2021), Testimony of Dr. Joseph Gibbons (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[643] Kaplan, sup

[644] Rothstein, supra, at pp. vii-xvii.

[645] Manhertz, supra.

[646] Anderson, Redlining's Legacy of Inequality: $212,000 Less Home Equity, Low Homeownership Rates For African American Families (Oct. 15, 2020), Redfin (as of Apr. 26, 2022). .

[647] Ibid.

[648] Loewen, supra, at pp. 102-03, 293.

[649] Id. at p. 338.

[650] Id. at pp. 100, 239-240.

[651] Id. at p. 49.

[652] Id. at pp. 14, 112

[653] Id. at pp. 100, 236, 255.

[654] Id. at pp. 23, 333.

[655] Id. at p. 5.

[656] Id. at p. 276.

[657] Id. at p. 258.

[658] Id. at p. 239.

[659] Id. at p. 340.

[660] Id. at pp. 75, 258.

[661] Id. at pp. 347, 410.

[662] Id. at pp. 14, 227.

CHAPTER 6 Separate and Unequal Education

COURTESY OF DICK DEMARSICO/LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Black children on their way to school pass mothers protesting integration. (1965)

I. Introduction

Nationally

A quality education is the foundation for a good job, income growth, and, in the words of the Supreme Court of California, "for the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people."[1] During slavery, the government of the United States of America at all levels, including the government of the State of California, deprived 11 generations of African Americans of the benefits of a quality education.

After slavery, governments in the United States required nearly all Black children to attend segregated schools with far fewer resources and funding than the schools white children attended.[2] In many schools today, these separate and unequal education conditions continue for African American children. The benefits of a good education—a better job and higher income—build up over generations.[3] Just as benefits mount and increase, so too, do the harms. For hundreds of years, governments at all levels in America have inflicted compounding educational harm upon African American children, and they have never made sufficient amends.

During the slavery era, in order to control the African American enslaved people who toiled to build the wealth of this country, enslaving states denied education to nearly all enslaved people.[4] Free states of the North and Midwest segregated their schools and limited or denied freed African Americans access.[5] With rare exceptions, African Americans could not go to college.[6]

After the Civil War, southern states and others on the borders denied equal education to free Black people to maintain a servant class and prevent Black people from voting.[7] Until 1945, state governments legally segregated African American children in principally one room schoolhouses with fewer resources and funding than white schools. White terrorist groups, supported by government officials, destroyed African American schools.[8] In the rest of the nation, government supported housing segregation and neighborhood-based school assignment policies sent most African American children to schools that were separate from white students and unequal with respect to both funding and resources. Most state-funded and private white colleges and universities refused to admit African American students.

The Supreme Court's landmark 1954 case, Brown v. Board of Education, which outlawed school segregation on paper, did not mark the end of segregation, as some Americans believe.[9] Many white government actors throughout the country aggressively resisted integration—shutting down public schools, harassing, threatening, and terrorizing Black students and parents who sought to integrate schools, and providing vouchers for white students to attend newly created private schools.[10] In the rest of the country, government actors created and preserved school segregation through housing segregation and neighborhood-based school assignment policies.

The Supreme Court's landmark 1954 case, Brown v. Board of Education, which outlawed school segregation on paper, did not mark the end of segregation in reality. Today, in America, the vast majority of Black children remain locked into unequal schools and classrooms, separate from their white peers.

Today, in America, the vast majority of African American children remain locked into unequal schools and classrooms, separate from their white peers. With regard to higher education, predominantly white colleges and universities slowly increased the number of African American students attending for about 40 years following the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. However, in more recent years, the overall number of African American students attending college has declined.

California

Before the Civil War, California also denied education to African Americans or forced them to attend segregated schools with far fewer resources and funding than the schools white children attended.[11] For a period of time, California law provided state funding only based on the number of white children in each county, and also allowed public school districts to refuse to teach African American children even in a segregated school under certain circumstances.[12] Although California law officially ended segregated schooling for African American students in 1890, as in the rest of the nation, government officials created less obvious, but equally effective policies to keep African American children in mostly African American, underfunded schools.[13]

Today, in California many African American students continue to attend unequally funded, under-resourced, and highly segregated public schools due to government policies that continue to segregate many schools and school funding by neighborhood. Recently, California has tried to provide a more equitable funding system by providing more state money to school districts that serve our poorest students. However, the system does not ensure that the money is actually spent on those students, many of whom are African American children, and there is some evidence that this is a reason that African American students continue to be the lowest performing sub-group in California.

Section II of this Chapter describes the laws, policies, and practices during slavery which denied education to African Americans. Section III focuses on the period after the Civil War until the present and the laws, policies, and practices that created the segregated and unequal primary and secondary schooling experienced by the vast majority of African American students to this day. Section IV describes how laws, policies, and practices denied African Americans equal access to higher education. Section V of this Chapter describes how our nation excludes the experience of African Americans when educating our children and the resulting negative impacts. Section VI summarizes the ongoing and compounding harms suffered by African Americans.

II. Denial of Education During Slavery

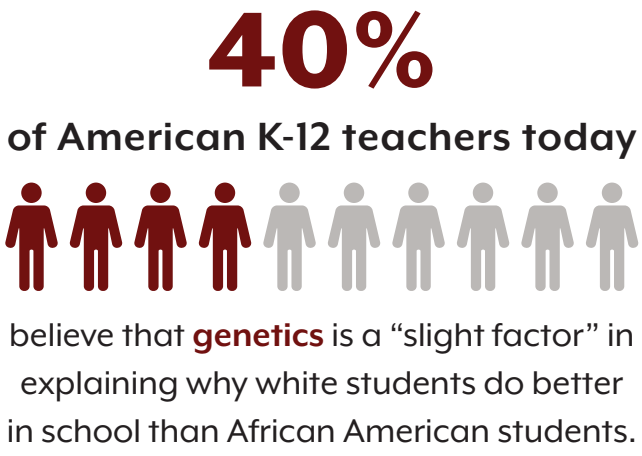
Racist pseudo-scientific theories about the false inferiority of African Americans spread in the decades before the Civil War and justified prohibiting their education. Most enslaving states formally outlawed the education of enslaved African Americans, so enslaved people who sought to learn to read and write had no choice but to do so in secret, and at great risk to themselves. While African Americans were enslaved and banned from schooling in the South, their labor helped pay for public schools in some states in the North. Schooling available to free African Americans in the North was mostly in segregated schools with fewer resources. At several schools that attempted to provide integrated education to African Americans, white Americans subjected teachers and students to threats, harassment, and terror.

In California, for a period of time, laws intended to enforce segregated schooling also withheld state money from schools that taught African American children and allowed school districts to deny education to African American children altogether, under certain circumstances. Even when local governments provided money and resources to support African American schools, white schools disproportionately received greater funding and resources.

America's Leaders Promote Racist Pseudoscience

In Notes on the State of Virginia, Thomas Jefferson "proposed that black inferiority—'in the endowment of both body and mind'—might be an unchangeable law of nature."[14] Some scholars argue that Jefferson's statements became an important first document of racist scientific theories that were popular in the decades before the Civil War.[15] Some of the so-called "race scientists" graduated from elite northern colleges and claimed that African American people were subhuman and not descendants of Adam and Eve to support, as one scholar argues, "the self-image of the nation's white supremacist majority."[16]

Even Abraham Lincoln also believed that white people were superior to African American people, stating in his famous debate with Stephen Douglas: "I as much as any other man am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race."[17] Other early leaders of America, including Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, and Benjamin Rush, a Founding Father who has been called the father of American psychiatry, endorsed these false ideas about the inferiority of African Americans that served to justify education prohibitions.[18] Scientists later proved that these "race scientists" were wrong in the racist theories used by government officials and private citizens to justify slavery and discrimination.[19] See also Chapter 12, Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect, which discusses studies finding no biological difference between African American and white people. A recent 2019 Education Week survey suggests that these racist theories live on among America's teachers today.[20] The survey found that more than 40 percent of American teachers incorrectly believe that genetics is "a slight factor" in explaining why white students do better in school than African American students.[21]



The South

During more than 250 years of slavery, state governments prohibited education of African Americans, except for certain religious education.[22] In fact, the institution of slavery depended, in part, on enslaved African American people remaining uneducated.[23] Frederick Douglass' former enslaver forbade him from learning to read, as "[a] nigger should know nothing but to obey his master – to do as he is told to do."[24]

Most enslaving states formally outlawed teaching an enslaved person to read or write as early as 1740.[25] Enslaved people caught learning to read or write in states where this was outlawed could face prison, public whipping, or be threatened with having a finger or arm cut off.[26] When religious education was permitted, it generally taught enslaved people basic reading but not writing, because learning to write could help an enslaved person escape.[27] Some enslaved African Americans sought out instruction provided in secret. For example, Douglass secretly taught other enslaved people how to read, and described "[t]he work of instructing my dear fellow-slaves" as "the sweetest engagement with which I was ever blessed. We loved each other, and to leave them at the close of the Sabbath was a severe cross indeed."[28] As a result of such secret lessons taught by enslaved people, free African Americans, and some white Americans,[29] about 10 percent of African Americans in the South learned to read by 1865.[30]

The Rest of the Country

In the North, African Americans were more likely to have basic reading and writing skills. African Americans sometimes attended schools that were mostly segregated, either through government policy or local practice.[31] In some places, state and local officials prohibited African Americans from opening schools, and white Americans harassed and threatened teachers of African American students until they stopped teaching. In some places, white Americans also vandalized or destroyed schools that permitted African American students to attend.[32] For example, in 1832, when a white school master in Connecticut named Prudence Crandall, began enrolling African American students in the small school that Crandall ran out of her home, white townspeople forced her out of her own home.[33] White parents withdrew their children.[34] Crandall eventually enrolled 20 African American students.[35]

On May 24, 1833, the Connecticut legislature passed a "Black Law," prohibiting any school from teaching African American students from outside the state without permission.[36] Local officials arrested Crandall because she kept her school open. She spent the night in jail and charges were brought against her. Then, in January 1834, vandals set the school on fire.[37] Crandall finally closed the school in September 1834 after white townspeople broke 90 panes of glass on her home using iron bars.[38] This was the second unsuccessful attempt to establish a school for African American students in the state.[39]

While African Americans were enslaved and banned from schooling in the South, their labor helped pay for public schools in some states in the North.[40] Enslaved people worked for free in the South picking cotton, and their labor in the South created great wealth for the textile manufacturers in the North. By the early 1830s, New England mills consumed such large quantities of cotton from the South—78 million pounds of cotton fiber per year—that the United States became the second largest producer of textiles in the world.[41] This textile industry in the North paid taxes. These taxes helped to fund the public schools in New England. During slavery, due to government policies and local practices, very few African American students were permitted to attend these public schools, even though the labor of African Americans enslaved in the South helped fund them. During this time, the federal government also supported enslavers kidnapping African Americans in the North who had escaped from slavery to re-enslave them in the South, where they were again denied education.[42] See Chapter 2 Enslavement for further discussion of related issues.

During the 1800s, African American students generally could not receive an education beyond high school because it was legal for colleges and universities to refuse to admit African American students.[43] In response, free African Americans, often affiliated with African American churches, established the first African American colleges and universities.[44] Until the early 1900s, these schools mostly offered middle and high school level education to African Americans who had been prohibited from attending school.[45] By the eve of the Civil War, only 28 of the nation's nearly four million newly freed enslaved people had received bachelor's degrees from American colleges.[46]

California

California became a state in 1850, a decade before the onset of the Civil War. Despite the anti-enslavement clause in California's constitution, enslavers brought several hundred African American enslaved people to California and generally denied them education.[47] The early California legislature, dominated by white southerners from enslaving states, revd the school liseaws to enforce segregated schooling.[48] See Chapter 2 Enslavement for further discussion of related issues. These state lawmakers successfully enforced segregated schools to deter racial intermixing.[49] California's State Superintendent of Public Instruction Andrew Jackson Moulder, who served from 1857 to 1862 stated: "[I]f this attempt to force Africans, Chinese, and the Diggers [Native Americans] into our schools is persisted in, it must result in the ruin of our school."[50]

As early as 1855, California enacted a law calculating how much the State of California would fund a school "in proportion to the number of white children" in each county, so that local governments would not receive any extra money from the state when they taught an African American student.[51] Superintendent Moulder later influenced a California law in 1863 that withheld state funds from schools that taught African American and Chinese children.[52] So, although California taxed African American people to pay for the state's public schools, African American Californians' taxes only paid for the education of white children, and they had no right to education for their own children.

While African Americans were enslaved and banned from schooling in the South, their labor helped pay for public schools in some states in the North.

Because of both of these laws, local governments, instead of the state, paid to educate nonwhite students. Further, those local governments that ran schools for African American students generally provided less funding and resources for African American schools in comparison to white schools. For example, six years after the first all-Black school was established in 1854 in the basement of a San Francisco church,[53] the San Francisco School Superintendent George Tait stated to his school board that: "[T]he room occupied by this school for the past few years is disgraceful to any civilized community" and was "squalid, dark, and unhealthy."[54]

In 1864, the state changed the law to allow school districts to provide education to African American students in a segregated classroom or school if requested in writing by "the parents or guardians of 10 or more colored children."[55] This meant that if fewer than 10 students lived in the district, California law also allowed public school districts to refuse to teach African American children at all. In 1866, the state changed the law again to allow white parents to prevent African American students from attending their children's schools, if a majority of parents objected in writing.[56]

A California law passed in 1855 withheld state funds from schools that taught Black and Chinese children. So although California taxed African Americans to pay for the state's public schools, a Black Californian's taxes only paid for the education of white children, and they had no right to education for their own children.

Because of these state laws, African American children were forced into separate public schools or out of the public-school system altogether. In response, African American women in Sacramento, Oakland, and San Francisco led efforts to organize church-based schools, private schools, and separate free-standing public schools.[57]

In the mid-1860s, African American students across California were also generally denied access to public middle and high schools. Few public middle and high schools existed at the time, and California refused to fund and provide separate public middle and high schools for African American students, in part, because of the 1864 state law that permitted school districts not to provide a school where African American students were few in number.[58]

III. Unequal Primary and Secondary Education

Nationally

Formerly enslaved African Americans had a fundamental belief in the value of literate culture and this belief was expressed through their efforts to secure education for themselves and for their children.[59] For the first decade after the Civil War, African Americans and the politicians they elected, successfully fought for and built the South's public-school system, through a series of legislative and constitutional enactments.[60] Prior to the concerted leadership of freed African American leaders, none of the southern states had a universal public education system.[61] As African American political leaders passed laws and set aside funding to create a public education system for all children, African American students could attend schools in their communities.

However, government expansion of schooling for illiterate African Americans threatened white economic domination.[62] According to J.L.M. Curry, an Alabama state legislator in 1889, "[e]ducation would spoil a good plow hand."[63] So, even as educational opportunities for Black people in former enslaving states expanded, after reconstruction, white-led governments and organizations created a web of government-approved policies and tactics, including burning schools down, to continue to deny Black people education and maintain legalized school segregation.[64] So, even though African Americans led the creation of the public education system in the South, white students ultimately benefited far more than African American students.

Denying education or quality education to African Americans was also critical to denying African Americans political power and maintaining white political supremacy.[65] For example, most former enslaving states suppressed the African American vote by imposing a "literacy test" for voters and selectively enforcing it against African American people.[66] See Chapter 4, Political Disenfranchisement for a further discussion of this topic. The vast majority of the policies and practices that created unequal and segregated schools for African Americans in the South lasted another 100 years. Many continue to live on today in different forms.

African Americans Led the Creation of the Southern Public Education System

In the immediate aftermath of the Civil War, the vast majority of African American people lived in the South. Formerly enslaved African Americans identified education as essential. Black-dominated Reconstruction-era legislatures in the South passed laws to create the public education system in the South. "The whites [in the South] had always regarded the public school system of the North with contempt. The [African American] freedman introduced and established it and it stands today a living testimony to his faith that education is necessary to social welfare," said Colonel Richard P. Hallowell, Union Army and Pennsylvania Freedmen's Relief Association.[67]

African American men, recently allowed to vote and hold political office, helped draft new state constitutions in the South that mandated public education.[68] During Reconstruction, they served on federal and state legislatures that passed the bills to provide funding to the new schools.[69] African American political leaders worked in interracial political coalitions with white Republicans (generally poor whites or Northern transplants) to establish the South's universal public-school system, what historians have called "the crown of Reconstruction."[70] The Freedmen's Bureau Act of 1865 also helped set-up some schools for African American people who had been newly freed,[71] although the federal government ended the Freedmen's Bureau Act after just seven years.[72]

Despite this setback and other obstacles and even after federal troops withdrew from the South in 1877, African Americans who already knew how to read and write, shared their knowledge with others in their communities.[73] When, as described further below, African American communities did not receive the necessary funding from post-reconstruction white government officials to afford to pay teacher salaries, African Americans sought financial assistance and teacher recruitment from federal agencies and benevolent organizations in the North.[74] Given the unwillingness of white property owners to rent or sell to African Americans and the refusal of white-led post-reconstruction governments to properly fund schools, African Americans also struggled to access buildings that they could use as schoolhouses.[75] Nonetheless, African American communities worked together to overcome these obstacles. Since most African American churches were owned by African American congregations, churches were often utilized as schoolhouses.[76] Local residents often gathered together to apply liquid slate to the side walls of the church to create chalkboards to also use these buildings for schooling.[77]

From 1908 to 1968, some of one-hundred-plus Black teachers in rural communities in 13 states (whose salaries were funded by a northern philanthropist) utilized their positions not only to teach Black students but to advocate for improvements to their schools, public health, living conditions, and teacher training.[78] Influential educators such as Nannie Helen Burroughs, an African American woman who was denied a teaching position at a public school in D.C., decided that if she could not get a job as a teacher, she would start her own school.[79] Burroughs refused to rely on white donors and instead relied on donations from community members, which enabled her to establish the Training School for Women and Girls in D.C. by 1909.[80] Although Burroughs' school taught vocational skills as well, her school differed in that she assisted women in becoming politically and financially autonomous in order to empower Black women to be "public thinkers and not just public doers."[81]

The persistence and enthusiasm of African Americans created schools for African Americans within their communities when white-led southern government refused to fund them.

Racial Terror

As discussed in Chapter 3 Racial Terror, after federal troops withdrew from the South in 1877, for the next century, government officials supported private citizens who terrorized African Americans and African American institutions with impunity. White Americans burned a number of African American schools and churches housing African American schools to the ground.[82] White-American-led post-reconstruction governments closed African American public schools and fired African American teachers.[83] A unanimous Supreme Court effectively authorized the elimination of high school for African American students.[84] Hundreds of thousands of African American youth and adults were essentially re-enslaved on trumped up charges upheld by federal and local judges and police, and forced to labor for white-led U.S. companies and plantation owners under conditions that were as brutal, or even more so, than those endured during slavery.[85] A number of those re-enslaved were pre-teens and teenagers, some were children under the age of 10.[86] They were not enrolled in school. The unpaid labor of these re-enslaved African Americans also built wealth for white-led companies and plantation owners.[87] See Chapter 11, An Unjust Legal System for further discussion of related issues.

Segregation by Law

From the mid-1860s to 1954, legal segregation laws operating in 17 former enslaving states forced African Americans into segregated and unequal schools.[88] By the 1880s, a series of U.S. Supreme Court cases had severely limited the federal government's power to enforce Reconstruction civil rights legislation intended to protect African Americans, leaving enforcement in the hands of white-led state and local governments.[89] This cleared the way for the Supreme Court in 1896 to endorse the idea that requiring African Americans to be "separate" from whites in nearly every facet of life could be consistent with equality.[90] During the long period of segregation, African Americans attended schools that were intentionally under-resourced and structured for the purpose of maintaining a servant class.[91]

In May 1911, after completing a study of the conditions of Black schools across the South, W.E.B. Du Bois concluded that the schools were in "a deplorable condition," worse off than 20 years prior "with poorer teaching, less supervision and comparatively few facilities."

Double-Taxation for African American Schools

After Reconstruction, white former enslavers created a state tax system designed to underfund education for African Americans. Some states ordered that schools for African American children be paid for exclusively by taxes on African American parents.[92] In these states, no white taxpayer paid for the education of an African American child, but African Americans paid for the education of both African American and white children.[93] This dual-tax system created huge differences in the amount of money spent to educate African American and white children.[94]

In practice, this meant that many African Americans in the early 1900s had to pay double to receive less in education.[95] In southern states, the disparity could be as high as 10 dollars per white student for a single dollar given to fund an African American student's education.[96] In the 1930s, a local school superintendent in Louisiana reported bluntly: "We have twice as many colored children of school age as we have white, and we use their money. Colored children are mighty profitable to us."[97]

The same African Americans were forced to donate additional land and money to support African American schools because the state did not send enough money for African American schools.[98] For example, when in the 1930s a fire destroyed classroom furniture and equipment in a Louisiana school, according to a local newspaper, the city refused to pay to replace any of the destroyed items. Instead, the tax dollars were given to the white school and African American parents would have to raise the money to repair the school.[99]

COURTESY OF LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Schoolhouse for Black students near Summerville, South Carolina. (1938)

Inferior Resources, Funding, and Time

By the late 1890s, African Americans in former slaveholding states had "been shunted into their own inferior . . . schools" through an "unfettered grab by white supremacists," according to one historian.[100] The schools they attended were often in terrible condition and lacking in basic facilities, such as desks and chairs and working windows.[101] These schools generally included fewer grade levels of education.[102] White school authorities intentionally selected the least-qualified teaching applicants and pushed a curriculum focused on "industrial work," e.g., canning, sewing, and woodworking.[103] In May 1911, after completing a study of the conditions African American schools across the South, W.E.B. Du Bois concluded that the state of segregated elementary schools for African Americans in the South and in border states is in "a deplorable condition," worse off than 20 years prior "with poorer teaching, less supervision and comparatively few facilities."[104]

The disparities in funding were also severe. White schools received on average five to eight times more government funding than African American schools in nearly all former enslaving states.[105] In the 1930s in Louisiana, African American teachers and principals made on average only 43% of what white teachers and principals made—$499 a year compared to $1,165.[106] Similarly, in Mississippi, African American teachers and principals made just $215 a year, while white teachers and principals made

$630 a year.[107] For African American teachers, as Isabel Wilkerson writes in The Warmth of Others Suns, this meant "even the most promising of colored people, having received next to nothing in material assets from their slave foreparents, had to labor with the knowledge that they were now being underpaid by more than half, that they were so behind it would be all but impossible to accumulate the assets their white counterparts could, and that they would, by definition, have less to leave succeeding generations than similar white families."[108]

During segregation, compared to white students, African American students attended school

3-4 months LESS than white students every year

In addition, the number of months African American students attended school was generally fewer than white students, e.g., four-to-five months in comparison to six-to-eight months for white students.[109] The causes included lack of sufficient funding for schools in rural communities, where many African Americans lived, white farm owners forcing African American children to work in the fields (or their sharecropping parents needing assistance), and government limits on the number of months that an African American school would be funded in comparison to a white school.[110]

Despite the inferior quality of African American schools, some prominent thinkers such as W.E.B. Du Bois, suggested that integrated schools would ultimately disadvantage African American students, because the discrimination they would inevitably continue to experience would prevent African Americans from receiving a proper education.[111] He wrote that separate schools were "necessary for the proper education of the Negro race."[112] Moreover, he believed that race prejudice in the United States was such that "most Negroes cannot receive a proper education in white institutions" because the proper education of any group of people required sympathy, understanding, and social equality between teachers and their students.[113]

In his 2014 article in The Atlantic, Ta-Nehisi Coates recounts the story of Clyde Ross, a student who was encouraged to attend a more challenging African American school outside of his community built with funds from a philanthropist and resources amassed by African American community members, who also donated physical labor to actually build the schools.[114] The school was too far away from Ross' home for him to walk there and get back in time to work in the fields. Local white children had a school bus. But Ross and other African American children did not. Thus, Ross lost out on the opportunity for a better education.[115] For many African American students, the school that Ross was encouraged to attend was the first ever available to them in their community. In yet another way, African Americans paid twice. They devoted funds and their own labor to build a school for their children while also paying taxes that supported better schools for white students.

In spite of concerted state efforts to deny them equal educational opportunities, African American Southerners achieved a literacy rate of 43 percent by 1890, a rate of growth that far surpassed the rise of literacy in Spain and Italy during the same period and that continued to rise in nearly all southern states in the early 1900s.[116] Yet, researchers have found that the "legacies of slavery" compounded by the many obstacles that African American children faced in acquiring education show a correlation with high rates of illiteracy among African Americans nearly 80 years after slavery ended.[117]

Resistance to Integration

In 1951, African American students led the fight for desegregation[118] and, in 1954, the Supreme Court declared race-based segregation in public schools unconstitutional in its Brown v. Board of Education decision.[119] Although many Americans believed that the Supreme Court's Brown decision was the end of school segregation, it was not. After the Brown decision, all across the country, many white Americans and white state and local governments refused to implement the Court's order, while the federal government failed to adequately

COURTESY OF BUYENLARGE VIA GETTY IMAGES

African American boy watching a group of people, some carrying American flags, march past to protest the admission of the "Little Rock Nine" to Central High School. (c. 1958)

90% of the south's Congressional delegation

Signed the "Southern Manifesto" pledging to fight integration using any means at their disposal.

enforce the order and protect African American teachers, school administrators, and students.

In former enslaving states, white-controlled government school boards, and state and municipal governments almost universally refused to comply with Brown in what historians have called the "era of massive resistance."[120] On May 12, 1956, 90 percent of the south's Congressional delegation signed the "Southern Manifesto" pledging to fight integration using any means at their disposal. [121] These lawmakers and others in southern states made good on their promise.

Some white Americans in the South used violence, harassment, and threats to stop integration. They attacked African American students and terrorized some African American families who dared to enroll their children in white public schools. For example, in Arkansas, on September 4, 1957, when nine African American students went to enroll in Little Rock's all-white Central High School, Arkansas Governor Orval Faubus ordered the Arkansas National Guard to form a blockade around the school's front door to keep the students out. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) had to get a federal court order to make the National Guard stand down. But even with the court's order, the students were still not safe to enter because of the threat of white mob violence. Only after Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. sent a plea for protection to President Eisenhower, did the federal government act. The federal government brought in 1,000 Army paratroopers and ordered the National Guard to provide an escort for the students as they entered the school. Twenty-one days after the nine African American students – now known as the "Little Rock Nine" –first tried to attend the high school, they were finally able to enter. As they walked in, angry white crowds of students and adults yelled racial insults and threw objects at them. Rather than allow integration to go forward in other schools, Governor Faubus then closed all public high schools in Little Rock for the 1958 to 1959 school year.[122] Throughout their time in the school, the Little Rock Nine reported enduring severe harassment, including physical violence from some white students. Several years later on the eve of graduation, the home of Carlotta Walls, one of the Little Rock Nine was bombed by white supremacists.[123]

In Mississippi when then-NAACP civil rights attorney Derrick Bell filed a lawsuit to integrate one community's schools, he described how nightriders came through the community firing guns into African American homes.[124] African Americans who signed petitions to integrate the schools lost their jobs or had their credit cut off by merchants.[125] Because of the severe intimidation and harassment by the white community, only one African American family was ultimately willing to send their child to the white school.[126] When the child, Debra, arrived at school, a large crowd jeered and marshals had to escort her into the school.[127] Debra's father lost his job the same day, and white Americans attempted to burn their house down.[128]

Rather than allow integration to go forward in other schools, Governor Faubus then closed all public high schools in Little Rock for the 1958 to 1959 school year.

Southern states also passed laws to close both white and African American public schools, deny state money for any schools that integrated, and provided vouchers or "freedom-of-choice" to over 3,000 newly created private schools for white students.[129] For several years, African American students in certain areas in the South had no school to attend at all.[130] In Georgia, Governor Herman Talmadge, who fiercely opposed public school integration, told the public at a press conference that the only solution to a public school segregation ban was "abolition of the public school system."[131]

The Supreme Court also contributed to the slow progress of desegregation. When asked to decide how quickly school districts across the country must desegregate, the Supreme Court answered that schools could do so with "all deliberate speed."[132] One federal judge who heard cases filed by African Americans challenging the failure to desegregate schools for almost 10 years, concluded that the effect of the Supreme Court's decision was to "sacrifice[] individual and immediate vindication of the newly discovered right of [B]lacks to a desegregated education in favor of a remedy more palatable to whites"[133]

Because of all of these government acts, legal school segregation in many places in the South continued into the 1960s and little desegregation of schools took place.[134] In five Deep South states, 1.4 million African American school children continued to attend a segregated school until the fall of 1960, when integration efforts finally began.[135]

Mass Firings of African American Educators

Federal government and court failure to adequately enforce the Brown v. Board of Education decision had other negative consequences.[136] Southern states engaged in en masse firing of African American teachers and administrators without cause to prevent a white administrator and teacher with the same or overlapping position as a Black administrator or teacher at the newly integrated school from losing their job.[137] In 1955, a federal government staff attorney responded to the firing of Black teachers, stating that: "In a war, there must be some casualties, and perhaps the black teachers will be the casualties in the fight for equal education of black students."[138]

One African American educator affected by the firings told researchers that in his community, the teachers' college for African Americans was closed in the name of integration, and many of the professors who taught there were required to go teach in the high schools. The president of the Black college was "given a central office do-nothing position and then someone with a Master's degree, a [White] high school principal, was named president of [the newly desegregated teachers college]."[139]

Mass firing of Black educators deeply affected the economic, social, and cultural structure of the Black community because many middle-class Black people served in education.[140] It is estimated that Black communities lost millions of dollars as a result. For example, in 1970-71, the Black community in 17 southern states lost an estimated $240 million in salaries.[141]

The mass firings also have had long-standing repercussions, as the presence of Black principals and superintendents remain disproportionately low across America in relation to the number of Black public-school students.[142] Studies show that students who have teachers who look like them do better in school than those who do not. African American students with at least one African American teacher by third grade are 13 percent more likely to graduate high school and 19 percent more likely to enroll in college than African American students who had no African American teachers.[143] However, about 80 percent of teachers and principals and 90 percent of superintendents nationwide are white.[144] African American teachers represent just seven percent and African American male teachers represent just two percent of the teaching force,[145] yet 15 percent of public school students are Black students.[146] Many African American students will go through their educational careers without having an African American teacher.

Other Government-Implemented Tools to Segregate Schools

Whereas in the South, legal segregation laws prohibited African American students from attending schools with white students, in the rest of the country, government actors largely used different but nearly as effective tools to create segregated schools for African American students with less funding and resources. First, federal, state and local housing segregation policies, including redlining and restrictive covenants as described in Chapter 5, Housing Segregation, forced the vast majority of African Americans to live in separate communities from white Americans.[147] School and government officials then assigned African American and white students to attend different schools based on where they lived. In this way, segregated schools were created and maintained.

Black students with at least one Black teacher by third grade are 13 percent more likely to graduate high school and 19 percent more likely to enroll in college than Black students who had no Black teachers.

The schools that African American students attended then received less funding and resources than the schools that white students attended. This occurred because public schools generally obtained a large portion of money from local property taxes raised within the city where the schools were located. As a result, the amount of funding for the school district and school depended on how much could be raised by taxes in each local, segregated community.

The more expensive the properties in a school district, the more money a school district receives. When the federal government along with private actors devalued Black-owned properties, through redlining, they also locked Black students into schools that received far less funding for their schools than the white families in nearby neighborhoods with a higher property tax base.[148]

Some cities' schools outside of the South were also segregated by law for a number of years after the Civil War. For example, segregated schools were not banned until 1920 in New York City.[149] In general, the quality of education received by African American students in these segregated schools was not equal to the quality of education received by white students, because schools largely attended by African American students were underfunded and provided with fewer resources.[150]

Even after the Brown v. Board of Education decision, highly segregated schools fostered through official actions—government implemented housing segregation and school district boundary and assignment policies—also remained largely the rule.[151] White protests against integration, including some that involved violence against African Americans integrating schools, occurred in different places across the country. For example, in February of 1964, after 460,000 African American and Puerto Rican students and their parents called on the New York City Board of Education to integrate majority-student of color schools that were so overcrowded they operated on split shifts—with the school day lasting only four hours for students, and so underfunded that they had inferior facilities and less experienced teachers—15,000 white New York parents staged a counter-protest.[152] Milton Galamison, a civil rights activist and pastor of Siloam Presbyterian Church in Bedford-Stuyvesant, who helped lead the protest to integrate the schools stated: "Nobody can do these children more harm than these children are being done every day in this public school system."[153]

The United States Commission on Civil Rights 1967 study, Racial Isolation in Public Schools, confirmed the nation-wide problem, finding that "violence against [African American people] continues to be a deterrent to school desegregation."[154] The report also found that African American children suffer serious harm when they must attend racially segregated schools, "whatever the source of that segregation might be."[155]

After actively enforcing desegregation from 1965 to 1969, the federal government reduced enforcement of the Civil Rights Act under President Nixon. By the 1980s, roughly half of the nation's children of color resided in the 20 or 30 largest school districts.

In 1968, the Kerner Commission warned President Lyndon Johnson that the nation was "moving toward two societies, one black, one white—separate and unequal" as a result of "[w]hite racism" and white supremacist institutions.[156] After a short period of active coordinated federal effort to enforce desegregation rights from 1965 to 1969, the Nixon Administration curtailed enforcement of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.[157] By the 1980s, roughly half of the nation's children of color resided in the 20 or 30 largest school districts.[158] In urban areas, white Americans continued to fight vehemently against integration. For example, in Boston, schools that served African American children were poorly equipped and understaffed, and badly underfunded. They received about two-thirds the amount of funding received by schools in white neighborhoods.[159] In 1974, after African American families filed suit and a court ordered the city to desegregate its schools, white mobs threw bricks, bottles, and eggs at buses carrying African American students to majority-white schools, injuring nine children.[160]

As white Americans moved into the suburbs, redlining, restrictive covenants, and even violence prevented many African Americans from doing the same. Suburban school district officials drew their boundaries at the city and suburb line, which ensured that African American students living in the inner city would be required to attend inner-city schools, while white children living in the suburbs attended suburban schools. In larger school districts in cities, unless a court desegregation order was in place, districts continued to assign students to schools based on the schools in their neighborhoods. Because the neighborhoods remained segregated by race, the schools continued to be segregated, too.

Intentional segregation in housing by federal and local government actors and the drawing of school district boundaries to mirror school segregation and funding inequities was well-known and documented. But, in 1974, when African American parents asked the Supreme Court to order 53 suburban school districts to participate in the desegregation of the predominantly African American and very under-resourced Detroit city school system, the Court said no.[161] Because the Supreme Court refused to address the government-supported residential segregation that forced African Americans to attend a small subset of American schools, integration was stopped at the city-suburb line.[162] Today, the Detroit city school system remains segregated—approximately 80 percent African American—and severely underfunded and under-resourced.[163]

Then, in 1977, the Supreme Court made it difficult to challenge neighborhood zoning rules, which made it difficult for African Americans to move into largely white residential areas.[164] Professor Derrick Bell noted that the federal government and local governments created racially isolated communities, which in turn "created single-race schools" and then the Supreme Court "insulated these schools from court challenges."[165] After these Supreme Court opinions, lower court judges began to declare school districts desegregated even when the percentage of African American students increased after white Americans moved to the suburbs aided by housing policies that continued to discriminate against African Americans.[166] In general, these federal courts would not find that it was against the law for African American students to attend schools that received far less funding and had far fewer resources than those schools attended mostly by white students.[167]

On July 17, 2001, Harvard University's Civil Rights Project published a study concluding that school districts across the nation had re-segregated or were re-segregating at an alarming rate, particularly in the South. The study linked this re-segregation to a series of Supreme Court cases decided in the early 1990s, which made it easier for school districts to remain segregated.

By the late 1980s, which was considered the peak of integration, schools remained or were returning to being predominantly white and predominantly non-white.[168] Ten years later things had gotten worse. On July 17, 2001, Harvard University's Civil Rights Project published a study concluding that school districts across the nation had re-segregated or were re-segregating at an alarming rate, particularly in the South.[169] The study linked this re-segregation to a series of Supreme Court cases decided in the early 1990s, which made it easier for school districts to remain segregated.[170]

In 2007, the Supreme Court eliminated school districts' ability to use certain types of voluntary local desegregation plans.[171] Five years later a study found that school segregation across the nation was substantially worse than at the high point of desegregation in 1988, and that the typical African American student was in a school where almost two out of every three classmates (64 percent) are low-income, nearly double the level of schools of the typical white or Asian student.[172]

Studies in the last five years continue to find that segregated and unequally resourced schools remain the reality for the vast majority of African American students and other students of color.[173] However, they also note the extraordinary gains that African American students have made, in spite of remaining in segregated and unequally funded and resourced schools. Before the Brown decision, less than a fourth of Black students had graduated from high school; now about nine-tenths of Black students are graduating.[174] Nonetheless, for African Americans to ever attain academic justice, emphasis should be placed not just on the number of African Americans receiving an education, but rather on the quality and content of the education received. As stated by Carter G. Woodson, if the education being provided to African Americans is "of the wrong kind, the increase in numbers [of "educated" African Americans] will be a disadvantage rather than an advantage."[175]

Tracking

After Brown v. Board of Education, in districts and schools that were marginally integrated, African American students faced segregation by other means. School officials were more likely to place African American students into special education programs and inferior vocational, non-diploma, and alternative school tracks than white students. And school officials were more likely to place white students into gifted or accelerated programs than African American students. This practice where educators group students by what they view as the student's abilities is commonly referred to as "tracking."[176]

Studies have shown that tracking, which continues today, is correlated with race,[177] and eliminates the benefits of integration for African American students, like access to college classes and high-quality curriculum.[178]

Researchers explain that teachers, the vast majority of whom are white, function as primary gatekeepers in gifted and talented identification, and are less likely to refer African American students for gifted programs than white students with similar levels of academic achievement.[179] Black students tracked out of the mainstream program are often re-segregated in another classroom within the school or in a setting in another school location.[180] Those placed in "lower tracks" do not receive the same quality of education—they often receive less resources and opportunities.[181]

At the October 12, 2021 Task Force hearing, Professor Rucker Johnson testified to the harms of segregation within schools, including harm to student's health, mental health, school success, and income growth, telling the panel "[t]oo often even when we see what look like diverse schools there are segregated classrooms" and "racialized tracking."[182]

Unequal and Segregated Schools Persist

As of the early 2000s and through today, the vast majority of African American children remain locked into schools separate from their white peers, and possibly more unequal than the schools that their grandparents had attended under legal segregation.[183] The U.S. Government Accountability Office found that, 60 years after Brown v. Board of Education, African American students are increasingly attending segregated, high-poverty schools where they face multiple educational disparities.[184] The U.S. Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights data between 2014 through 2018 shows the same disparities—large and persistent opportunity gaps and fewer education resources for Black students.[185] African American students are less likely to attend schools that offer advanced coursework and math and science courses,[186] and less likely to be placed in gifted and talented programs. Another found that African American students who had been on an accelerated math track consistent with their white and Asian peers were disproportionately removed from that track, so that in high school they were no longer being placed with the highest achievers—thereby reinforcing racial inequality.[187] African American students are also more likely to attend schools with large class sizes and teachers with the least amount of experience and qualifications, and that employ law enforcement officers but no counselors.[188] This can partially be attributed to the fact that urban school districts often times have difficulty attracting and retaining teachers due to the low pay, substandard working conditions, and socioeconomic factors that affect such work environments.[189] Moreover, although many African American students deal with greater social and environmental pressures, schools mostly attended by African Americans fail to place greater emphasis on family counseling and community empowerment.[190]

Nationally, nonwhite school districts get

$23 Billion LESS

than predominantly white districts

In addition, because African American students more often have less qualified teachers than their white peers, they fall further behind in school, and some researchers believe this is one reason for their excess placement in classes that support students with disabilities. In other words, even though they have only fallen behind because they have not received high quality instruction, schools believe incorrectly that they may have a learning or other disability.[191] These school placement and resource allocation decisions matter for student achievement and post-K-12 school outcomes.[192]

Severe funding disparities between schools serving white students and those serving African American students persist as well.[193] Many school districts across the country today continue to be funded primarily by property taxes raised from the school district's local community, even though neighborhoods continue to be segregated by race and income. Federal and state governments have not filled the gaps between high- and low-income districts. According to a study by EdBuild, "[n]ationally, predominantly white school districts get $23 billion more than their nonwhite peers, despite serving a similar number of children" and there is a "$1,500 per student gap between white districts . . . and equally disadvantaged nonwhite districts."[194] This funding differential matters: more school funding improves education quality.[195] In underfunded schools, students also face health and other risks because of the decrepit conditions of their school buildings.[196]

In addition, because Black students more often have less qualified teachers than their white peers, they fall further behind in school, and some researchers believe this is one reason for their excess placement in classes that support students with disabilities.

Discriminatory Use of Discipline and the School-to-Prison Track

African American students are disproportionately subjected to exclusionary discipline with devastating consequences, which include significantly higher risk of dropout and juvenile justice involvement.[197] Over the last three decades, research has shown that African American students are far more likely than white students to be suspended, even when controlling for income level.[198] This disproportionate discipline also extends to preschool, where Department of Education data from the 2013-14 school year showed that Black preschoolers made up 18 percent of preschoolers, but nearly half of all out-of-school suspensions.[199] Overall, African American students made up approximately 16 percent of enrollment, yet they accounted for 40 percent of suspensions nationally during the 2013-14 school year.[200] And African American students were four times more likely to be suspended than their white peers during the 2017-18 school year.[201] Some researchers have shown that even when you control for the type of student misbehavior, African American students are suspended and expelled at far higher rates than their white peers. In short, even when white students and African American students misbehave in the same or similar ways, African American students are more likely to be removed from school for the behavior than their white peers who do the same or similar things.[202] Researchers have also found that the difference in suspension rates between white and African American students accounts for as much as one-fifth of the achievement gap between African American and white students, so if African American students were suspended less then achievement levels should go up.[203]

In addition, African American students are more likely to attend schools with law enforcement on campus and significant security measures, such as metal detectors, random security sweeps and searches, security guards, and security cameras.[204] Having a large police presence and heighted surveillance measures on campus can cause students to feel less bonded to school adults, less engaged in school, more fearful and less trusting of school officials and police, and left with a feeling of alienation because they perceive that adults on campus inherently distrust them.[205]

That schools serving mostly African American students have more law enforcement and fewer counselors is one reason that African American students have more contact with and are also disproportionately referred by schools to law enforcement. Arrests of African American students are higher in schools with a police officer on campus, even when controlling for school-wide academic achievement, racial/ethnic composition, geography, and student misconduct.[206] In the 2015-16 school year, African American students made-up 15 percent of students enrolled in America's public schools but 31 percent of referrals and arrests, and they were twice as likely to be referred or arrested than their white peers in 2018-19.[207] And Black girls are three times more likely than white girls to receive referrals to law enforcement.[208] There is also evidence that African American students are more likely to be subjected to excessive force by officers in schools.[209] One arrest during school can have severe consequences for a student's future, as it doubles a high school student's likelihood of dropout and increases their likelihood of incarceration as adults.[210]

Disproportionality in discipline—and the school-to-prison pipeline such disproportionality begets—has been attributed to biases, implicit or otherwise, that school officials may carry into the schoolhouse. Research shows that these biases about African American students, which can result in discriminatory disciplinary decisions, may also exacerbate the achievement gap by decreasing expectations and opportunities.[211] In addition, when students perceive an unfair distribution of punishment, an environment of anxiety is created, with achievement outcomes decreasing and students reporting less of a sense of belonging.[212] Consistent research has identified alternatives to exclusionary discipline, such as School-Wide Positive Behavior Interventions and Supports and social emotional learning lessons for students that improve educational outcomes, faculty cohesion, school safety, and teacher morale, but many school districts have not implemented these alternatives.[213] Furthermore, intergenerational exposure to trauma related to racism has been linked to higher incidences of depression, anxiety, and other mental health conditions in African American communities compared with other groups, including African immigrants, who have not experienced the same multigenerational slavery and institutionalized racism.[214] Schools have not consistently provided help, such as mental health services and a trauma-informed approach to education. Instead, schools with large numbers of African American students have increased security and police presence.

Even when white students and Black students misbehave in similar ways, Black students are more likely to be removed from schools.

The impact of the school-to-prison pipeline is also reflected in data over decades showing that, nationally, Black youth and adults are incarcerated at a disproportionately high rate compared with white youth and adults.[215] See Chapter 11, An Unjust Legal System and Chapter 8, Pathologizing the African American Family for additional discussions of this topic. Once in the system, education provided to African American students in juvenile facilities is often substandard and youth in adult facilities may receive no education at all.[216] One of the many tragic consequences of the disproportionate incarceration of Black men is reflected in the academic struggles experienced by young Black boys.[217] The incarceration of African American adult men contributes to the number of young African American students in fatherless homes. Moreover, research suggests that the lack of male models in the home has a significantly higher impact on African American male students than it does on African American female students.[218]

California

From the Civil War until the present, African Americans attending school in California have been forced to endure the same segregated and unequal education conditions endured by African Americans in the rest of the nation. In the early years, school segregation was required by state law. Later, the methods to maintain segregated and unequal schools—which included housing segregation, how to draw school districts and where to build schools—have largely mirrored the methods employed in other states outside of the South.

Segregated and Unequal Education Systems

In 1866, California law was amended to empower school districts to "allow 'colored' children to attend" school with white children in areas where there were not enough children of color to create a separate school, unless the "majority of white parents objected in writing."[219] However, this change was short-lived because a California Superintendent of Public Instruction who believed in segregation and a governor who refused to abide by the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments won the subsequent election.[220]

In 1870, legislators amended California law to provide that every school shall be open for the admission of white children residing within the school district—and that the "education of children of African descent and Indian children shall be provided for in separate schools," and that schools with "fewer than ten students of color" can "educate them in separate schools or in any other manner."[221] The Oakland School Board interpreted state law as no longer requiring a school for African American children and, in 1871, abruptly closed its "colored school," which had been operating since 1866.[222]

On September 22, 1872, after the principal of San Francisco's white-only Broadway public school denied 11-year-old Mary Frances Ward entrance and told her to attend the separate, all-African American public school, she and her parents filed suit in California court.[223] The California Supreme Court upheld the system of segregated schools with a caveat.[224] Where no separate school existed, the Court concluded that African American children could attend white schools.[225] Soon after, state law was conformed to the Ward decision—"children of African descent, and Indian children" must be educated in separate schools but if districts "fail to provide such separate schools, then such children must be admitted into schools for white children."[226]

Records reveal that in 1874, there were 23 "colored schools" in California, but "conditions had worsened for many of the state's black youths," because such schools were "poorly equipped."[227] One year later in 1875, the San Francisco School Board ended school segregation, principally due to the cost of maintaining segregated schools.[228] Soon after, in 1880, the legislature removed school segregation for African American students from state education law. The amended law stated that schools "must be open" for "all children," except "children of filthy or vicious habits, or children suffering from contagious or infectious diseases."[229]

Nevertheless, 10 years later, in 1890, 12-year-old Arthur Wysinger was denied admission to Visalia's "Little White" public school on account of race. The school for nonwhite Americans was manifestly unequal to the school for white Americans as illustrated by the fact that the Visalia School District built a new two-story school for white students and forced African American students to attend school in a barn. [230]

Arthur Wysinger's father, Edmond, both African American and Native American, had been brought to California as an enslaved person during the gold rush and eventually bought his freedom. Edmond became a part-time preacher and laborer and always stressed the value of education to his six children. Edmond wanted to send his son to Visalia's newly constructed school, however, officials said his son could only attend the one held in the barn. Edmond sued in response and the California Supreme Court ultimately held in favor of Edmond, but he died before he could see his son enroll in the "Little White" school. The Supreme Court found that the 1880 education law allowed an African American student to attend any local public school.[231] However, the Court also recognized the state legislature's right to re-impose segregated schools whenever it wished.[232]

In 1870, California law was amended to read that every school shall be open for the admission of white children residing within the school district—and that the "education of children of African descent and Indian children shall be provided for in separate schools," and that schools with "fewer than ten students of color" can "educate them in separate schools or in any other manner."

Despite this decision, California continued to have racially segregated schools due to other discriminatory policies in housing and education. Just as education segregation existed in the North because of government-supported housing segregation, so too it existed in California. Government-supported housing discrimination in the form of restrictive covenants on properties, redlining, and white-only housing perpetuated school segregation. The federal government intentionally financed the creation of neighborhoods segregated by race—funding white-only public housing, redlining communities to deny homeownership loans to African Americans, and promoting racially-restrictive housing covenants. See Chapter 5, Housing Segregation, for a more detailed discussion of this topic.

Racially-restrictive covenants, enforced by California courts until 1948, were inserted into property titles as early as the 1890s and became rampant in the 1910s, "effectively turning neighborhoods across the state white-only."[233] Districts then assigned students to schools based on the segregated neighborhood where they lived or gerrymandered district boundaries to create segregated schools. School districts also zoned and constructed schools and drew school attendance boundaries in ways that created schools segregated by race.[234] In addition, in the 1940s and 1950s, when African American homeowners tried to break the color lines, they came under attack by the Ku Klux Klan.[235]

On March 2, 1945, five Mexican-American families on behalf of 5,000 other families sued the Westminster School District in Orange County because the school district forced their children to attend a different set of schools with fewer resources than the children of white families.[236] Two years later, the federal court of appeal in California ruled that California education law did not permit separate schools for Mexican children, so creation of segregated schools for Mexican children was arbitrary and not allowed under federal law.[237] This case is called the Mendez case after the family who led the filing of the lawsuit. At the time of this lawsuit, most African American students in the state were also attending schools with all African American or nearly all African American children.

Because California law also did not permit the creation of separate schools for African American students, this case meant that where a school district had purposefully created a segregated school by, for example, creating school attendance boundaries around an African American neighborhood, this too was illegal. The lawyers who filed Brown v. Board of Education relied on the cases filed by Wysinger and Mendez and the other four Mexican-American families to help convince the Supreme Court to hold that separate schooling was unconstitutional. Also, as a result of the Mendez decision, on June 14, 1947, the last of California's school segregation laws, which applied to Asian American and Native American children, was repealed.[238]

Even after the Wysinger and Mendez decision, and the Brown decision in 1954, local cities and school boards refused to take proactive steps to desegregate schools. For example, they did not change the school-site attendance boundaries that had been drawn to reflect racially segregated neighborhoods and that created racially segregated schools. Many also did not take proactive steps to allow students to attend other schools outside their racially segregated neighborhoods. Moreover, those that did failed to provide African American students adequate transportation to get them to schools in the white neighborhood.

In the years after, California leaders and the state's school board acknowledged that local school segregation continued and was illegal, but the problem was not fixed. In 1962, California's Board of Education acknowledged the ongoing problem of highly segregated schools and directed local districts to "exert all effort to avoid and eliminate segregation . . . ." [239] In 1964, prominent civil rights attorney, Loren Miller, confirmed that rampant segregation by race existed in California schools when he told an assembly of western governors, "[M]ore Negro children attend all-Negro schools in Los Angeles than in Jackson, Mississippi and Little Rock, Arkansas, combined."[240]

Statewide racial school census data taken in 1966 also confirmed the high levels of segregated schools: 85 percent of African Americans attended predominantly minority schools, whereas only 12 percent of African American students and 39 percent of white students attended racially balanced schools.[241] To address this segregation, California Attorney General Stanley Mosk advocated for explicit consideration of race in formulating a plan to eliminate it, because to ignore race one would have to "not merely conclude the Constitution is colorblind, but that it is totally blind."[242]

Many local school boards and districts did not take the necessary steps to integrate schools, and so African American and Latino families and their advocates filed lawsuits and asked California courts to order school districts to integrate.[243] In the 1960s and 70s, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Pasadena, San Diego, Inglewood, and Richmond school districts, among others, faced court desegregation orders. Berkeley and Riverside initiated busing programs.[244]

Despite these orders, the passage of Proposition 64 in November 1964 allowed majority-white California to undermine efforts to integrate schools through desegregation of communities. This proposition allowed property sellers, landlords, and agents to continue to segregate communities—and, thereby, schools—on racial grounds when selling or renting accommodations, as they had been permitted to do before 1963.[245] The highest courts ultimately struck the law down in 1967, but private racially restrictive covenants continued to be used by private owners to prevent African Americans from moving into white neighborhoods with better funded and resourced schools.[246] See Chapter 5, Housing Segregation for further discussion of related issues.

In addition, Californians successfully passed laws to limit the tools courts could use to order schools to desegregate. Because neighborhoods continued to be segregated by race, one of the main tools that courts used to desegregate schools was to have African American and white students attend schools outside of their neighborhoods via bus transportation to the new schools. But many white Californians strongly opposed integration plans, especially court-ordered ones that required African American people or other students of color to be bused to attend their white schools or vice versa. And, in 1979, majority-white Californians passed Proposition 1, a law that stopped courts from ordering school desegregation plans, unless families or students suing to desegregate the schools could prove that intentional discrimination by school officials caused the segregation or a federal court could impose the same order.[247]

The law, upheld by the United States Supreme Court, limited the ability of California courts to integrate schools that were segregated in fact, for example due to racially segregated neighborhoods, but not by a California law.[248] Then, from the mid- to late-1970s through the 1990s, courts removed or limited desegregation orders in many California districts, as the Supreme Court and Congress further restricted the use of remedies like busing and school reassignment to integrate schools.[249] In a few cases, such as in Berkeley, schools remained relatively integrated because school districts continued busing students and using school-selection processes designed to achieve integration, even without a desegregation order.[250]

COURTESY OF FRANCES BENJAMIN JOHNSTON/LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

African American children and teacher in classroom studying corn and cotton, Annie Davis School, near Tuskegee, Alabama. (c. 1902)

But, in the vast majority of California school districts, schools either re-segregated or were never integrated, and so segregated schooling persists today. As of 2003, California was one of the four most segregated states for African American students.[251] As of 2014, California was identified as the third most segregated state for African American students, and a state where African American and Latino students are strongly concentrated in schools that have far lower quality and resources than their white and Asian peers.[252] As of 2020, California remained in the top 10 most segregated states for Black students.[253] Approximately 51 percent of African American students in California attend hyper-segregated, 90- to 100-percent nonwhite schools.[254]

In a recent case, the state found that the segregation that persisted in a Bay Area school district was by design. For example, the California Attorney General's office found in 2019 that the Sausalito Marin City school board had segregated its schools, leaving the vast majority of African American students in an underfunded and under-resourced school while providing a better-funded and resourced charter school for the majority of white students.[255]

Separate and Unequal Education Conditions Persist

In California's highly segregated schools, schools mostly attended by white and Asian children receive more funding and resources than schools mostly attended by African American and Latino children. Throughout the 20th century, school districts in California, like those across the nation, financed their operations mainly with local property tax revenue and limited amounts of state and federal funding. This system allowed richer, white neighborhoods to better fund their schools districts than poorer, largely African American neighborhoods.[256] In 1971, the California Supreme Court decided that this education funding system was discriminatory because, according to the Supreme Court, it made "the quality of a child's education a function of the wealth of his parents and neighbors."[257]

As of 2020, California remained in the top 10 most segregated states in the country for Black students. Approximately 64 percent of Black students in California attend hyper-segregated, 90- to 100-percent nonwhite schools.

In 1978, voters passed Proposition 13, which decreased the amount of local property tax revenues and increased the amount of state funding for K-12 education. In 1988, voters then approved Proposition 98, which requires the state to dedicate at least 40 percent of its General Fund to K-14 education each year.[258] These measures still did not solve the issue, and African American parents and students and other parents and students of color have continued to challenge funding inequities in court.

In late April 1991, the Richmond Unified School District, which served a high proportion of African American students, announced that it would close its schools six weeks early on May 1, 1991 due to a budget shortfall. As discussed in Chapter 5, Housing Segregation, federal housing policies, and local officials segregated Richmond and made it extremely difficult for African American residents to move to the suburbs after World War II.[259] Richmond parents sued, and the state Supreme Court decided that the closure did not meet the minimum level of education required by the state constitution.[260] In the late 1990s, in the Compton Unified School District, which served mostly African American and Latino students, a teacher described the deplorable conditions in a temporary school building in Compton where she taught: "Because the wooden beams across the ceiling were being eaten by termites, a fine layer of wood dust covered the students desks every morning. Maggots crawled in a cracked and collapsing area of the floor near my desk . . . The blue metal window coverings on the outsides of the windows were shut permanently, blocking all sunlight."[261]

In 2000, students were part of a lawsuit, Williams v. California, again alleging that schools serving majority African American, Latino, and low-income students across the state failed to provide access to even the most rudimentary learning tools: school books, safe and decent facilities, and qualified teachers.[262] The lawsuit ultimately settled in 2004, with $138 million in state funds to provide instructional materials to schools, $800 million for facility repairs in low performing schools through establishment of the Emergency Repair Program (ERP), and $50 million to create a complaint and oversight system to check to see if schools were providing the basics of an education.[263] According to the American Civil Liberties Union, which brought the lawsuit, the state has failed its obligation under the settlement to fund the ERP and, as of 2013, the state's cumulative net contribution to ERP for the five last years had been $0.[264] Further, despite progress made as a result of the Williams settlement, persistent challenges remain, such as textbook distribution issues and insufficient monitoring of school districts that are new to the Williams process.[265] Without county oversight, school districts facing hard fiscal choices are often tempted to give textbooks less of a priority, despite the fact that, under Williams, students have a right to sufficient instructional materials.[266] California's unequal funding system continues to mean that African American and Latino students, and low-income students have far fewer school resources.

In 2013, the state tried to address the inequalities in school funding by giving more money to schools that have higher numbers of low-income, homeless, and foster youth. This change in the way funding was provided to school districts is referred to as the "equity index" and is part of the state's Local Control Funding Formula that provides approximately 58 percent of the funding that

California public schools receive each year.[267] The state's funding formula does not focus on African American students specifically or require schools to ensure that the funding is spent on the high-needs students within the district.[268] Because about 32 percent of the funding for California schools still comes from local property taxes, and wealthier communities with higher property values can more easily raise additional funds through local bonds and donations, rich and often more predominantly white neighborhoods continue to fund their schools at greater levels.[269]

At the October 2021 Task Force hearing, Kawika Smith, who graduated from Verbum Dei High School in Watts, a historic African American neighborhood of Los Angeles, testified about two high schools in Los Angeles. In the predominantly African American high school, African American students went without paper for three months simply because the school was underfunded. In contrast, the other school had access to extra funding, which allowed the school to purchase a fountain. Smith told the Task Force, "I strongly believe that we need to revisit the property tax laws and algorithms for how schools are funded . . . I can only imagine if that money was redirected into the Black school where they needed the money –what that could have meant for [those] Black students."[270]

As in the rest of the country, unequal funding translates to unequal opportunities. Schools with fewer resources mean fewer Advanced Placement and college preparation courses, which means that African American students attending those schools are less competitive for college and university admission and may not have taken the courses necessary—called A-G courses in California—to go to a four-year state University. Within districts and schools, Black students continue to be placed in vocational tracks and out of Science, Technology, Engineering, Mathematics, and Advanced Placement programs.[271] In addition, African American students in California are disproportionately likely to be identified as having a learning disability, at nearly twice the rate of African American students nationwide.[272] "Where we failed is discontinuing those efforts to integrate our schools, to invest in them equitably, and to begin in the pre-K years," Dr. Rucker Johnson, Professor of Public Policy at Berkeley told the Task Force.[273]

Because about 32 percent of the funding for California schools still comes from local property taxes, and wealthier communities with higher property values can more easily raise additional funds through local bonds and donations, rich and often more predominantly white neighborhoods continue to fund their schools at greater levels.

Recent studies have shown the importance of having at least one teacher who looks like you.[274] But the percentage of African American teachers in California declined from 5.1 percent in 1997-98 to four percent in 2017-18, even though African American students made up 5.6 percent of California's student population.[275] African American men comprise one percent of California's teaching force.[276]

Furthermore, in California, while suspensions have decreased significantly statewide since 2013,[277] Black students continue to be suspended at three times the rate of white students,[278] and lose nearly four times the number of days of instruction to suspensions and expulsions as white students.[279] Suspensions for subjective offenses, such as willful defiance or disruption—which can include anything from failing to take a hat off in class to talking in class—are a persistent but declining source of disproportionate discipline due to recent legislation limiting use for these reasons.

In recent stipulated judgments reached with four different California school districts, the California Attorney General's office identified racial disparities in discipline for African American students with harmful negative impacts.[280] For example, the Attorney General's investigation of the Barstow Unified School District found that African American middle and high school students were 79 and 78 percent, respectively, more likely, to be suspended out of school than similarly situated white students, and the rate of days African American students were punished was 168 percent greater in elementary, 37.9 percent greater in middle school, and 54.5 percent greater in high school than their white peers.[281]

In California, African American students are also disproportionately referred by schools to law enforcement.[282] A case investigated by the California Attorney General's Office found that, since 1991, school resource officers in the Stockton Unified School District had arrested 34,000 students, including 1,600 under 10 years old, with many minor misbehaviors turned into criminal offenses, disproportionality impacting African American and Latino students, and students with disabilities.[283]

COURTESY OF NATIONAL ARCHIVE/NEWSMAKERS VIA GETTY IMAGES

Demonstrators picket in front of a school board office protesting segregation of students. (1963)

A number of high-profile reported cases have also raised concerns that African American children in California face increased risk of invasive searches and excessive use of force in schools. In one reported case, during school hours, a police officer handcuffed a five-year-old African American boy with zip ties and charged him with battery because he "resisted" being arrested.[284] The American Civil Liberties Union has also reported a number of incidents. In one, an African American student in a Los Angeles school was partially strip-searched in the presence of a male officer—a vice principal forced an "eighth grade girl to pull her bra away from her body and shake it" and when she "tried to cover her breast for modesty, the vice-principal pulled her hands away."[285] In another filed case, school police were alleged to have handcuffed and placed a 13-year-old African American student on probation after he was playing a makeshift game of soccer with an orange.[286] In yet another, the American Civil Liberties Union reported that a school police officer who told an African American high school student that it was wrong to be gay and wear boy's clothes, subsequently pushed her against the wall and handcuffed her for telling the officer that "it was also wrong that white people like the officer enslaved her people."[287] Subsequent to the incident, the same officer "continued to harass [her], routinely patting her down and demanding that she turn out her bag."[288]

Jacob "Blacc" Jackson, the Los Angeles Youth Commissioner, explained to the Task Force during its October 2021 hearing how he was placed in an abusive adoptive home and lost his older brother in a police shooting but was focused on "finish[ing] high school [at Crenshaw High] and pass[ing] all of [his classes]."[289] When, at school, Jackson made a mistake in dealing with a substitute teacher, instead of the teacher, counselors, and school administrators trying to work with him, he was questioned, threatened, and handcuffed by school police for an incident he had already apologized for. The school police officer told Jackson that "they would always be watching me. They said you're just like everybody else at this school . . . I felt scared and anxious and unclear about what to do." Jackson felt he could not stay at his high school and told the Task Force that, "What I wish the school [had] provided for me when I was there was real counselors, after-school programs, real nurses, Black people history, peace building, and [transformative justice] practice."

In general, research shows that school officials are more likely to refer African American students like Jackson to law enforcement for minor behavior than white students.[290] Such contacts with law enforcement increase a student's feeling of isolation, and contributes to the school-to-prison pipeline and the disproportionate rates of African American people in our criminal justice system.[291]

Once in the juvenile justice system, African American students face an increased likelihood of dropout due to inconsistent education access and adequacy of instruction.[292] See Chapter 11 An Unjust Legal System for a more detailed discussion of this topic. For African American students charged with offenses that result in a transfer to the state prison system, few can access and complete higher education.[293]

IV. Unequal Higher Education

Until Brown v. Board of Education, white colleges and universities largely refused to admit African Americans.[294] In response, African Americans raised funding to develop Historically Black Colleges and Universities (HBCUs). In the early 1900s, the federal government began to provide funding and land to open HBCUs, but it had to pass through white-controlled state legislatures. However, these historically African American institutions have been unequally funded in comparison to similar historically white institutions throughout American history.

After World War II, the GI Bill paid for veterans to attend college, graduate school, and go through training programs.[295] Although the GI Bill should have helped African American and white veterans equally, due to African American veterans' exclusion from white colleges, the lack of African American Veterans Administration counselors and the tendency of white counselors to steer African American veterans into vocational programs, it actually increased the racial higher education gap between African American and white Americans.[296] Even today, African American military veterans continue to face discriminatory barriers that can result in unequal access to education benefits available to veterans. In addition, although the Civil Rights Act of 1964 again promised some relief through a prohibition on discrimination in higher education programs receiving federal funds and some colleges and universities took affirmative action to remedy prior-discrimination in college admissions, gains were short-lived due to Supreme Court decisions and, in California, passage of Proposition 209, which prohibited race from being used as a factor in admissions.

Unequal Funding for Historically Black Colleges and Universities

Prior to the Civil War, a few colleges for free African Americans existed in the north, and none in the south.[297] In 1862, the federal government under the first Morrill Act granted federal land and funding to states to open colleges and universities, but African Americans were generally not allowed to attend.[298] After the Civil War ended in 1865, the Freedmen's Bureau began establishing Black colleges staffed by Civil War veterans with the support of white and Black religious missionaries.[299] White missionaries funded African American education in order to Christianize the "menace" of uneducated enslaved people.[300] These colleges were in name only and, like many white colleges at the time, generally provided only primary and secondary education.[301]

In 1890, Congress passed the second Morrill Act and required states to provide higher education to African American students as the states had for white students.[302] In the North, where African American students were allowed to attend colleges and universities in extremely limited numbers, they often were not allowed to fully participate in the way that white, male students participated.[303]

In order to continue receiving federal funding, former enslaving states, where the majority of African Americans lived, built segregated public African American colleges.[304] White-controlled legislatures underfunded African American colleges and universities, provided substandard facilities, and did not provide adequate resources to train faculty.[305] White-controlled southern legislatures limited curriculum to mechanical, agricultural, and industrial arts, helping maintain African Americans as a servant underclass to build white wealth.[306]

Few graduate programs admitted African American students, although after World War II, the NAACP successfully sued to expand graduate education opportunities for African American students.[307] Although a few African American people were allowed to attend predominantly white institutions, 90 percent of all African American degree-holders in the late 1940s had been educated at Historically Black Colleges and Universities. On the eve of the 1954 Brown v. Board of Education decision, African American people were less than one percent of entering first-year students at predominantly white institutions.[308]

Even after the Brown decision, white government officials in the south used state power to prohibit integration efforts, including in Mississippi.[309] In 1959, Clyde Kennard, a 31-year-old African American veteran of the Korean War, who ran a small poultry farm, applied to Mississippi Southern College, now the University of Southern Mississippi.[310] The university president reported Kennard's intention to apply to the Mississippi Sovereignty Commission, a state agency led by the governor of Mississippi, which was created in order to preserve segregation.[311] After refusing to back down from applying to the university, even after the Mississippi governor requested that he withdraw his application, Kennard's local cooperative foreclosed on his farm and local government officials arrested and falsely convicted him for stealing $25 of chicken feed.[312] Kennard was sentenced to seven years in a chain gang where he picked cotton and was fed white prisoners' leftover food.[313] Kennard died of misdiagnosed and untreated colon cancer in 1963.[314]

Segregated higher education continued into the 1970s. In 1969 and 1970, the federal Department of Education concluded that Louisiana, Mississippi, Oklahoma, North Carolina, Florida, Arkansas, Pennsylvania, Georgia, Maryland, and Virginia operated segregated colleges and universities and, in 1970, the NAACP sued the federal department of education for failing to force these institutions to desegregate.[315] By the late 1970s, many years after the Civil Rights Act of 1964, at least 17 southern states were still operating racially segregated higher education systems.[316] A number of public HBCUs closed or merged with traditionally white institutions, but most African American college students continued to attend HBCUs.[317] HBCUs continued to struggle with poorer facilities and budgets compared to traditionally white institutions; some lacked adequate libraries and scientific and research equipment.[318]

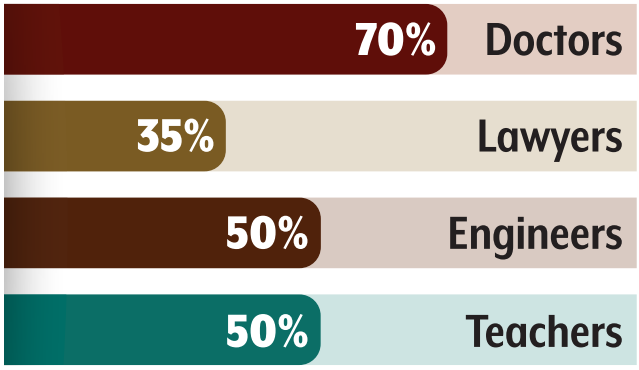
Despite the underfunding, through the 1970s, private and public HBCUs educated a large proportion of the African American middle class.[319] In 2006, HBCUs made up three percent of higher education but enrolled 14 percent of Black undergraduates, and graduated 28 percent of all Black undergraduate students who earned a degree.[320] Seventy percent of America's African American doctors, 35 percent of African American lawyers, and 50 percent of African American engineers and teachers have a degree from an HBCU.[321] For African American students, HBCUs can provide an empowering, family-like environment of small classes and close relationships with faculty and students away from racial tensions experienced off campus.[322]

AFRICAN AMERICAN PROFESSIONALS TODAY

Percent that graduated from HBCUs



Today, increased access for African American students to all colleges and universities has led to a relative decrease in enrollment to HBCUs.[323] While Black enrollment at HBCUs increased by 17 percent between 1976 and 2018, the total number of Black students enrolled in all degree-granting postsecondary institutions more than doubled during this period.[324] In 2018, there were 101 HBCUs located in 19 states, including one in Los Angeles, the Charles R. Drew University of Medicine and Science.[325] However, funding for HBCUs continues to be uneven and is tied to a state's fiscal health.[326] Reports in 2008 and 2014 concluded that state governments continue to deprioritize funding public HBCUs, leading to predominantly white universities receiving more funding per student than HBCUs.[327] In 2008, for example, the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill received about $15,700 in state funding per student.[328] But students at historically African American North Carolina Agricultural and Technical State University received about $7,800 in state funding per student.[329] In 2020, the federal government increased funding for HBCUs, but many HBCUs have closed in recent years due to financial issues, a trend that has worsened during the COVID-19 pandemic.[330]

Unequal Access to the GI Bill

Due to expanded education opportunities and funding under the GI Bill, between 1950 and 1975, Black student college enrollment increased from 83,000 to 666,000 students.[331] However, in comparison to white veterans who used GI Bill benefits to go to college, state officials and the structure of the program generally prevented African American veterans from accessing the full education benefits available to them.[332]

At the end of World War II, the vast majority of African American veterans returned to their residence in the southern states.[333] Universities in the South did not accept African American students, and white state legislatures did not increase funding to Historically Black Colleges and Universities to meet increased demand from returning veterans.[334] Many HBCUs had huge waiting lists, and applicants might have to wait a year or more to learn whether they had been admitted; during the postwar period, approximately 55 percent of African American veteran applicants to HBCUs were rejected.[335] In the North, where less than a quarter of African Americans lived at the time, although public universities admitted African American students, many private colleges and universities continued to reject African American students, or only admitted them in small numbers.[336] Local Veterans Administration officials in the South were overwhelmingly white, and steered African American people to vocational programs that funneled them to menial jobs or prohibited use of the GI Bill to pay for college.[337] Only 12 percent of African American veterans were able to use the GI bill to enroll in college, compared to 26 percent for veterans as a whole.[338] Although African Americans used the educational benefits of the GI Bill more often than white Americans did, they could not use those benefits for college, like white Americans could, because they were denied entrance to white colleges and universities and often steered away from college degree programs and into vocational tracks.[339] As a result, the educational and economic gap between white and African Americans widened.[340] See Chapter 13 The Wealth Gap for further discussion of related issues.

Today, discrimination in access to healthcare, employment, and housing continues to limit access to education benefits in the GI Bill for African American veterans compared to white veterans.[341] While African Americans make up 16.9 percent of the U.S. active duty force, studies show that African American veterans are not utilizing their benefits as much as white or Asian American veterans due to the aforementioned barriers.[342]

Deficiencies of Affirmative Action

The idea of affirmative action began as a concept with President John F. Kennedy issuing an executive order in 1961 requiring that federal contractors "take affirmative action to ensure that applicants are employed, and that employees are treated during employment, without regard to their race, creed, color, or national origin," and establishing the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.[343] Three years later, Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to ban discrimination on the basis of race, color, and national origin not only in employment, but also in education.[344] With respect to employment, the federal department of labor ordered all federal contractors to prepare affirmative action plans including goals and timetables to improve the employment standing of specific groups of people, including African Americans.[345]

In his 1965 commencement address at Howard University, President Lyndon Johnson stated that affirmative action should be approached as a moral and policy response to the material and psychological losses suffered by African Americans during and after the time of slavery.[346] He declared, "you do not take a person who, for years, has been hobbled by chains and liberate him, bring him up to the starting line of a race and then say, 'you are free to compete with all the others,' and still justly believe that you have been completely fair."[347] Further, he emphasized the importance of African Americans' humanity and stated that what African Americans sought was "not just freedom but opportunity—not just legal equity but human ability—not just equality as a right and a theory, but equality as a fact and as a result."[348]

In the late 1960s and 1970s, some colleges and graduate schools began to develop similar affirmative action policies to increase the number of African American and other underrepresented students.[349] After the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. on April 4, 1968, civil rights leaders pushed for colleges to admit more African American students.[350] In 1969, the next school year, the number of African American students admitted to America's elite universities rose sharply, some by more than 100 percent.[351]

The lawsuits came quickly. In 1971, two years after schools adopted affirmative action policies, a white student sued the University of Washington Law School, citing reverse racism as the reason for his rejection.[352] Because of this case, Harvard alumni believed that "semiliterate blacks are being accepted at the expense of white geniuses[,]" said David L. Evans, associate dean of admissions at Harvard in 1975.

By 1978, when the former nearly all white colleges and universities were still admitting fewer African American students than African American high school graduates, the Supreme Court decided in the Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, to limit states' and universities' ability to take race-based affirmative actions to address education discrimination.[353] The Supreme Court declared that the policy of the University of California at Davis's medical school to set aside 16 of 100 total seats for "minority groups" like African Americans was unconstitutional because it prevented white students from competing for the 16 seats set aside.[354] The Supreme Court declared in Bakke and subsequent cases that if a college or university wanted to have a more diverse class of students or make up for "societal" discrimination against African Americans in the United States then it could only consider race as a factor, among many other factors, and with limitations.[355]

In doing so, the Supreme Court rejected affirmative action programs, like Davis's program, that were intended to compensate African American students (and other racial minority groups) for the ways that federal, state, and local government had discriminated against them in education for more than 200 years, solely on account of their race. Instead, the Supreme Court described the American history of discrimination as "societal discrimination" that is "amorphous and ageless into the past[,]" which colleges and universities could not fix through programs like the one at Davis.[356] At the same time, federal courts have not struck down university and college admissions policies, which provide a preference for legacy admissions, students whose parents, grandparents, and great grandparents attended the university or college.[357] The argument is that such preferences are not race-based, but this does not grapple with the fact that white legacies may have received a preference in admission because they did not need to compete with African American students who were excluded from the admissions pool for centuries.[358] Critics of the current way that colleges and universities practice affirmative action as sanctioned by the Supreme Court argue that using student diversity as a reason to include race as a factor does not address the original intention of desegregation or break down structural barriers for African American students.[359]

COURTESY OF RONDAL PARTRIDGE/NATIONAL ARCHIVES

A photograph taken by the Federal Security Agency, National Youth Administration. The original caption written by the federal agency stated: "Bakersfield, California. These Negro youth are returning to their squalid homes in the Sunset district of Bakersfield." (1940)

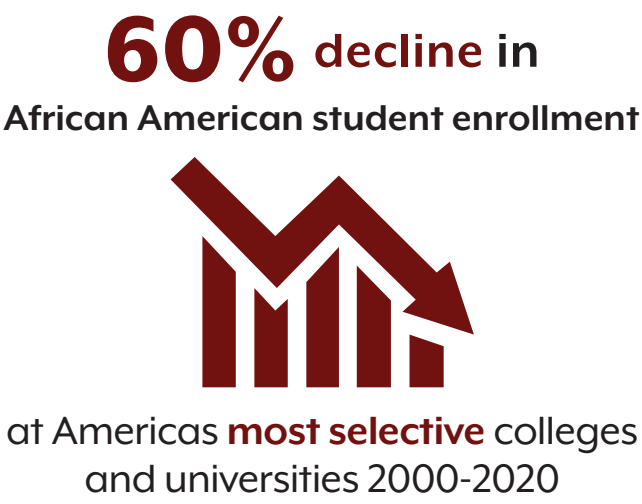
The percentage of African American college students has risen in the past 50 years, but it has fallen recently. The percentage of American college students who are African American increased from 10 percent in 1976 to 14 percent in 2017, but has dropped since from its high of 15 percent in 2011.[360] College enrollment rates for African American 18- to 24-year-old Americans still lag behind those for Asian and white Americans of the same age.[361] A 2020 study found that, since 2000, the percentage of Black students enrolled has decreased at nearly 60 percent of the 101 most selective public colleges and universities.[362] Researchers identify that one cause of declining enrollment is a focus on standardized testing as an admissions requirement because the scores from such testing do not reflect the potential or ability of African American students but rather the inequities that African American students experience throughout their education career, from less access to high-quality early education to a greater likelihood of attending schools with less funding, fewer experienced teachers, and fewer rigorous course options.[363] Other causes for declining enrollment include closure of for-profit colleges and declines at two-year public colleges due to unemployment. Black students are overrepresented at both types of colleges.[364]

California

In 1996, California voters passed Proposition 209, which eliminated consideration of race in public education admissions, regardless of long-standing segregation and past discrimination.[365] This has had significant impacts on African American and other students of color in California.[366] In 2020, a University of California, Berkeley study found that this affirmative action ban has harmed Black and Latino students by significantly reducing enrollment across the University of California campuses and lowering their graduation rates.[367]



An earlier 2006 study found that Black admissions had plummeted since the ban on affirmative action, particularly at the University of California Los Angeles and Berkeley campuses.[368] In 2020, the President of the University of California Student Association, Varsha Sarveshwar, commented that, "[t]he exclusion of Black and Latino students from selective colleges and universities is nothing short of a crisis. . . . 7 out of 9 UC undergraduate campuses receive D and F grades in access for Black and Latino students."[369] Sarveshwar called on higher education leaders and policymakers to "move beyond public commitments to diversity – and act decisively to ensure that access is truly equitable."[370]

The continued nature of the uneven playing field between African American and white students was highlighted in a recent legal settlement between student and community groups and the University of California.[371] The lawsuit, leading up to the settlement, was brought by then 19-year-old Kawika Smith, a high school student from South Los Angeles, who asserted that the use of SAT and ACT scores in admissions and university scholarship decisions may be discriminatory because they are proxies for wealth and race, and only exacerbate the gaps that exist due to unequal exam preparation between schools and based on whether parents can pay for private test tutors.[372] In addition, research has shown that African American students may perform poorly on standardized tests, not because of genetic or cultural differences, but because negative stereotypes raise doubts and high-pressure anxieties in a test-taker's mind.[373]

Kawika Smith told the Task Force at its October 2021 hearing that when he thought back to the day he took the SAT, he was "immediately met with this memory of feeling that I wasn't worthy or capable of being in a collegiate environment, and this singular test determined that I would not be eligible for scholarship opportunities despite my academic achievements and having been in need of financial support to afford college[.]"[374] The legal settlement with the University California ensures that SAT and ACT scores will not be used in admission and scholarship decisions until spring 2025.[375]

V. Teaching Inaccurate History

Researchers and historians have raised significant concerns that the American K-12 education system is failing to teach a complete and accurate history of slavery and structural racism, along with the significant role that African Americans had in developing this nation's wealth without compensation. Dr. David Yacovone, a historian at Harvard University's Hutchins Center for African & African American Research who has been studying United States history textbooks published from 1839 to the 1980s found that many textbooks taught that white people were superior to African American people and downplayed, minimized, or justified slavery based on a racial caste system, with African Americans appearing "only as a problem."[376] Dr. Yacovone explained that in the older history textbooks "[w]hite supremacy is a toxin. . . . injected . . . into the mind of many generations of Americans."[377]

In addition, a 2018 study, Teaching Hard History: American Slavery, surveyed social studies teachers in K-12 schools across the country and found that 97 percent agreed that learning about slavery is essential, but that there is a lack of deep coverage on the topic; 58 percent reported dissatisfaction with their textbooks; and 39 percent reported their state offered little or no support for teaching about slavery.[378] The study gave an average score of 46 percent with respect to whether 10 popular U.S. history textbooks provide comprehensive coverage of slavery and enslaved people. The study also found that only eight percent of 1,000 American high school seniors surveyed could identify slavery as the central cause of the Civil War.[379] To ensure that schools accurately teach American history, Dr. Yacovone recommends "teach[ing] the truth about slavery as a central institution in America's origins, as the cause of the Civil War, and about its legacy that still lives on."[380]

Historians have found that United States history textbooks published from 1839 to the 1980s taught that white people were superior to Black people and downplayed, minimized, or justified slavery.

In Texas, the state that uses the largest amount of textbooks, thereby shaping the K-12 textbook industry, the Board of Education, rather than historians, began changing the history books to refer to formerly enslaved people as workers.[381] In schools, students of color, including African American students, are less likely to see books with characters that share their cultural background and textbooks that reflect their experiences.[382] Many educators recognize that textbooks do not accurately and fully reflect experiences of people of color; only one in five educators, the vast majority of whom were white, in a June 2020 nationwide survey thought so.[383] Educators of color were more likely to find textbooks lacking.[384] In 2020, Connecticut became the first state in the nation to require high schools to offer African-American, Black, Puerto Rican, and Latino studies.[385]

There is continued opposition to discussing the truth about slavery in public K-12 schools. Republicans in multiple states and in Congress have introduced bills to cut funding from schools that choose to use curriculum derived from the New York Times' Pulitzer Prize-winning 1619 series of essays challenging readers to think about slavery as foundational to the nation's origin story. They argue inclusion of this history delegitimizes the idea of the U.S. as a nation founded on principles of liberty and freedom and creates racial divisions.[386] In addition, the concept that schools may be teaching students critical race theory—which explains that race is a social construct embedded in legal systems and policies—is under attack across the nation by groups that say it divides Americans and places the blame on white Americans for current and historical harm to African Americans and other nonwhite Americans.[387] But Randi Weingarten, the President of the American Federation of Teachers, one of the nation's largest teaching unions, has said that teaching critical race theory is really about teaching "the truth" and pledged to defend any teacher "who gets in trouble for teaching honest history . . . Teaching the truth is not radical or wrong. Distorting history and threatening educators for teaching the truth is what is truly radical and wrong."[388] Weingarten publicly stated that those attacking critical race theory have other motives: "labeling any discussion of race, racism or discrimination as critical race theory to try to make it toxic" and "to deprive students of a robust understanding of our common history."[389]

As important as how schools shape their curriculum concerning the history of African American people in America is how schools teach the humanity of African American people before, during, and after enslavement. A curriculum that undoes the harmful narratives of African Americans that have historically been used to justify false conceptions of African American inferiority, requires schools to teach that African Americans' stories did not begin with enslavement.[390] Such a curriculum also requires schools to teach about humanity's origins in Africa thousands of years before either Arabs or Europeans encountered people of West and Central African ancestry.[391] Academics have also focused on the importance of teaching about the study of African lives and the African experience for true liberation.[392] In order to empower African American communities through the study of African American history, academics discuss the importance of challenging European perspectives of the African experience to prevent others from defining the African experience and to give African people control over the narrative that is told about their experiences.[393] Redefinition of school curriculum discussing Black experiences, including the narrative about the African experience, is particularly important in California, a state which, as of 2015, was home to the fifth largest Black population in the country.[394]

The dehumanization inscribed in school textbooks causes miseducation and effectively contributes to African Americans' "cultural and social alienation from identity and existential belonging."[395] In the 1960s, W.E.B Du Bois spoke out about the dangers posed by the deficiencies in school curriculums with regard to African American history and culture.[396] He warned that the intentional omission of these concepts from public school curriculums would ultimately cause African American history and culture to be lost, unless African American families and organizations actively and systematically impressed these fundamental principles upon subsequent generations of African Americans.[397]

In line with this same notion of education for liberation and cultural preservation, many activists specifically focused their efforts on the establishment and expansion of "Black Studies" on university and college campuses to further the ongoing movement for the liberation of African Americans. The majority of Black Studies programs began at predominantly white institutions and a handful of HBCUs.[398] Although the Black Studies Movement was initially faced with stiff opposition, by 1971 an estimated 500 courses and programs had been organized in the United States.[399]

California

California student groups have long raised concerns that the complete history of racism and segregation in the state and across the nation has been left out of textbooks, and that leaders from diverse backgrounds who helped create this nation and California are not reflected.[400] "It isn't just white heroes like Christopher Columbus or folks like George Washington or Thomas Jefferson. There was a lot more history behind it and we don't learn a lot about the other important figures that contributed to making America[] into what it is," Alvin Lee, President of Generation Up, a 4,000-member California student organization, shared with legislators considering how to change California's history textbooks to better reflect the contributions of its diverse people. One state legislator who has advocated to ensure that California's elementary and secondary schools teach a curriculum that reflects the history of African Americans and other people of color, explained that: "Knowledge of our history plays a critical role in showing who we become" and "students [are more engaged] when they [see] themselves reflected in the coursework."[401]

Among other things, California's approach to teaching about slavery has been critiqued. In 2018, a classroom teacher made headlines for staging a classroom simulation of conditions on a slave ship to provide a "unique learning experience."[402] A study by Southern Poverty Law Center found that California did a better job than other states in teaching slavery, but highlighted concerns with the approach of teaching about Harriet Tubman in second grade two years before slavery is taught and failing to discuss how false ideas of white economic and political supremacy fueled and perpetuated slavery as an institution.[403]

In addition, research has shown that because school curricula often do not include content that reflects the experience, culture, and history of African American students, they and others students whose experience, culture, and history is not reflected, suffer.[404] When African American students do not see their experiences and history reflected in the school curricula, this leads to a feeling that they are not important and even invisible and voiceless in the classroom.[405] And while culturally responsive teacher training is one way to help African American students and other students of color feel welcomed, included, and valued in schools, teacher preparation is inadequate in training teachers to be culturally-responsive and to carry those practices into the classroom in both the way they teach and the materials they use when they teach.[406]

One other way to increase diversity in curriculum is by adding ethnic studies courses. "Ethnic studies" is a term used to encompass African American, Chicano, Latino, Native, and Asian American studies, and was developed in response to lack of representation of people from these groups in curricula taught in U.S. schools, colleges, and universities. Generally, ethnic studies is not taught in California elementary and secondary schools, despite known academic performance and attendance benefits.[407] In 2016-17, only a small number—17,354 K-12 students statewide—were enrolled in ethnic studies courses.[408] One reason for this: Only 51 percent of the 777 ethnic studies courses in social science in 2016-17 were approved as meeting A-G state university admissions requirements.[409]

This may be changing. In 2016, California state law mandated creation of a voluntary K-12 ethnic studies curriculum. Recently, on March 18, 2021, the State Board of Education approved the model ethnic studies curriculum.[410] And while in 2019, a California bill to mandate ethnic studies in all K-12 schools was vetoed by Governor Newsom,[411] in October 2021, he signed a different bill, Assembly Bill 101, which will require California high school students to take ethnic studies as a graduation requirement commencing in 2030.[412] In the interim, several districts have recently made completion of a course in ethnic studies a graduation requirement, including Montebello, Sacramento City, and Coachella.[413] In 2020, San Francisco approved development of a K-12 Black studies curriculum.[414]

In California's public colleges and universities, the movement for Ethnic Studies began in 1968. At that time, the Black Student Union, the Third World Liberation Front, select faculty and staff, and other activists from the larger San Francisco Bay Area, organized and led a series of protests at San Francisco State University.[415] Protestors denounced the deficiencies within the university's curriculum, which neglected and misrepresented the experiences of people of color, including African Americans and Indigenous people.[416] On a mission to define and shape their own educational experiences, students drafted a list of demands for the university and protested for months until a deal was negotiated. Ultimately, the university agreed to establish a College of Ethnic Studies, the first in the nation, with classes geared toward communities of color.[417] Since that time, 22 of 23 CSU campuses have maintained some level of ethnic studies, but a recent legislative analysis suggested that 53 percent of CSU students had not taken a course between 2015 to 2018.[418]

In August 2020, Governor Newsom signed Assembly Bill 1460, which, beginning in 2024 to 2025, requires a three credit ethnic studies course for graduation from a CSU—the first change to the CSU's general education curriculum in over 40 years.[419] Legislative findings in support of the bill's passage included that white students and students of color benefit from taking ethnic studies courses, which "play an important role in building an inclusive multicultural democracy."[420] In discussing the importance of the bill's passage, Senator Steven Bradford, the bill's co-author commented, "Ethnic studies is critical in learning our contributions to America and telling the true story of our rich history."[421]

VI. Conclusion

During the slavery era, enslaving states denied enslaved African Americans an education so that they could maintain control over the enslaved people they depended upon to build this nation's wealth. However, an understanding of how powerful knowledge can be emboldened enslaved African Americans to find ways to educate themselves, despite the great danger they risked in doing so. Following the Civil War, states adopted many laws and policies continue denying education to free African Americans and to effectively maintain an illiterate servant class. In states where African American children were permitted to attend segregated schools, white-controlled legislatures severely underfunded these schools and subjected African American students to deplorable conditions. Aside from the inferior quality of these schools, African American communities also suffered from the ongoing racist attacks by white terrorist groups who committed themselves to destroying African American schools. Even after the Supreme Court outlawed school segregation in its 1954 Brown v. Board of Education decision, white policymakers and school boards adopted other policies to ensure the continued exclusion of African American students from their schools. Such policies and the incidents and effects of enslavement continue to have lasting effects on the educational opportunities and the quality of academic opportunities available to African Americans today.[422]

Because government acts have denied the vast majority of African Americans continued access to education and high quality and well-funded schools from enslavement until the present, they have suffered a number of harms, including lower levels of high school graduation, achievement, and college access and completion. These injuries widened the gap between African American and white wealth in America. The COVID-19 pandemic has made the education injuries even worse, because far more African American students than white students live in poverty, and students living in poverty have had less access to the technology needed to participate in remote schooling.[423] California and the nation have not adequately accounted for the harmful intergenerational effects of education discrimination and denial.

In recent years, the academic gap between all student groups has steadily narrowed, except for the gap between African American and white students, which has widened, confirming the ongoing existence of deeply-rooted racial disparities in the nation's education system.[424] In California, over the past decade, average math and reading test scores rose for all student groups, except African American students. In districts where there was the least significant gap between the academic achievements of different student groups, data showed that this could be attributed to less socioeconomic inequality among students, more spending per pupil by the district, and fewer disparities in access to experienced teachers.[425] The gap also continues to exist in high school graduation rates, but it has reduced considerably nationwide and in California since the 1960s.[426] Nonetheless, the gap in college as well as graduate school admission and graduation rates has remained stagnant, with African Americans half as likely as white Americans to have a college degree.[427]

Due to intergenerational denials of equal educational opportunity, African Americans have also been denied a number of other benefits, including a positive link between one's own education and the education received by one's children.[428] More schooling is associated with higher earnings in one's own life and in subsequent generations.[429] However, white and African Americans with the same educational level do not have the same level of wealth.[430] White college graduates have seven times more wealth than their African American college graduate counterparts, even when it is assumed that the white and African American college graduates are in jobs making the same amount of money.[431] African American college graduates also have two-thirds of the net worth of white Americans who never finished high school.[432] And Black college graduates continue to suffer higher unemployment rates than white college graduates.[433] Centuries after slavery, white Americans continue to benefit from its effects, and African Americans continue to suffer its compounded harms.

Endnotes

[1] Piper v. Big Pine Sch. Dist. of Inyo Cty. (1924) 193 Cal. 664, 668, 673-74.

[2] Orfield and Jarvie, Black Segregation Matters: School Resegregation and Black Educational Opportunity, UCLA Civil Rights Project/Proyecto Derechos Civiles (Dec. 2020) pp. 4-6 (as of July 1, 2021) (hereafter Black Segregation Matters); Ladson-Billings, From the Achievement Gap to the Education Debt: Understanding Achievement in U.S. Schools (2006) 35 Ed. Researcher 3, 5 (hereafter Achievement Gap to the Education Debt).

[3] Ladson-Billings, Achievement Gap to the Education Debt, supra; Tamborini et al., Education and Lifetime Earnings in the United States (2015) 54 Demography 1383, 1385-1386.

[4] Sambol-Tosco, The Slave Experience: Education, Arts & Culture, Thirteen (2004) p. 2 (as of Mar. 5, 2021) (hereafter The Slave Experience).

[5] Sambol-Tosco, The Slave Experience, supra; Bell, Silent Covenants: Brown v. Board of Education and the Unfulfilled Hopes for Racial Reform (2004) p. 52 (hereafter Silent Covenants).

[6] Woodson, The Education of the Negro Prior to 1861 (1919) p. 15.

[7] Burnette II, Do America's Public Schools Owe Black People Reparations? (Sept. 23, 2020) 40 Education Week 4-7 (as of June 21, 2021) (hereafter Do America's Public Schools?); Jim Crow Laws, History (Feb. 21, 2021) (as of June 21, 2021); see also South Carolina v. Katzenbach (1966) 383 U.S. 301, 310-13, 311, fn. 10 (noting that Southern states "rapidly instituted racial segregation in their public schools" following the Civil War and discussing the interplay between efforts to restrict literacy and efforts to restrict the vote); Du Bois, The Souls of Black Folk: Essays and Sketches (2d ed. 1903); Tyack and Lowe, The Constitutional Moment: Reconstruction and Black Education in the South (1986), 94 Am. J. Ed. 236, 238-239, 250-252; Anderson, The Education of Blacks in the South, 1860-1935 (1988) pp. 95-96 ("From the vantage point of the southern white majority, any system of universal education for blacks, even industrial education, would potentially lead to universal suffrage.").

[8] Coates, The Case for Reparations, The Atlantic (Jun. 2014) (as of June 21, 2021); Du Bois and Dill, The Common School and the Negro American, Report Of A Social Study Made By Atlanta University Under The Patronage Of The Trustees Of The John F. Slater Fund, With The Proceedings Of The 16th Annual Conference For The Study Of The Negro Problems, Held At Atlanta University, On Tuesday, May 30th, 1911 (1911) (hereafter The Common School) p. 117 (in 1909 in one county in Georgia, "five school houses for colored children, with their contents, have been burned" and over the last few years "burning of Negro school houses . . . by white neighbors had been frequent in the gulf states.").

[9] Brown v. Board of Education (1954) 347 U.S. 483, 495.

[10] Horsford and McKenzie, 'Sometimes I feel like the Problems Started with Desegregation': Exploring Black Superintendent Perspectives on Desegregation Policy (2008) 21 Int. J. of Qualitative Studies in Ed. 443, 444 (hereafter Exploring Black Superintendent Perspectives).

[11] Don Wilson Builders v. Superior Ct. for Los Angeles County (1963) 220 Cal. App. 2d 77, 89 (dis. opn. of Fourt, J.) ("California history indicates that at the time the state was organized in 1849 and for some several years thereafter many southerners were influential in the state government and otherwise and their influence is reflected in many statutes. The statutes of 1850, ch. 140, p. 424, set forth the law against miscegenation and such remained the law in one form or another until 1948 [].."); Smith, Remaking Slavery in a Free State: Masters and Slaves in Gold Rush California (2011) 80 Pacific Historical Rev. 28, 49-50.

[12] Hudson, West of Jim Crow: The Fight Against California's Color Line (2020) p. 32 (hereafter West of Jim Crow); Hendrick, The Education of Non-Whites in California, 1849-1970 (1977) p. 7; Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed: Segregation and Exclusion in California Schools, 1855-1975 (1976) p. 12, fn. 10 (hereafter All Deliberate Speed); see Stats. 1855, ch. 185, § 12, p. 232.

[13] One of these tactics was housing segregation, which government enforced in a variety of ways. See, e.g., Rothstein, The Color of Law: A Forgotten History of How Our Government Segregated America (2017) (hereafter The Color of Law); Orfield and Jarvie, Black Segregation Matters, supra, pp. 12-13.

[14] Farrow et al., Complicity: How the North Promoted, Prolonged, and Profited from Slavery (2005) pp. 180-181 (hereafter Complicity).

[15] Ibid.

[16] Id. at pp. 181-182.

[17] Id. at p. 191.

[18] Ladson-Billings, From the Achievement Gap to the Education Debt, supra, p. 6 (hereafter Achievement Gap to the Education Debt); Warner, Psychiatry Confronts its Racist Past, and Tries to Make Amends, N.Y. Times (Apr. 30, 2021) (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[19] Farrow et al., Complicity, supra, p. 191.

[20] Burnette II, Do America's Public Schools?, supra, fn. 7.

[21] Ibid.

[22] Sambol-Tosco, The Slave Experience, supra, p. 2.

[23] Woodson, The Education of the Negro Prior to 1861, supra, pp. 7-10, 13; Albanese, The Plantation School (1976) pp. 131-138, 255-256 ("Moreover the presence of a large mass of semi-civilized slaves made possible the concentration of large tracts of lands in a few hands, and helped perpetuate a society with aristocratic institutions and tendencies.").

[24] Douglass, Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave (1845) Electronic Edition, p. 33.

[25] Span, Learning in Spite of Opposition: African Americans and their History of Educational Exclusion in Antebellum America (2005) 131 Counterpoints 26, 27-28; Woodson, The Education of the Negro Prior to 1861, supra, pp. 151-178; Ladson-Billings, Achievement Gap to the Education Debt, supra, p. 5.

[26] Span, supra, pp. 27-28; Cornelius, "We Slipped and Learned to Read:" Slave Accounts of the Literacy Process, 1830-1865 (1983) 44 Phylon 171, 174.

[27] Woodson, The Education of the Negro Prior to 1861, supra, pp. 70-92.

[28] Douglass, Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave (1845) Electronic Edition, pp. 49.

[29] Langhorne, The African American Community: Circumventing the Compulsory Education System (2000) 33 Beverly Hills Bar Assn. J. 12, 13.

[30] Bracey, The Significance of Historically Black Colleges and Universities (HBCUs) in the 21st Century: Will Such Institutions of Higher Learning Survive? (2017) 76 Am. J. Econ. & Socio. 670, 671 (hereafter Significance of HBCUs).

[31] Sambol-Tosco, The Slave Experience, supra, p. 2; Bell, Silent Covenants, supra, at p. 52.

[32] Woodson, The Education of the Negro Prior to 1861, supra, pp. 10-11; Sambol-Tosco, The Slave Experience, supra, p. 2. In 1857, the Supreme Court held in Dred Scott that Black people were not citizens and, as such, gave the states express permission to deny Black people equal rights, including to education. Scott v. Sandford (1857) 60 U.S. 393.

[33] May, Some Recollections of Our Antislavery Conflict (1869) pp. 52-53 (as of June 24, 2021).

[34] Ibid.

[35] Id. at p. 50.

[36] Id. at p. 52.

[37] Id. at pp. 70-71.

[38] Id. at p. 71.

[39] Id. at pp. 71-72.

[40] See Ladson-Billings, Achievement Gap to the Education Debt, supra, p. 6 (noting that by 1860, New England was home to 472 cotton mills and between 1830 and 1840, Northern mills consumed more than 100 million pounds of Southern cotton).

[41] Encyclopedia.com, Impact of Slavery on the Northern Economy (as of Jan. 26, 2022).

[42] Farrow et al., Complicity, supra, p. 141.

[43] Woodson, The Education of the Negro Prior to 1861, supra, p. 15.

[44] Bracey, Significance of HBCUs, supra, p. 675; Office for Civil Rights, Historically Black Colleges and Universities and Higher Education Desegregation, U.S. Dept. of Ed. (Mar. 1991) (as of June 21, 2021) (hereafter HBCUs and Desegregation).

[45] Bracey, Significance of HBCUs, supra, p. 676; Office for Civil Rights, HBCUs and Desegregation, supra.

[46] Harper et al., Access and Equity for African American Students in Higher Education: A Critical Race Historical Analysis of Policy Efforts (2009) 80 J. of Higher Ed. 389, 393 (hereafter Access and Equity); Roebuck and Murty, Historically Black Colleges and Universities: Their Place in American Higher Education (1993) p. 22 ("[O]nly twenty-eight blacks received baccalaureate degrees . . . prior to the Civil War.")

[47] Hudson, West of Jim Crow, supra, pp. 22-23;.see, e.g., In re Perkins (1852) 2 Cal. 424, 437-441, 454-457 (upholding 1852 Fugitive Slave Act, affirming that enslavers who brought enslaved persons from other states were not affected by the anti-slavery clause in the constitution); Gold Chains: The Hidden History of Slavery in California, ACLU (as of June 24, 2021).

[48] E.g., Don Wilson Builders v. Superior Ct. for Los Angeles County (1963) 220 Cal.App.2d 77, 89 (dis. opn. of Fourt, J.) ("California history indicates that at the time the state was organized in 1849 and for some several years thereafter many southerners were influential in the state government and otherwise and their influence is reflected in many statutes. The statutes of 1850, ch. 140, p. 424, set forth the law against miscegenation and such remained the law in one form or another until 1948 [].")); Smith, Remaking Slavery in a Free State: Masters and Slaves in Gold Rush California (2011) 80 Pacific Historical Rev. 28, 49-50.

[49] Hudson, West of Jim Crow, supra, pp. 19, 31.

[50] Id. at p. 32 (citing Moulder, Annual Report of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction (1858) S.F. Public Library Archives, p. 14).

[51] Hendrick, The Education of Non-Whites in California, supra, p. 7; see also Hudson, West of Jim Crow, supra, p. 32; Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, p. 12; see Stats. 1855, ch. 185, § 12, p. 232.

[52] Ibid.; see also Hendrick, The Education of Non-Whites in California, supra, pp. 7-8; Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, p. 12, fn. 10; see Stats. 1855, ch. 185, § 12, p. 232.

[53] Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, p. 10.

[54] Id. at p. 11.

[55] Id. at p. 14.

[56] Id. at pp. 14, 17.

[57] Hudson, West of Jim Crow, supra, pp. 31-32.

[58] Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, p. 16.

[59] Anderson, supra, at p. 5.

[60] Du Bois and Dill, The Common School, supra, pp. 19-22; John Hope Franklin, Reconstruction after the Civil War (2d ed., 1994) pp. 107-113; Burnette II, Do America's Public Schools?, supra.

[61] See Franklin, Reconstruction after the Civil War, supra, pp. 107-113; Tyack and Lowe, The Constitutional Moment: Reconstruction and Black Education in the South (1986) 94 Am. J. Ed. 236, 238; Gershon, Bringing Universal Education to the South (Jan. 24, 2018) JSTOR Daily (as of May 3, 2022).

[62] Burnette II, Do America's Public Schools?, supra; Jim Crow Laws (Feb. 21, 2021) History (as of June 21, 2021); see also South Carolina, supra, 383 U.S. at p. 301, 310-13, 311 (noting that Southern states "rapidly instituted racial segregation in their public schools" following the Civil War and discussing the interplay between efforts to restrict literacy and efforts to restrict the vote).

[63] Blackmon, Slavery by Another Name: The Re-Enslavement of African Americans from the Civil War to World War II

(2008) pp. 105 & fn. 40 (hereafter Slavery by Another Name).

[64] See National Geographic, The Black Codes and Jim Crow Laws (as of June 24, 2021).

[65] Du Bois, The Souls of Black Folk: Essays and Sketches (2d ed. 1903); Tyack & Lowe, supra, pp. 238-239, 250-252; Anderson, supra, at pp. 95-96 ("From the vantage point of the southern white majority, any system of universal education for blacks, even industrial education, would potentially lead to universal suffrage.").

[66] Kendi, Stamped from the Beginning: The Definitive History of Racist Ideas in America (2017) p. 273; Blackmon, Slavery by Another Name, supra, at fn. 63, pp. 121-122; Greenblatt, The Racial History of the 'Grandfather Clause', NPR (Oct. 22, 2013) (as of July 15, 2020).

[67] Du Bois, et al., The Common School and the Negro American: Report of a Social Study, Atlanta University (May 30, 1911) p. 22.

[68] Du Bois and Dill, The Common School, supra, p. 21; Franklin, Reconstruction after the Civil War, supra, at fn. 60, pp. 107-113; Burnette II, Do America's Public Schools?, supra.

[69] Du Bois and Dill, The Common School, supra, pp. 19-21; Tyack & Lowe, supra, at pp. 238-239, 243-249.

[70] Burnette II, Do America's Public Schools?, supra.

[71] United States Senate, Freedmen's Bureau Acts (1865 And 1868) (as of June 18, 2021); Du Bois and Dill, The Common School, supra, p. 19.

[72] Nat. Archives, The Freedmen's Bureau (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[73] Antietam National Battlefield, African Americans and Education During Reconstruction: The Tolson's Chapel Schools (as of Mar. 11, 2022).

[74] Ibid.

[75] Ibid.

[76] Ibid.

[77] Ibid.

[78] The North Carolina Collection – Durham County Library, The Women Who Ran the Schools: The Jeanes Teachers and Durham County's Rural Black Schools (As of March 10, 2022).

[79] McHugh, Denied a Teaching Job for Being "too Black," She Started Her Own School – and a Movement, The Wash. Post (February 2021).

[80] Ibid.

[81] Ibid.

[82] Coates, The Case for Reparations, The Atlantic (Jun. 2014) (as of June 21, 2021); Du Bois and Dill, The Common School, supra, p. 117 (in 1909 in one county in Georgia, "five school houses for colored children, with their contents, have been burned" and over the last few years "burning of Negro school houses . . . by white neighbors had been frequent in the gulf states").

[83] Bell, Silent Covenants, supra, p. 91; Darity Jr. and Mullen, From Here to Equality: Reparations for African Americans in the Twenty-First Century (2020) p. 210 (hereafter From Here to Equality).

[84] Cummings v. Board of Ed. of Richmond County (1899) 175 U.S. 528, 530, 542 (court will not intervene in case where county closed a Black high school and used the "funds in hand", including tax dollars from Black residents, to support a white high school to which Black students were denied entry).

[85] See Blackmon, Slavery by Another Name, supra, p. 93.

[86] Id. at pp. 93, 97.

[87] Id. at pp. 100-102.

[88] Orfield and Jarvie, Black Segregation Matters, supra, pp. 4-6.

[89] E.g., United States v. Stanley (Civil Rights Cases) (1883) 109 U.S. 3, 13, 25.

[90] Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) 163 U.S. 537, 546-548, 550-552.

[91] Ladson-Billings, Achievement Gap to the Education Debt, supra, p. 5.

[92] Foner, Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863-1877 (2014 ed.) p. 422.

[93] See Ibid.

[94] See Ibid.; cf. generally Du Bois and Dill, The Common School, supra.

[95] See Foner, supra, p. 422; Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns: The Epic Story of America's Great Migration, pp. 85-86 (2010) (hereafter The Warmth of Other Suns).

[96] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns, supra.

[97] Id. at p. 86.

[98] Anderson, supra, at pp. 183-184; Du Bois and Dill, The Common School, supra, pp. 7-8 (African American people "themselves have purchased school sites, school houses and school furniture, thus being a peculiar way double taxed" and are "paying into the school fund" in taxes much more than they are receiving in "actual appropriations for school facilities.").

[99] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns, supra, pp. 84-86.

[100] Blackmon, Slavery by Another Name, supra, p. 157.

[101] See, e.g., Du Bois and Dill, The Common School, supra, p. 136.

[102] See, e.g., id. at pp. 40, 52-53, 57, 59, 63, 65, 78-79.

[103] Id. at pp. 100-107.

[104] Id. at p. 3.

[105] Bell, Silent Covenants, supra, p. 15 (citing Tushnet, The NAACP's Legal Strategy Against Segregated Education, 1925-1950 (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987), pp. 5-6); Darity Jr. and Mullen, From Here to Equality, supra, p. 230 (citing Bond, The Education of the Negro in the American Social Order, 46); Du Bois and Dill, The Common School, supra, pp. 29-31; 118 (report that in Mississippi counties draw their share of funding according to the number of white and African American children but spend the money almost exclusively on the white children).

[106] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns: The Epic Story of America's Great Migration, p. 88 (2010).

[107] Ibid.

[108] Ibid.

[109] See, e.g., Du Bois and Dill, The Common School, supra, pp. 52; see also Ibid. at pp. 57, 59-60, 101 (describing differences in months of operation for African American and white schools in Georgia and South Carolina); Brooker, The Education of Black Children in the Jim Crow South, America's Black Holocaust Museum: Bringing Our History to Light (as of June 18, 2021); Ladson-Billings, Achievement Gap to the Education Debt, supra, p. 5.

[110] Brooker, supra; Ladson-Billings, Achievement Gap to the Education Debt, supra, p. 5; see, e.g., Du Bois and Dill, The Common School, supra, pp. 52-54, 58, 101.

[111] Du Bois, Does the Negro Need Separate Schools? (1935) 4 The J. of Negro Education, p. 328.

[112] Ibid.

[113] Id. at pp. 328-329.

[114] Coates, The Case for Reparations, The Atlantic (June 2014) (as of Nov. 19, 2021).

[115] Ibid.

[116] Compare Du Bois and Dill, The Common School, supra, p. 16 with Tapia et al., The Uneven Transition Toward Universal Literacy in Spain, 1860-1930 (2021) 50 Hist. of Educ. 605, 609; Nat. Bureau of Economic Research (Working Paper No. 173) p. 26 (Spain's literacy rate was 38.1% in 1887 and 44.8% in 1990); Tapia et al., Two Stories, One Fate: Age-Heaping and Literacy in Spain, 1877-1930 (2018) National Bureau of Economic Research (Working Paper No. 139) p. 5 (literacy rate in Italy was similarly poor as Spain and was below 50% in the nineteenth century); see also National Center for Education Statistics, National Assessment of Adult Literacy, 120 Years of American Education: A Statistical Portrait (as of Jan. 26, 2022) (African American literacy rose from 20 percent in 1870 to 70 percent by 1910, close to 80 percent by 1920).

[117] Bertocchi and Dimico, The Racial Gap in Education and the Legacy of Slavery (2012) 40 J. Comp. Econ. 581, 581-582. (hereafter The Racial Gap in Education)

[118] Burnette II, Do America's Public Schools?, supra.

[119] Brown, supra, 347 U.S. at p. 495. The idea that segregated schools were "equal" was unfounded—segregated public schools for African American students provided unequal education in nearly every category when compared to public schools for white students. See Margo, Race and Schooling in the South 1880-1950: An Economic History (1990) pp. 18-20.

[120] Horsford and McKenzie, Exploring Black Superintendent Perspectives, supra, p. 444; see, e.g., Griffin v. County School Bd. (1964) 377 U.S. 218, 221 (school districts closed public schools rather than integrate, cut off funding for public schools and instead provided private vouchers for private schools, then delayed adoption of integration plan); Green v. County School Bd. (1968) 391 U.S. 430, 433 (Green) (school board automatically reassigned children to schools they had attended the prior year, preventing integration); Goss v. Bd. of Ed. of City of Knoxville (1963) 373 U.S. 683, 686-687 (school board allowed students to request to be transferred if they had been assigned to a school previously attended only by members of a different race).

[121] Driver, Supremacies and the Southern Manifesto (2014) 92 Tex. L. Rev. 1053, 1054, 1066-1067, 1079 (nineteen out of the twenty-two Southern senators signed the Manifesto and declared their aim to reverse Brown using all lawful means); see Ogletree, Tulsa Reparations: The Survivor's Story (2004) 24 B.C. Third World L.J. 13, 22 (noting that "[s]ince the end of slavery, whites have resisted the challenge of integration and found more or less sophisticated ways by which to resist the efforts of African Americans to participate on equal terms in American society").

[122] Equal Justice Initiative, Supreme Court Bans School Segregation, Sparking Massive White Resistance (as of May 5, 2021); Bennett, Little Rock Nine: Decades-long Battle for School Equity Began with Nine Black Students Facing Angry White Mob (Sept. 25, 2020) Southern Poverty Law Center (as of Nov. 19, 2021); Zinn Education Project, Sept 12, 1958: Little Rock Public Schools Closed, (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[123] Ross and Key, In the Wake of Central High Crisis, Crime and Injustice, Arkansas Times (Oct. 27, 2020) (as of Nov. 19, 2021).

[124] Bell, Silent Covenants, supra, p. 100.

[125] Ibid.

[126] Id. at pp. 100-102.

[127] Ibid.

[128] Ibid.

[129] Schofield, School Desegregation and Intergroup Relations: A Review of the Literature (1991) 17 Rev. of Research in Education 335, 335; Horsford and McKenzie, Exploring Black Superintendent Perspectives, supra, pp. 448-49; Bell, Silent Covenants, supra, p. 100.

[130] E.g., Equal Justice Initiative, Georgia Governor Proposes Abolition of Public School System to Avoid Integration (as of Nov. 19, 2021).

[131] E.g., Ibid.

[132] Brown v. Board of Educ. of Topeka, Kan. (1955) 349 U.S. 294, 300.

[133] Bell, Silent Covenants, supra, p. 95; see also Carter, The Warren Court and Desegregation (1968) 67 Mich. L. Rev. 237, 243.

[134] See Alexander v. Holmes County Bd. of Ed. (1969) 396 U.S. 19, 20-21.

[135] Equal Justice Initiative, Supreme Court Bans School Segregation, Sparking Massive White Resistance (as of May 5, 2021).

[136] See Tate et al., The Brown Decision Revisited: Mathematizing a Social Problem (1993) 7 Educational Policy 255, 259-268; Ladson-Billings, Landing on the Wrong Note: The Price We Paid for Brown (2004) 33 Education Researcher 3, 6 (noting that one of consequences of Brown included the "job loss and demotions for Black teachers and administrators").

[137] Horsford and McKenzie, Exploring Black Superintendent Perspectives, supra, p. 447; Toppo, Thousands of Black Teachers Lost Jobs, USA Today (Apr. 28, 2004) (as of June 21, 2021).

[138] Ibid.

[139] Horsford and McKenzie, Exploring Black Superintendent Perspectives, supra, p. 449.

[140] Ibid.; Tillman, (Un)Intended Consequences?: The Impact of the Brown v. Board of Education Decision on the Employment Status of Black Educators (2004) 36 Educ. & Urban Soc. 280, 287-288; Will, 65 Years After 'Brown v. Board,' Where Are All the Black Educators?, Education Week (May 14, 2019) (as of June 23, 2021); Ethridge, Impact of the 1954 Brown vs. Topeka Board of Education Decision on Black Educators (1979) 30 Negro Ed. Rev. 217, 223.

[141] Fultz, The Displacement of Black Educators Post-Brown: An Overview and Analysis (2004) 44 Hist. Ed. Q. 11, 37; see Tillman, supra, p. 288 (noting that firing of African American educators affected their communities economically); Ethridge, supra, , p. 224.

[142] Fultz, supra, pp. 28-29; Tillman, supra, p. 294; Toppo, Thousands of Black Teachers Lost Jobs, supra; see Jones-Wilson, Race, Realities, and American Educators: Two Sides of the Coin (1990) 59 J. of Negro Ed. 119, 121; Walker, The Architects of Black Schooling in the Segregated South: The Case of One Principal Leader (2003) 19 J. of Curriculum & Supervision 54, 56.

[143] Gershenson et al., The Long-Run Impacts of Same-Race Teachers (Nov. 2018) National Bureau of Economic Research (Working Paper No. 25254) pp. 1-2, 33 (finding that African American students with at least one African American teacher in K-3 are 13% more likely to graduate high school and 19% more likely to enroll in college than their African American peers who had no African American teachers).

[144] Will, Still Mostly White and Female: New Federal Data on the Teaching Profession, Education Week (Apr. 14, 2020) (as of June 21, 2021); Gewertz, Survey of Mostly-White Educators Finds 1 in 5 Think Textbooks Accurately Reflect People of Color, Education Week (June 29, 2020) (as of June 22, 2021) (hereafter Survey of Mostly-White Educators); U.S. Dept. of Ed., The State of Racial Diversity in the Educator Workforce (2016) pp. 2, 6, 7, 9 (as of June 21, 2021); Modan, Survey: Superintendents still overwhelmingly white, male, K-12 Dive (Feb. 11, 2020) (as of May 6, 2022).

[145] Will, Still Mostly White and Female: New Federal Data on the Teaching Profession, Education Week (Apr. 14, 2020) (as of June 21, 2021); U.S. Dept. of Ed., The State of Racial Diversity in the Educator Workforce (2016) pp. 2, 6 (as of June 21, 2021).

[146] Nat. School Boards Assn., Black Students in the Condition of Education 2020 (June 23, 2020) (as of Jan. 26, 2022).

[147] Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 13, preface.

[148] See Burnette II, As Districts Seek Revenue Due to Pandemic, Black Homeowners May Feel the Biggest Hit, Education Week (July 23, 2020) (as of June 22, 2021); Oliver and Shapiro, Black Wealth/White Wealth: A New Perspective on Racial Inequality (1995) pp. 8-9, 19-20; Guastaferro, Why Racial Inequities in America's Schools are Rooted in Housing Policies of the Past, USA Today (Nov. 2, 2020) (as of June 23, 2021) (hereafter Why Racial Inequities are Rooted in Housing Policies).

[149] Demand for School Integration Leads to Massive 1964 Boycott – in New York City, N.Y. Public Radio (Feb. 3, 2016) (as of Nov. 19, 2021).

[150] Ibid.; Ladson-Billings, Achievement Gap to the Education Debt, supra, at fn. 2, p. 5; see generally Du Bois & and Dill, The Common School, supra, at fn. 8.

[151] Bell, Silent Covenants, supra, at fn. 5, pp. 109-112; Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 142, 146.

[152] Demand for School Integration Leads to Massive 1964 Boycott – in New York City, N.Y. Public Radio (Feb. 3, 2016) (as of Nov. 19, 2021).

[153] Ibid.

[154] Equal Justice Initiative, Resistance to School Desegregation (March 1, 2014) (as of June 21, 2021).

[155] Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 147-148.

[156] Kerner, Report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders: Summary of Report (1968) pp. 1, 5-6 (as of June 21, 2021).

[157] Graham, Richard Nixon and Civil Rights: Explaining an Enigma (1996) 26 Presidential Studies Quarterly 93, 94, 101.

[158] Orfield and Jarvie, Black Segregation Matters, supra, at fn. 2, p. 22; see also Orfield, Schools More Separate: Consequences of A Decade of Resegregation, The Civil Rights Project, Harvard University (July, 2001) p. 25 (as of July 1, 2021) (hereafter Schools More Separate) (26 central cities house districts which enroll 1/10 of the nation's students, but only a minute fraction of the nation's white student; five school districts were more than 90% nonwhite, while a large majority of the others had less than one-fifth white students).

[159] Boston Research Center, Encyclopedia of Boston, Desegregation Busing (as of Jan. 26, 2022.)

[160] History, This Day in History, Violence erupts in Boston over Desegregation Busing (as of Jan. 26, 2022); Bubar, The Jim Crow North, Upfront: The N.Y. Times (March 9 2020) (as of Jan. 26, 2022).

[161] Milliken v. Bradley (1974) 418 U.S. 717, 752.

[162] See e.g., Bell, Silent Covenants, supra, at fn. 5, p. 112.

[163] Goldstein, Detroit Students Have a Constitutional Right to Literacy, Court Rules, The N.Y. Times (April 27, 2020) (as of June 22, 2021); see Bell, supra, at fn. 5, pp. 111-112;

[164] Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp. (1977) 429 U.S. 252.

[165] Bell, Silent Covenants, supra, at fn. 5, p. 110.

[166] Id. at p. 114; Orfield and Jarvie, Black Segregation Matters, supra, at fn. 2, pp. 12-13.

[167] Bell, Silent Covenants, supra, at fn. 5, p. 114.

[168] See id. at pp. 110-113; Orfield, Schools More Separate, supra, pp. 1-2; see also Orfield and Jarvie, Black Segregation Matters, supra, at fn. 2, p. 6 ("Intense segregation, in 90-100% non-White schools, fell very sharply from 78% of Black students in 1968 to 24% in the South states by 1988, but [by 2020] has now risen back to 37%[.]").

[169] Orfield, Schools More Separate, supra, pp. 15-44.

[170] Ibid. (citing Board of Education of Oklahoma City vs. Dowell (1991), Freeman v. Pitts (1992), and Missouri v. Jenkins (1995)).

[171] Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School Dist. No. 1 (2007) 551 U.S. 701.

[172] Orfield and Siegel-Hawley, E Pluribus . . . Separation, Deepening Double Segregation for More Students, UCLA Civil Rights Project/Proyecto Derechos Civiles (Sept. 2012) p. 7 (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[173] Meatto, Still Separate, Still Unequal: Teaching about School Segregation and Educational Inequality, N.Y. Times (May 2, 2019) (as of June 21, 2021) ("More than half of the nation's schoolchildren are in racially concentrated districts, where over 75 percent of students are either white or nonwhite."); Bracey, Significance of HBCUs, supra, p. 687; Toppo, GAO Study: Segregation Worsening in U.S. Schools, USA Today (May 17, 2016) (as of June 22, 2021); Guastaferro, Why Racial Inequities are Rooted in Housing Policies, supra (discussing study showing that predominantly nonwhite school districts received $23 billion less in state and local funding than majority white school districts in 2016); Orfield and Jarvie, Black Segregation Matters, supra, pp. 6, 28.

[174] Orfield and Jarvie, Black Segregation Matters, supra. at fn. 2, p. 28.

[175] Woodson, The Mis-Education of the Negro (1933).

[176] Ed. Week, Tracking (Sept. 21, 2004) (as of June 24, 2021); Oakes et al., Multiplying Inequalities: The Effects of Race, Social Class, and Tracking on Opportunities to Learn Mathematics and Science (1990) pp. 18-19 & fn. 6 ("[W]e are dealing with teachers' perceptions of ability—we cannot assume that ability means the same thing from teacher to teacher, or from school to school.") (hereafter Multiplying Inequalities); Anderson and Oakes, The Truth About Tracking in The Big Lies of School Reform: Finding Better Solutions for the Futile Public Education (2014) pp. 113-114 (describing the arbitrary nature of tracking) (hereafter The Truth About Tracking).

[177] Horsford and McKenzie, Exploring Black Superintendent Perspectives, supra, at fn. 10, p. 452; Oakes, Two Cities' Tracking and Within-School Segregation (1995) 96 Teachers College Record 681 (as of June 24, 2021); Oakes, Keeping Track: How Schools Structure Inequality (2005) pp. 11-12, 40, 64-65; Oakes et al., Detracking: The Social Construction of Ability, Cultural Politics, and Resistance to Reform (1997) 98 Teachers College Record 482, 490-491, 496-500; Artiles et al., Culturally Diverse Students in Special Education: Legacies and Prospects, in Handbook of Research on Multicultural Education (2d ed. 2004) p. 716 (finding that many students because of factors including race are disproportionately referred and placed in special education programs); Conger, Within-School Segregation in an Urban School District (2005) 27 Ed. Eval. & Policy Analysis 225, 237-238; Saddler, The Impact of Brown on African American Students: A Critical Race Theoretical Perspective (2005) 37 Ed. Studies 41, 44 (observing that African American students are three times more likely to be placed in special education classes and more likely to be placed in vocational tracks); Oakes et al., Multiplying Inequalities, supra, pp. 18-25.

[178] Bell, Silent Covenants, supra, at fn. 5, p. 112; see Kohli and Quartz, Modern-Day Segregation in Public Schools, The Atlantic, (Nov. 18, 2014); Mathis, Moving Beyond Tracking, National Education Policy Center (May 2013) ("[Tracking] generally plays out in a discriminatory way, segregating students by race and socio-economic status.") (as of June 25, 2021).

[179] Darity Jr. and Mullen, From Here to Equality, supra, p. 220; Oakes et al.,, Multiplying Inequalities, supra, pp. 18, 23; Anderson & and Oakes, The Truth About Tracking, supra, pp. 118 (discussing their research finding that "African American and Latino students were much less likely than White or Asian students with the same test scores to be placed in high-ability classes") (hereafter The Truth About Tracking).

[180] Horsford and McKenzie, Exploring Black Superintendent Perspectives, supra, at fn. 10, pp. 451-452.

[181] Anderson and Oakes, The Truth About Tracking, supra, pp. 114-118 ("in every aspect of what makes for a quality education, kids in lower tracks typically get less than those in higher tracks and gifted programs"); Mathis, supra, ("Low-track classes tend to have watered-down curriculum, less experienced teachers, lowered expectations, more discipline problems, and less engaging lessons.") (as of June 25, 2021); Oakes et al., Multiplying Inequalities, supra, pp. 104-105 ("Students judged to have low ability may get less because they are thought to need less (they are considered unable to benefit) or deserve less (they are considered unwilling to benefit).").

[182] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (October 12, 2021) Testimony of Dr. Rucker Johnson (as of Jan. 28, 2022).

[183] Bell, Silent Covenants, supra, at fn. 5, pp. 127-129; Ladson-Billings, Achievement Gap to the Education Debt, supra, at fn. 2, p. 9 ("If we are unwilling to desegregate our schools and unwilling to fund them equitably, we find ourselves not only backing away from the promise of the Brown decision but literally refusing even to take Plessy seriously. At least a serious consideration of Plessy would make us look at funding inequities."); Kozol, Savage Inequalities: Children in American Schools (1991) pp. 3-6; Kozol, The Shame of the Nation: The Restoration of Apartheid Schooling in America (2005) pp. 18-21.

[184] U.S. Government Accountability Office, GAO-20-494, K-12 Education: School Districts Frequently Identified Multiple Building Systems Needing Updates or Replacement (June 2020) (as of July 1, 2021).

[185] Shores et al., Categorical Inequalities Between Black and White Students are Common in US Schools—But They Don't Have to Be, Brookings Institute (Feb. 21, 2020) (as of June 21, 2021).

[186] Bracey, Significance of HBCUs, supra, pp. 687-688; Kerr, Report Finds Segregation in Education on the Rise, AP News (May 17, 2016) (as of June 23, 2021); Office for Civil Rights, 2015-16 Civil Rights Data Collection: Stem Course Taking, U.S. Dept. of Ed. (2018) at p. 5 fig.4 (as of July 1, 2021); compare College Board, AP Cohort Data Report: Graduating Class of 2020 (2020) p. 20 with Handwerk et al., Access to Success: Patterns of Advanced Placement Participation in U.S. High Schools (July 2008) p. 7 (as of July 1, 2021) (African American students were 14.2% of all public high school seniors in 2020, but only 8.3% of students nationwide who took an AP exam—an increase of only 1.3% since 2006).

[187] Irizarry, On Track or Derailed? Race, Advanced Math, and the Transition to High School (2021) 7 Socius 1, 12-13 (as of Jan. 28, 2022).

[188] Hammond, Inequality in Teaching and Schooling: How Opportunity is Rationed to Students of Color in America, in The Right Thing to Do, The Smart Thing to Do: Enhancing Diversity in Health Professions, Summary of the Symposium on Diversity in Health Professions in Honor of Herbert W.Nickens, M.D., National Academies Press (2001) pp. 208-209; Grissom and Redding, Discretion and Disproportionality: Explaining the Underrepresentation of High-Achieving Students of Color in Gifted Programs (2016) 2 Aera Open 1, 1-2; The Education Trust, Inequities in Advanced Coursework: What's Driving Them and What Leaders Can Do (2019), at p. 8 ("Our analysis [of the 2015-16 CRDC data] shows that although Black students make up 16% of elementary schoolers, they make up only 9% of students in gifted and talented programs."); Llahamon, Office for Civil Rights, Dear Colleague Letter: Resource Comparability, U.S. Dept. of Ed. (Oct. 1, 2014), p. 4 (as of July 1, 2021); Office for Civil Rights, 2011-12 Civil Rights Data Collection, Data Snapshot: Teacher Equity, U.S. Dept. of Ed. (2014) (as of July 1, 2021); Adamson and Darling-Hammond, Funding Disparities and the Inequitable Distribution of Teachers: Evaluating Sources and Solutions (2012) 20 Ed. Policy Analysis Archives 1, 30-32; Whitaker et al., Cops and No Counselors: How the Lack of School Mental Health Staff is Harming Students, ACLU (2019) p. 7 (finding that students of color are more likely to attend schools with law enforcement officers, be referred to law enforcement, and be arrested, and "students who attend schools with high percentages of Black students . . . are more likely to attend schools with tough security measures like metal detectors, random 'contraband' sweeps, security guards, and security cameras") (as of June 23, 2021) (hereafter Cops and No Counselors).

[189] Toldson, Breaking Barriers: Plotting the Path to Academic Success for School-Age African American Males, Congressional Black Caucus Foundation, Inc. p. 46 (2008).

[190] Id. at p. 23.

[191] Powers et al., Twenty-five Years after Larry P.: The California Response to Overrepresentation of African Americans in Special Education (2004) 9 The California School Psychologist 145, 155 (hereafter Twenty-five Years after Larry P.).

[192] E.g., Office for Civil Rights, Education in a Pandemic: The Disparate Impacts of COVID-19 on America's Students, U.S. Dept. of Ed. (2021) p. 10 (citing Shores et al., Categorical Inequality in Black and White: Linking Disproportionality across Multiple Educational Outcomes, 57 Am. Ed. Research J. 2089, 2097 (2020)).

[193] Bellan, $23 Billion: Education Funding Report Reveals Less Money for City Kids, Bloomberg.com (March 27, 2019) (as of June 21, 2021); Mervosh, How Much Wealthier Are White School Districts than Nonwhite Ones? $23 Billion, Report Says, The N.Y. Times (Feb. 27, 2019) (as of June 21, 2021); Carey, Rich Schools, Poor Schools and a Biden Plan, The N.Y. Times (June 9, 2021) (reporting that "districts where more than 75 percent of students are white receive $23 billion more per year than districts where more than 75 percent of students are not white — even though there are more students in predominantly nonwhite districts") (as of June 25, 2021).

[194] EdBuild, $23 Billion (Feb. 2019) pp. 4-5 (as of June 25, 2021).

[195] Carey, supra; Carey and Harris, It Turns Out Spending More Probably Does Improve Education, The N.Y. Times (Dec. 12, 2016) (as of June 25, 2021); Lafortune et al., School Finance Reform and the Distribution of Student Achievement (2018) 10 Am. Econ. J.: Applied Econs. 1, 24 (finding that "money can and does matter in education").

[196] Reparations 4 Slavery, The Movement for Black Lives (as of June 21, 2021); Vazquez-Martinez et al., Unsafe School Facilities Reinforce Educational Inequities Among Marginalized Students, Brookings Institute (Sept. 1, 2020) (as of July 1, 2021); U.S. Government Accountability Office, GAO-20-494, K-12 Education: School Districts Frequently Identified Multiple Building Systems Needing Updates or Replacement (June 2020) (as of July 1, 2021); Kelley, Study Unlocks Why Decrepit Schools Mean Poor Test Scores, Cornell Chronicle (July 20, 2016) (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[197] Rosenbaum, Educational and Criminal Justice Outcomes 12 Years After School Suspension, Youth & Soc'y (Jan. 17, 2018) (finding that suspended youth were less likely to have graduated from college or high school, and were more likely to have been arrested and on probation); Gordon, Disproportionality in Student Discipline: Connecting Policy to Research, Brookings Institute (Jan. 18, 2018) (as of June 21, 2021) (hereafter Disproportionality in Student Discipline); Losen and Martin, The Unequal Impact of Suspension on the Opportunity to Learn in California: What the 2016-2017 Rates Tell Us about Progress, The Center for Civil Rights Remedies (2018) pp. 7-9, 12; Losen and Whitaker, Lost Instruction: The Disparate Impact of the School Discipline Gap in California, The Center for Civil Rights Remedies (2017) pp. 8-9; The Council on State Gov. & Pub. Policy Research Inst. at Tex. A&M Univ., Breaking Schools' Rules: A Statewide Study on How School Discipline Relates to Students' Success and Juvenile Justice Involvement (July 2011) (as of July 1, 2021).

[198] Gordon, Disproportionality in Student Discipline, supra, p. 6; Skiba et al., The Color of Discipline: Sources of Racial and Gender Disproportionality in School Punishment (2002) 34 Urban Rev. 317, 318-319, 333 (finding that "[c]ontrary to the socioeconomic hypothesis, the current investigation demonstrates that significant racial disparities in school discipline remain even after controlling for socioeconomic status"); see CADRE et al., Redefining Dignity in Our Schools: A Shadow Report on School-Wide Positive Behavior Support Implementation in South Los Angeles, 2007-2010 (June, 2010) pp. 6-7, 12; Into New Rules for Schools: Remote Learning Means Remote School Discipline. But Not All Kids Are Treated Equally, MSNBC (Sept. 14, 2020) (as of June 25, 2021).

[199] National Public Radio, Code Switch, Black Preschoolers Far More Likely to Be Suspended (March 21, 2014) (as of Jan. 26, 2022).

[200] Gordon, Disproportionality in Student Discipline, supra; U.S. Government Accountability Office, GAO 18-258, K-12 Education: Discipline Disparities for Black Students, Boys, and Students with Disabilities (Mar. 2018).

[201] Office for Civil Rights, Civil Rights Data Collection (for 2017-18 School Year), U.S. Dept. of Ed. (Oct. 14, 2020) (as of July 1, 2021); see also Green et al., 'A Battle for the Souls of Black Girls', The N.Y. Times (Oct. 1, 2020) ("The disproportionate discipline rates among girls indicate what researchers have long said about all Black children: It is not that they misbehave more than their peers, but their behaviors may be judged more harshly.") (as of June 25, 2021).

[202] Rocque and Paternoster, Understanding the Antecedents of the 'School-to-Jail' Link: The Relationship Between Race and School Discipline (2011) 101 The J. of Crim. L. & Criminology 633, 653-54.

[203] Morris and Perry, The Punishment Gap: School Suspension and Racial Disparities in Achievement (2016) 63 J. Social Problems 68, 68-69.

[204] Whitaker et al., Cops and No Counselors, supra, p. 7.

[205] E.g., ACLU, The Right to Remain A Student: How California School Policies Fail to Protect and Serve, p. 14 (Oct. 2016) (as of Jan. 28, 2022).

[206] Servoss and Finn, Security in American Schools: Are Schools Safer? Presentation to Alberti Center for Bullying Abuse Prevention Colloquium Series (Nov. 8, 2015).

[207] Office for Civil Rights, 2015-16 Civil Rights Data Collection: School Climate and Safety, U.S. Dept. of Ed. (2018) (as of June 22, 2021); Robles-Ramamurthy and Watson, Examining Racial Disparities in Juvenile Justice (2019) 47 J. Am. Academy of Psych. & L. 48 (hereafter Examining Racial Disparities); U.S. Dept. of Ed., Civil Rights Data Collection (for 2017-18 School Year) (Oct. 14, 2020) (as of July 1, 2021).

[208] Green et al., 'A Battle for the Souls of Black Girls', supra.

[209] E.g., Cal. Dept. of Justice, Stockton Unified School District Enter into Agreement to Address Discriminatory Treatment of Minority Students and Students with Disabilities, Press Release (Jan. 22, 2019) (as of June 22, 2021).

[210] E.g., ACLU, The Right to Remain A Student: How California School Policies Fail to Protect and Serve, p. 14 (Oct. 2016) (as of Jan. 28, 2022).

[211] See, e.g., Gilliam et al., Do Early Educators' Implicit Biases Regarding Sex and Race Relate to Behavior Expectations and Recommendations of Preschool Expulsions and Suspensions?, Yale Child Study Center, p. 14 (Sept. 28, 2016) (as of June 22, 2021); Dee, A Teacher Like Me: Does Race, Ethnicity, or Gender Matter? (2005) 95 Am. Econ. Rev. 158, 160-163; Banks et al., Discrimination and Implicit Bias in a Racially Unequal Society (2006) 94 Cal. L.Rev. 1169; Eberhardt et al., Looking Deathworthy: Perceived Stereotypicality of Black Defendants Predicts Capital–Sentencing Outcomes (2006) 17 Psychological Sci. 383; Greenwald and Kriegar, Implicit Bias: Scientific Foundations (2006) 94 Cal. L.Rev. 945; see also Dasgupta, Implicit In Group Favoritism, Outgroup Favoritism, and Their Behavioral Manifestations (2004) 17 Soc. Justice Research 146, 155 (discussing "[a]lmost a hundred studies" verifying the existence and importance of implicit bias in understanding racial stereotyping that results in different treatment on the basis of race or other protected categories); Gordon, Disproportionality in Student Discipline, supra.

[212] Bottiani et al., A Multilevel Examination of Racial Disparities in High School Discipline: Black and White Adolescents' Perceived Equity, School Belonging, and Adjustment Problems (2017) 109 J. Ed. Psych. 532, 532-533; Bottiani et al., Inequality in Black and White High School Students' Perceptions of School Support: An Examination of Race in Context (2016) 45 J. Youth Adolescence 1176, 1176-1177; Perry and Morris, Suspending Progress: Collateral Consequences of Exclusionary Punishment in Public Schools (2014) 79 Am. Sociological Rev. 1067, 1070, 1084.

[213] Gordon, Disproportionality in Student Discipline, supra: Results From a Randomized Controlled Effectiveness Trial in Elementary Schools (2010) 12 J. Positive Behavior Interventions 133, 133-135; Luiselli et al., Longitudinal Evaluation of Behavior Support Intervention in a Public Middle School (2002) 4 J. Positive Behavior Interventions 184; OSI Baltimore, Restorative Practices in Baltimore City Schools: Research Updates and Implementation Guide (Sept. 2020) pp. 6-8 (finding that studies are continuing to confirm that restorative approaches result in positive outcomes and are associated with "decreases in harmful exclusionary discipline and improvements in school climate") (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[214] Jackson et al., Intergenerational Resilience in Response to the Stress and Trauma of Enslavement and Chronic Exposure to Institutionalized Racism (2018) 4 J. of Clinical Epigenetics 1, 4.

[215] Lu, Michelle Alexander: More Black Men in Prison Than Were Enslaved in 1850: Clearly, Colorblindness Hasn't Gotten Us Very Far, Colorlines (Mar. 30, 2011) (as of June 22, 2021); Robles-Ramamurthy, Examining Racial Disparities, supra, see generally Alexander, The New Jim Crow: Mass Incarceration in the Age of Colorblindness (2010) (hereafter, The New Jim Crow).

[216] The Sentencing Project, Youth Reentry (June 14, 2012) (as of June 22, 2021); cf. Alexander, The New Jim Crow, supra, pp. 8, 94-96.

[217] Toldson, Breaking Barriers: Plotting the Path to Academic Success for School-Age African American Males, Congressional Black Caucus Foundation, Inc. p. 29 (2008).

[218] Ibid.

[219] Hudson, West of Jim Crow, supra, at fn. 12, p. 34; An Act to Provide for a System of Common Schools, Stats. 1866, ch. 342, §§ 57-58, p. 18.

[220] Hudson, West of Jim Crow, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 34-36.

[221] Ibid.; Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 14, 18, 20; see also Don Wilson Builders v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County (1963) 220 Cal. App.2d 77, 90 (dis. opn. of Fourt, J.) (describing statutes and regulation stating that children of African or Indian descent shall not be admitted into schools for white children).

[222] Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, at fn. 12, p. 17.

[223] Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, at fn. 12, p. 8.

[224] Ward v. Flood (1874) 48 Cal. 36, 54-57.

[225] Hudson, West of Jim Crow, supra, p. 38; Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 23-24.

[226] Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, at fn. 12, p. 24.

[227] Hudson, West of Jim Crow, supra, p. 34.

[228] Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 25-26.

[229] Ibid.

[230] Bailey, Hidden History: Edmond Wysinger, YourCentralValley.com (Feb. 14, 2017) (as of June 22, 2021).

[231] Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, at fn. 12, p. 25 (citing Wysinger v. Crookshank (1890) 82 Cal. 588, 592–93).

[232] Id. at p. 26. The state legislature did so later in its history to re-create for separates schools for Asians and Native Americans; also some legislators attempted to do so again for African American children, but the legislation failed. Id.

[233] Hudson, West of Jim Crow, supra, p. 61; see also id. at p. 168.

[234] Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, pp. 122, 132-137; Orfield and Jarvie, Black Segregation Matters, supra, at fn. 2, pp. 12-13.

[235] Hudson, West of Jim Crow, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 167, 199.

[236] Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 125-126.

[237] Id. at pp. 129-130; Westminster Sch. Dist. of Orange County v. Mendez (9th Cir. 1947) 161 F.2d 774, 777-781.

[238] Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 108-109.

[239] Id. at p. 143.

[240] Hudson, West of Jim Crow, supra, at p. 255 (citing Miller, Address to Western Governors (1964) Civil Rights and State's Rights).

[241] Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, at fn. 12, p. 143.

[242] Ibid.

[243] E.g., Crawford v. Bd. of Educ. (1976) 17 Cal.3d 280, 284-285 (Los Angeles); Jackson v. Pasadena City School Dist. (1963) 59 Cal.2d 876, 881-882 (Pasadena).

[244] See e.g., Wollenberg, All Deliberate Speed, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 148-164.

[245] Cal. Const. art. I, § 26 (November 3, 1964).

[246] Reft, How Prop 14 Shaped California's Racial Covenants, KCET (as of June 30, 2021).

[247] See Cal. Const., art. I, § 7; School Assignment and Transportation of Pupils, California Proposition 1 (1979).

[248] Crawford v. Board. of Educ. of City of Los Angeles (1982) 458 U.S. 527, 535-536.

[249] Orfield and Ee, Segregating California's Future: Inequality and Its Alternative 60 Years after Brown v. Board of Education (May 14, 2014) The Civil Rights Project, UCLA p. 3, 12-18 (hereafter Segregating California's Future); Butt v. State of California (1992) 4 Cal. 4th 668, 684-685.

[250] Bowles, Kamala Harris and Classmates Were Bused Across Berkeley. The Experience Changed Them, N.Y. Times (June 30, 2019) (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[251] Ladson-Billings, Achievement Gap to the Education Debt, supra, at fn. 2, p. 9.

[252] Orfield and Ee, Segregating California's Future, supra, pp. 3, 27.

[253] Orfield and Jarvie, Black Segregation Matters, supra, at fn. 2, pp. 30-31, Tables 13 and 14.

[254] Id. at p. 31, Table 13.

[255] Cal. Dept. of Justice, Attorney General Becerra: Sausalito Marin City School District Agrees to End Segregation in Its Schools, Press Release (Aug. 9, 2019) (as of June 22, 2021).

[256] Murphy and Paluch, Financing California's Public Schools, Public Policy Institute of California (Nov. 2018) (as of June 18, 2021).

[257] Serrano v. Priest (1971) 5 Cal.3d 584, 589.

[258] Murphy and Paluch, Financing California's Public Schools, supra.

[259] Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 13, pp. 6-10.

[260] Butt, supra, 4 Cal.4th 668, 4 Cal.4th 668 (1992).

[261] Sentilles Taught by America: A Story of Struggle and Hope in Compton (2005) pp. 72-73.

[262] Cal. Dept. of Ed., The Williams Case – An Explanation (as of July 1, 2021).

[263] Ibid.

[264] Chung, Williams v. California: Lessons from Nine Years of Implementation, ACLU Foundation of Southern California, p. 11 (2013).

[265] Id. at p. 19.

[266] Id. at pp. 19-20.

[267] See Murphy and Paluch, Financing California's Public Schools, supra, p. 3.

[268] California State Auditor, K-12 Local Control Funding: The State's Approach Has Not Ensured that Significant Funding Is Benefiting Students as Intended to Close Achievement Gaps (Nov. 2019) p. 15 (finding that the implementation of the Local Control Funding Formula "has not yet proven effective at increasing transparency and accountability" and noting that "state law does not explicitly require districts to use unspent supplemental and concentration funds in the following year to benefit intended student groups").

[269] Murphy and Paluch, Financing California's Public Schools, supra, at fn. 169; Cano, Data Exclusive: With California School Bonds, the Rich Get Richer and the Poor, Not So Much, Cal Matters (June 23, 2020) (districts with the highest concentrations of wealthier students average more than twice as many local bond dollars per student since 1998 as most impoverished district and can benefit from as must as $270,000 per pupil in local bond money over the last 20 years) (as of Jan. 28, 2022).

[270] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 12, 2021) Testimony of Kawika Smith (as of Jan. 28, 2022).

[271] The Education Trust West, Black Minds Matter: Supporting the Educational Success of Black Children in California (Oct. 2015) pp. 14-16.

[272] Powers et al., Twenty-five Years after Larry P., supra, pp. 153-154.

[273] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (October 12, 2021) Testimony of Dr. Rucker Johnson (as of Jan. 28, 2022).

[274] Assem. Com. on Ed., Analysis of Assem. Bill 520 (2021-2022 Reg. Sess.) as amended March 25, 2021, p. 6-7 (research shows that "[t]eachers of color boost the academic performance of students of color"); Freedburg, Despite Progress, California's Teaching Force Far From Reflecting Diversity of Students, EdSource.org (April 25, 2018) (as of Jan. 28, 2022).

[275] Cal. Dept. of Ed., Fingertip Facts on Education in California (2019-2020) (as of Jan. 28, 2022); Assem. Com. on Ed., Analysis of Assem. Bill 520 (2021-2022 Reg. Sess.) as amended March 25, 2021, p. 6; Cal. Dept. of Ed., State Superintendent Tony Thurmond, Assemblymember Mike Gipson, Educators and Scholars Urge Support for First-of-its-Kind Legislation to Diversify the Teaching Workforce (Apr. 13, 2021) (as of June 25, 2021);

[276] Sentinel News Service, Gipson Bill Supports Male Educators of Color: AB 520 Diversifies Teaching Workforce, Los Angeles Sentinel (Apr. 15, 2021) (as of June 22, 2021).

[277] Cal. Dept. of Ed., State Superintendent Torlakson Announces 2018 Rates for High School Graduation, Suspension and Chronic Absenteeism (Nov. 19, 2018) (as of June 22, 2021).

[278] Davis, "Why Are the Black Kids Being Suspended?"An Examination of a School District's Efforts to Reform a Faulty Suspension Policy Through Community Conversations (2017) 27 School Community J. 159, 161.

[279] Losen and Martin, The Unequal Impact of Suspension on the Opportunity to Learn in California, The Civil Rights Project (Sept. 18, 2018) p. 5 (as of June 22, 2021); see also Office for Civil Rights, An Overview of Exclusionary Discipline Practices in Public Schools for the 2017-2018 School Year, U.S. Dept. of Ed. (June 2021) (as of June 24, 2021) (finding that "Black pre-school students were expelled at rates that were more than twice their share (38.2%) of total pre-school enrollment (18.2%)").

[280] Cal. Dept. of Justice, California Department of Justice, Stockton Unified School District Enter into Agreement to Address Discriminatory Treatment of Minority Students and Students with Disabilities, Press Release (Jan. 22, 2019) (as of June 24, 2021); Cal. Dept. of Justice, Attorney General Becerra Secures Settlements with Barstow and Oroville School Districts to Address Discriminatory Treatment of Students Based on Race and Disability Status, Press Release (Aug. 25, 2020) (as of June 24, 2021).

[281] People of the State of California v. Barstow Unified School District, No. 20STCV3228, Complaint filed Aug. 25, 2020, p. 6-7.

[282] U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Beyond Suspension: Examining School Discipline Policies and Connections to the School-to-Prison Pipeline for Students of Color with Disabilities, Briefing Report (2019) pp. 10-11, 49, 66; Whitaker, et al., Cops and No Counselors, supra, pp. 5, 35 (analyzing 2015-16 academic year data collected by U.S. Department of Education and finding that California had a 44 percent increase in referral to law enforcement from 2013-14 to 2015-16); Black Organizing Project et al., From Report Card to Criminal Record: The Impact of Policing Oakland Youth (Aug. 2013) p. 17 ("While Blacks make up only 30.5 percent of the student population, they make up more than 70 percent of all Oakland School Police arrests.").

[283] Cal. Dept. of Justice, California Department of Justice, Unified School District Enter into Agreement to Address Discriminatory Treatment of Minority Students and Students with Disabilities, Press Release (Jan. 22, 2019) (as of June 24, 2021); Males, California Decision Aims to End Aggressive Policing in Schools, Yes! Magazine (Feb. 14, 2019) (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[284] Manoucheri, 5-Year-Old Handcuffed, Charged With Battery On Officer, KCRA (Feb. 9, 2012) (as of June 25, 2021); see Males, California Decision Aims to End Aggressive Policing in Schools, Yes! Magazine (Feb. 14, 2019) (as of June 25, 2021); Nelson et al., The Right to Remain a Student: How California School Police Fail to Protect and Serve, ACLU of California (Oct. 2016) p. 13 (hereafter The Right To Remain a Student).

[285] Nelson et al., The Right to Remain a Student, supra, at fn. 284, p. 15.

[286] Sigma Beta Xi, Inc. v. County of Riverside (July 1, 2018) Case No. 5:18-cv-01399, at ¶ 83.

[287] Nelson et al., The Right to Remain a Student, supra, at fn. 284, p. 13.

[288] Ibid.

[289] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 12, 2021) Testimony of Jacob Jackson (as of Jan. 28, 2022).

[290] See, supra, at fn. 196.

[291] See, supra, at fn. 196; Hayes et al., California's Prison Population, Public Policy Institute of California (July 2019) (as of July 24, 2020) (California numbers reflecting disproportionate representation of African American people).

[292] See, supra, at fn. 196; see also Ferriss, Black Oakland Youth Arrested, but Not Charged, in Stunning Numbers, Report Says, The Center for Public Integrity (Aug. 28, 2013) (reporting that "between 2008 and 2012, [B]lack children represented 29 percent of Oakland's school-age population but 78 percent of the more than 13,680 juveniles arrested") (as of June 25, 2021).

[293] Murillo, The Possibility Report, From Prison to College Degrees in California, p. 4 (Feb. 5, 2021) (as of June 22, 2021).

[294] Allen, et. al, Historically Black Colleges and Universities: Honoring the Past, Engaging the Present, Touching the Future (2007) 76 The J. of Negro Education 263, 264.

[295] History.com, G.I. Bill (June 7, 2019) (as of Jan. 28, 2022).

[296] JBHE Foundation, How the GI Bill Widened the Racial Higher Education Gap (2003) J. Blacks in Higher Ed. 36, 36-37; see also Turner and Bound, Closing the Gap or Widening the Divide: The Effects of the GI Bill and World War II on the Educational Outcomes of African Americans (2003) 63 J. Econ. History 145.

[297] Gasman, Envisioning Black Colleges: A History of the United Negro College Fund (2007) p. 11 (hereafter Envisioning Black Colleges).

[298] Harper et al., Access and Equity, supra, at fn. 46, p. 395; Office for Civil Rights, HBCUs and Desegregation, supra, at fn. 44, p. 2; see also Croft, The U.S. Land-Grant University System: An Overview, Congressional Research Services (2019) p. 3.

[299] Gasman, Envisioning Black Colleges, supra, at fn. 297, p. 11.

[300] Id. at pp. 11-12.

[301] Id. at p. 11.

[302] Harper et al., Access and Equity, supra, at fn. 46, p. 395; Office for Civil Rights, HBCUs and Desegregation, supra, at fn. 44, p. 2; see also Croft, The U.S. Land-Grant University System: An Overview, Congressional Research Services (2019) p. 3.

[303] See Synnott, The Half-Opened Door: Researching Admissions Discrimination at Harvard, Yale, and Princeton (1979) 45 The Am. Archivist 175, 187; Horowitz, Campus life: Undergraduate Cultures from the End of the Eighteenth Century to the Present (1987) pp. 8, 145.

[304] Bracey, Significance of HBCUs, supra, p. 673; Harper et al., Access and Equity, supra, at fn. 46, p. 395; Gasman, Envisioning Black Colleges, supra, at fn. 297, p. 12.

[305] Harper et al., Access and Equity, supra, at fn. 46, pp. 395-396; Bracey, Significance of HBCUs, supra, at fn. 30, p. 674.

[306] Id. at p. 394; Allen and Jewell, A Backward Glance Forward: Past, Present and Future Perspectives on Historically Black Colleges and Universities (2002) 25 Rev. Higher Ed. 241, 244-245; Anderson, supra, at p. 122; Gasman, Envisioning Black Colleges, supra, at fn. 297, p. 13.

[307] Sipuel v. Board of Regents of University of Okl. (1948) 332 U.S. 631 (state must offer schooling for African American students as soon as it provided it for white students); McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents for Higher Ed. (1950) 339 U.S. 637 (African American students must receive the same treatment as white students); Sweatt v. Painter (1950) 339 U.S. 629 (state must provide facilities of comparable quality for African American and white students).

[308] Harper et al., Access and Equity, supra, at fn. 46, p. 396.

[309] Bracey, Significance of HBCUs, supra, p. 685 (citing Harper et al., Access and Equity, supra, at fn. 46, p. 397).

[310] Tierney, The Parameters of Affirmative Action: Equity and Excellence in the Academy (1997) 67 Rev. of Ed. Research, 165, 168.

[311] Blackmon, Silent Partner: How the South's Fight to Uphold Segregation Was Funded up North (June 1999) (as of Apr. 29, 2022); Minchin, Clyde Kennard: A Little-Known Civil Rights Pioneer, Mississippi History Now (2010) (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[312] Tierney, supra, at p. 168.

[313] Mitchell, Story of False Arrest Called Civil Rights Movement's Saddest, Clarion Ledger (Dec. 31, 2005).

[314] Bluhm Legal Clinic: Center on Wrongful Convictions, Clyde Kennard: The Clyde Kennard Story (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[315] See Office for Civil Rights, HBCUs and Desegregation, supra, at fn. 44; Adams v. Richardson (D.D.C. 1973) 356 F.Supp. 92, 94, modified (D.C. Cir. 1973) 480 F.2d 1159; Egerton, Adams v. Richardson: Can Separate Be Equal?, 6 Change, No. 10 29.

[316] Office for Civil Rights, HBCUs and Desegregation, supra, at fn. 44, p. 3.

[317] Ibid.

[318] Ibid.

[319] Gasman, Historically Black Colleges and Universities in a Time of Economic Crisis, Am. Assn. of University Professors (as of Apr. 29, 2022) (hereafter HBCUs in a Time of Economic Crisis).

[320] Johnson et al., Historically Black Colleges and Universities (HBCUs) in the Twenty First Century: An Exploratory Case Study Analysis of Their Mission (2017) 24 Race, Gender & Class 44, 47-48.

[321] Id. at p. 48.

[322] Ibid.; see also Gasman, HBCUs in a Time of Economic Crisis, supra, at fn. 319.

[323] Guy-Sheftall and Jackson, Challenges and Possibilities at HBCUs after the COVID-19 Pandemic, Am. Assn. of University Professors (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[324] National Center for Education Statistics, Historically Black Colleges and Universities (as of July 2, 2021).

[325] Ibid.

[326] Orteg and Swinton, Business Cycles and HBCU Appropriations (2018) 1 J. Econ. Race Policy 176, 176–195.

[327] Boland and Gasman, America's Public HBCUs: A Four State Comparison of Institutional Capacity and State Funding Priorities (2014) Penn Center for Minority Serving Institutions, p. 3 (as of Apr. 29, 2022); Belkin, Maryland to Pay Four Black Colleges $577 Million, Wall Street Journal (Mar. 24, 2021) (as of June 22, 2021).

[328] Minor, Contemporary HBCUs: Considering Institutional Capacity and State Priorities (2008) Michigan State University, College of Education, Dept. of Educational Administration, p. 23.

[329] Ibid.

[330] Guy-Sheftall and Jackson, Challenges and Possibilities at HBCUs after the COVID-19 Pandemic (2021) Am. Assn. of University Professors (as of Apr. 29, 2022); Price, 1 in 10 HBCUs were Financially Fragile Before COVID-19 Endangered all Colleges and Universities, (2020).

[331] Allen and Jewell, A Backward Glance Forward: Past, Present and Future Perspectives on Historically Black Colleges and Universities, p. 249.

[332] JBHE Foundation, How the GI Bill Widened the Racial Higher Education Gap, supra, at fn. 296, pp. 36-37.

[333] Id. at p. 36.

[334] Ibid.

[335] Ibid.

[336] Id. at p. 37.

[337] Turner and Bound, Closing the Gap or Widening the Divide: The Effects of the G.I. Bill and World War II on the Educational Outcomes of African Americans (2003) 63 J. of Econ. Hist. 145, 151-154, 172.

[338] Bracey, Significance of HBCUs, supra, pp. 674-675; Herbold, Never a Level Playing Field: Blacks and the GI Bill (1994) 6 J. of Blacks in Higher Ed. 104; see also Blakemore, How the GI Bill's Promise was Denied to a Million Black WWII Veterans, History (Apr. 20, 2021) (as of July 7, 2020); Onkst, 'First a Negro . . . Incidentally a Veteran': Black World War Two Veterans and the G. I. Bill of Rights in the Deep South, 1944–1948 (1998) 31 J. of So. His. 517, 519-20, 523-24; Darity Jr. and Mullen, From Here to Equality, supra, pp. 247-248; Katznelson, When Affirmative Action was White: An Untold History of Racial Inequality in Twentieth-Century America (2005) pp. 130-132; Turner and Bound, Closing the Gap or Widening the Divide: The Effects of the G.I. Bill and World War II on the Educational Outcomes of African Americans (2003) 63 J. of Econ. Hist. 145, 149 fn. 7, 151-154, 172.

[339] See Katznelson, supra, at fn. 338, pp. 130-132.

[340] Id. at p. 134; Bracey, Significance of HBCUs, supra, p. 675.

[341] Ottley, Empty Promise: African American Veterans and the New GI Bill (2014) 144 New Directors for Adult & Continuing Ed. 79, 79.

[342] Id. at pp. 79-81 (according to the US Department of Housing and Urban Development, "nearly 56% of all homeless veterans are Black or Hispanic males").

[343] Annenberg Classroom, JFK Calls for Government 'Affirmative Action', Executive Order 10925 (as of Jan. 28, 2022); Tierney, supra, at p. 167.

[344] Tierney, supra, at p. 167.

[345] Ibid.

[346] Chace, Affirmative Inaction, The American Scholar (December. 2011(As of March 11, 2022).

[347] Ibid.

[348] Ibid.

[349] Torres, Affirmative Action in Higher Education: Relevance for Today's Racial Justice Battlegrounds, Am. Bar Association (2020) (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[350] Hartocollis, 50 Years of Affirmative Action: What Went Right, and What It Got Wrong, N.Y. Times (Mar. 30, 2019) (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[351] Ibid.

[352] Ibid.

[353] Regents of University of California v. Bakke (1978) 438 U.S. 265, 307.

[354] Ibid.

[355] E.g., Grutter v. Bollinger (2003) 539 U.S. 306; Gratz v. Bollinger (2003) 539 U.S. 244.

[356] Regents of University of California, supra, 438 U.S. at p. 307.

[357] Jack, A Separate and Unequal System of College Admissions, N.Y. Times (Sept. 16, 2020) (legacy students have a 25% percent higher chance of admission than nonlegacy with the same SAT scores) (as of June 22, 2021).

[358] Ibid.

[359] Torres, supra.

[360] National Center for Education Statistics, Fast Facts (as of June 18, 2021).

[361] National Center for Education Statistics, The Condition of Education 2020, College Enrollment Rates, p. 1 (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[362] Nichols, Segregation Forever?: The Continued Underrepresentation of Black and Latino Undergraduates at the Nation's 101 Most Selective Public Colleges and Universities, The Education Trust (July 21, 2020) p. 3 (as of June 22, 2021) (hereinafter Segregation Forever?).

[363] Id. at pp. 6-7.

[364] Zahneis, Why Has Black-Student Enrollment Fall, The Chronicle of Higher Education (Aug. 18, 2019) (as of June 22, 2021).

[365] Hopwood v. University of Texas (5th Cir. 1996) 78 F.3d 932; Kronley and Handley, Miles To Go: A Report on Black Students and Postsecondary Education in the South, Southern Education Foundation (1998) p. 14.

[366] Hopwood, supra, 78 F.3d 932; Kronley and Handley, supra, at pp. 14, 50.

[367] Watanabe, Prop. 209's Affirmative Action Ban Drove Down Black and Latino UC Enrollment and Wages, Study Finds, L.A. Times (Aug. 22, 2020) (as of June 22, 2021); Bleemer, Affirmative Action, Mismatch, and Economic Mobility After California's Proposition 209, Center for Studies in Higher Education, U.C. Berkeley (Aug. 2020) (as of June 22, 2021); Harper et al., Access and Equity, supra, at fn. 46, p. 401.

[368] Korry, Black Student Enrollment at UCLA Plunges: Fallout from Prop. 209, NPR (July 24, 2006) (as of June 22, 2021).

[369] Nichols, Segregation Forever?, supra.

[370] Ibid.

[371] McDonnell Nieto del Rio, University of California Will No Longer Consider SAT and ACT Scores, N.Y. Times (May 15, 2021) (as of June 18, 2021).

[372] Ibid.; Watanabe, California Groups Demand UC Drop the SAT, Alleging it Illegally Discriminates Against Disadvantaged Students, L.A. Times (Oct. 29, 2019) (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[373] Am. Psychological Assn., Stereotype Threat Widens Achievement Gap (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[374] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 12, 2021) Testimony of Kawika Smith (as of Jan. 28, 2022).

[375] Mcdonnell Nieto del Rio, supra.

[376] Benz, Teaching White Supremacy: How Textbooks Have Shaped Our Attitudes on Race, Huffington Post (Nov. 20, 2017) (as of June 22, 2021); Stewart, 'We are Committing Educational Malpractice,' Why Slavery is Mistaught—And Worse—In American Schools, N.Y. Times Magazine (Aug. 19, 2019) (as of June 22, 2021).

[377] Mineo, How Textbooks Taught White Supremacy, The Harvard Gazette (Sept. 4, 2020) (as of Nov. 22, 2021).

[378] Shuster, Teaching Hard History: American Slavery, Southern Poverty Law Center (2018) pp. 9-10 (as of June 22, 2021) (hereafter Teaching Hard History).

[379] Id. at pp. 9-10; see also Washington, Diversity in Schools Must Include Curriculum, The Century Foundation ("Studies have shown that most students lack a basic understanding of such things as slavery. . . .") (September 17, 2018) (as of June 24, 2021).

[380] Mineo, supra.

[381] Isensee, Why Calling Slaves 'Workers' is More than an Editing Error, NPR (Oct. 23, 2015) (as of June 22, 2021).

[382] Schwartz, Teachers Push for Books with More Diversity, Fewer Stereotypes, Education Week (June 11, 2019) (as of Apr. 29, 2022); Gewertz, Survey of Mostly-White Educators, supra.

[383] Gewertz, Survey of Mostly-White Educators, supra.

[384] Ibid.

[385] Governor Lamont Announces Connecticut Becomes First State in Nation to Require High Schools Provide Courses on Black and Latino Studies, The Office of Governor Ned Lamont (Dec. 9, 2020) (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[386] Kaur, Bills in Several States Would Cut Funding to Schools that Teach the 1619 Project. But They Mostly Aren't Going Anywhere, The Philadelphia Tribune (Feb. 11, 2021) (as of June 22, 2021); Bernstein, Republican Lawmakers Introduce Bill to Defund '1619 Project' Curricula in Schools, Nat. Rev. (July 14, 2021) (as of Nov. 22, 2021).

[387] Sawchuk, What is Critical Race Theory, and Why is It Under Attack? (May 18, 2021) EdSource (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[388] Murakami, Teachers Union Vows to Defend Critical Race Theory in Classrooms: 'Truth is Not Radical', Wash. Times (July 6, 2021) (January 28, 2022).

[389] Ibid.

[390] King, A Reparatory Justice Curriculum for Human Freedom: Rewriting the Story of African American Dispossession and the Debt Owed (2017) 102 J. of African Am. History 213, 216.

[391] Ibid.

[392] Mazama, The Afrocentric Paradigm: Contours and Definitions (2001) 31 J. of Black Studies 387, 387 (citing and discussing Molefi Asante's seminal work, Afrocentricity: The Theory of Social Change).

[393] Id. at pp. 387-388.

[394] The Education Trust – West, Black Minds Matter: Supporting the Educational Success of Black Children in California (Oct. 2015), p. 4.

[395] Verene A. Shepherd, Member of the UN Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD), presentation to the United Nations, Justice for People of African Descent through History Education: Addressing Psychological Rehabilitation (Mar.31- Apr. 4, 2014) p. 1.

[396] Du Bois, Speech to the Association of Negro Social Science Teachers (Mar. 31, 1960) (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[397] Ibid.

[398] Colón, Review: Reflections on the History of Black Studies (2008) 93 The J. of African Am. History 271, 272.

[399] Rooks, The Beginnings of Black Studies, The Chronicle of Higher Education (Feb. 10, 2006) (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[400] See e.g., Martinez, Newsom's Veto of Ethnic Studies Requirement Stirs Applause, Disappointment, KCRA (Oct. 1, 2020) (as of June 22, 2021) (hereafter Newsom's Veto of Ethnic Studies Requirement); Harris, A Roadmap for Reparations in Education, (Oct. 15, 2022) Ed. Week.

[401] Assembly Member Medina, author, A.B. 1331, Analysis, Assembly Committee on Education (2019).

[402] Branigin, Calif. High School Sparks Criticism for Using Slave-Ship Role-Play to Teach Students History, The Root (Sept. 18, 2017) (as of June 22, 2021).

[403] Shuster, Teaching Hard History, supra, at fn. 378, p. 12.

[404] Adam, When Authenticity Goes Missing: How Monocultural Children's Literature is Silencing the Voices and Contributing to Invisibility of Children from Minority Backgrounds (2021) 11 Education Sciences 1.

[405] Richardson, Tomorrow's Super Teacher (2021) p. 13.

[406] Id. at p. 14.

[407] Dee, The Causal Effects of Cultural Relevance: Evidence from an Ethnic Studies Curriculum, Stanford Center for Education Policy Analysis, Working Paper No. 16-01 (Jan. 2016) (assignment to an ethnic studies court in ninth grade in high school increased ninth-grade student attendance by 21 percentage points, GPA by 14 grade points, and credits earned by 23).

[408] Assem. Com. on Ed., Analysis of Assem. Bill No. 331 (2019-2020 Reg. Sess.) p. 4 -5 (hereafter Analysis of AB 331); see also San Francisco Unified School District, San Francisco Board of Education Board of Education Approves K-12 Black Studies Curriculum, Press Release (Oct. 20, 2020) (discussing 2016 Stanford Graduate School of Education study demonstrating that San Francisco's implementation of a year-long ethnic studies course boosted attendance by 21 percentage points and academic performance by 1.4 grade points) (as of June 15, 2021).

[409] Analysis of AB 331, supra, at fn. 408, p. 4.

[410] Asmelash, After Years of Debate, California Finally Adopts Ethnic Studies Model Curriculum, CNN (Mar. 22, 2021) (as of June 22, 2021) (hereafter California Finally Adopts Ethnic Studies Curriculum); see also Cal. Dept. of Ed., State Board of Education Approves Historic Ethnic Studies Guidance for High Schools (Mar. 18, 2021) (as of June 22, 2021).

[411] Martinez, Newsom's Veto of Ethnic Studies Requirement, supra, at fn. 400.

[412] Assem. Bill No. 101 (Oct. 8, 2021).

[413] Analysis of AB 331, supra, at fn. 408, 4; see Smith, Orange County Debates Ethnic Studies: Vital Learnings or 'Anti-White' Divisiveness?, L.A. Times (Apr. 28, 2021) (as of June 25, 2021) (while there's been oppositions by critics who argue ethnic studies promotes hate and victimization, students have shown support for an ethnic studies requirement, with one student sharing that such courses are "important 'because it tells the stories that help us belong'").

[414] SFUSD, Board of Education Approves K-12 Black Studies Curriculum, Press Release (Oct. 20, 2020) (as of June 22, 2021); San Francisco Board of Education, Res. No. 208-25A2 In Support of Creating a K-12 Black Studies Curriculum that Honors Black Lives, Fully Represents the Contributions of Black People in Global Society, and Advances the Ideology of Black Liberation for Black Scholars in the San Francisco Unified School District, as adopted Oct. 20, 2020; Asmelash, California Finally Adopts Ethnic Studies Curriculum, supra, at fn. 410.

[415] San Francisco State University, College of Ethnic Studies, History (as of Mar. 10, 2022).

[416] Ibid.

[417] Ehsanipour, Ethnic Studies: Born in the Bay Area from History's Biggest Student Strike, KQED (Jul. 30, 2020) (as of July 30, 2022).

[418] Assem. Floor, Analysis on Assem. Bill No. 1460 (2019-2020 Reg. Sess.) Feb. 11, 2020, p. 3.

[419] Assem. Bill No. 1460 (2019-2020 Reg. Sess.); California Requires Ethnic Studies for University System, KCRA (Aug. 17, 2020) (as of June 22, 2021).

[420] AB 1460 (Aug. 17, 2020).

[421] Senator Steven Bradford, Governor Signs Bill to Require Ethnic Studies at California State University (as of June 25, 2021).

[422] Bertocchi and Dimico, Racial Gap in Education, supra, at fn. 116 (results show persistent effect that past slavery has on the level of racial education inequality for African Americans to 2000s).

[423] Office for Civil Rights, Education in a Pandemic: The Disparate Impacts of COVID-19 on America's Students, U.S. Dept. of Ed. (2021) pp. 2, 12-17 (finding that "the COVID-19 pandemic has had a strikingly negative impact on academic growth for many students of color, widening the pre-existing disparities" and that the "gap continued to widen sharply through winter 2021 for many Black and Latinx students.") p. 15 (as of June 25, 2021).

[424] Jones, New Data Shines Light on Student Achievement Progress – And Gaps – In California and US, EdSource (Feb. 8, 2021) (as of June 22, 2021) (hereafter New Data Shines Light on Student Achievement).

[425] Ibid.

[426] Jones et al., 50 Years After the Kerner Commission: African Americans Are Better Off in Many Ways But Are Still Disadvantaged By Racial Inequality, Economic Policy Institute (Feb. 26, 2018) (as of June 22, 2021); Cal. Dept. of Ed., California Department of Education Releases 2019-20 High School Graduation and Dropout Rates (Dec. 11, 2020) (as of June 22, 2021).

[427] Agrawal, Black Students Are Succeeding in College at Higher Rates, But Far Behind White Peers, Report Says, L.A. Times (Feb. 24, 2021) (as of June 22, 2021); Ladson-Billings, Achievement Gap to the Education Debt, supra, at fn. 2, p. 4; Orfield et al., Losing our Future: How Minority Youth are Being Left Behind by the Graduation Rate Crisis, The Civil Rights Project at Harvard University et al. (2004) (as of June 22, 2021); Bridgeland et al., The Silent Epidemic: Perspectives of High School Dropouts (2006) p. i.

[428] Ladson-Billings, Achievement Gap to the Education Debt, supra, at fn. 2, p. 5.

[429] Id. at p. 6; Tamborini et al., Education and Lifetime Earnings in the United States (2015) 54 Demography 1383, 1385-1386.

[430] Altonji and Doraszelski, The Role of Permanent Income and Demographics in Black/White Differences in Wealth (2005) 40 J. Human Resources 1, 9.

[431] Broyles, A Conversations About the Racial Wealth Gap—And How to Address It, Brookings Institute (June 18, 2019) (as of June 22, 2021).

[432] Hicks et al., Still Running Up the Down Escalator: How Narratives Shape our Understanding of Racial Wealthy Inequality (2021) Insight Center for Community Economic Development, Duke University, p. 13 (as of Jan. 28, 2022).

[433] E.g., Gould and Cooke, Unemployment for Young Black Grads is Still Worse Than it was For Young White Grades in the Aftermath of the Recession, Econ. Policy Institute (May 11, 2016) (as of June 22, 2021).

CHAPTER 7 Racism in Environment and Infrastructure

COURTESY OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY ARCHIVE/UNIVERSAL IMAGES GROUP VIA GETTY IMAGES

Housing of Black migrant workers. Florida. (1941)

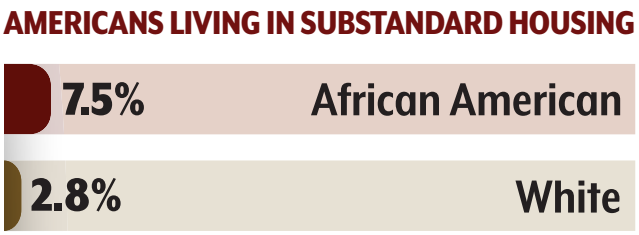
I. Introduction

The legacy of slavery, legal segregation, and government policies known as redlining have created environmental impacts that have harmed and continue to harm African Americans. First, government policies forced African Americans to live in poor-quality housing, exposing them to disproportionate amounts of lead poisoning[1] and increasing their risks of disease,[2] including COVID-19.[3] Outside of their homes, African Americans are also exposed to far more pollutants than white Americans, partially because redlining explicitly grouped African Americans and other "inharmonious racial groups" with polluting sources.[4] Second, government actors developed infrastructure projects, like highways and parks, in ways that destroyed and segregated African American communities, and also failed to provide or repair public services like sewage lines and water pipes.[5] Finally, African Americans and their homes are more vulnerable than white Americans to the dangerous effects of extreme weather patterns like heat waves, disparities which are made worse by climate change.[6]

Section III of this chapter addresses the substandard housing and overcrowding problems faced by African Americans throughout American history caused by government practices including redlining. Section IV of this chapter addresses discusses the environmental pollutants to which African Americans are exposed as result of similar and related government practices, which disproportionately continues to subject African Americans to hazardous waste management, oil and gas production, automobile and diesel fumes. Section V addresses the discriminatory choices made by government actors in implementing infrastructure development and related public services, which consistently have disadvantaged African Americans. Section VI addresses the discriminatory impacts of climate change, which are experienced disproportionately by African Americans as a result of government actions and policies that have imposed those harms on them.

II. Substandard Housing and Overcrowding

Throughout American history and to this day, African Americans have lived in housing of worse quality than white Americans, and paid more to live in it.[7]



Nationally

Starting in the early 20th century, as African Americans primarily rented housing in urban areas, they were consistently charged higher rents than white people.[8] Before the federal Fair Housing Act made housing discrimination based on race illegal, landlords would freely admit that they needed to charge African American renters higher rent because white renters did not want to share an apartment building with African Americans.[9] To pay for the higher rents, African American families often took in lodgers or shared apartments, which created additional overcrowding.[10]

As of 2010, about 2.6 million (7.5 percent) non-Hispanic African American people and 5.9 million white people (2.8 percent) live in substandard housing in America, which is defined largely in relation to the housing's susceptibility to waterborne and airborne communicable diseases.[11] African American households are almost twice as likely as white households to lack indoor plumbing nationwide.[12] African American households are more poorly ventilated than white households in general, leading to excess moisture that supports the growth of mold and vermin, which can lead to or exacerbate asthma and other breathing issues.[13]

African American families also still experience overcrowded housing—generally defined as either having more than 1.5 or more than two persons per room living in a household—at three times the rates of white Americans.[14] Overcrowded housing is linked with physical and mental health problems, including higher rates of exposure to household lead poisoning.[15] This association may be correlative rather than causative, since overcrowded housing is more likely to be older housing, and also more likely to house low-income workers in heavy industries that may cause them to bring lead dust and other contaminants into the household.[16] Overcrowding has similarly shown to increase the risk of spread of infectious diseases, such as tuberculosis, diarrhea, and infectious respiratory illnesses.[17] At least one recent study demonstrated that overcrowding and other poor housing conditions correlated with greater rates of COVID-19 infections across the country, as well as increased mortality from COVID-19.[18]

Overcrowded housing also is linked with various mental health issues, including psychological distress, alcohol abuse, depression, and sleep disorders.[19] Living in overcrowded housing is also associated with social withdrawal and feelings of helplessness,[20] as well as an increase in hostility among household residents due to the lack of privacy and time to oneself.[21]

Overcrowded housing also harms school performance for children, which has lasting impact on their educational attainment.[22] Living in a house with too many people makes it difficult to find a quiet place to study,[23] and even a quiet place to sleep.[24] Children in crowded houses are more likely to catch infectious diseases from others in their household, making it more likely for the child to stay home from school.[25] Children from overcrowded homes are more likely to be held back a grade,[26] they show reduced math and reading test scores,[27] and they demonstrate higher rates of disruptive behaviors according to teachers.[28] Moreover, some international research has found that children and adolescents in overcrowded housing are more likely to engage in violent behavior in the home,[29] as well as to be victims of sexual abuse.[30]

California

California displays the same racial disparities regarding overcrowded housing as the rest of America. The most recent data provided by the California Department of Public Health reveals that African American Californians are approximately 2.5 times more likely to live in housing considered "overcrowded," and 2.8 times more likely to live in housing considered "severely overcrowded," compared to white Californians.[31]

African American Californians have also been forced to live in substandard housing, sometimes as a direct result of government action. One historical example is the federal government's building of public housing in Richmond to accommodate ship workers during World War II, which was officially and explicitly segregated.[32] As part of those efforts, the federal government put programs in place that enabled white workers to access permanent, residential housing, but offered African American workers no permanent housing.[33] While some African American workers were able to find low-quality, long-term housing in areas of the East Bay, others lived in barns, minimal shelter like tents or cardboard shacks, or even without any shelter in open fields.[34]

In California specifically, the problem of overcrowded housing has been linked to the rapid spread of COVID-19 in neighborhoods with a higher number of African American residents, such as South Los Angeles.[35] Neighborhoods with overcrowded housing in California had rates of COVID-19 that were 3.7 times higher than neighborhoods without overcrowded housing.[36]

III. Environmental Pollutants

U.S. government policies, as discussed in Chapter 5,, Housing Segregation, penned African Americans into poorer neighborhoods with polluting industries, garbage dumps, and other sources of toxic health harms.[37] Local governments zoned African American neighborhoods as industrial instead of residential specifically to segregate African American residents from white residents.[38] White neighborhoods frequently were zoned by local entities to explicitly ensure that few industrial or polluting business could locate within them, again pushing environmental pollution into African American neighborhoods.[39] Redlined and segregated African American neighborhoods were cheaper for polluting industries to build on.[40] This became a downward spiral: the more garbage dumps and sewer treatment plants a neighborhood had, the cheaper the land was, and the more likely that other polluting industries would move in.[41] Without access to the mortgages and loans available to white Americans, African American homeowners also had less money to maintain and improve their homes, which made housing conditions worse and prevented African Americans from moving away from polluting sources.[42]

Redlined and segregated Black neighborhoods were cheaper for polluting industries to build on. This became a downward spiral: the more garbage dumps and sewer treatment plants a neighborhood had, the cheaper the land was, and the more likely that other polluting industries would move in.

African American communities across the country still experience higher rates of pollution and the negative health outcomes caused by exposure to pollutants.[43]

African Americans are exposed to greater pollution from virtually every polluting source when compared to white Americans, including hazardous waste, heavy industry, vehicle traffic, and construction—all of which can be partially attributed to redlining and other historical discrimination.[44]

Hazardous Waste

One source of pollution that has been continuously prevalent in African American communities is hazardous waste sites. This pollution has been shown to correlate with increased rates of asthma, cancer, lung disease, and heart disease.[45] For example, in 2020, the New York Times Magazine profiled the story of Kilynn Johnson, an African American resident of Philadelphia, who developed asthma as a child and eventually developed gallbladder cancer after growing up in a largely African American neighborhood proximate to hazardous waste facilities and oil refineries.[46] After recovering from surgery and chemotherapy, Johnson and a neighbor documented over two dozen close relatives who were diagnosed with some form of cancer, many rare, and many at unusually young ages.[47]

African Americans have long been disproportionately exposed to these harms. As of 1983, approximately three out of every four communities in which hazardous waste landfills were found were predominantly African American.[48] In 1991, the federal Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) acknowledged that a disproportionate number of toxic waste facilities were found in African American neighborhoods throughout the country.[49] More recently, a study in 2007 analyzed 38 states and found that African Americans disproportionately live in neighborhoods that host hazardous waste facilities and are twice as likely to live near a hazardous waste facility.[50] As of 2020, African Americans are still 75 percent more likely to live near facilities that handle hazardous waste.[51]

Moreover, studies have shown that that the EPA's handling of toxic waste clean-up sites—i.e., so-called "Superfund" sites, or former industrial sites polluted with dangerous levels of hazardous waste—has consistently favored white communities over minority communities, and an external audit of the handling of discrimination complaints by the EPA determined that the agency failed to adequately respond to those complaints.[52] From 1985 to 1991, fines assessed by the EPA against polluters in minority zip codes were approximately 46 percent lower than in white zip codes.[53] The EPA also took longer to address hazardous sites in minority communities than in white ones, and polluters were required to undertake more stringent cleanup measures in white communities.[54]

Oil and Gas Pollution

The oil and gas industry, as permitted by governmental entities, has also imposed disproportionate environmental harms on African Americans. Oil and gas extraction is associated with various carcinogenic pollutants, including benzene.[55] Studies have shown that living near these sources elevates one's risk of cancer.[56] Over one million African Americans live within half a mile of oil and gas extraction and refining facilities.[57] African Americans are also more likely to live near fracking facilities, which create similar pollution to more traditional oil and gas facilities.[58] The natural gas produced via fracking contains various toxins and carcinogens, including hexane, benzene, and hydrogen sulfide.[59] These dangerous, cancer-causing chemicals are emitted at the initial facilities that gather natural gas, at points along the systems that move the from those facilities, and at the destination plants at which they are processed, all of which occur disproportionately in African American neighborhoods.[60] Moreover, as African Americans have grown increasingly involved in the fight against oil and gas pollution in their communities, fossil fuel companies have pushed back by arguing that the fight for environmental justice would particularly harm African American communities by robbing them of oil and gas-related jobs, including through a false report that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was opposed to a clean energy plan.[61]

Automobile Traffic

Although not specific to one particular industry, African Americans are also subject to disproportionate environmental harms as a result of automobile traffic. Some African Americans live in areas with more than double the traffic density of white neighborhoods, and experience the highest traffic density of any racial or ethnic group.[62] As a result, many African Americans are exposed to more on-road sources of carcinogenic pollution than other racial or ethnic groups.[63]

Compared to other Americans, African Americans are

75% MORE LIKELY to live near hazardous waste or refining facilities

Auto pollution includes, among other things, exposure to nitrogen dioxide (NO2), which contributes to asthma and other respiratory ailments.[64] While exposure to NO2 is decreasing across all races in the United States, the percentage of increased exposure experienced by African Americans as compared to white Americans has changed little.[65] Moreover, among all pollution sources nationwide, African Americans are more disproportionately exposed to air pollution attributable to construction than as to any other air pollution source.[66]

Lead Poisoning

Also not specific to any industry, lead pollution is disproportionately high in African American communities that were officially segregated through federal redlining.[67] Although this has been known for decades, commentators have noted that "surprisingly little research" has examined the extent of the problem.[68] This toxic lead exposure comes from myriad sources that are found in greater amounts in African American neighborhoods, including toxic industrial sites near to residences.[69] Exposure to lead from outside the home can be through lead water pipes, gasoline exhaust, and nearby smelting plants.[70] Even though most smelting plants that created lead pollution have been closed since the 1960s, soil pollution surrounding these facilities remains an active problem.[71] Nationally, African American children are three times as likely to have elevated blood rates of lead, and these patterns have persisted even as lead exposure rates have decreased for children of other races and ethnicities.[72] These disparities are even more dramatic in some areas with older housing stock. For example, a 2004 report found that in Chicago, African American children were five to 12 times more likely to exhibit lead poisoning than white children.[73] This is partially because African American Chicagoans are disproportionately located in older housing stock with deteriorating lead-based paint.[74]

All of these forms of environmental pollution have serious health consequences, resulting in chronic illnesses like diabetes, asthma, and heart disease, and affecting maternal health and educational outcomes.[75] African Americans suffer disproportionately from these health problems.[76] Moreover, these health consequences persist long after exposure, with at least one study showing substantial central nervous system deficits 11 years after childhood exposure.[77] For further discussion of disparities in health outcomes not specific to environmental pollution, see Chapter 12, Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect.

California

Historically, federal public housing was explicitly created to segregate African American Californians into areas with greater pollution burdens due to immediately adjacent polluting sources. For example, when the federal government built public housing in Richmond to accommodate ship workers, as discussed above, it placed the temporary housing for African American workers by the railroad tracks and shipbuilding areas, subjecting them to particulate matter (e.g., small cancer-causing particles associated with diesel exhaust) and industrial pollution, but built higher quality housing for white workers further inland.[78]

Many areas within California still demonstrate racial disparities traceable to state and federal government action. Studies throughout the 1990s have found that largely African American and Latino people in Los Angeles are the most heavily impacted by pollution and toxic waste sites.[79] Neighborhoods that were explicitly redlined by federal agencies in the 1930s—ranging from South Stockton to West Oakland to Wilmington in Los Angeles—continue to have some of the highest average pollution levels in the state.[80]

African American children are

3x MORE LIKELY to have elevated lead levels in their blood

The historically African American area of Bayview-Hunters Point in San Francisco has a long history of environmental racism, with African American residents subjected to myriad environmental harms, including radioactive contamination from a nearby shipyard, not experienced by whiter, wealthier areas within San Francisco.[81] Moreover, recent environmental remediation efforts have come hand-in-hand with a substantial decline in the percentage of African American residents.[82] Starting in the 20th century, African American residents of the neighborhood were displaced by Latino and Asian-American residents.[83] Although this has largely been attributed to the "dot com" boom and rising housing prices across San Francisco, scholars have offered a variety of discriminatory factors that drove African American residents out.[84] These include the San Francisco Housing Authority's demolition of public housing, the San Francisco Police Department's enforcement of gang injunctions, and the issuance of subprime mortgage loans.[85] As one long-time African American resident described it, the formerly-polluted community in which she had long lived is now dramatically cleaner, but is no longer meant for "her or for her grandchildren."[86]

Similarly, the divisions between the wealthier, white "hills" of Oakland, California and the poorer, African American "flats" that were first established by federal redlining have remained today, with African American residents of the low-lying areas still subject to far greater environmental pollutants.[87] In Oakland's earlier days, redlining placed Black Californians in these "flats" adjacent to various heavy industries and manufacturing centers, acknowledging that the housing available was of low quality and subject to noticeable industrial "odors."[88] From the 1950s through the 1980s, substantial freeway construction projects placed substantial pollution burdens on all of the low-lying areas in Oakland, including in the few parks and other green space available to them.[89] Residents of these areas continue to experience quantifiably greater health consequences, such as emergency room visits due to asthma.[90]

These patterns exist across California with respect to facilities that handle hazardous waste. Los Angeles has 1.2 million people living near facilities that handle hazardous waste, and 91 percent of them are people of color.[91] African Americans live near hazardous waste facilities at rates higher than other people of color as a whole.[92] This is true elsewhere in California, leading to increased lifetime cancer risks for African American Californians that correlate with exposure to outdoor air toxins.[93]

As is the case nationwide, the oil and gas industry disproportionately affects African American Californians. More than two million Californians live within 2,500 feet of an unplugged oil or gas well, with greater percentages of African Americans living near these sources of pollution than the California population as a whole.[94] Aside from the exposure to carcinogenic chemicals involved with oil and gas production, toxic residues brought up by subterranean drilling can contaminate local aquifers that supply drinking water.[95] In the greater Los Angeles Area, notable oil production exists in Inglewood and Baldwin Hills areas which have a greater African American population than Los Angeles generally.[96] Similar patterns exist in the San Francisco Bay Area, with major oil production facilities in Richmond and Martinez, areas that are disproportionately African American when compared to the broader Bay Area.[97] Moreover, advocates have argued that public officials are more responsive to oil and gas-related health concerns from residents of whiter, wealthier neighborhoods, noting that the methane leak in the wealthy Porter Ranch neighborhood of Los Angeles elicited a massive, statewide response while hundreds of significant health complaints related to the AllenCo drilling site in the largely African American neighborhood Jefferson Park were ignored for years.[98]

Even for industries that do not inherently involve toxic or carcinogenic materials, increased rates of truck traffic and general industrial activity also lead to higher rates of heavy metal contamination of local soils.[99] Those soils are disproportionately found in the backyards, playgrounds, and urban gardens of African American Californians.[100] This heavy metal contamination poses

Residents of Los Angeles who live near a hazardous waste facility are

91% people of color

Compared to white Californians, African American Californians are exposed to 40% MORE particulate matter from cars, trucks and buses

a wide array of serious health consequences, including increased susceptibility to asthma, inflammation, pregnancy complications, high blood pressure, osteoporosis, kidney damage, and even Parkinson's disease.[101] It also can prevent safe urban gardening in neighborhoods that would desperately benefit from it.[102] On average, African American Californians breathe in about 40 percent more particulate matter from cars, trucks, and buses than white Californians.[103] African American Californians are exposed to a higher amount of PM 2.5—fine particles emitted by diesel engines—at a rate of 43 percent higher than white Californians, the highest rate of any racial or ethnic group.[104] African American Californians also are exposed to disproportionately high levels of air pollution from other infrastructure-related non-mobile sources, such as shipyards, factories, warehouses, and aviation.[105] These sources of air pollution are a primary reason that African Americans have the highest rates of asthma among all groups in California,[106] leading to asthma-related deaths at a rate of two to three times higher than any other racial or ethnic group.[107] Exposure to small particulate matter from cars, trucks, and buses is also tied to increased risk of heart and lung disease.[108]

IV. Climate Change

Research on the concrete and worsening effects of climate change has made clear that harmful health and environment-related effects of climate change will be experienced by all Americans.[109] These effects include increased range and incidence of infectious disease vectors like ticks, mosquitos, and avian-borne pathogens and decreased food quality and security.[110] Rising sea levels will damage coastal communities and reduce water quality and availability.[111] Extreme weather events, like floods, storms, fires, and extreme heat waves are projected to occur more frequently and more severely.[112] All Americans will be at risk of these harms, but not all will face that risk equally. Communities that are already socially and economically struggling, including the urban poor, communities of color, the elderly and children, agricultural workers, and rural communities will shoulder a disproportionate burden of these hazards.[113]

Nationally

Nationally, formerly redlined areas consistently show hotter temperatures than other areas.[114] Therefore, climate change is certain to exacerbate existing, historically-codified disparities that track existing housing-related harms experienced by African Americans.[115] In particular, so-called "heat islands," which will worsen due to climate change, exist where built-up urban areas have few trees, vegetation, or parks that serve to dissipate or reflect heat, and instead have pavement and building materials that absorb and retain it.[116] Federal Environmental Protection Agency studies have found that the heat island effect can cause urban areas to be up to seven degrees hotter than outlying areas during the day and up to five degrees hotter at night.[117] African Americans disproportionately live in such heat islands, experiencing higher temperatures on extreme heat days

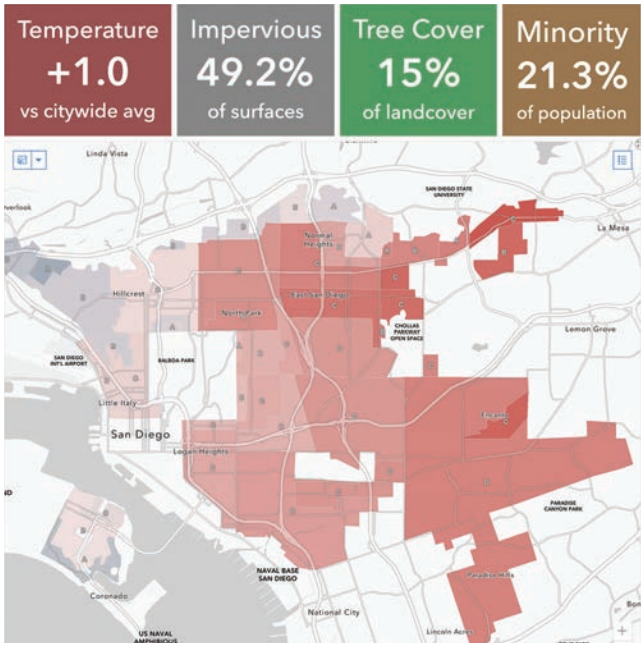
due to a lack of adequate tree cover.[118] In a study of 108 urban areas nationwide, including several in California, the formerly-redlined neighborhoods of nearly every city studied were hotter than the non-redlined neighborhoods, some by nearly 13 degrees.[119] Aside from tree cover, other features of the urban landscape in African American neighborhoods—most notably, roadways and large building complexes—also absorb and slowly release heat, which also exacerbate heat islands and their effects as discussed above.[120]

The greater presence of trees in a community has been shown to correlate with lower asthma rates, fewer hospital visits during heat waves, and improved mental health for the community's residents.[121] There are a variety of reasons for this, but the most significant is the prevalence of shade that trees create, lowering temperatures and providing a less oppressive environment during particularly hot days.[122] Conversely, the heightened temperatures in "heat islands" has led to higher rates of heat-related adverse pregnancy consequences for Black women, including premature births and still births.[123] Elected officials have recognized that the issue of shade and heat islands is connected to social justice, with those facing the greatest risk as a result of these disparities often being the most vulnerable members of a community.[124]

The association between parks and green space with wealthier, whiter neighborhoods is so strong that even modern efforts to add green space to largely African American neighborhoods sometimes involve racist narratives, with local efforts portraying green revitalization plans as benefiting primarily white residents even in African American neighborhoods.[125] Such revitalization plans can also lead to the backlash and suffering of African American residents in these gentrifying neighborhoods. For example, they can be treated as suspicious by local government and new residents when they take advantage of newly-constructed parks and other green space.[126] African American residents of areas without tree cover have also faced gentrification and unaffordability as a consequence, intentional or inadvertent, of local government efforts to add green space.[127]

In a study of 108 urban areas nationwide, including several in California, the formerly-redlined neighborhoods of nearly every city studied were hotter than the non-redlined neighborhoods, some by nearly 13 degrees.

COURTESY OF HOFFMAN, JEREMY S., VIVEK SHANDAS, AND NICHOLAS PENDLETON. 2020. "THE EFFECTS OF HISTORICAL HOUSING POLICIES ON RESIDENT EXPOSURE TO INTRA-URBAN HEAT: A STUDY OF 108 US URBAN AREAS" CLIMATE 8, NO. 1: 12.



Map of San Diego depicting average temperature rises, tree coverage, percentage of impervious surfaces and percentage of minority population affected through color coded map. (2020)

California

African American Californians experience these disproportionate harms in many ways, many attributable to the decisions of state and local governments. As is the case nationally, redlining had the effect of clustering African American Californians in urban centers that often constitute heat islands and the worsening heat waves caused by climate change will impose disproportionate health burdens on African American Californians.[128] A 2009 report published by the University of Southern California, "The Climate Gap," found that African American residents of Los Angeles are already almost twice as likely to die during a heat wave as other residents because of the "heat islands" attributable to a history of redlining and segregation.[129]

According to the California Department of Public Health, African American Californians are 52 percent more likely than white Californians to live in areas where more than half the ground is covered by impervious surfaces like asphalt and concrete, and where more than half the population lacks tree canopy—by Black residents of Los Angeles were already almost twice as likely to die during a heat wave as other residents because of the "heat islands" attributable to a history of redlining and segregation.

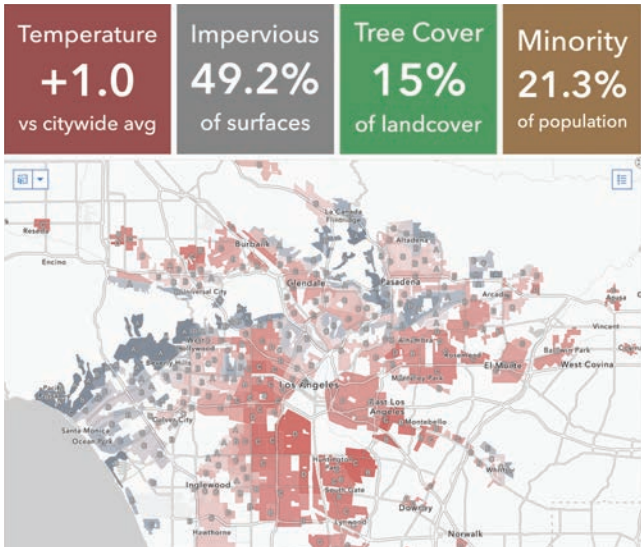
definition, the characteristics of a heat island.[130] This disparity is particularly pronounced in the Greater Los Angeles Area, where wealthier white areas have triple the amount of tree cover compared to poorer African American neighborhoods.[131] This may be directly attributable to government action, since the City of Los Angeles intentionally kept tree growth to a minimum in African American communities where police officers expressed a concern—realistic or not—that trees could serve as places to hide drugs or weapons.[132]

The California Department of Public Health has warned that, as heat waves begin earlier in the season and last longer, heat-related deaths are growing disproportionately more common for certain racial or ethnic groups, particularly African American Californians.[133] Exacerbating these harms, African American Californians are less likely to have air conditioning, a car to access cooler areas, government-sponsored cooling stations, and are more likely to have one or more chronic health conditions.[134] For example, in South Los Angeles, a disproportionately African American neighborhood, nearly three-fifths of households did not have air conditioning in 2020, a number which has not substantially changed over the past decade even as heat waves worsened.[135] These patterns have been seen across the state during heat waves, in which African American Californians consistently experience heightened rates of emergency medical visits and hospitalizations compared to white Californians.[136]

COURTESY OF HOFFMAN, JEREMY S., VIVEK SHANDAS, AND NICHOLAS PENDLETON. 2020. "THE EFFECTS OF HISTORICAL HOUSING POLICIES ON RESIDENT EXPOSURE TO INTRA-URBAN HEAT: A STUDY OF 108 US URBAN AREAS" CLIMATE 8, NO. 1: 12.



Map of Los Angeles depicting average temperature rises, tree coverage, percentage of impervious surfaces and percentage of minority population affected through color coded map. (2020)

V. Infrastructure and Public Services

Nationally and within California, African Americans have suffered disproportionate harms—both environmental and otherwise—as a result of governmental investment and neglect relating to infrastructure and public services.

Neglected Water Systems

While African American communities across the U.S. face these infrastructure disparities daily, the crisis of water quality and lead poisoning in Flint, Michigan, is an example of governmental neglect that led to the poisoning of an African American community.[137]

Flint, Michigan, in Genesee County, which is now a majority African American city, was originally populated largely by white workers for the General Motors (GM) corporation, which recruited workers in the 1920s and 30s through housing it built itself and then sold subject to restrictive covenants preventing sale to non-white persons.[138] Private discrimination was cemented and continued through federal redlining in the 1940s, as GM also discriminated in the jobs it offered to the few African American residents of Flint, who generally worked as janitorial staff.[139] However, starting in the 1960s, as a larger African American population arrived, pockets of Flint experienced "white flight," which accelerated dramatically across Flint through the 1970s as the automotive industry suffered.[140]

In 2014, the entire city of Flint decided to switch its drinking water source from Detroit's system to the Flint River to save money.[141] Residents thereafter complained for months that their water both smelled and appeared worse, but city and state officials continued to maintain the water was safe for human consumption, even as they explicitly chose not to test the water's safety.[142] After a leaked internal memo from the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency reported high levels of lead due to the corrosivity of the Flint River water, state officials continued to falsely maintain the levels were safe and called the federal report an "outlier."[143] By the time Flint switched back to Detroit's water system, children were exposed to massive amounts of lead with potentially irreversible health consequences for both young children and those exposed in utero through their mothers.[144] Those consequences include learning disabilities, intellectual disabilities, and behavioral problems.[145] Again, because Flint had become a majority African American city at the time of the crisis, these impacts were experienced by African American Michiganders far more so than other groups: even in 2017, after years of attention and remediation, Flint's water still had higher rates of lead than 98 percent of the rest of the state.[146]

Studies showed that the amount of children in Flint with lead pollution in their blood almost doubled as a result of the crisis, while both state officials and Michigan Governor Rick Snyder continued to downplay the issue.[147] The Michigan State Attorney General has attributed responsibility for the crisis to all levels of state and local government, filing criminal charges against various state and local officials including former Governor Snyder.[148] The charges range from perjury, related to actions designed to cover up malfeasance, to manslaughter.[149]

In the 19th century, as cities built sewer and garbage systems, they ignored or built them slower for Black neighborhoods. In the 20th century, Black neighborhoods lost access to water and sewage services as cities prioritized white neighborhoods.

Inadequate Sewage Systems

Historically, African Americans were subjected to environmental and health consequences as a result of failure to equitably construct sewer and other waste management systems. Originally, U.S. cities relied on private waterworks.[150] By the mid-19th century, cities across America began substantial investment in constructing modern, sanitary sewer and garbage removal systems.[151]

However, African American neighborhoods were not provided with such systems as early—or at all—as compared to white neighborhoods.[152] In fact, the impetus for provision of such services to African American neighborhoods was sometimes to prevent diseases that resulted from the lack of such services from crossing from African American neighborhoods into white ones.[153]

Rates of illness and death resulting from poor sewage disposal dramatically diverged for African American and white Americans as the latter gained access to effective sewage systems while the former did not.[154] For example, in early 20th century New York, African American residents were forced to live in lowland areas near drainage pools for sewage while white residents lived on higher ground with better drainage.[155] As a result, African American people died from malaria at much higher rates than white people and experienced higher rates of diseases like dysentery and typhoid.[156] Similar patterns existed across the South as well.[157]

Across the nation, as residential segregation increased throughout the 20th century, African American neighborhoods actually lost access to water and sewer municipal services, since it enabled municipalities to more easily prioritize white over African American neighborhoods for better services.[158] These disparities continue today. As recently as 2019, New York City acknowledged its responsibility for a massive leak caused by a collapsed pipe in a largely African American neighborhood of Queens, which flooded 127 homes with raw sewage.[159] Many of these houses were destroyed or severely damaged, losses that were not covered by basic homeowners or rental insurance.[160]

Energy Burdens

African Americans nationally are subject to disproportionately-higher costs and disproportionately-poorer service with respect to the electrical grid. African American households in America spend more on residential energy bills than white households, even when controlling for income, household size, and other possibly-relevant factors.[161] Across the country, African Americans shoulder energy burdens that are disproportionately larger than any other racial group, meaning they spend a larger portion of their income on energy.[162] This is true in major California cities as well, such as Los Angeles and San Francisco.[163] These disproportionate costs are partially attributable to African Americans living in older, energy-inefficient homes as a result of the legacy of redlining and other discriminatory housing policies.[164] Low-income African Americans are also twice as likely to have their utility service shut off as similarly-low-income white Americans,[165] which advocates have argued are the result of inflexible shut-off regulations and disproportionate energy burdens.[166]

Because of lower rates of home ownership in the African American community, African Americans also often cannot take advantage of programs aimed at lessening energy burdens that require home ownership to utilize, such as home solar panels[167] or installation of free charging stations for electric vehicles.[168] As discussed in more detail above, African Americans also suffer disproportionate burdens related to the production of energy, as power plants—including those fired by coal—continue to be disproportionately located in their neighborhoods, producing particulate matter emissions that cause damage to the heart, lungs, and brain.[169]

Racist Transportation Systems

Federal, state, and local governments have consistently failed to offer equitable transit options for African American communities throughout American history. The earliest form of transportation discrimination was the trafficking of Black Africans in slave ships, discussed more fully in Chapter 2 Enslavement. The federal government allowed and regulated this form of human trafficking until 1808, when the importation of enslaved people was outlawed.[170] By the late 1700s, the Underground Railroad, an organized effort of safe houses and activists, helped transport enslaved people to freedom.[171] Between 1810 and 1850, the Underground Railroad freed an estimated 100,000 enslaved persons.[172]

Around the same time, both the South and the North segregated travelers by race. Frederick Douglass "was often dragged out of [his] seat, beaten, and severely bruised, by conductors and brakemen" when he refused to ride in the Jim Crow car as he rode trains in New England.[173] The federal government supported these segregation efforts, even as some states attempted to desegregate. For example, in 1877, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a Louisiana civil rights law requiring the desegregation of transport as unconstitutional.[174] Decuir, an African American woman, bought a first class ticket on a steamboat, but was sent to the second class cabin because first class was for whites only.[175] The Court overturned a decision from the Louisiana Supreme Court to award legal damages to Decuir based on a state law requiring desegregated transport, holding that Louisiana had no authority to regulate such transport.[176] In 1896, in contrast, the United States Supreme Court explicitly permitted segregation in public transit when it upheld Louisiana's law requiring transportation segregation.[177] This history of government segregation set the stage for unequal transportation for African Americans that continues to the present.

At the turn of the century, subsidized by government funds, private companies constructed mass transit systems in America's cities.[178] Until around the 1950s, nearly all transit was built and operated by private companies.[179] Many transit companies struggled to remain profitable in the 1920s, especially after the Depression.[180] The widespread adoption of the automobile combined with white Americans' move to the suburbs, as described in Chapter 5, Housing Segregation, resulted in the companies' financial failure.[181] Public transit systems cut back services as masses of white riders left the system, and never expanded to the suburbs.[182] As government and private actors erected barriers to prevent African Americans from moving to the suburbs, poorer African American workers without cars were left with few public transportation options.[183] When manufacturing and industrial jobs moved from urban centers to suburban or rural areas, urban African American workers were often unable to follow due to lack of transportation options.[184]

In 1968, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., described how city planning decisions result in transportation systems that failed African American communities: "Urban transit systems in most American cities . . . have become a genuine civil rights issue—and a valid one—because the layout of rapid-transit systems determines the accessibility of jobs to the black community. If transportation systems in American cities could be laid out so as to provide an opportunity for poor people to get meaningful employment, then they could begin to move into the mainstream of American life."[185]

The federal government has been aware of this failure to support transportation for the African American urban workforce, but has not provided a remedy. In 1968, the report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, also known as the Kerner Commission report, studied the causes and effects of riots in U.S. cities.[186] In order to enhance employment opportunities for central-city residents, the report recommended the creation of improved transportation links between African American urban neighborhoods and new job locations in the suburbs.[187]

In the 1960s and 70s, the federal government began providing funding for public transit, and many municipalities took control of transit operations.[188] However, scholars argue that these revitalized agencies built a segregated system.[189] The municipal transit agencies that were created throughout the 70s and into the 80s were designed to be responsive to the demands of the local communities, demands which had often grown "re-segregationist" as a backlash to the Civil Rights Movement.[190] This created transit systems that were unequal by design. Municipal agencies did not cater to urban riders who relied exclusively on public transit, instead channeling greater resources to entice mostly white suburban commuters who could also choose to drive.[191] This translated to less comfortable seats, unshaded waiting areas, and bumpier, more unpleasant rides for African American users of public transit.[192]

This system continues to operate today. African Americans still rely on public transit to get to work at much higher rates than white workers. African American workers commute by public transit at nearly four times the rate of white workers.[193] Moreover, African American workers on average experience higher commute times than white workers, both nationally and in California.[194] Finally, since most fares are usually flat, low income people pay a higher share of their monthly salary on transit, which is more likely to impact African Americans and other people of color.[195] Due to these government actions, workers relying on public transit, who are more often African American than white, often pay comparatively more money and commute for a longer amount of time if they are able to use transit to get to jobs at all.[196]

In addition to discrimination in the public transit system, as discussed in Chapter 5, our country's highway system destroyed African American neighborhoods and intensified residential segregation by separating African American neighborhoods from white neighborhoods.

Disparities in Telecom

African Americans also face disproportionate burdens with respect to the national telecommunications network. From 1960 through 2010, African Americans have had significantly lower rates of telephone access than white Americans, though this gap has reduced over time as telephone use became more ubiquitous.[197] More recently, fewer African Americans have access to broadband internet access than white Americans.

The town of Lanare, founded by Black families fleeing the Dust Bowl, had no running water until the 1970s. After wells were drilled, the water contained dangerous levels of arsenic. The town's residents had no access to clean drinking water until 2019.

A 2021 study in Indiana revealed that 56.2 percent of African American residents lacked reliable access to internet service and/or a computer, compared to 34.8 percent of white residents.[198] This lack of telecommunications impacts economic and educational opportunities. African American teens are almost twice as likely to report that they cannot complete all their homework due to lack of access to a computer or reliable internet access.[199]

In addition to difficulty accessing the internet, African Americans are disadvantaged by racist structures within it. Dr. Yeshimabeit Milner testified before the California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans that search algorithms, machine learning, automated resource allocation systems, and even credit reporting agencies are all built by software engineers that are overwhelmingly white.[200] As a result, the implicit biases of these human software engineers have been built into seemingly neutral algorithms and artificial intelligence, with discriminatory effects.[201] For example, in 2016, when Amazon Prime same day-delivery services were introduced in Atlanta, Georgia, virtually 100 percent of white residents were given access to the service but less than half of African American residents did.[202] Similar patterns existed for African American residents of Boston and Chicago.[203]

California

California authorized segregated public transportation at least until 1864.[204] The governments of California and its municipalities have chosen infrastructure projects that have harmed African American communities. While California and federal law require state and municipal agencies to consider racially disparate impacts of infrastructure projects today, the historical damage caused by highways in particular has contributed to higher exposure to air pollution among communities of color as discussed above.

As with the federal government, California's government historically neglected water infrastructure as it applied to African American Californians. One example is California's treatment of African American families fleeing the dust bowl. These families left the prairie states and came to farmland across California starting in the 1930s, experiencing widespread infrastructure discrimination from state and local governments.[205] For example, African American Californians in the San Joaquin Valley were excluded from most urban areas with access to clean water as a result of explicit redlining policies, racially-restrictive housing covenants, and even racially-motivated violence.[206] In Tulare county, the largely African American community of Teviston had no access to sewer and water infrastructure, while the adjacent white community of Pixley did.[207] Again, this discrimination continued until recently: the town of Lanare, also formed by African American families fleeing the Dust Bowl, had no running water at all until the 1970s, and was subjected to dangerous levels of arsenic in the water even after wells and pipes were drilled.[208] The town's residents did not get access to clean drinking until 2019.[209]

At times, government entities were explicit in weaponizing infrastructure against African American Californians. For example, in the 1950s, a developer in Milpitas, a town north of San Jose, sought to build a large housing development open to both white and African American homebuyers.[210] He managed to overcome several zoning related obstacles only to discover that the Milpitas City Council had increased the sewer connection fee more than tenfold explicitly to thwart the development.[211]

African American neighborhoods in California still suffer extremely high rates of water pollution in the water provided through government infrastructure. In 2019, the New York Times reported that as many as 1,000 community water systems in California may be at high risk of failing to deliver potable water, with a disproportionate number of these systems located in low-income areas that tend to be disproportionately African American.[212] California's Environmental Protection Agency has also acknowledged that contamination of water sources disproportionately impacts communities of color.[213]

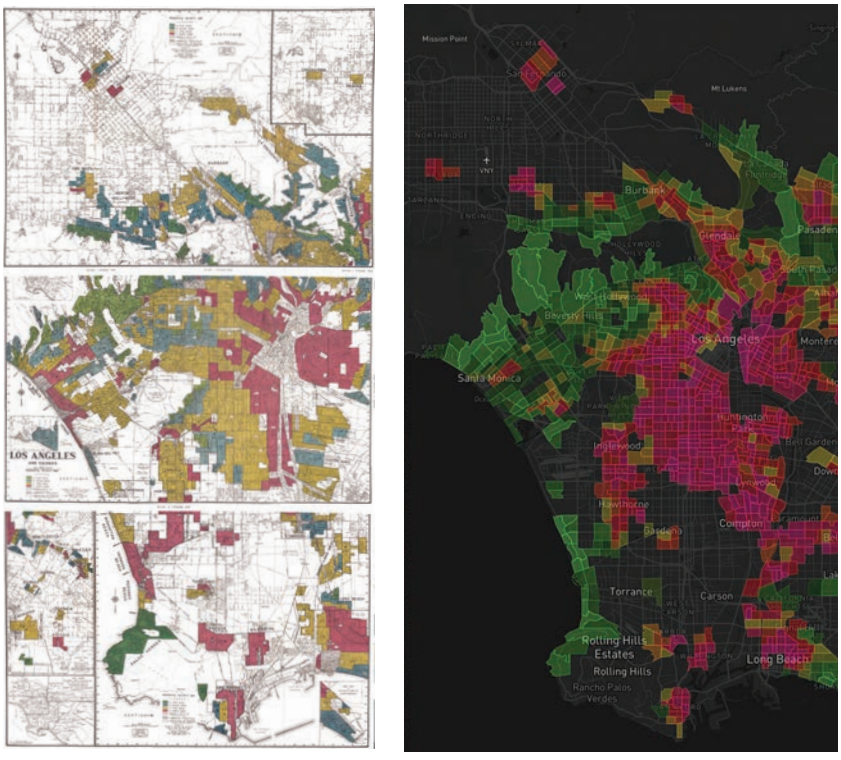
A UCLA report in 2021 identified 29 failing water systems in Los Angeles County, and these systems largely service communities of color.[214] For example, in 2019, authorities dissolved the Sativa Los Angeles county Water District for servicing brown water for decades to its customers in Willowbrook and the historically African American neighborhood of Compton.[215] In Oakland, the majority African American McClymonds High School has had a history of serious water contamination issues in recent years, from lead pollution to dangerously high levels of chemical solvent groundwater pollution that led to the school's temporary closure in 2020.[216]

Transportation discrimination impacts African American Californians as well. In 1965, the California Governor created the McCone Commission to examine causes of civil unrest in Los Angeles in 1965, identifying "inadequate and costly" transportation as contributing to high rates of unemployment among the African American urban population. California has not designed its transportation system to address this need, often favoring rail options catering to suburbs rather than bus lines used by urban areas with greater African American populations.[217] These choices have led to several high-profile lawsuits, including in Los Angeles and San Francisco in the 1990s and 2000s.[218]

Nevertheless, design of public transit by major municipalities in the state often catered to the largely white suburban residents because they were seen as needing better options in order to "choose" public transit.

For example, Oakland's San Antonio neighborhood, the most racially diverse in the city and one of the densest parts of the Bay Area, sees the Bay Area Rapid Transit (BART) train travel for nearly three miles without stopping.[219] By contrast, in suburban Walnut Creek and Pleasant Hill, which are less than half as dense, BART stations are only 1¾ miles apart.[220] In the late 1960s, BART was "literally designed" to hurry white suburban commuters past African American inner-city neighborhoods and residents.[221] This purposeful decision by the government left African American residents without the same transit options to reach jobs, and limited economic mobility and opportunity.[222]

COURTESY OF "NOT EVEN PAST: SOCIAL VULNERABILITY AND THE LEGACY OF REDLINING"/ HTTPS://DSL.RICHMOND.EDU/SOCIALVULNERABILITY



The image on the left shows a redlining map of Los Angeles, CA made by the Home Owners Loan Corporation during the 1930s. The red portions are non-white neighborhoods deemed by the federal agency to be a credit risk. The map on the right shows the Center for Disease Control's Social Vulnerability Index scores for census tracts today. The Social Vulnerability Index is widely used to assess a community's capacity to prepare for, respond to, and recover from human and natural disasters. The red portion indicates the highest level of vulnerability to disasters.

In Oakland, a $484 million elevated "people mover," which connects BART to the airport, lost federal funding because it was found to have a discriminatory impact; its construction led to the elimination of a bus route in the minority neighborhoods it bypasses.[223] But, though the project lost federal funding, it still went ahead, and the Oakland neighborhood still lost its bus line.[224]

Finally, although the disparities between African American and white residents in terms of raw internet

COURTESY OF BETTMANN VIA GETTY IMAGES

Afton, NC– Black and white protesters march against a toxic waste dump in Warren County. The site was chosen because most of its residents were Black and poor. (1982) access in California is much smaller than nationally,[225] research has shown that African American neighborhoods in both Los Angeles and Oakland had the least investment in broadband internet in those cities.[226]

VI. Conclusion

The various forms of environment and infrastructure-related discrimination suffered by African Americans in this country are rooted in the badges and incidents of slavery that have never been eliminated in this country. African American enslaved persons were released from bondage and forced into unhealthy, dangerous, and overcrowded housing, located in the most toxic areas in our cities, which also lacked proper water and sewage services. Residential segregation and government decisions regarding modern infrastructure development reinforced these patterns throughout the 20th century. African Americans have been denied equal access to telecommunication services, and are increasingly subjected to "algorithms" and other forms of computerized decision making with racist underpinnings and outcomes. These racist systems have harmed and will continue to harm African Americans.

Endnotes

[1] See, e.g., Lockett, How Lead Poisoning Disproportionately Affects Black Communities (Feb. 7, 2022) Healthline (as of Apr. 7, 2022); Haslam, Lead Poisoning (2003) 8 Paediatrics & Child Health 8, pp. 509-10.

[2] Krieger and Higgins, Housing and Health: Time Again for Public Health Action (2002) 92 Am. J. of Public Health 5, pp. 758-768.

[3] Jackie Botts and Bénichou, The Neighborhoods Where COVID Collides with Overcrowded Homes (June 12, 2020) Cal Matters (as of Apr. 7, 2022).

[4] CalEPA, Pollution and Prejudice: Redlining and Environmental Injustice in California (Aug. 16, 2021) CalEPA (as of Apr. 7, 2022).

[5] Hoffman et al, The Effects of Historical Housing Policies on Resident Exposure to Intra-Urban Heat: A Study of 108 US Urban Areas 8 Climate 2020 1, pp. 1-3.

[6] Id. at p. 11.

[7] Rothstein, The Color of Law (2017) pp. vii-xvii; Taylor, The Environment and the People in American Cities, 1600s-1900s (2009) pp. 153, 179-180, 183; see also Carter, From Exclusion to Destitution: Race, Affordable Housing, and Homelessness (2011) 13 Cityscape 1, p. 37.

[8] Taylor, The Environment and the People in American Cities, 1600s-1900s (2009) pp. 60. 173, 208.

[9] Id. at pp. 210, 280.

[10] Id. at pp. 173, 210, 280.

[11] Jacobs, Environmental Health Disparities in Housing (2011) 101 Am. J. of Public Health, pp. S115–S

[12] Roller et al., Closing the Water Access Gap in the United States (2019) Dig Deep and U.S. Water Alliance, p. 22.

[13] Jacobs, supra.

[14] Office of Policy Development and Research, Measuring Overcrowding in Housing (2007) U.S. Dept. of Housing and Urban Development pp. 4, 18.

[15] Haslam, supra; Tong et al, Environmental Lead Exposure: A Public Health Problem of Global Dimensions (2000), 78 Bulletin of the World Health Organization 9, p. 1071.

[16] Tong, supra at pp. 1068-69.

[17] World Health Organization, WHO Housing and Health Guidelines (2018) pp. 25-27 (hereafter WHO Housing and Health Guidelines).

[18] Ahmad et al., Association of Poor Housing Conditions with COVID-19 Incidence and Mortality Across US Counties (2020) 15 PLoS ONE 11.

[19] WHO Housing and Health Guidelines, supra, at pp. 27-29.

[20] W.C. Regoeczi, Crowding in Context: An Examination of the Differential Responses of Men and Women to High-Density Living Environments (2008) 125 J. of Health & Social Behavior, pp. 254-68; Regoeczi, When Context Matters: A Multilevel Analysis of Household and Neighborhood Crowding on Aggression and Withdrawal (2003) 23 J. of Environmental Psychology 4, pp. 457-70.

[21] Earle Chambers et al., The Link between Housing, Neighborhood, and Mental Health (Apr. 24, 2014) MacArthur Foundation (as of Apr. 7, 2022).

[22] Solari and Mare, Housing Crowding Effects on Children's Wellbeing (2012) 41 Social Science Research 2, pp. 464–476.

[23] Ibid.

[24] Ibid.

[25] Ibid.; see also Cimini and Botts, Close Quarters: California's Overcrowded Homes Fuel Spread of Coronavirus Among Workers (June 12, 2020) Cal Matters (as of Apr. 7, 2022).

[26] Goux and Maurin, The Effect of Overcrowded Housing on Children's Performance at School (2005) 89 Journal of Public Economics, p. 809.

[27] Solari and Mare, supra.

[28] Evans et al., Residential Density and Psychological Health among Children in Low-Income Families (2001) 33 Environment and Behavior 2, p. 174.

[29] Makinde et al., Overcrowding as a Risk Factor for Domestic Violence and Antisocial Behaviour among Adolescents in Ejigbo, Lagos, Nigeria (2016) 3 Global Mental Health 16.

[30] Cant et al., Overcrowded Housing: One of a Constellation of Vulnerabilities for Child Sexual Abuse (2019) 93 Child Abuse Neglect, pp. 239-248.

[31] Office of Health Equity, Housing Overcrowding (Dec. 2018) Cal. Dept. of Public Health (as of Apr. 7, 2022).

[32] Rothstein, The Color of Law (2017) pp. 5-6.

[33] Ibid.

[34] Ibid.

[35] Kate Cimini and Botts, supra (noting that West Adams, a mostly African American and Latino neighborhood of Los Angeles, has much higher rates of overcrowding and of COVID-19 cases).

[36] Jackie Botts and Bénichou, supra.

[37] Taylor, supra at p. 503.

[38] CalEPA, supra.

[39] Ibid.

[40] Ibid.

[41] Ibid.

[42] Ibid.

[43] See, e.g., Munguia, Environmental Racism: Why Long Beach Residents of Color Have Worse Health Outcomes (Mar. 8, 2021) Press Telegram (as of Apr. 7, 2022).

[44] Tabuchi and Popovich, People of Color Breathe More Hazardous Air. The Sources Are Everywhere (Apr. 28, 2021) N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 7, 2022).

[45] Linda Villarosa, Pollution is Killing African Americans. This Community Fought Back. (July 28, 2020) New York Times Magazine (as of Apr. 7, 2022).

[46] Ibid.

[47] Ibid.

[48] Rothstein, supra at p. 56.

[49] Ibid.

[50] Bullard et al., A Current Appraisal of Toxic Wastes and Race in the United States in Toxic Wastes and Race at Twenty 1987-2007 (2007) United Church of Christ, p. 58.

[51] Villarosa, supra.

[52] Taylor, supra at pp. 99-100, 505-06.

[53] Ibid.

[54] Ibid.

[55] Garcia-Gonzalez et al., Hazardous Air Pollutants Associated with Upstream Oil and Natural Gas Development: A Critical Synthesis of Current Peer-Reviewed Literature (2019) 40 Annual Review of Public Health, pp. 283-304.

[56] Johnston et al., Impact of Upstream Oil Extraction and Environmental Public Health: A Review of the Evidence (2019) 20 Sci Total Environ 657, pp. 187-199.

[57] Fleischman and Franklin, Fumes Across the Fence-Line (Nov. 2017) Nat. Ass. for the Advancement of Colored People and Clean Air Task Force, p. 6.

[58] Klara Zwickl, The Demographics of Fracking: A Spatial Analysis for Four U.S. States (2019) 161 Ecological Economics, pp. 202-215.

[59] Fleischman and Franklin, supra at p. 13.

[60] Id. at pp. 13, 16.

[61] Nikayla Jefferson and Stokes, Our Racist Fossil Fuel Energy System (Jul. 17, 2020) Boston Globe (as of Apr. 8, 2022); Tabuchi, How One Firm Drove Influence Campaigns Nationwide for Big Oil (Nov. 11, 2020) N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 8, 2022).

[62] Pratt et al., Traffic, Air Pollution, Minority and Socio-Economic Status: Addressing Inequities in Exposure and Risk (2015) 12 International J. of Environmental Research and Public Health 5, pp. 5355-5372.

[63] Ibid.; see also Apelberg et al., Socioeconomic and Racial Disparities in Cancer Risk from Air Toxics in Maryland (2005) 113 Environmental Health Perspectives 6, pp. 693-699.

[64] U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, Nitrogen Dioxide (NO2) Pollution: Basic Information about NO2 (June 7, 2021) U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (as of Apr. 8, 2022).

[65] Clark et al., Changes in Transportation-Related Air Pollution Exposures by Race-Ethnicity and Socioeconomic Status: Outdoor Nitrogen Dioxide in the United States in 2000 and 2010 (2017) 125 Environmental Health Perspectives 9.

[66] Tabuchi and Popovich, supra.

[67] Muller et al., Environmental Inequality: The Social Causes and Consequences of Lead Exposure (2018) 44 Annual Review of Sociology, pp. 266-68.

[68] Sampson and Winter, The Racial Ecology of Lead Poisoning: Toxic Inequality in Chicago Neighborhoods, 1995-2013 (2016) 13 Du Bois Review: Social Science Research on Race 2, pp. 261-

[69] Ibid.

[70] Ibid.

[71] Ibid.

[72] Emily Benfer, Contaminated Childhood: How the United States Failed to Prevent the Chronic Lead Poisoning of Low-Income Children and Communities of Color (2017), 41 Harv. Env. L. Rev. 494, pp. 504-05; see also Sampson and Winter, supra.

[73] Chicago Department of Public Health & Loyola University Chicago Civitas ChildLaw Center, Lead Safe Chicago: A Plan to Eliminate Childhood Lead Poisoning in Chicago by 2010 (June 30, 2004).

[74] Sampson and Winter, supra.

[75] Chappelle et al., Access to Safe Drinking Water (Apr. 2021) Public Policy Institute of California (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[76] Lutz, Health Disparities Among African-Americans (2022) Pfizer (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[77] Needleman et al., The Long-Term Effects of Exposure to Low Doses of Lead in Childhood—An 11-Year Follow-up Report (Jan. 11, 1990) 322 N Engl J Med (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[78] Rothstein, The Color of Law (2017) pp. 5-6.

[79] Pulido, Rethinking Environmental Racism: White Privilege and Urban Development in Southern California (2000) 90 Annals of the Ass. of Am. Geographers 1, p. 21.

[80] CalEPA, Pollution and Prejudice, supra.

[81] Kang, Looking Toward Restorative Justice for Redlined Communities Displaced by Eco-Gentrification (2021) 26 Mich.. J. Race and L. 23, pp. 31-38; California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 12, 2021), Testimony of Helen Kang (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[82] Kang, supra at pp. 31-34.

[83] Id. at pp. 31-32.

[84] Id. at p. 32.

[85] Ibid.

[86] Id. at p. 33.

[87] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 12, 2021), Testimony of C.N.E. Corbin (as of Apr. 22, 2022); Corbin, In Red, Black, and Green: The Political Ecological Eras of Oakland from 1937-2020 (2022) (unpublished draft manuscript provided by author).

[88] Corbin, supra at p. 11.

[89] Id. at p. 21.

[90] Anthony L. Nardone et al., Associations between Historical Residential Redlining and Current Age-Adjusted Rates of Emergency Department . Visits Due to Asthma across Eight Cities in California: An Ecological Study (Jan. 1, 2020) 4 The Lancet Planetary Health 1, pp. e24–31.

[91] Janet Wilson, California Has Largest Number of Minorities Near Hazardous Waste (Apr. 12, 2007) L.A. Times (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[92] Bullard et al, supra at p. 80.

[93] Rachel Morello-Frosch et al., Environmental Justice and Regional Inequality in Southern California: Implications for Future Research (Apr. 2002) 110 Environmental Health Perspectives 2, pp. 149-154.

[94] Olalde and Menezes, The Toxic Legacy of Old Oil Wells: California's Multibillion-Dollar Problem (Feb. 6, 2020) L.A. Times (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[95] Ibid.

[96] Fleischman and Franklin, supra at p. 19.

[97] Sadasivam, Bay Area Regulators Just Delivered on a Promise to Help Frontline Communities Breathe Easier (Jul. 22, 2021) Grist (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[98] Fleischman and Franklin, supra at p. 20.

[99] See Nathan McClintock, Assessing Soil Lead Contamination at Multiple Scales in Oakland, California: Implications for Urban Agriculture and Environmental Justice (2012); Shahir Masri et al., Risk Assessment of Soil Heavy Metal Contamination at the Census Tract Level in the City of Santa Ana, CA: Implications for Health and Environmental Justice (June 2021) 23 Environmental Science Process Impacts 6, pp. 812-830.

[100] Fleischman and Franklin, supra at pp. 4, 14.

[101] Masri et al., supra.

[102] McClintock, supra at 460-61.

[103] Reichmuth, Inequitable Exposure to Air Pollution from Vehicles in California (Jan. 28, 2019) Union of Concerned Scientists (as of Apr. 26, 2022) p. 1.

[104] Ibid.

[105] Id. at pp. 6-7.

[106] Meng et al., California's Racial and Ethnic Minorities More Adversely Affected by Asthma (2007) UCLA Center for Health Policy Research (as of Apr. 26, 2022) p. 6.

[107] Milet et al., The Burden of Asthma in California: A Surveillance Report (June 2007) Cal. Dept. of Health Services p. 5.

[108] Reichmuth, supra at p. 1.

[109] Mazur et al., Indicators of Climate Change in California: Environmental Justice Impacts (Dec. 2010) Off. of Environmental Health Hazard Assessment (as of Apr. 26, 2022) p. 6.

[110] Id. at p. 3.

[111] Id. at pp. 1, 3.

[112] Id. at p. 4; Cal. Dept. of Public Health, Preparing California for Extreme Heat (Oct. 2013) Cal. Dept. of Public Health (as of Apr. 17, 2022) p. 8.

[113] Mazur et al., supra at p. 2; see also Anthony Rogers-Wright, Getting to the Roots: Requisites for Climate Reparations Powerpoint Presentation California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (October 12, 2021) p. 5.

[114] Hoffman, supra.

[115] Ibid.

[116] Ibid.

[117] U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, Learn About Heat Islands (Sept. 2021) U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[118] Plumer and Popovich, How Decades of Racist Housing Policy Left Neighborhoods Sweltering (Aug. 24, 2020) N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Locke et al., Residential Housing Segregation and Urban Tree Canopy in 37 US Cities (Mar. 25, 2021) 1 NPJ Urban Sustainability 15 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[119] Hoffman, supra.

[120] Ibid.

[121] Tim Arango, "Turn Off the Sunshine": Why Shade Is a Mark of Privilege in Los Angeles (Dec. 1, 2019) N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[122] Ibid.

[123] Flavelle, Climate Change Tied to Pregnancy Risks, Affecting Black Mothers Most (June 18, 2020) N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[124] Arango, supra.

[125] C.N.E. Corbin, Rendering Gentrification and Erasing Race: Sustainable Development & The (Re)visioning of Oakland, California as a Green City, p. 17 (unpublished draft manuscript provided by author) (noting that city documents portraying green revitalization plans for West Oakland "display a different and more affluent whiter population and a greener landscape, thus a depiction of green gentrification expressed in these municipal images").

[126] Id. at 8 (noting that "Black and Brown bodies [] can and have also been rendered as trespassers, criminalized, and met by state violence historically and currently when in parks.").

[127] Kang, supra at pp. 31-34. One displaced resident put it follows: "When you sit [in] a room full of poor folks on one side and homeowners on the other side, who are trying to bring all of this . . . 'greening' into our areas . . . And I'm saying, Good Lord! We're black, we're not stupid.'" Id. at 34.

[128] Rachel Morello-Frosch et al, The Climate Gap Report: Inequalities in How Climate Change Hurts Americans & How to Close the Gap (2009) USC Equity Research Institute (as of Apr. 17, 2022).

[129] Ibid.

[130] Off. of Health Equity, Cal. Dept. of Public Health, Climate Change & Health Equity: Issue Brief (May 2019) Cal. Dept. of Public Health (as of June 17, 2021) p. 2.

[131] Arango, supra.

[132] Ibid.

[133] Off. of Health Equity, Climate Change Issue Brief, supra at p. 2.

[134] Ibid.

[135] Smith, How Communities of Color are Hurt Most by Climate Change (June 7, 2021) Forbes (as of Apr. 22, 2022); Chen et al., Utilizing Smart-Meter Data to Project Impacts of Urban Warming on Residential Electricity Use for Vulnerable Populations in Southern California (2020) 15 Environmental Research Letters 6, p. 6.

[136] Knowlton et al., The 2006 California Heat Wave: Impacts on Hospitalizations and Emergency Department Visits (2009) 117 Environmental Health Perspectives 1 pp. 61-67; Basu and Ostro, A Multicounty Analysis Identifying the Populations Vulnerable to Mortality Associated with High Ambient Temperature in California (2008) 168 Am. J. of Epidemiology 6, pp. 632–637; Shonkoff et al., The Climate Gap: Environmental Health and Equity Impacts from Climate Change and Mitigation Policies in California—A Review of the Literature (2011) 109 Climate Change, pp. 485-503.

[137] Tamar Meshel, Environmental Justice in the United States: The Human Right to Water (2018) 8 Wash. J. Environmental L. & Policy 264, pp. 270-72.

[138] Mich. Civil Rights Commission, The Flint Water Crisis: Systemic Racism Through the Lens of Flint (Feb. 17, 2017) Michigan Civil Rights Commission, pp. 26-27.

[139] Id. at pp. 25, 28.

[140] Id. at pp. 56-57, 68-69.

[141] Denchak, Flint Water Crisis: Everything You Need to Know (Nov. 8, 2018) Natural Resources Defense Council (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[142] Merrit Kennedy, Lead-Laced Water In Flint: A Step-By-Step Look at the Makings of A Crisis (Apr. 20, 2016) NPR (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[143] Ibid.; see also Del Toral, High Lead Levels in Flint, Michigan – Interim Report (June 24, 2015) U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[144] Kennedy, supra.

[145] Ibid.

[146] Kennedy, supra; Fonger, Flint Water Has More Lead than 98 Percent of State, Despite Snyder's Claim (Mar. 31, 2017) MLive-The Flint Journal (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[147] Kennedy, supra.

[148] Booker, Ex-Michigan Gov. Rick Snyder And 8 Others Criminally Charged in Flint Water Crisis (Jan. 14, 2021) NPR (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[149] Ibid.

[150] Montag, Water/Color: A Study of Race & The Water Affordability Crisis in America's Cities (2019) , NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., p. 7.

[151] Taylor, The Environment and the People in American Cities, supra at p. 270.

[152] Id. at p. 94.; Montag, supra at p. 12.

[153] Taylor, supra at p. 94; Montag, supra at p. 10.

[154] Taylor, supra at p. 94.

[155] Ibid.

[156] Ibid.

[157] *Id.*at p. 96.

[158] Montag, supra at p. 3.

[159] Van Syckle, Raw Sewage Flooded Their Homes. They're Still Waiting for Help (Apr. 15, 2021) N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[160] Ibid.

[161] Eva Lyubich, The Race Gap in Residential Energy Expenditures (June 21, 2020) The Energy Institute at Haas Business School, UC Berkeley (as of Apr. 27, 2022) p. 1.

[162] Drehobl, Lifting the High Energy Burden in America's Largest Cities: How Energy Efficiency Can Improve Low-Income and Underserved Communities (April 20, 2016) American Council for an Energy-Efficient Economy (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[163] Am. Council for an Energy-Efficient Economy (ACEEE), Energy Burdens in Los Angeles (Sept. 2020) ACEEE (as of Apr. 27, 2022); Am. Council for an Energy-Efficient Economy (ACEEE), Energy Burdens in San Francisco (Sept. 2020) ACEEE (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[164] Williams-Tack, From Redlining to Restorative Justice: Anti-Blackn Racism and Energy Insecurity Go Hand in Hand in America (Feb 21 2021 Sierra: The Magazine of the Sierra Club (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[165] Kowalski, Racial Disparities Persist in Electric Service. Is 'Willful Blindness' to Blame? (July 1, 2020) Energy New Network (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[166] Pickens and Ballenger, This Pa. Law on Utility Shutoffs Unfairly Impacts Black and Brown People. It Must be Repealed (Aug. 7, 2020) Pennsylvania Capital-Star (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[167] Sunter et al., Disparities in Rooftop Photovoltaics Deployment in the United States by Race and Ethnicity (2019) 2 Nature Sustainability, pp. 71–76.

[168] See Access to Clean Mobility, GRID Alternatives.

[169] Thind et al., Fine Particulate Air Pollution from Electricity Generation in the US: Health Impacts by Race, Income, and Geography (2019) 53 Environmental Science & Technology 23, pp. 14010-14019.

[170] Brenman, Transportation Inequity in the United States: A Historical Overview (July 1, 2007) American Bar Association (as of Apr. 15, 2022).

[171] Ibid.

[172] Ibid.

[173] Douglass, My Bondage and My Freedom (1855) Railroads and the Making of Modern America (as of Mar. 24, 2022).

[174] Singer, No Right to Exclude: Public Accommodations and Private Property (1996) 90 Northwestern University Law Review 1283 p. 60.

[175] Hall v. Decuir (1877) 95 U.S. 485.

[176] Ibid.

[177] New Orleans & Texas Railway v. Mississippi (1890) 133 U.S. 587; Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) 163 U.S. 537.

[178] English, Why Did America Give Up on Mass Transit? (Don't Blame Cars.) (Aug. 31, 2018) Bloomberg CityLab (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[179] Ibid.

[180] Ibid.

[181] Ibid.

[182] Ibid.

[183] Ibid.

[184] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 13, 2021), Testimony of Jacqueline Jones (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[185] King, Jr., A Testament of Hope: The Essential Writings and Speeches of Martin Luther King, Jr. (1991) pp. 326–27.

[186] Sanchez et al., Moving to Equity: Addressing Inequitable Effects of Transportation Policies on Minorities (2003) Civil Rights Project at Harvard University, p. 3.

[187] Ibid.

[188] Spieler, Racism Has Shaped Public Transit, and It's Riddled with Inequities (Aug. 24, 2020) Rice Kinder Institute for Urban Research (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[189] Ibid.

[190] Ibid.

[191] Ibid.

[192] Ibid.

[193] Austin, To Move Is To Thrive: Public Transit and Economic Opportunity for People of Color (Nov. 15, 2017) Demos (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[194] Ibid.; National Equity Atlas, Commute Time: All Workers Should Have Reasonable Commutes (2019) National Equity Atlas (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[195] Morgan, Can Variable Transit Fares Increase Equity? (Jan. 28, 2019) Chicago Policy Review (as of Apr. 27, 2022); Brown, Fair Fares? How Flat and Variable Fares Affect Transit Equity in Los Angeles (2018) 6 Case Studies on Transport Policy 4, pp. 765-773.

[196] Morgan, supra; Brown, supra.

[197] Journeys, Through the Wire: Understanding Inequality in Household Telephone Access, 1960-2010 (Nov. 25, 2016) Dartmouth University (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[198] Yousry, With Telemedicine On The Rise, African Americans Risk Being Left Behind (Mar. 1, 2021) WBAA (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[199] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (January 27, 2022), Testimony of Vincent Le (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[200] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (January 27, 2022), Testimony of Yeshimabeit Milner (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[201] Ibid.

[202] Ibid.

[203] Ibid.

[204] Alexandra, A Century Before Rosa Parks, She Fought Segregated Transit in SF (Mar. 12, 2009) KQED (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[205] Hall, Black Farmworkers in the Central Valley: Escaping Jim Crow for a Subtler Kind of Racism (Feb. 22, 2019) KQED (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[206] London et al., The Struggle for Water Justice in California's San Joaquin Valley: A Focus on Disadvantaged Unincorporated Communities (Feb. 2018) UC Davis Center for Regional Change, p. 10.

[207] Jose A. Del Real, How Racism Ripples Through Rural California's Pipes (Nov. 29, 2019), N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 22, 2022).

[208] Cowan and Del Real, Why Thousands of Californians Don't Have Clean Drinking Water (Dec. 6, 2019), N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[209] Ibid.

[210] Taylor, supra at pp.

[211] Ibi

[212] Jose A. Del Real, The Crisis Lurking in Californians' Taps: How 1,000 Water Systems May Be at Risk (July 24, 2019) N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[213] Office of Environmental Health Hazard Assessment, Achieving the Human Right to Water in California (Jan. 2021) Cal. Environmental Protection Agency (as of Apr. 27, 2022) p. 8.

[214] Glickfeld et al., The Human Right to Water in Poor Communities of Color (Jan. 19, 2021) UCLA, p. viii.

[215] Id. at p. 18.

[216] ABC 7 News, Oakland's McClymonds High School Safe to Return to, Months After Chemical Scare, District Says (Oct. 16, 2020) ABC 7 News (as of Apr. 18, 2022).

[217] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Dec. 7, 2021), Testimony of Bruce Appleyard (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[218] Ibid.

[219] Spieler, supra.

[220] Ibid.

[221] Ibid.

[222] Ibid.

[223] Ramey, America's Unfair Rules of the Road (Feb. 27, 2015) Slate (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[224] Ibid.

[225] Gao and Hayes, California's Digital Divide (Feb. 2021) Public Policy Institute of California (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[226] Testimony of Vincent Le, supra.

CHAPTER 8 Pathologizing the African American Family

COURTESY OF DOROTHEA LANGE/LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

A migrant worker from the South and her baby on an Arizona cotton farm. (c. 1940)

I. Introduction

Starting over 400 years ago, the federal and state governments of our country have decimated African American families, both through their own official action and inaction, as well as through creating and supporting systems in which private actors enacted racist policies and practices. After the end of the legal enslavement of African Americans, the apprenticeship system and segregation laws denied African Americans the stability and safety of the family unit.[1] In the past century, both financial assistance and child welfare systems have based decisions on racist beliefs about African Americans.[2]

As a result, these government-run systems have excluded African Americans from receiving benefits and targeted Black families for investigations of child mistreatment and neglect.[3] Further, these structures have placed African American children in foster care systems at much higher rates than white children.[4] Meanwhile, the criminal and juvenile justice systems have intensified these harms to African American families by imprisoning large numbers of African American children, thereby separating African American families.[5] All of these actions have systematically worked to deny African Americans the opportunities to form stable, supportive family structures, and have often further stereotyped and blamed African Americans themselves for resulting harms.

Section III of this chapter addresses the treatment—and decimation—of family structure among African American enslaved persons during the slavery era of American history. Section IV discusses the African American family from emancipation until the Civil Rights Era, during which government structures and policies empowered the continued enslavement of African American children, excluded both African American women and African American men from healthy parenting relationships, and continued to deny the legitimacy—both literal and figurative—of African American marriages and children, so as to ensure white wealth was not dispersed to them. Section V addresses the Moynihan Report, which largely blamed the culture of African American families for the injustices faced by African Americans and proposed deeply problematic solutions to remedy them. Section VI addresses direct cash assistance welfare programs, from their overtly racist origins through modern programs that continue to systematically disadvantage impoverished African American families. Section VII lays out the history of the foster care and other child welfare systems in America, discussing the myriad ways in which that system further attacked the African American family and denied them resources afforded to other Americans. Section VIII addresses the criminalization of African American youth, who are targeted consistently both within and outside of schools, further breaking families apart. Section IX addresses issues relating to African American victims of domestic violence, who are doubted and excluded from assistance in ways that many white victims are not.

II. Enslavement

Throughout the slavery era of American history, federal and state governments empowered and protected white enslavers in their destruction of African American family structures by treating enslaved people as chattel, unworthy of family love, care, and support.

Enslavers and state governments maintained no records of the origins of enslaved Africans, and replaced their names with those of their new enslavers. This erased their identity, severed them from their family, and made it extremely difficult for them to find each other after emancipation.

The Transatlantic Slave Trade and Reproductive Slavery

As Frederick Douglass observed over 250 years ago, "[g]enealogical trees do not flourish among slaves."[6]

The vast majority of the nearly 400,000 enslaved persons brought over from Africa were children or young adults, and more than a quarter were children.[7] Upon the arrival of enslaved people in the United States, private parties and state governments maintained no records of their origins, replacing their names with those of their new enslavers, names by which they were called throughout their lives.[8] This erased an individual's identity, severed them from their family, and made it extremely difficult for them to find each other after emancipation.[9] See Chapter 2, Enslavement, for more detailed information about this process.

Federal and state governments passed laws that protected enslavers' ability to destroy African American families and use African American women and their children as a way to increase the wealth of enslavers. Before 1662, English law governing the American colonies held that children of enslaved fathers were enslaved, but the child of enslaved women and white male enslavers were free persons upon their birth, thereby entitling them to the full protection of the law.[10] This changed in 1662, when the colonial government of Virginia passed a law stating that all children born to enslaved mothers were enslaved themselves, regardless of whether or not the father was white, African American, enslaved, or free.[11] This law created a new source of wealth as enslavers used these children to settle debts, pass on a larger inheritance, or otherwise enrich themselves.[12] The doctrine underlying this law became known as "partus sequitur ventrem," Latin for "that which is brought forth follows the womb."[13] It was adopted in laws by virtually all other states in which enslavement was legal.[14]

The United States outlawed trafficking enslaved people into the country in 1807.[15] The only legal way to increase the number of enslaved people and free labor for the American economy was therefore through domestic birth of new enslaved persons. This created a financial incentive for impregnating African American women and girls and carrying the pregnancies to term.[16] Historians have found evidence that enslavers raped African American women and forced them to birth children to create more enslaved people and further enrich their enslavers.[17]

Professor Daina Ramey Berry has argued that this sexual slavery served to provide great benefits to both government and private actors within both the southern and northern states.[18] The labor of African American enslaved people created wealth for their enslavers, sustained cotton production and other private industries, and paid state and local taxes across the country.[19] In the North, maritime industry, merchants, textile manufacturers, and even consumers of cheap cloth were all dependent on the southern cotton plantation economy, which was based on the sexual slavery of Black women and men[20] and the destruction of Black families.[21] Professor Berry argues that enslavers focused on the fertility of young African American women during slave auctions, and that early childbirth was considered to be a valuable skill, like housekeeping and clothes-mending.[22] Enslavers considered the birth of enslaved infants not with humanity, but "appraised" them with a monetary value, one that typically increased as they aged.[23]

Marriage Between Enslaved People

American governments prohibited or did not recognize marriage between enslaved people. Across the southern enslaving states, enslaved persons were generally prohibited by law from entering any legally-binding marriage.[24] Abolitionist William Goodell described the way that American law treated the families of enslaved people in 1853 as: "The slave has no rights. Of course he, or she, cannot have the rights of a husband, a wife. The slave is a chattel, and chattels do not marry. 'The slave is not ranked among sentient beings, but among things,' and things are not married."[25] Tennessee was the only enslaving state that allowed for marriage between enslaved persons, but the law required consent of the enslavers for the marriage to be valid.[26] Because enslaved persons were not considered to be human beings under the law, they could not enter into legal contracts.[27] Therefore, enslaved people could neither own nor transfer property, which is what American law recognized their husbands, wives, and children to be.[28]

The North Carolina Supreme Court in 1858 said: "The relation between slaves is essentially different from that of man and wife joined in lawful wedlock," because "with slaves it may be dissolved at the pleasure of either party, or by the sale of one or both, dependent upon the caprice or necessity of the owners."

Their condition was compatible only with a form of concubinage, "voluntary on the part of the slaves, and permissive on that of the master."[30]

These attitudes and legal mandates were not limited to the South. One notable example is the case of Basil Campbell, who at the time of his death in 1906 was one of the wealthiest African American men in California.[31] He arrived to California from Missouri in 1854 as an enslaved person, forcibly removed from his wife and two children, who never saw him again.[32] After his death, his two adult sons from his marriage in Missouri sued to seek their inheritance, leading three different courts, including the California Supreme Court, to reject their claims.[33] Indeed, one appellate court held—nearly 50 years after the legal emancipation of enslaved African Americans—that describing Campbell's marriage to his enslaved wife as a marriage would make a "mockery" of the institution.[34]

Interracial Marriage

Laws prohibiting interracial marriage, known as anti-miscegenation laws, devalued African American families. The earliest known anti-miscegenation law, passed in 1661 in the Colony of Maryland, stated that a white woman who married an African American man became an enslaved person herself.[35] Other colonies followed suit to prohibit interracial marriage during slavery.[36] However, from slavery through the era of legal segregation, American society accepted white men having sex with African American women—whether consensual or rape—especially when those women were treated as the property of white men.[37] The children of these interracial interactions were typically enslaved and could not inherit their white father's wealth.[38]

Fears of interracial marriage often led to violence. In 1834, a false rumor that abolitionist ministers had married an interracial couple led to 11 days of racial terror in New York City.[39] Mobs attacked a mixed-race gathering of the American Anti-Slavery Society and destroyed African American churches, homes, schools, and businesses, as well as the homes and churches of leading abolitionists.[40] A similar incident occurred in Philadelphia in 1838.[41]

Punishments for interracial marriage varied by state, but in many states prior to the Civil War, white Americans were punished more often than African Americans, at least within the legal system.[42] Scholars have argued that this reflects anti-Black racist attitudes that, depending on the circumstance, African American people were sometimes considered "too irresponsible and too inferior to punish" and "it was whites' responsibility to protect the purity of their own bloodlines."[43] Punishments for African Americans, however, were still severe, including whippings, fines, exile, or even enslavement if they were free at the time of their violation of the law.[44] Although it is unclear how often anti-miscegenation laws were enforced, evidence suggests that they were used to make examples of high-visibility interracial couples, who were considered a threat to public order.[45]

Parent-Child Relationships

Enslavement treated enslaved African Americans as replaceable property, so enslavers separated children from their parents if it was profitable to do so, and sometimes in order to discourage potential rebellion. This was justified by the enslavers in various ways. For example, Thomas R.R. Cobb, a legal scholar who drafted parts of the Georgia legal code of 1861,[46] claimed that the African American mother "suffers little" when her children are stolen from her, since she lacked maternal feelings.[47] Cobb helped write principles of white supremacy into Georgia law, including a provision that presumed African Americans were enslaved unless proven otherwise.[48]

State law legally entitled enslavers to separate enslaved parents and children at any time, and to relocate them at different plantations at the time of the child's birth. In some southern states, approximately one-third of enslaved children were separated from one or both parents.

From their birth, enslaved children were considered property of the enslaver, and therefore enslavers controlled a child's life and upbringing.[49] From the time of birth, enslavers stripped away parental rights, often not allowing the birth parents to choose the newborn's name.[50] Very soon after giving birth, enslaved mothers were expected to return to work and leave their children with extended family members or an older enslaved woman who was assigned the role to watch over children on the plantation.[51] Even if an enslaved parent had some control over their child's life, the enslaver held the highest authority and could make final decisions as to who would take care of the child, what activities they participated in, or whether they would be separated from their family by selling the parent or child to a different enslaver.[52] As a result of many children and parents being separated through chattel sales, orphaned children were often adopted and cared for by friends, extended family, or the enslaved community as a whole.[53] This approach of allowing white strangers, aided by laws and government actors, to take an African American child from their family is echoed after enslavement via the apprenticeship system and by the modern foster care system, as discussed further below.

Enslaved children typically received no formal education and were expected to work as soon as they were physically able, forced to work in the fields as young as eight.[54] They often worked in a similar capacity as the adults, working fields, tending animals, cleaning and serving in their enslavers' houses, and taking care of younger children.[55] State law legally entitled enslavers to separate enslaved parents and children at any time, and to relocate them at different plantations at the time of the child's birth.[56] In some southern states, approximately one-third of enslaved children were separated from one or both parents.[57]

Harriet Mason, an enslaved women forced to separate from her family at age seven, related that she "used to say I wish I'd died when I was little."[58] Members of a family could be separately sold as enslavers fell into debt or wanted to raise profits.[59] In some parts of the South, an African American enslaved person had a 30 percent chance of being sold in his or her lifetime.[60] A quarter of trades of enslaved persons across state lines destroyed a first marriage, while approximately half destroyed a nuclear family by separating immediate family members.[61]

Opponents of slavery, including those in the federal government, recognized how it destroyed the families of

COURTESY OF CULTURE CLUB VIA GETTY IMAGES

The Separation of Mother and Child. (1852)

African Americans. Advocating for the elimination of slavery, U.S. Senator James Harlan of Iowa stated that slavery effected "the abolition practically of the parental relation, robbing the offspring of the care and attention of his parents[.]"[62] Scholars argue that the anguish caused by the threat of family separation coerced enslaved people into working without complaint.[63] The horrors of family separation during slavery were highlighted by abolitionists as a central strategy to enlist people to their cause.[64] Near the end of the slavery era, in the 1850s, some southern states responded to public horror at child separation by passing laws prohibiting the taking of infants from their enslaved mothers.[65] Modern scholars analyzing this development have argued that these laws were not passed out of concern for African Americans, but to assuage public outrage in order to maintain slavery.[66]

Extended Family Kinship Structures

In order to cope with the destruction of their nuclear family, enslaved people created deep, extended supportive relationships with other enslaved people.[67] Some historians have argued that the extended kinship structures of African American enslaved people mirrored similar structures in their native West African homelands.[68] The role of African American grandparents, other extended relatives, and older Black caregivers who were not biologically related took on particular importance,[69] with Black grandmothers often serving as a central figure within a plantation ensuring the care of all children of enslaved parents who were sold to other enslavers, killed, or otherwise removed from their nuclear families.[70] The reliance of Black mothers and African Americans on extended kinship networks was a necessity for mere survival, beginning in the slavery era and continued through legal segregation and other forms of discrimination.[71]

Early African American historians argued that the legacy of slavery created "disorganization and instability" in African American families for generations.[72] In 1899 and again in 1909, prominent sociologist and social critic W.E.B. Du Bois published detailed, fact-driven analyses of African American families, demonstrating the many ways in which a lack of economic means and opportunities after the end of slavery harmed African American families in both the North and South.[73] In 1932, sociologist E. Franklin Frazier argued that African American families had particular difficulty adapting to the drastic changes of the early 20th century due to the way that enslavement destroyed African American families and traditions.[74] As discussed further below, these resulting harms have been used throughout American history to claim that the African American family itself was to blame because it was dysfunctional by its nature.

COURTESY OF THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Red Cross Relief, drought of 1930-31. African American family of 9. (c. 1930)

III. African American Families from Emancipation to the Civil Rights Era, 1865 to 1960

After slavery, states and private actors continued to discriminate against African American families, particularly with respect to the dominant gender norms of the time. Before the women's liberation movement of the late 1960s redefined the role of women in society,[75] women were expected to take care of children and the home.[76] Only men were expected to participate in the public sphere.[77] For African American women, these expectations imposed impossible burdens. African American women were expected to be mothers and wives, but white society expected African American women to be their servants and workers.[78] African American women attempted to do both, which took a great emotional and physical toll on African American women and, in turn, their families.[79]

For African American men, traditional gender roles dictated that they must dominate and lead, acting as the head of the family.[80] Under these norms of masculinity, society expected men to be stoic figures, enduring all injury without emotion or complaint.[81] These expectations, too, demanded the impossible from Black men, as society expected them to accept the indignities of discrimination without complaint.[82] When Black men responded to discrimination in anger—one of the few emotions society expected of and allowed for men to exhibit—Black men were criminalized and treated as threats, feeding the stereotypes imposed upon them.[83] This, too, has taken a toll on African American men and their families.[84]

Black women were generally precluded from taking public-facing retail jobs or professional secretarial work with traditional nine-to-five work schedules. Instead, typically they were only given opportunities to serve as domestic caregivers and maids, often living in the homes of their white employers and on call at all hours. These domestic service jobs took the individual work of caring and mothering from Black families and gave it to the children of white families, often preventing Black mothers from even living with their children.

African American Parenthood

During this time, prevailing gender norms defined fathers as breadwinners and mothers as caretakers at home.[85] But racial discrimination combined with these gender expectations to place heavier burdens on African American families and African American parenthood. As described in greater detail in Chapter 10, Stolen Labor and Hindered Opportunity, government and private actors discriminated against African American men seeking employment, restricting them to ill-paid menial jobs and limiting their ability to earn income to support their families.[86] At times, this required African American men to direct their children to work to ensure that the family could survive.[87] African American children, therefore, often could not pursue schooling or their own goals and dreams.[88]

COURTESY OF JOHN H. TARBELL/LIBRARY OF CONGRESS/CORBIS/VCG VIA GETTY IMAGES

(1899)

Because discrimination limited African American men's employment opportunities, African American women also had to seek work to supplement the family's income even where white women did not.[89] This required African American women to play the social roles of both men and women, taking care of children and the household while working jobs at the same time.[90] The Freedmen's Bureau, a government agency established to aid the transition of enslaved people to freedom, singled out African American women as subset of poor women who were supposed to work rather than remaining at home.[91] For example, South Carolina Freedmen's Bureau agent John de Forest criticized the "myriads of [African American] women who once earned their own living [who] now have aspirations to be like white ladies and, instead of using the hoe, pass the days in dawdling over their trivial housework[.]"[92]

As a result, a higher percentage of African American married women worked than their white counterparts.[93] This systematically denied African American children the care of their mothers when compared to white children whose mothers could more often choose to stay home and provide care.[94] Later in the 20th century, African American women were generally precluded from taking public-facing retail jobs or professional secretarial work with traditional nine-to-five work schedules.[95] Instead, typically they were only given opportunities to serve as domestic caregivers and maids, often living in the homes of their white employers and on call at all hours.[96] These domestic service jobs took the individual work of caring and mothering from African American families and gave it to the children of white families, often preventing African American mothers from even living with their children.[97]

Interracial Marriage

Anti-miscegenation laws continued after the end of enslavement. When the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified, it was not considered to prohibit laws banning interracial marriage so long as the laws applied equally to both races.[98] In 1883, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of laws outlawing interracial marriage, and state courts followed suit through the mid-20th century.[99] Members of Congress also tried—unsuccessfully—to ban interracial marriage nationwide through legislative proposals made in 1871, 1912, and 1928.[100] Eventually, a total of 38 states established such laws.[101]

Many scholars argue that the white-dominated state governments passed anti-miscegenation laws to prevent African Americans—enslaved or otherwise—from accumulating wealth, in addition to controlling women's sexuality.[102] In America's earliest days, white colonists were also concerned with possible mixing of African Americans and Native Americans, given that an alliance of both groups might provide sufficient strength to rise against slavery and other forms of economic oppression.[103]

Immediately after emancipation, former enslavers continued to exploit children, both sexually and as a cheap source of labor, through the apprenticeship system. Enslavers refused to free children when their parents were freed, either through apprenticeship laws or through outright kidnapping.

The most direct concern was a passing on of white wealth to interracial offspring through inheritance or probate laws, undermining race-based social stratification.[104] Children of legally-unrecognized interracial marriages were almost always excluded from economic benefits they would have received if their parents were both white.[105] The children were legally considered "bastards," and had no claim to the estates of their biological fathers, nor could the man or woman in such a "void" marriage claim alimony, child support, death benefits, or any inheritance.[106]

White relatives also had a strong motivation to ensure these statutes were strictly and aggressively enforced, since a sibling who might inherit nothing on the death of a married brother or sister could inherit that sibling's wealth by proving that the sibling's spouse was African American, and that the marriage was therefore void.[107] Anti-miscegenation laws continued to deny economic benefits—especially in probate, i.e., a judicial process whereby a will is "proven" in court—to African Americans who would have otherwise received them, since, by operation of law, assets of those who died without wills would be inherited by spouses.[108]

Government officials and white militants enforced bans on sexual intimacy between African American men and white women with particular intensity due to the overlapping aims of maintaining racial hierarchy and policing white women's bodies.[109] The Ku Klux Klan, an all-male group, claimed one of its purposes was to treat white women as the "special objects of [its] regard and protection."[110] Nevertheless, they abused, raped, and mutilated white women who fraternized with Black men.[111]

This also meant that African American men were special targets for violence after any interactions with white women. In Alabama in 1929, for example, Elijah Fields, a 50-year-old African American man, and Ollie Roden, a 25-year-old white woman, were both arrested and tried for violation of the state's anti-miscegenation law, which also prohibited cohabitation.[112] An Alabama jury convicted Fields even though Roden's father testified that he had only asked Fields to drive his daughter, who was incontinent and suffering from open sores, from a hospital to a boardinghouse.[113] The state sentenced Fields to two to three years in prison, although it was later reversed on appeal.[114]

In 1967, in Loving v. Virginia, the U.S. Supreme Court finally struck down all anti-miscegenation laws as unconstitutional.[115]

Continued Enslavement of African American Children Through Apprenticeship

The so-called "apprenticeship system" was a system that existed both before and after the Civil War under which state and local governments, through court decisions and agency actions, removed African American children from their families and placed them in the control of white adults who sometimes forced them to work without pay.[116] This system had existed in some form since the late 1700s, including when enslavement of African American children was legal.[117] However, even during the slavery era, it was used to exploit the labor of free African American children, including in enslaving states.[118] For example, records reveal that in 1857 a three-year-old free African American boy named Charles Bell was bound to an apprenticeship in Frederick County, Maryland, until the age of 21, through an agreement between local county officials and Nathanial C. Lupton, which makes no mention of his parents.[119]

Immediately after emancipation, former enslavers continued to exploit children, both sexually and as a cheap source of labor, through the apprenticeship system.[120] Enslavers refused to free children when their parents were freed, either through apprenticeship laws or through outright kidnapping.[121] Former enslavers petitioned state courts to remove African American children from their families based on apprenticeship laws.[122] These laws often allowed former enslavers to gain legal custody of African American children simply by claiming their parents were incapable of financially supporting them.[123] In addition to the trauma of losing a child, African American families often suffered substantial economic harm since farming families relied upon children to assist in agricultural work.[124]

This apprenticeship system controlled African American girls until they were 18 and African American boys until they were 21.[125] Although it is not known precisely how many children were effectively re-enslaved through apprenticeship, scholars estimate that many thousands of children in the South were taken from their recently-freed parents.[126]

Court cases throughout the second half of the 19th century document occasionally-successful attempts of parents to free their children from this form of enslavement, but also reveal the continued success of the system at ensuring that white former enslavers could profit from their continued exploitation of African American children.[127]

In one well-known example, a young Black girl named Elizabeth Turner was apprenticed as a "house servant" at the age of eight, two days after her emancipation.

Southern white people defended the apprenticeship system as benevolent in nature. One Maryland newspaper, for example, described the system in 1864 as being "prompted by feelings of humanity towards these unfortunate young ones."[128] One Texas judge described the Texas apprenticeship system as granting "justice to these children" by placing them in "good comfortable homes" where they would receive "some education."[129]

State and local courts were involved in empowering this injustice. So-called "orphan" courts across the southern states, typically run by pro-slavery judges, bound an estimated 10,000 children of freed African American men and women to these apprenticeships, which for all intents and purposes were an extension of their forced labor under slavery, operating to the benefit of the children's former enslavers.[130] Chief Justice of the United States Supreme

COURTESY OF THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Photograph shows ten African American children of various ages in a field picking berries. (c.1920)

Court Salmon Chase noted, in an 1867 case, that under the Maryland apprenticeship system "younger persons were bound as apprentices, usually, if not always, to their late masters."[131] This legal dispute arose because, under Maryland law, anyone seeking to apprentice a white child was required to provide an education, and could not involuntarily "transfer" the apprenticed child to another.[132]

However, African American children subjected to apprenticeship were not provided similar rights, and were described as a "property and interest."[133] In one well-known example, a young African American girl named Elizabeth Turner was apprenticed as a "house servant" at the age of eight, two days after her emancipation.[134] She challenged her apprenticeship because of the differences between apprenticeship laws for African American and white children.[135] The Supreme Court held that no African American child could be bound to an apprenticeship without the protections afforded to white children, concluding that "the alleged apprenticeship in the present case is involuntary servitude, within the meaning of...the [thirteenth] amendment."[136]

Although this decision meant freedom for Elizabeth Turner, many southern trial courts ignored Justice Chase's observations, and the re-enslavement of African American youth continued in the South.[137]

Since apprenticeship laws allowed local courts to judge whether African American parents were financially able to raise their children, white former enslavers often easily convinced white judges that the children would be better off placed with them.[138]

Scholars have noted that these attitudes have continued through modern family court and child welfare systems, which continue to apply three presumptions that are racist in practice: 1) that the state knows how to raise African American children better than their parents; 2) that poverty in and of itself prevents parents from raising their children well; and 3) that menial or vocational work, instead of an academic education, is more appropriate for African American youth.[139]

During the New Deal, the federal government had a chance to remedy these abuses but did not. The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, a federal law that generally outlawed child labor explicitly carved out agricultural and domestic work, which was then largely done by African American workers.[140] The United States Congress excluded these industries from labor protections, thereby denying African American children the labor protections given to white children.[141] See Chapter 10, Stolen Labor and Hindered Opportunity, for further discussion of related issues.

Impacts of the Great Migration on the African American Family

In the first half of the 20th century, millions of African Americans left the segregated South in search of greater opportunity in urban centers in the North and the West in a phenomenon called the Great Migration, which is discussed in detail in Chapter 1. This was, in part, because these cities already had some existing Black social networks and possibly relatives with whom southern African Americans could connect.[142] Older studies theorized that Black migrants during the Great Migration had disorganized family structures in the South, which they brought with them when they migrated to the North, contributing to higher rates of single parenthood and childbirth outside of marriage.[143] Many African American families sent one parent, northwards or westwards first, with the rest of the family to follow months or years later.[144]

Modern scholarship disputed these conclusions, noting that African American migrants from the South were more likely than African Americans already living in the North to have children living with two parents, married women living with their spouses, and fewer mothers that had never married.[145] They were also less likely than northern African Americans to receive welfare payments,[146] contradicting claims in the Moynihan Report, which is discussed further below, that the higher welfare payments in the North drew migrants from the South.

California

California had an anti-miscegenation statute even as other nearby states did not.[147] In fact, California enacted an anti-miscegenation law in its very first legislative session in 1850.[148] It initially singled out "negroes and mulattos" as the sole group which was prohibited from marrying "whites," following the national trend of disenfranchising African American people from entering into legally-recognized marriages with white Americans.[149] Although the law was based in slavery-era motivations for prohibiting such marriages, other racial groups facing waves of societal discrimination in California were targeted by later amendments to the original law.[150] California legislators exported its ban on interracial marriage to other states: In 1939, California legislators convinced the Utah legislature to add "Malay" to their state's anti-miscegenation law in order to avoid having to recognize marriages between Filipino Americans and white people performed in Utah.[151]

It was not until 1948 that the California anti-miscegenation law was struck down by the California Supreme

COURTESY OF J.E. PURDY & CO. /LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Photograph shows Lavinia Russell Baker and her five surviving children after the lynching of her husband, Postmaster Frazer Baker, and their daughter, Julia, on February 22, 1898. The Post Office and Baker family home was burned and family members were attacked by gunfire as they sought to escape.

Court.[152] At oral argument, in defense of the law, the attorney for Los Angeles County asserted that "it has been shown that the white race is superior physically and mentally to the black race, and the intermarriage of these races results in a lessening of physical vitality and mentality in their offspring" and that "people who enter into miscegenous marriages are usually from the lower walks of both races . . . generally people who are lost to shame."[153]Even after the law was struck down as unconstitutional, the California legislature repeatedly refused to repeal the law.[154] It was not until 11 years later that the California legislature finally repealed the statute, following consistent pressure from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.[155]

IV. The Moynihan Report

Few developments in the past half-century have been as impactful, or arguably as harmful, to America's perception of African American families as the "Moynihan Report" of 1965.

Drafting and Content of the Moynihan Report

In the midst of the civil rights movement, in 1965, Daniel Moynihan, an Assistant Secretary of Labor researching policies as part of the Johnson Administration's "War on Poverty," drafted what was originally an internal Department of Labor Report entitled, "The Negro Family: The Case For National Action."[156] As described in the introduction of the report, one of its goals was to analyze the African American family structure, which Moynihan saw as the fundamental problem underlying the gap in income, standards of living, and education between African Americans and other groups.[157]

The report described numerous ways that the historical legacy of slavery and institutional racism created lasting, harmful effects on African Americans and the African American family.[158] However, while acknowledging the impacts of these historical realities, the report essentially claimed that the high rate of single motherhood in African American families in America was a major reason for the continued failure of African Americans to achieve full and equal access to success in America.[159] It further asserted that such equality could only be achieved by changing the culture of African Americans, and particularly of African American men, who Moynihan claimed had been feminized and rendered inadequate workers through being raised without male role models.[160]

Even when advocating for governmental intervention to assist African Americans, the Moynihan Report still portrayed them as helpless but for the intervention of white Americans, describing what Moynihan called the "pathology" of Black America as "capable of perpetuating itself without assistance from the white world."[161] Although the Moynihan Report relied heavily on scholarship previously published by African American scholars, and linked the poverty experienced by African Americans to the historical traumas of slavery, it also argued that the Civil Rights Act and equality of opportunity would not resolve them.[162]

Instead, the Moynihan Report asserted that "[t]he gap between the Negro and other groups in American society is widening. The fundamental problem, in which this is most clearly the case, is that of family structure."[163] Moynihan argued, for example, that the prevalence of single motherhood in African American families created "a matriarchal structure which . . . seriously retards the progress of the group as a whole."[164]

The overt sexism and gender-stereotyping of the report also dovetailed with existing hostility towards African American women serving as leaders in the Civil Rights movement.[165] Contemporary African American women leaders were outraged that Moynihan explicitly advocated for improved governmental job opportunities for African American men over African American women to ensure male "breadwinners."[166]

Trailblazing advocate Pauli Murray stated that Moynihan's criticism of African American women in the workforce was "bitterly ironic," as criticism "for their efforts to overcome a handicap not of their own making."[167] Murray and others sharply disputed that traditional gender roles could solve African American poverty and racism.[168] Social scientist Donna Franklin argued that the family instability Moynihan focused on was mostly a result of the fact that African American women were hired as maids and child caregivers, while racial discrimination prevented African American men from finding jobs.[169] W.E.B. Du Bois made a similar observation nearly a half a century before the Moynihan Report.[170]

Franklin also noted that the many single mothers in the African American community noted by Moynihan was at least partially due to the fact that adoption services did not accept African American children.[171] As a result, single African American women were forced into motherhood when white women had the option of giving their children up for adoption.[172] During the 1950s, 70 percent of white single mothers gave up their children for adoption, but only five percent or fewer of African American single mothers did so.[173]

COURTESY OF GOODMAN AND SPRINGER /LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Unidentified African American Civil War veteran in Grand Army of the Republic uniform with two children. (c. 1900)

As Ta-Nehisi Coates wrote, the report helped create "the myth…that fatherhood is the great antidote to all that ails black people."[174]

Ultimately, no national effort resulted from the Moynihan Report. President Johnson called for a White House conference in its wake, which occurred in November of 1965.[175] At that point, the report had engendered so much controversy that Moynihan himself was largely sidelined at the conference, having recently left the administration.[176]

The Contemporary Response of African American Leaders to the Moynihan Report

Largely in response to the Moynihan Report, President Johnson acknowledged the legacy of state-sanctioned slavery and discrimination when he publicly stated, "Negro poverty is not white poverty."[177] Nevertheless, his administration followed that announcement with few meaningful efforts to address disparities of African Americans.[178]

Johnson did, however, convene a group of well-respected civil rights leaders to address African American poverty, which produced a report proposing that the federal government spend billions of dollars to ensure jobs, universal health insurance, and a basic minimum income paid to all Americans, regardless of race.[179] Their approach did not acknowledge that the American government has harmed African Americans in a unique way, since they believed proposals aimed at helping all poor Americans, African American and white, were likely to succeed.[180] Nevertheless, very few of their recommendations ultimately manifested in any federal legislation from the Johnson Administration, or otherwise.[181]

Impacts on Public Discourse and Social Policy

Scholars have consistently criticized the Moynihan Report for blaming the victim.[182] For some politicians and government actors, the Moynihan Report justified a stance that African Americans were unworthy of public assistance because African American culture was to blame for harms resulting from the enslavement and racial discrimination.[183]

Moynihan also suggested that every young African American man should join the armed forces, which would provide African American men with a much-needed "world away from women, a world run by strong men of unquestioned authority, where discipline, if harsh, is nonetheless orderly and predictable."[184] This recommendation was made as American involvement in the Vietnam War was beginning to escalate, at a time in which African American men were underrepresented in the armed forces.[185] Moynihan's analysis and recommendation lead to Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara's "Project 100,000," a program ostensibly designed to allow greater access to the U.S. Military for those who initially failed the qualifications test.[186] Project 100,000 ultimately served as a successful recruitment tool for Black soldiers in the Vietnam War—40 percent of those recruited were Black, a proportion nearly four times the percentage of African Americans in the general population.[187] Regardless, African American men were more likely to be drafted than white men, further devastating African American families when thousands of African American men died in the war.[188]

Although the Moynihan Report and its central conclusions were immediately controversial and contested, President Johnson adopted its language and central focus in decrying the "breakdown of the Negro family structure" as fundamental to the challenges faced by African Americans.[189] Several high-profile scholars also used the conclusions of the Moynihan Report to argue against the very social welfare programs for which Moynihan had advocated to help African Americans out of poverty. These included Arthur Jensen and Charles Murray—best known for their deeply controversial book "The Bell Curve"—who argued that the wealth gap between African American and white Americans existed because white Americans were more intelligent, a position Moynihan explicitly rejected.[190]

Later scholars argued the Moynihan Report provided grounds for politicians to blame African American single-parent families for their poverty and to deny assistance to African Americans in need.[191] Scholars have noted that Ronald Reagan, as California governor, "exploited" the perception of the single African American mother popularized by the Moynihan report when he coined the term "welfare queen" as part of his larger campaign for limited government.[192] Historians have argued that the Moynihan Report, despite arguing for greater interventions to combat African American poverty, nevertheless influenced the political movement within the federal government in the 1990s to cut welfare programs and impose punitive "welfare to work" training or employment requirements on recipients of cash assistance.[193]

V. The Welfare System: Assistance to Families

Despite the consistent arguments of politicians in the 1980s and 1990s stereotyping African Americans as unfairly taking advantage of government welfare policies, the American welfare system throughout history has actually discriminated against African American women and families, both explicitly and implicitly.

1900 to 1935: State "Mothers' Pensions"

States across America developed centralized welfare systems in the early 1900s to provide economic aid to low-income single mothers taking care of their children.[194] States made support payments every month to ensure a basic standard of living to care for both mother and child.[195] By 1930, all but two of the 48 existing states had created these "mothers' pensions."[196]

Throughout the era of mothers' pensions, Southern states consistently avoided giving aid to single African American mothers.[197] These policies discriminated against African American mothers, despite their greater economic need on average.[198] This approach was in line with southern state officials' administration of federal public works programs; such officials generally argued that African Americans should not need or be given relief so long as menial jobs were available to them.[199] Research has shown that between 1910 and 1920, the states in the South that enacted no "mothers' pensions" were those with greatest percentage of African American single mothers.[200] Similarly, states that had higher African American single motherhood rates were slower to enact such pensions and/or less generous with them when they were enacted.[201]

Both Northern and Southern states also implemented standards that disproportionally disqualified African American women, such as barring unmarried mothers

COURTESY OF RUSSELL LEE/LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

African-American family living in crowded quarters, Chicago, Illinois. (1941)

from receiving benefits.[202] Many states across the nation only gave mothers' pensions to widows, thereby excluding unmarried mothers who were more often African American women.[203] Even nominally race-neutral programs were often racist in their administration, since discretion in administering these programs was often left to "line officials (judges as well as county agencies)" who made decisions "to separate the worthy mothers from the unworthy" and about whether to provide benefits at all.[204]

A welfare field supervisor in the 1930s explained that the withholding of welfare payments from African American mothers was to prevent them from staying at home caring for their children and to instead force them into the work place.[205] This reflected the attitude of the white community that African American women should be forced to continue engaging in seasonal labor jobs or domestic service rather than receive any aid.[206]

MOTHERS' PENSIONS RECIPIENTS 1931 BY RACE
A FORM OF GOVERNMENT AID TO NEEDY FAMILIES
Percent receiving funds

A survey of all mothers' pensions across states in 1931 found that 96 percent of recipients were white; only three percent went to African American mothers.[207] All the states of the Deep South—Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas—created "mothers' pension" programs, but provided almost no assistance to African American single mothers. Across these seven states in 1931, only 39 African American families received mothers' pensions, compared to 2,957 white families.[208]

1935 to The Present: Federal Aid to Dependent Children and Modern Welfare

In 1935, the federal government passed the Social Security Act, which created a federal program similar to the state mothers' pensions known as "Aid to Dependent Children," later renamed "Aid to Families with Dependent Children."[209] In the 1950s, the federal government established payment programs to help poor Americans, but these programs were administered by state government agents who often denied welfare benefits to African American families by claiming that their homes were immoral, typically because children were born out of wedlock.[210] For example, in 1960 the Louisiana government removed 23,000 children from its state welfare rolls solely because their parents were not married, which was more likely to be the case among African American families.[211]

In response, the federal government prohibited states from denying welfare benefits solely because a child was born to unmarried parents, and required them to decide on a case-by-case basis whether a family was "unsuitable" for welfare and to provide service interventions to such families.[212] Although the intent of this rule, which became known as "Flemming Rule," was to prohibit states from excluding families from welfare assistance by applying broad (and often arbitrary) rules to all recipients, the effect was to push more African American children into foster care.[213] State welfare officials investigated African American families to consider whether to remove their children, often simply because the family was poor.[214] Again, scholars have noted that these policies were in many ways a modern day continuation of the apprenticeship process of removing African American children from their low-income families.[215]

For example, in 1960 in Florida, the largely white state welfare worker staff investigated and challenged the "suitability" of approximately 13,000 families already receiving welfare assistance.[216] Of these 13,000 families, only nine percent were white, even though welfare recipients as a whole were 39 percent white.[217] The State of Florida forced these 13,000 families to choose between their children or their welfare benefits.[218] Based on the racist beliefs that African American women had little maternal connection to their children, state workers expressed surprise that only 168 families agreed to place their children in state care.[219]

In modern times, the welfare system of cash assistance has remained biased against African Americans. In 1996, as part of a public movement against so-called "welfare moms," Congress passed the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act, which created the Temporary Assistance to Needy Families program, a system of federal funds sent to the states.[220] This system awards fixed dollar amounts to each state, but allows them to spend that money how they see fit to achieve federal goals.[221] Those goals include, but are not limited to, providing cash assistance to needy families and ending the dependence of needy parents on government benefits.[222]

This system has allowed states to craft policies that determine who is eligible for assistance, and these state policies tend to disqualify African American families from receiving cash assistance at a higher rate than other racial and ethnic groups.[223] For example, seven states have policies that completely ban individuals with any drug-related convictions from eligibility for cash assistance.[224] As discussed in Chapter 11, An Unjust Legal System, African American individuals are much more likely than white individuals to be convicted of drug offenses due to discrimination in the criminal justice system.[225] Therefore, these restrictions are more likely to burden poor African Americans.[226] Similarly, 11 states still maintain "family cap" policies that originated in "welfare mom" stereotypes, which deny benefit increases when welfare recipients have another child, and which have disproportionate impacts on African American families that tend to be larger than white families.[227]

One other notable change has emerged in very recent times. Because the law gives states the power to spend federal money on programs other than direct cash assistance, states are motivated to minimize cash assistance so they can spend more on other programs that might otherwise drain state coffers.[228] Over the past 20 years there has been a dramatic reduction in the percentage of federal money spent on cash assistance. In 1997, 71 percent of federal money was spent on welfare benefits nationwide, whereas in 2019 states spent only 21 percent of their federal money on such benefits.[229] Again, African Americans are more likely to suffer from this change, as states with larger percentages of African American residents have tended to spend the least percentage of their federal funds on welfare benefits.[230]

Both during and for many decades after the slavery era, Black children were systematically excluded from orphanages and other resources designed to care for poor children. Instead, some free Black children were placed in charitable housing for homeless or very low-income adults, where they faced abuse and were sometimes "indentured" into forced labor, effectively re-enslaving them.

California

Historically, California provided "mother's pensions" solely to widows, and was thus more likely to give these benefits to white single mothers because of the greater percentage of unwed African American mothers.[231] Moreover, the racist stereotype of "Welfare Queen" was arguably popularized by then-California Governor Ronald Reagan in 1976, who ran for President in part on a promise to cut welfare benefits, as he had done as Governor of California.[232]

Currently, California spends a greater percentage of its federal Temporary Assistance to Needy Families funds on basic assistance than most other states in the nation.[233] However, that percentage has reduced from 51 percent in 2009 to 39 percent in 2020.[234] Advocates and academics note that these reductions disproportionately harm African American families.[235]

VI. Foster Care Systems and Other Forms of Child Welfare

Historically and through today, African American families have faced racism in the child welfare system. After the Civil War, government agencies excluded African American orphans from government care and have consistently been more likely to investigate African American families. As of 2019, African American children "accounted for roughly 14 percent of the child population [but] 23 percent of the foster care population."[236]

The fact that child welfare agencies are more likely to investigate African American families is not because African American parents are more likely to mistreat their children, but rather due to many other factors.237 An official study of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services found in 1996 that the disproportionality of African American children being taken from their parents and placed in foster care "does not derive from inherent differences in the rates at which they are abused or neglected," but rather reflects the "differential attention" received by African American children "along the child welfare service pathway."[238] Since then, some studies have found slightly higher rates of mistreatment within African American families, but scholars have observed that these higher rates are due to the fact that African American families are more likely to be poor, and the stresses of poverty correlate with child mistreatment.[239]

Foster Care and Adoption Throughout American History

Both during and for many decades after the slavery era, Black children were systematically excluded from orphanages and other resources designed to care for poor children.[240] Instead, some free African American children were placed in charitable housing for unhoused or very low-income adults, where they faced abuse and were sometimes "indentured" into forced labor, effectively re-enslaving them.[241] Non-governmental African American child welfare organizations were sometimes established to help some African American children rejected from private and public entities that only assisted white children.[242] For example, Pittsburgh's Home for Colored Children was founded after a young Black girl, Nellie Grant, wandered the streets after being rejected from the city's childcare institutions because she was Black.[243]

Scholars have argued that more African American children end up in foster care because adoption services believed that African American children were "unadoptable" due to the preferences of the white families which they served to adopt white children.[244] After governmental child adoption services were officially open to African American children, most were not still given the same opportunities as white families because adoption agencies catered to the preferences of white families.[245] Non-governmental agencies similarly excluded African American children by catering to the private adoption market, which was largely affluent and white.[246] When these adoption institutions failed to place Black children with families, they blamed the children and stigmatized them as "unadoptable."[247]

From 1945 to 1982, the percentage of nonwhite children in foster care rose from 17 percent to 47 percent, with 80 percent of nonwhite children being Black. Scholars have found that racial discrimination exists at every stage of the child welfare process.

State government systems that take children from caregivers believed to be unfit and place them in other environments designed to ensure their safety developed after World War II.[248] From the start, state agencies removed African American children from their families and placed them into foster care far more often than white children. Between the years of 1945 and 1961, the number of nonwhite children in child welfare caseloads almost doubled, increasing from 14 percent to 27 percent.[249]

In 2008, compared to white children, similarly-situated African American children were

77% MORE LIKELY to be removed from their homes

As the modern foster care system developed, various governmental policies have placed African American youth at greater risk of being taken from their families. As discussed above, until the 1950s, poor African American families continued to be denied benefits available to other poor Americans based on federal policies, and then were faced with potential removal of their children into foster care because of "unsuitable" home conditions.[250]

The criminalization of African Americans through the "War on Drugs" also contributed to increasing numbers of Black children being removed from families and placed into the foster care system, as Black men in particular were disproportionately arrested for minor crimes, breaking apart families and often leaving children in the care of extended relatives or strangers.[251] Child welfare agencies tasked with ensuring child safety also often pay particular attention to families experiencing homelessness and housing instability, which African Americans are more likely to experience.[252] Housing instability can also delay the return of a child who has been removed to their family.[253] From 1945 to 1982, the percentage of nonwhite children in foster care rose from 17 percent to 47 percent, with 80 percent of nonwhite children being African American.[254]

Scholars have found that racial discrimination exists at every stage of the child welfare process. State agencies are more likely to be involved with African American families than with white families.[255] African American parents are more likely to be investigated than other families, because neighbors, teachers, and bystanders are more likely to report African American families than white families, likely due to their own racial biases.[256]

When equally poor African American and white families are compared, even where the families are considered to be at equal risk for future abuse, state agencies are more likely to remove African American than white children from their families.[257]A 2008 study found that

African American children were 77 percent more likely than similarly-situated white children to be removed from their homes as opposed to receiving in-home services.[258] African American children placed in foster care spend more time there, and are less likely to reunify with their families.[259] All other factors being equal, African American parents are more likely than white parents to have their parental rights terminated.[260]

In 2017, the New York Times published evidence of racist foster care interventions in New York City in which African American mothers not only had their children taken away, but also faced unfair criminal consequences.[261] One African American woman, who remained anonymous in the article, called emergency services when she went into premature labor, but then realized her boyfriend could not be reached unless she walked to his location.[262] She left her six-year-old-daughter alone at her apartment and walked to get her boyfriend, returning 40 minutes later to find emergency services and police.[263] Immediately after giving birth, she was handcuffed and placed under arrest for child endangerment, and both of her children—including her newborn baby—were placed in foster care.[264] Scholars argue that the refusal of some academics to consider the narrative experiences of African American parents facing foster care interventions such as these echo the arguments of the Moynihan Report.[265]

Consequences of Foster Care Disparities

As a group, children in the foster care system are often subjected to harms as a result of the experience. These children are more likely to be African American.[266] For example, Brittany Clark spent 12 years in state care.[267] At age seven, she was placed as the only girl in a long-term home, during which she experienced physical and sexual abuse.[268] After five years, Clark was relocated and spent the remainder of her time in foster care moving from home to home, encountering individuals who cared more about receiving foster care payments than caring for her.[269] This instability, lack of control over circumstances, and repeated loss of connection harms foster children in compounding and lasting ways.[270]

Foster children as a group—in which African American children are greatly overrepresented—demonstrate various long term negative outcomes when compared to children not involved in the foster care system. Compared to youth nationally, children who age out of foster care are less likely to be employed or employed regularly, and earn far less, than young adults who were not in the foster care system.[271] By age 26, only three to four percent of young adults who aged out of foster care earn a college degree.[272] One in five of these youth will experience homelessness after turning 18.[273] Only half will obtain any employment by 24.[274] Over 70 percent of female foster youth will become pregnant by 21, and one in four former foster youth will experience Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder.[275]

Children in foster care are also far more likely to be involved with the criminal justice system. Some children taken from their families are placed in correctional facilities, and within this group, African American children were placed in various penal facilities at rates much higher than white children.[276] Approximately 25 percent of children in foster care will become involved with the criminal justice system within two years of leaving foster care, and over half of youth currently in foster care experience an arrest, conviction, or stay at a correctional facility by the age of 17.[277] For children who have been moved through multiple foster care placements, the risk is even higher, with one study indicating that over 90 percent of foster youth who move five or more times will end up in the juvenile justice system.[278] Foster youth, particularly girls, are targeted by sex traffickers, and the criminalization of sex work can funnel these victims of modern-day slavery into the criminal justice system.[279]

As a result of these severe disadvantages faced by foster youth, some modern scholars have advocated for the abolition of the modern "Child Protective Services" agency, arguing that it is inherently racist and should be replaced with a child protection model that implements policies and procedures designed from the ground-up to exclude racist presumptions.[280]

California

California's Child Welfare system historically exhibited, and continues to exhibit, the same disparities between African American and white families that are discussed above at the national level, generally in even more extreme forms. For example, African American children in California make up approximately 22 percent of the foster population, while only six percent of the general child population.[281] Nationally, these percentages are 24 percent and 15 percent, meaning that, in California, African American children are more than twice as overrepresented in foster care when compared to the national average.[282]

Compared to white children in California, African American children are

2x MORE LIKELY to experience a Child Protective Services Event

A 2015 study ranked California among the five worst states in foster care racial disparities.[283] Some counties in California—both urban and rural—have much higher disparities compared to the statewide average. In San Francisco County, which is largely urban and has nearly 900,000 residents, the percentage of African American children in foster care in 2018 was over 25 times the rate of white children.[284] In Yolo County, which is largely rural and has approximately 200,000 residents, the percentage of African American children in foster care in 2018 was over 8 times the rate of white children.[285] In 2014, Los Angeles County's Commission on Child Protection issued a detailed report noting widespread failures and shortcomings across the county's child welfare system—failures that fall disproportionately on the overrepresented African American population within that system.[286]

Similar to national statistics, a 2003 study showed that, even when normalizing for other relevant factors like poverty, Black children in California are more likely to be removed from their caretakers and placed in foster care than white children.[287] African American children in California are approximately twice as likely as white children to experience a Child Protective Services investigation, and approximately three times as likely to spend some time in foster care or experience a termination in parental rights.[288]

California youth who enter foster care also consistently exhibit various achievement gaps compared to children not involved with foster care, further worsening disparities for African Americans. By age 24, California foster youth who age out of foster care earn less than half what an average 24-year-old earns nationally.[289] Only 53 percent of foster youth in California graduate high school on time, compared with 83 percent of all youth in California.[290]

California has made some recent attempts to address these dramatic disparities between foster youth and those not in the foster system, though little has been done to specifically target the racial disparities discussed above. In September 2021, California Assembly Bill 12 was passed into law, enabling foster youth to remain in care through age 21 as a tool to help increase foster youth college attendance rates and address some of the negative consequences of youth aging out of care at 18 with no sources of support.[291] In July 2021, California lawmakers approved the first ever state-funded plan to guarantee monthly cash payments to youth leaving the foster system.[292] All University of California, California State University, and California Community College campuses now have foster youth programs designed to provide help and support to former foster youth on their campuses.[293] Explicitly addressing the racial disparity in Los Angeles County's foster care system, the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors created an "office of equity" within the agency administering the foster care system.[294] It was created, however, with "no proposed budget or more specific mandates on the office in terms of actual services it will provide."[295]

VII. Criminalization of African American Youth

Black youth are more likely to be exposed to the criminal legal system as a result of racism and over-policing.[296] In recent years, these disparities have often gotten worse.[297] In 2018, while African American youth made up 16 percent of the youth population, the rate of arrest of African American youth was 2.6 times that of white youth, and African American youth accounted for 50 percent of all youth arrests for violent crimes.[298]

Once charged with a crime, African American youth are at risk of harsher prosecution, detention, and punishment.[299] African American youth are transferred to adult

COURTESY OF CHARLOTTE BROOKS/LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Photograph shows children of William and Daisy Myers, the first black residents of Levittown, Pennsylvania riding bicycles on the sidewalk. (1957) court at a much higher rate than white youth. In 2018, while African American youth only accounted for 35 percent of all cases, they made up more than 51 percent of transfers from the juvenile court system to adult court.[300] African American girls are 3.5 times more likely to be incarcerated than their white peers.[301] African American girls also comprise 34 percent of girls in residential placements, but accounted for 15 percent of the female youth population.[302] A 2016 study found that for youth serving life without parole sentences in the United States, twice as many individuals were African American as white.[303]

Law enforcement and other government agencies across America often treat African American youth as adults, or as less than human, in myriad ways. Research confirms that law enforcement often overestimates the age of African American youth when they are suspected of a felony based on contact with police.[304] One study found that Black boys are perceived as older than they are and less innocent than their white peers.[305]

COURTESY OF NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION/NATIONAL ARCHIVES

A photograph taken by the Federal Security Agency. National Youth Administration. The original caption stated: "Oakland, California. High School Youth. Two Negro youngsters look over the shoulders of a couple of fortunate enough to own a model plane. The white boys can hope to become aviators" (1940)

School Policing

In all 50 states, public schools, including elementary schools, employ student resource officers, which often do not go by the title of police.[306] Proponents of school policing have long tied this practice to fears after deadly mass shootings in places like Columbine High School, while some scholars have argued its prevalence is linked to white fear of African American youth under the guise of protecting school children.[307] In either case, over the past several decades the number of law enforcement officers on school campuses throughout the United States has skyrocketed.

In the 2015-16 school year, Black students were arrested at three times the rate of white students, while only comprising 15 percent of the population in schools. This is at least partially explained by findings that Black girls are seen by authorities and teachers as "disobedient" or "disruptive" for similar but accepted behaviors from white children.

In 1975, the number of U.S. schools with police presence on campus was only one percent.[308] By 2016, there were 27,000 school resource officers patrolling U.S. schools, up from about 9,400 in 1997.[309] This equated to sworn officers in approximately 36 percent of elementary schools, 67.6 percent of middle schools, and 72 percent of high schools in the 2017-18 school year.[310] This is at least partially due to a dramatic increase in federal funding for school police.[311] Congress passed the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act in 1994 to increase federal involvement in school policing and safety.[312] The law provided massive federal aid for policing at the state and local level and in schools.[313]

In the 2015-16 school year, African American students were arrested at three times the rate of white students, while only comprising 15 percent of the population in schools.[314] This disparity widens for African American girls, who make up 17 percent of the school population, but are arrested at 3.3 times the rate of white girls.[315] This is at least partially explained by findings that Black girls are seen by authorities and teachers as "disobedient" or "disruptive" for similar but accepted behaviors from white children.[316]

Moreover, schools have historically disciplined clothing trends popular among African American youth, including "sagging," oversized, and baggy clothes.[317] Police played a role in creating a narrative in schools that sagging was a symbol of gang activity, and school officials proceeded to ban sagging as a way to prevent gang violence, graffiti, and create "safe" environments for kids, thereby further targeting African American youth.[318] See Chapter 6, Separate and Unequal Education, for more information on the so-called "school to prison pipeline."

One in five students in the U.S. will develop mental health challenges that rise to the level of a diagnosis.[319] Yet, around the country, schools are more likely to employ law enforcement than mental health counselors, and

African American students are three times more likely than their white peers to have police in their school but no psychologist.[320] African American male youth with disabilities in the 2015-16 school year had an arrest rate of five times the rate of the whole population.[321]

The Juvenile Justice System

Outside of schools, African American youth face disproportionate harms through various aspects of the juvenile justice system. A 2021 study by researchers from the University of California, Berkeley, found that Black youth in the 10 to 14 age group are injured in police-related incidents at 5.3 times the rate for boys, and 6.7 times the rate for girls, compared to their white peers.[322] The study suggested that especially among African American girls, this disparity could be due to how African American girls are "adultified" compared to white girls and perceived of as older.[323] Scholars have noted similar "adultification" of African American boys, who at 10 years old are perceived as less childlike, less innocent, and four and a half years older than their white counterparts.[324] Because of this perception of African American children as older and less innocent, they are seen as more responsible for their actions than white children who engage in the same behaviors.[325] Both Black boys and girls are also perceived as more dangerous than their white peers, though the magnitude of the bias has been shown to be stronger for boys than girls.[326]

More broadly, as discussed in Chapter 11, An Unjust Legal System of this report, African American youth are more than four times as likely to be detained or committed in juvenile facilities as their white peers.[327] Youth who are stopped more frequently by police are more likely to report feelings such as anger, fear, and stigma, and shame.[328] More invasive stops led to increased feelings of emotional distress and trauma, including posttraumatic stress after the stop.[329] Stress among youth involved in police stops is not contingent on whether they were engaging in any misconduct.[330]

The "War on Drugs" in the 1980s and 90s had an outsized impact on African American youth. White youth use drugs at the same or higher rate as African American youth, but African American youth are disproportionately prosecuted though drug cases in juvenile courts.[331] Again, this was largely enabled by the federal government. In 1990, Congress passed legislation authorizing Department of Defense resources to be used to combat drug activity by state and local agencies, including public schools.[332] In 2014, schools in states such as California, Florida, and Texas reported receiving military-grade equipment through the department's program.[333]

African American youth facing mental health problems or crises are also funneled into the juvenile justice system in ways white children facing similar issues are not.[334] Even when African American youth receive mental health treatment instead of or in addition to incarceration, they are more likely to be inappropriately diagnosed and medicated than their white peers.[335]

Once in the juvenile justice system, outreach to families is inadequate.[336] Police and facility outreach to parents is usually limited to notice that their child has an upcoming court appearance, without more information such as why an arrest was made or the circumstances of their child's confinement.[337] The bail system for youth in the criminal legal system is also deeply flawed. Courts rarely consider what a family can actually afford when setting bail, and bail is regularly set between $100 to $500 for children.[338]

White youth use drugs at the same or higher rate as Black youth, but Black youth are more likely to be prosecuted.

California

The issues discussed above apply to California's history and present treatment of African American youth, although there has been some modern pushback to these approaches.

Recent California Attorney General investigations and settlements with California school districts, e.g., the Barstow Unified School District, the Oroville City Elementary School District, and the Oroville Union High School District are all representative of continued targeting of African American youth.[339] Investigations at these districts showed that African American students were more likely to be punished and/or suspended, and were subjected to greater punishments, than similarly-situated peers of other races.[340]

Other districts have taken proactive steps to change outdated approaches. For example, the Oakland school board voted to remove security officers from schools in June 2020.[341] Before this vote, school officer practices were governed by a policy and procedure manual that described them as having a "calming presence" in the school.[342] The manual also included authorization for officers to restrain students, search students and their property, and even detain individuals if they had reason to believe a crime had been committed.[343] All of these powers, and the school police enforcing them, have disproportionate harmful impacts on African American students. California-specific research has determined that schools with larger police presences lead to decreased instruction for African American students, likely because police discipline and monitoring contributes to a climate that is incompatible with learning.[344]

Nevertheless, California still allows law enforcement discretion to add youth over the age of 12 to a gang database as long as two of the following factors—under certain limitations and requirements—are found: admission of gang activity, identification of a gang tattoo, frequent identification in a "gang area," any known association with gang members, clothing associated with a gang, arrest for typical gang activity, or display of gang signals.[345] In California, public defenders and youth advocates estimate that police have tracked children as young as 10 for suspected gang activity.[346]

In one high-profile incident related to the policing of African American children, in May 2019, police in Sacramento chased down an African American 12-year-old child who they claimed was asking people to buy goods he was selling, and forcefully detained him while he was calling for his mom.[347] One police officer covered his face with a mesh sack and forced him on the ground with a knee on his back while an officer put a knee on his thigh.[348]

Although African Americans experience intimate partner violence at greater rates, very little academic or practical attention has been paid towards specific interventions or assistance models that are explicitly catered to Black victims.

VIII. Domestic Violence in African American Families

Domestic violence, also termed intimate partner violence, is a significant problem within African American families and communities across the country, and that problem is linked to many of the issues already discussed in this chapter.

Elevated Rates of Domestic Violence

African American women experience intimate partner violence at greater rates, and in more traumatic ways, than other women on average.[349] The U.S. Department of Justice estimated that, in 2000, African American females experienced intimate partner violence at a rate 35 percent higher than that of white women.[350] In 2007, data indicated that African American women victims of intimate partner violence were twice as likely to be murdered by a spouse and four times as likely to be murdered by an unmarried partner when compared to white women.[351] Even among victims of intimate partner violence, African American women experience more traumatic forms of violence on average as compared to white women.[352] Moreover, African American men also experience elevated rates of intimate partner violence when compared to white men.[353] Similar patterns exist for African American LGBTQ+ victims of both genders, who experience intimate partner violence at greater rates than white LGBTQ+ victims.[354] Despite these disparities, very little academic or practical attention has been paid towards specific interventions or assistance models that are explicitly catered to African American victims.[355]

Causal Factors

The higher rates of domestic violence in African American families cannot be explained by a single cause. Some scholars have noted that, aside from greater rates of poverty, overcrowding, and other domestic violence risk factors experienced by African American families, African American men have experienced systemic racism throughout American history that, when compounded with traditional gender roles, may contribute to displaced anger, hatred, and frustration toward family members.[356] Throughout American history, African American men have been subjected to racial discrimination in employment (as further detailed in Chapter 10, Stolen Labor and Hindered Opportunity) while society simultaneously tells them that their role is to provide for their families.[357] Scholars have argued that these pressures, which are impossible to reconcile, may lead to expressions of physical violence.[358]

Regardless of the causes of domestic violence, African American women are less likely to seek assistance from social services agencies because of distrust based on the racially discriminatory history described earlier in this chapter.[359]

Evidence shows that this distrust is not misplaced. Government actors in social services agencies and the judicial system have unfairly disregarded African American victims as angry "welfare queens" who are immune to violence, or violent themselves.[360] These perceptions are further cemented by media portrayals of African American women as aggressive or emasculating.[361] Similarly, African American women already involved with the justice system are less likely to seek help from police because they expect to be disbelieved, based on the extensive histories of racist government actions in supporting violence against African American women as detailed in Chapters 3, Racial Terror, 11, An Unjust Legal System and 12, Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect.[362] Black female victims of abuse are sometimes reluctant to report abuse by Black men to the "white legal system" even when police intervention is appropriate, given their long exposure to inequities within that system for African Americans.[363] As explained by Cecily Johnson, director of strategic initiatives at the Domestic Violence Network, I have been told personally [by a survivor] they can't get help because they don't want their partner to become a statistic . . . . There's a genuine and legitimate fear that if they call the police, their partner could be killed or they, as the survivor, could be killed.[364]

Black transgender women are similarly hesitant to report abuse to the police because they fear being falsely or illegitimately arrested, are particularly likely to be physically or sexually assaulted in prison,[365] and because they are more than three times as likely to experience police violence compared to non-transgender people.[366]

A lack of understanding of the real and well-founded concerns of Black victims of domestic violence, and the distrust of Black victims of police and social services, has consistently been a major challenge among those tasked with helping victims of intimate partner violence, both within California and nationally.

High-profile instances of violence against transgender women, especially when transgender women defend themselves, legitimize these fears.[367]

A lack of understanding of the real and well-founded concerns of Black victims of domestic violence, and the distrust of Black victims of police and social services, has consistently been a major challenge among those tasked with helping victims of intimate partner violence, both within California and nationally.[368]

California

The patterns discussed above exist in California as well as nationally. California has the largest number of domestic violence survivors in the country, and African American women in California are approximately 25 percent more likely than women generally to experience such violence during their lifetimes.[369] Moreover, a report from Blue Shield of California concluded that "Black women in particular . . . experience a significant resource gap after instances of intimate partner violence."[370] These disparities have likely been exacerbated by the COVID-19 epidemic, with significant majorities of Black Californians surveyed saying that they believe the epidemic and its stay-at-home orders both made domestic violence more likely to occur and made it harder for victims of such violence to reach out for help.[371]

Qualitative studies within California have also confirmed that African American Californians perceive poverty, prior trauma, and systemic racism as root causes of domestic violence in African American families.[372] African American female victims in California are also less likely to seek police assistance because they fear police will falsely believe them to be aggressors and arrest them as well.[373]

IX. Conclusion

The destruction, commodification, and exploitation of the African American family has occurred throughout American history, and enriched both private and government actors for generations of white Americans.

The racist and sexist stereotypes created during enslavement to sustain the cotton economy and enrich the entire nation are woven throughout American laws, policies, and government agencies. These racist beliefs tore apart African American families on the auction block during enslavement, justified re-enslaving children through the apprenticeship system, and underlie the continued removal of African American children from their parents in the foster care system. This reality has rarely been recognized, let alone remedied. To the contrary, in the past half-century government actors have blamed African Americans for the harms that have resulted from racist government actions.

Endnotes

[1] Fuke, Planters, Apprenticeship, and Forced Labor: The Black Family under Pressure in Post-Emancipation Maryland (1988) 62 Ag. Hist. 57, 62-65; section IV, infra.

[2] Robinson, "The Black Family" and US Social Policy: Moynihan's Unintended Legacy?, 97 Revue Française d'études Américaines (2003) 118, 118-128; Baldwin, Stratification of the Welfare Poor: Intersections of Gender, Race, and "Worthiness" in Poverty Discourse and Policy (2010) 6 The Modern American 4; Cooper, Racial Bias in American Foster Care: The National Debate (2013) 97 Marq. L.Rev. 215, 230-233; sections VI & VII, infra; see generally Minoff, Center for the Study of Social Policy, The Racist Roots of Work Requirements (Feb. 2020) (as of Mar. 6, 2022).

[3] Ibid.

[4] Lawrence-Webb, African American Children in the Modern Child Welfare System: A Legacy of the Flemming Rule (1997) 76 Child Welfare 9, 9-21; White, Federally Mandated Destruction of the Black Family: The Adoption and Safe Families Act (2006) 1 Nw. J. L. & Soc. Pol'y 303, 313; Ladner, Mixed Families Adopting Across Racial Boundaries (1978), p. 67; Roberts, Prison, Foster Care, and the Systemic Punishment of Black Mothers (2012) 59 UCLA L. Rev. 1474, 1480–81.

[5] See, e.g., Hockenberry & Puzzanchera, Juvenile Court Statistics 2018, Nat. Center for Juvenile Justice (2020) (as of Jan. 28, 2021).

[6] Douglass, My Bondage and My Freedom (1855), p. 34.

[7] Gates, Jr., How Many Slaves Landed in the U.S., PBS.org (citing Eltis & Richardson, Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade Database) (as of Mar. 6, 2022); Patton, Corporal Punishment in Black Communities: Not an Intrinsic Cultural Tradition but Racial Trauma (Apr. 2017) Am. Psychological Assn. (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[8] See generally Ellis, Lost Lineage: The Quest to Identify African Americans' Roots (Oct. 19, 2021) Wash. Post (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[9] See generally Williams, Help Me to Find My People (2012).

[10] Briggs, Taking Children: A History of American Terror (2020) p. 20.

[11] Id. at p. 19.

[12] Id. at pp. 20, 43.

[13] Lamb, The Peculiar Color of Racial Justice (Jan. 25, 2005) Christian Science Monitor (as of Apr. 11, 2022); see also White, Ar'n't I a Woman? Female Slaves in the Plantation South (New York: W. W. Norton, 1985) pp. 67-68.

[14] See Wiecek, The Statutory Law of Slavery and Race in the Thirteen Mainland, Colonies of British America (1977) 34 Wm. & Mary Q. 258, 262; Morris, Southern Slavery and the Law, 1619-1860 (1996) pp. 43-48.

[15] Act Prohibiting Importation of Slaves of 1807, 2 Stat. 426, ch. 22.

[16] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 13, 2021), Testimony of Dr. Jacqueline Jones (as of Apr. 11, 2022) (Testimony of Dr. Jacqueline Jones); Briggs, supra, at p. 19; see generally Morgan, Laboring Women: Reproduction and Gender in New World Slavery (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2014).

[17] Testimony of Dr. Jacqueline Jones, supra; White, Ar'n't I a Woman? Female Slaves in the Plantation South (New York: W. W. Norton, 1985) pp. 67-68; see generally Rachel A. Feinstein, When Rape was Legal: The Untold History of Sexual Violence During Slavery (New York: Routledge, 2019).

[18] See generally Berry, The Price for their Pound of Flesh: The Value of the Enslaved, from Womb to Grave, in the Building of a Nation (Boston: Beacon Press, 2017).

[19] Ibid.

[20] Foster, "The Sexual Abuse of Black Men under American Slavery." Journal of the History of Sexuality, vol. 20, no. 3, 2011, pp. 445–64, http://www.jstor.org/stable/41305880. Accessed 11 Apr. 2022.

[21] Ibid.; Testimony of Dr. Jacqueline Jones, supra.

[22] Berry, supra, at pp. 10-11.

[23] Id. at pp. 5-6.

[24] Goring, The History of Slave Marriage in the United States (2006) 39 J. Marshall L. Rev. 299, 299, 302-304.

[25] Goodell, The American Slave Code in Theory and Practice: Its Distinctive Features Shown by its Statutes, Judicial Decisions, & Illustrative Facts (1853) p

[26] Goring, supra, at pp. 314-315.

[27] Id. at pp. 303-304.

[28] Ibid.

[29] Howard v. Howard (N.C. 1858) 51 N.C. 235, 240.

[30] State v. Samuel (1836) 19 N.C. 177, 183.

[31] Smith, Freedom's Frontier: California and the Struggle over Unfree Labor, Emancipation, and Reconstruction (University of North Carolina Press, 2013) p. 231.

[32] Id. at pp. 231-32.

[33] Id. at pp. 232-33.

[34] In re Campbell's Estate (1910) 12 Cal.App. 707.

[35] Volpp, American Mestizo: Filipinos and Antimiscegenation Laws in California (2000) 33 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 795, 798.

[36] Viñas-Nelson, Interracial Marriage in "Post-Racial" America (July 2017) Origins (as of Aug. 13, 2021).

[37] Kwon, Interracial Marriages Among Asian Americans in the U.S. West, 1880–1954 (2011) p. 13.

[38] See Wiecek, supra, at p. 262; Morris, supra, at pp. 43-48; Goring, supra, at pp. 303-304.

[39] Viñas-Nelson, supra.

[40] Ibid.

[41] Ibid.

[42] Kennedy, Interracial Intimacies (2003) p. 220.

[43] Ibid.

[44] Id. at 221-22.

[45] Pascoe, What Comes Naturally: Miscegenation Law and the Making of Race in America (2009) pp. 135–136.

[46] McCash, Thomas Cobb and the Codification of Georgia Law (1978) 62 The Georgia Historical Quarterly 9

[47] Briggs, supra, at pp. 25-26.

[48] Morriss, Georgia Code (1861), in Slavery in the United States: A Social, Political, And Historical Encyclopedia (Santa Barbara: ABC-CLIO, 2007) vol. 2, pp. 314-315.

[49] Crew et al., Slave Culture: A Documentary Collection of the Slave Narratives from the Federal Writers' Project (2014) pp. 191. Please see Chapter 12 on Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect for further discussion of the process of birthing and the work demands placed on new mothers.

[50] Id. at p. 193.

[51] Id. at p. 194.

[52] Id. at p. 193

[53] Id. at p. 194.

[54] Steven Mintz, Childhood and Transatlantic Slavery, Children and Youth in History (as of Dec. 8, 2021).

[55] Nat. Park Service, African American Children (as of Aug. 23, 2021).

[56] See generally Gutman, The Black Family in Slavery and Freedom: 1750-1925 (1977).

[57] Tadman, The Hidden History of Slave Trading in Antebellum South Carolina: John Springs III and Other "Gentlemen Dealing in Slaves" (1996) 97 S.C. Hist. Mag. 6, 15.

[58] Holden, Slavery and America's Legacy of Family Separation (July 25, 2018) Black Perspectives (as of Aug. 24, 2021).

[59] Id

[60] Coates, The Case for Reparations (June 2014) The Atlantic (as of Apr. 12, 2022).

[61] Ibid.

[62] Briggs, supra, at p. 18 (quoting Congressional Globe (1864) 28th Congress, 1st Session 1439).

[63] Id. at p. 19.

[64] Id. at pp. 17–28 (noting that slave narratives "dwelt often on the question of child taking").

[65] Briggs, supra, at p.27.

[66] Ibid.

[67] See, e.g., Gutman, supra, at pp. 212-216; Hunter, Bound in Wedlock: Slave and Free Black Marriage in the Nineteenth Century (2017).

[68] Herskovits, The Myth of the Negro Past (1941) pp. 167-186.

[69] Fenton, In A World Not Their Own: The Adoption of Black Children (1993) 10 Harv. Blackletter J. 39, 42.

[70] Rankin, Why They Won't Take the Money: Black Grandparents and the Success of Informal Kinship Care (2002) 10 Elder L. J. 153, 157.

[71] See Holmes, The Extended Family System in the Black Community: A Child-Centered Model for Adoption Policy (1995) 68 Temp. L. Rev. 1649, 1660 (citing, inter alia, Gutman, supra).

[72] Ruggles, The Origins of African-American Family Structure (1994) 59 Am. Sociological Rev. 136, 136.

[73] Du Bois, The Philadelphia Negro (1899); Du Bois, The Negro American Family (1908).

[74] Frazier, Ethnic Family Patterns: The Negro Family in the United States (1932).

[75] Evans, Feminist Theory Today: An Introduction to Second-Wave Feminism (1995) p. 13.

[76] See Craig v. Boren (1976) 429 U.S. 190, 198–99; Beal, Double Jeopardy: To be Black and Female (2008) 8 Meridians 166, 167.

[77] Beal, supra, at p. 167, Jones, Labor of Love, Labor of Sorrow: Black Women, Work and the Family from Slavery to the Present (1985) (hereinafter "Labor of Love") pp. 62-66.

[78] See Testimony of Dr. Jacqueline Jones, supra; Campbell, Making Black Los Angeles: Class, Gender, and Community, 1850-1917 (2016), pp. 39–68.

[79] Campbell, supra.

[80] Hooks, The Will to Change: Men, Masculinity, and Love (2005) pp. 5-10, 18-35.

[81] Ibid.

[82] See generally Smith, et al., Racial Battle Fatigue and the MisEducation of Black Men: Racial Microagressions, Societal Problems, and Environmental Stress (2011) 80 J. of Negro Education 63.

[83] Wingfield, The Modern Mammy and the Angry Black Man (2007) 14 Race, Gender & Class 196, 198-199.

[84] Hooks, supra, at pp. 127-129; see generally Smith, et al., supra.

[85] See, e.g., Jones, Labor of Love, supra, pp. 58-64.

[86] Testimony of Dr. Jacqueline Jones, supra; see generally Kessler-Harris, Out to Work: A History of Wage-Earning Women in the United States (New York: Oxford University Press, 2003); Benson, Counter Cultures: Saleswomen, Managers, and Customers in American Department Stores, 1890-1940 (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986).

[87] Jones, Labor of Love, supra, at p. 64.

[88] Id. at pp. 64-65.

[89] Testimony of Dr. Jacqueline Jones, supra.

[90] Ibid.

[91] Ibid.; Jones, Labor of Love, supra, at p. 59.

[92] Jones, Labor of Love, supra, at p. 59.

[93] Testimony of Dr. Jacqueline Jones, supra; see generally Kessler-Harris, supra; Benson, supra.

[94] Testimony of Dr. Jacqueline Jones, supra; see generally Kessler-Harris, supra; Benson, supra.

[95] Jones, American Work: Four Centuries of Black and White Labor (New York: W. W. Norton, 1998) pp. 222-232.

[96] Ibid.

[97] Ibid.

[98] Stein, Past and Present Proposed Amendments to the United States Constitution Regarding Marriage (2004) 82 Wash. U. L. Q. 611, 628.

[99] Pace v. Alabama (1883) 106 U.S. 583; Stein, supra, at p. 629; Melton, Note, Constitutionality of State Anti-miscegenation Statutes (1951) 5 Southwestern L. J. 452, 453 ("Precedent being established, the state courts uniformly upheld these laws for over half a century until [Perez v. Sharp].").

[100] Stein, supra, at pp. 629–630.

[101] Cruz & Berson, Laws that Banned Mixed Marriages (May 2010) Ferris State University – Jim Crow Museum of Racist Memorabilia (as of Aug. 13, 2021); Stein, supra, at p. 628, fn. 82. In addition, Washington, Kansas, and New Mexico "prohibited interracial marriages when they were territories, but repealed them when they became states." Stein, supra, at p. 628, fn. 82.

[102] Sohoni, Unsuitable Suitors: Anti-Miscegenation Laws, Naturalization Laws, and the Construction of Asian Identities (2007) 41 L. & Soc. Rev. 587, 594; Viñas-Nelson, supra.

[103] Cruz & Berson, supra.

[104] Sohoni, supra, at p. 594.

[105] Kennedy, supra, at p. 2

[106] Ibid.

[107] Ibid.

[108] See Ibid.

[109] Angyal, I Don't Want to be an Excuse for Racist Violence Anymore (June 22, 2015) New Republic (as of Jan. 26, 2022); Hodes, The Sexualization of Reconstruction Politics: White Women and Black Men in the South after the Civil War (1993) 3 J. of the History of Sexuality 402, 408-412, 417.

[110] Hodes, supra, at p. 409.

[111] Id. at pp. 410-411.

[112] Kennedy, supra, at p. 214.

[113] Ibid.

[114] Id. at p. 215.

[115] (1967) 388 U.S. 1.

[116] Fuke, supra, at p. 63.

[117] Burnham, Property, Parenthood, and Peonage: Reflections on the Return to Status Quo Antebellum (1996) 18 Cardozo L. Rev. 433, 437.

[118] See, e.g., Mason, The Farmer's Apprentice: African American Indentures of Apprenticeship in Virginia (May 27, 2020) The Uncommon Wealth: Voices from the Library of Virginia.

[119] Ibid.

[120] Smallwood, Emancipation and the Black Family: A Case Study in Texas (1977) 57 Soc. Sci. Q. 849, 851.

[121] Ibid.

[122] Ibid.

[123] Fuke, supra, at p. 63.

[124] Id. at pp. 62-63, 67, Smallwood, supra, at p. 851.

[125] Testimony of Dr. Jacqueline Jones; California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 13, 2021), Testimony of Dr. Cheryl Grills <https://oag.ca.gov/ab3121/meetings/102021> (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[126] See Burnham, supra, at p. 436.

[127] Id. at pp. 439-448.

[128] Fuke, supra, at pp. 63-64.

[129] Farmer-Kaiser, Freedwomen and the Freedmen's Bureau: Race, Gender, and Public Policy in the Age of Emancipation (2010) p. 106.

[130] Weaver, The Changing Tides of Adoption: Why Marriage, Race, and Family Identity Still Matter (2018) 71 SMU L. Rev. 159, 168; Gutman, supra, at pp. 402-410.

[131] In re Turner (C.C.D. Md. 1867) 24 F.Cas. 337, 339.

[132] Ibid.

[133] Ibid.

[134] Burnham, supra, at pp. 439-440.

[135] In re Turner, supra, at p. 339.

[136] Ibid.

[137] Burnham, supra, at pp. 442-443.

[138] Fuke, supra, at p. 63.

[139] See, e.g., Burnham, supra, at p. 439.

[140] Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, 29 U.S.C. §§ 203, 213(1940).

[141] Testimony of Rebecca Dixon, National Employment Law Project, From Excluded to Essential: Tracing the Racist Exclusion of Farmworkers, Domestic Workers, and Tipped Workers from the Fair Labor Standards Act, Hearing before the U.S. House of Representatives Education and Labor Committee, Workforce Protections Subcommittee (May 3, 2021) (as of Apr. 12, 2022).

[142] See generally Gregory, The Southern Diaspora: How the Great Migrations of Black and White Southerners Transformed America (2005).

[143] Tolney, The Great Migration and Changes in the Northern Black Family, 1940 to 1990 (1997) 75 Social Forces 1213, 1213-1214.

[144] See, e.g., Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns (2010) pp. 6, 240-241.

[145] Tolney, supra, at pp. 1221-1232.

[146] Id. at p. 1232.

[147] Pascoe, supra, at p. 193.

[148] Stats. 1850, ch. 140, § 3, page 424. The act, "An Act regulating marriages," is actually older than the state itself: it passed on April 22, 1850, just over four months before California was granted official statehood.

[149] Ibid.

[150] Volpp, supra, at p. 822; Pascoe, supra, at p. 93.

[151] Pascoe, supra, at p. 195.

[152] Perez v. Sharp (1948) 32 Cal.2d 711.

[153] Pascoe, supra, at p. 217.

[154] Volpp, supra, at p. 824

[155] Ibid.; Pascoe, supra, at p. 242.

[156] Daniel Moynihan, Office of Policy Planning and Research, United States Department of Labor, The Negro Family: The Case for National Action (1965) (hereinafter, "Moynihan Report").

[157] Ibid.

[158] Ibid.

[159] Ibid.

[160] Ibid.; Geary, The Moynihan Report: An Annotated Edition, The Atlantic (Sept. 14, 2015).

[161] Moynihan Report, supra, at p. 47.

[162] Geary, supra; see also Weaver, African-American Grandmothers: Does the Gender-Entrapment Theory Apply? Essay Response to Professor Beth Richie (2011) 37 Wash. U. J.L. & Pol'y 153, 161 (hereinafter "Weaver 2011"); Robinson, supra.

[163] Moynihan Report, supra, at p. 3.

[164] Id. at p. 29.

[165] See Ibid.; Waters, Some Core Themes of Black Feminism, in Black Women's Intellectual Traditions: Speaking Their Minds (Kristin Waters & Carol B. Conaway eds., 2007) p. 377.

[166] Geary, supra.

[167] Ibid.

[168] Geary, Moynihan's Anti-Feminism (July 1, 2015) Jacobin Magazine (as of Apr. 13, 2022).

[169] Franklin, Ensuring Inequality: The Structural Transformation of the African-American Family (1997) p. 39.

[170] Du Bois (1908), supra, at p. 36.

[171] Franklin, supra, at p. 138.

[172] Ibid.

[173] Ibid.

[174] Coates, supra.; see generally Hill, The Strengths of Black Families (1972).

[175] Geary, supra.

[176] Ibid.

[177] Coates, supra.

[178] Ibid.

[179] Randolph & Rustin, A Freedom Budget for All Americans (Annotated) (Feb. 2018) The Atlantic (as of Apr. 13, 2022).

[180] Coates, supra.

[181] Randolph & Rustin, supra.

[182] See, e.g., Ryan, Blaming the Victim (Vintage Books 1976) p. xii; Peller, The Moynihan Report, Self-Help, and Black Power (2016) 8 Geo. J.L. & Mod. Critical Race Persp. 39, 41.

[183] Weaver 2011, supra, at p. 161.

[184] Geary, supra.

[185] See Ibid.

[186] Ibid.

[187] Chow & Bates, As Da 5 Bloods Hits Netflix, Black Vietnam Veterans Recall the Real Injustices They Faced During and After the War (June 12, 2020) Time Magazine.

[188] Geary, supra.

[189] Robinson, supra.

[190] Ibid. (citing Murray, Losing Ground (1984)); Murray, The Bell Curve: Intelligence and Class Structure in American Life (1994); see Jacoby & Glauberman, The Bell Curve Debate (1995) (accumulating critical studies undermining the central premises of "The Bell Curve"); Geary, supra.

[191] See, e.g., Steinberg, The Moynihan Report at Fifty (June 24, 2015) Boston Review (as of Apr. 13, 2022).

[192] McMillian, From Loving Mother to Welfare Queen to Drug Addict? Lebron v. Secretary of Florida Department of Children and Families and the Evolving Public View of the Poor as a Class of Sub-Humans with Sub-Rights (2016) 35 Miss. C. L. Rev. 197, 210–211.

[193] Ibid. (noting that then-Senator Moynihan was adamantly opposed to the elimination of the modern federal welfare program in 1996); Robinson, supra; Baldwin, Stratification of the Welfare Poor: Intersections of Gender, Race, and "Worthiness" in Poverty Discourse and Policy (2010) 6 The Modern American 3, 9; Minoff, supr

[194] Floyd et al., TANF Policies Reflect Racist Legacy of Cash Assistance (Aug. 4, 2021) Ctr. on Budget & Pol'y Priorities, p. 10.

[195] Id. at pp. 10-11.

[196] Sribnick & Johnsen, The Historical Perspective: Mothers' Pensions (2012) Institute for Children, Poverty & Homelessness, p. 29.

[197] Moehling, Mother's Pensions and Female Headship (2002) Yale University, pp. 12-18, 31 table 9 (analyzing data from Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia).

[198] Ibid. at pp. 2-3, 12-18.

[199] Testimony of Dr. Jacqueline Jones, supra; Jones, Labor of Love, pp. 163-194.

[200] Moehling, supra, at pp. 12-18, 31 table 9.

[201] Ibid.

[202] Gallo, Marrying Poor: Women's Citizenship, Race, and TANF Policies (2012) 19 UCLA Women's L.J. 61, 80.

[203] See Moehling, supra, at p. 17.

[204] Handler & Hasenfeld, The Moral Construction of Poverty: Welfare Reform in America (1991) p. 70.

[205] Briggs, supra, at p. 31.

[206] Ibid.

[207] Moehling, supra, at p. 7.

[208] Floyd et al., supra, at p. 10.

[209] Title IV, Social Security Act, Pub. L. No. 74-271 (1935) 49 Stat. 620.

[210] Lawrence-Webb, supra, at p. 11.

[211] Id. at pp. 11-12.

[212] Ibid.

[213] Id. at pp. 20-21.

[214] See Ibid.

[215] See, e.g., Burnham, supra, at p. 439.

[216] Briggs, supra, at p. 38.

[217] Ibid.

[218] Ibid.

[219] Ibid.; see also Ards et al., Racialized Perceptions and Child Neglect (2012) 34 Child Youth Serv Rev. 1480.

[220] Pub. L. No. 104-193 (1996) (Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996).

[221] Ibid.

[222] Ibid.

[223] Floyd et al., supra, at pp. 29-31.

[224] Ibid. at p. 32.

[225] Hinton et al., An Unjust Burden: The Disparate Treatment of African Americans in the Criminal Justice System (2018) Vera Institute of Justice, p. 6.

[226] Ibid.

[227] Floyd et al., supra, at p. 31.

[228] Id. at p. 32.

[229] Id. at p. 33.

[230] Id. at pp. 29-33.

[231] See Moehling, supra, at p. 17.

[232] Floyd et al., supra, at p. 20; Turner, Reagan Cuts $503-Million From the Budget Passed by California Legislature (July 4, 1971) N.Y. Times (as of Mar., 7, 2022).

[233] See Congressional Resource Service, The Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) Block Grant: Responses to Frequently Asked Questions (Dec. 14, 20201), Appendix B-1 (as of Mar. 8, 2022); see also Azevedo-McCaffrey & Safawi, To Promote Equity, States Should Invest More TANF Dollars in Basic Assistance (Jan. 12, 2022) Center on Budget and Priorities (as of Mar. 7, 2022) (noting that "states only spend a little over one-fifth of their combined federal and state TANF dollars on basic assistance").

[234] Compare Center on Budget and Priorities, California TANF Spending (as of Mar. 7, 2022) with Center on Budget and Priorities, California TANF Spending Factsheet (as of Mar. 7, 2022).

[235] Azevedo-McCaffrey & Safawi, supra.

[236] Children's Bureau, Child Welfare Practice to Address Racial Disproportionality and Disparity (Apr. 2021) U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Services, pp. 2-3.

[237] Cooper, Racial Bias in American Foster Care: The National Debate (2013) 97 Marq. L.Rev. 215, 230; Sedlak & Broadhurst, Third National Incidence Study of Child Abuse and Neglect: Final Report (1996) U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Services, Administration for Children and Families, p. 8–7; see generally Dettlaff et al., It Is Not a Broken System, It Is a System That Needs to Be Broken: The UpEND Movement to Abolish the Child Welfare System (2020) 14 J. of Public Child Welfare 500 (hereinafter "Dettlaff et al. 2020").

[238] Dettlaff et al. 2020, supra (quoting congressionally-mandated national incidence study of 1996).

[239] Sedlak et al. Supplementary Analyses of Race Differences in Child Maltreatment Rates in the NIS-4 (Mar. 2010) U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Services, Administration for Children and Families, p. 1; Sedlak, et al., Fourth National Incidence Study of Child Abuse and Neglect (NIS–4): Report to Congress (Jan. 2010) U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Services, Administration for Children and Families, pp. 9-10, 20-21; see generally Bartholet, Race & Child Welfare: Disproportionality, Disparity, Discrimination: Re-assessing the Facts, Re-thinking the Policy Options (July 2011) Harvard Law School Child Advocacy Program.

[240] White, Federally Mandated Destruction of the Black Family: The Adoption and Safe Families Act (2006) 1 Nw. J. L. & Soc. Pol'y 303, 305; Ladner, Mixed Families: Adopting Across Racial Boundaries (1978) p. 67.

[241] Hogan & Siu, Minority Children and the Child Welfare System: An Historical Perspective (1988) 33 Soc. Work 493, 493.

[242] Id. at p. 494.

[243] Ramey, Child Care in Blackn and White (2012) pp. 159–161.

[244] See Billingsley & Giovannoni, Children of the Storm (1972) pp. 132–134.

[245] White, supra, at p. 305; Landner, supra, at pp. 67-68.

[246] Ibid.

[247] Fenton, In a World Not Their Own: The Adoption of Black Children (1993) 10 Harv. Black Letter J. 39, 42.

[248] Roberts, Shattered Bonds: The Color of Child Welfare (Basic Civitas Books, 2002), p.

[249] Ibid.

[250] Lawrence-Webb, supra.

[251] Roberts, Prison, Foster Care, and the Systemic Punishment of Black Mothers (2012) 59 UCLA L. Rev. 1474, 1480–1481.

[252] Ibid.

[253] See Ibid.

[254] Oversight on the Implementation of the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978, Hearing before Sen. Select Com. on Indian Affairs, 98th Cong., 2d Sess., at pp. 35–36 (Apr. 25, 1984).

[255] Id.

[256] Dettlaff, et al. 2020, supra; Children's Bureau, supra, pp 2-3.

[257] Dettlaff, et al., Disentangling Substantiation: The Influence of Race, Income, and Risk on the Substantiation Decision in Child Welfare (2011) 33 Children and Youth Services Review 1630, 1634–1635; Miller, Racial Disproportionality in Washington State's Child Welfare System (June 2008) Washington State Institute for Public Policy; Rivaux et al., The Intersection of Race, Poverty, and Risk: Understanding the Decision to Provide Services to Clients and to Remove Children (2008) 87 Child Welfare 151, 151–152.

[258] Rivaux, supra, at pp. 161-162.

[259] Children's Bureau, supra, pp.

[260] Ibid.

[261] Clifford & Silver-Greenberg, Foster Care as Punishment: The New Reality of 'Jane Crow' (July 21, 2017) N.Y. Times.

[262] Ibid.

[263] Ibid.

[264] Ibid..

[265] Dettlaff et al. 2020, supra.

[266] Children's Bureau, supra, at pp. 2-3; Cooper, supra.

[267] Clark, My Experiences in Foster Care, Children's Rights (May 24, 2015) (as of Mar. 9, 2022).

[268] Ibid.

[269] Ibid.

[270] Williams-Mbengue, The Social and Emotional Well-Being of Children in Foster Care (May 9, 2016) Nat. Conference of State Legislatures, p. 2.

[271] Urban Inst., Coming of Age: Employment Outcomes for Youth Who Age Out of Foster Care Through Their Middle Twenties (2008) p. 28.

[272] Squiers, Aging Out of Foster Care: 18 and On Your Own (Mar. 30, 2017) Shared Justice (as of Aug. 24, 2021).

[273] Ibid.

[274] Ibid.

[275] Ibid.

[276] Billingsley & Giovannoni, supra, at p. 88.

[277] Palcheck, Child Welfare and the Criminal System: Impact, Overlap, Potential Solutions (Mar. 24, 2021), Georgetown J. on Poverty L. & Pol'y (as of Aug. 25, 2021).

[278] Ibid.

[279] Anspach, The Foster Care to Prison Pipeline: What It Is and How It Works (May 25, 2018), TeenVogue (as of Aug. 25, 2021).

[280] E.g., Dettlaff et al., supra, at pp. 500–517.

[281] KidsData, Children in Foster Care, by Race/Ethnicity (2018) (as of Aug. 27, 2021).

[282] Compare Ibid. with Children's Bureau, supra, pp. 2-3.

[283] Tiano, Los Angeles' Plan to Address the Overrepresentation of Black and LGBTQ Youth in Foster Care (May 22, 2019) The Imprint (as of Aug. 25, 2021).

[284] KidsData, supra.

[285] Ibid.

[286] Los Angeles County Blue Ribbon Com. on Child Protection, The Road to Safety for our Children (Apr. 18, 2014) (as of Apr. 15, 2022).

[287] Needell et al., Black Children and Foster Care Placement in California (2003) 25 Children & Youth Servs. Rev. 393, 405.

[288] Lurie, Child Protective Services Investigates Half of All Black Children in California (Apr. 26, 2021) Mother Jones (as of Aug. 27, 2021).

[289] Urban Inst., supra, at p. 8.

[290] Children's L. Ctr., Foster Care Facts (as of Aug. 27, 2021) (as of Apr. 15, 2022).

[291] Leecia Welch, California's AB 12: Historic Step Toward Helping Foster Youth Attend College, But Much Work Ahead (July 1, 2012) Nat. Center for Youth Law (as of Nov. 9, 2021).

[292] Beam, California Approves 1st State-funded Guaranteed Income for Former Foster Youth (July 15, 2021) Youth Today (as of Aug. 19, 2021).

[293] Univ. of Cal., Current and Former Foster Youth (as of Nov. 9, 2021); Cal. State Univ., Resources for Foster Youth (as of Aug. 24, 2021); Cal. Comm. Colleges, Foster Youth Success Initiatives (as of Nov. 9, 2021).

[294] Tiano, supra.

[295] Ibid.

[296] Henning, The Rage of Innocence: How America Criminalizes Black Youth (Pantheon Books 2021) p. xv; U.S. Dept. of Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, Statistical Briefing Book: Juvenile Arrest Rates by Race, 1980-2019 (2019) (as of Apr. 15, 2022); Puzzanchera, Juvenile Arrests, 2018 (June 2020) U..S. Dept. of Justice, Juvenile Justice Statistics National Report Series Bulletin (as of Apr. 15, 2022).

[297] Nat'l Council of Juvenile & Family Ct. Judges, Addressing Bias in Delinquency and Child Welfare Systems (2018) 1.

[298] Henning, supra, at p. xvi; Puzzanchera, supra, at p. 8.

[299] Henning, supra, at p. xvi.

[300] Ibid.

[301] Id. at p. 105; Fact Sheet: Incarcerated Women and Girls, Sentencing Project, June 2019 (as of Apr. 15, 2022).

[302] Henning, supra, at p. 105.

[303] Id. at p. 246.

[304] Id. at p. 29.

[305] Goff et al., The Essence of Innocence: Consequences of Dehumanizing Black Children (2014) 106 J. of Personality and Social Psychology 526, 526–545.

[306] Henning, supra, at p. 123.

[307] Id. at p. 127.

[308] Id. at p. 124.

[309] Ibid.

[310] Ibid.

[311] See id. at p. 130.

[312] Ibid.; Gun-Free Schools Act of 1994, 20 U.S.C. §§ 8921-8923 (1994); Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act, Pub. L 103-322, 108 Stat. 1796 (1994); Office of Community Oriented Policing Services, Ab

[313] Henning, supra, at p. 124.

[314] Id. at p. 132.

[315] Ibid.

[316] U.S. Government Accountability Office (Mar. 22, 2018) K-12 Education: Discipline Disparities for Black Students, Boys and Students with Disabilities (as of Apr. 15, 2022).

[317] Henning, supra, at p. 53.

[318] Id. at p. 52.

[319] Id. at p. 137

[320] Id. at p. 138

[321] Ibid.

[322] Shivaram, Black Kids In California More Likely To Be Hospitalized For Police-Related Injuries (Sept. 9, 2021) NPR (as of Apr. 15, 2022); Farkas et al., Injuries to Children and Adolescents by Law Enforcement: An Analysis of California Emergency Department Visits and Hospitalizations, 2005-2017 (2021) 176 JAMA Pediatrics 89, 89.

[323] Ibid.

[324] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Jan. 28, 2022), Testimony of Dr. Howard Stevenson (as of Apr. 15, 2022).

[325] Goff et al., supra.

[326] Thiem, et al., Are Black Women and Girls Associated With Danger? Implicit Racial Bias at the Intersection of Target Age and Gender (2019) 45 Personality and Social Psychology Bulletin 1427, 1427–1439.

[327] See, e.g., Hockenberry & Puzzanchera, supra, at pp. 21, 26-27.

[328] Henning, supra, at p. 214.

[329] Ibid.

[330] Ibid.

[331] Id. at p. 14; Hockenberry & Puzzanchera, supra, at p. 24.

[332] Henning, supra, at pp. 124-125.

[333] Id.

[334] Marrast et al.,. Racial and Ethnic Disparities in Mental Health Care for Children and Young Adults: A National Study (2016) 46 Internat. J. of Health Services 810, 810-824.

[335] Cancio et al., The Color of Justice: The Landscape of Traumatic Justice: Youth of Color in Conflict with the Law (2019) The Alliance of Nat. Psychological Assns. For Racial and Ethnic Equity, p. 17.

[336] Henning, supra, at p. 247.

[337] Ibid.

[338] Id. at p. 275.

[339] Cal. Dept. of Justice, Attorney General Becerra Secures Settlements with Barstow and Oroville School Districts to Address Discriminatory Treatment of Students Based on Race and Disability Status (Aug. 25, 2020) (as of Apr. 15, 2022).

[340] Ibid.

[341] Henning, supra, at p. 134.

[342] Ibid.; Wilson & Godown, School Security Officer Policy and Procedures Manual (June 29, 2016) Oakland School District.

[343] Henning, supra, at p. 134.

[344] Id. at p. 141; Losen & Martinez, Is California Doing Enough to Close the School Discipline Gap? (Los Angeles: Civil Rights Project, 2020); Losen & Martinez, Lost Opportunities: How Disparate School Discipline Continues to Drive Differences in the Opportunity to Learn (Los Angeles: Civil Rights Project, 2020), pp. 33–34; Fisher & Hennessy, School Resource Officers and Exclusionary Discipline in U.S. High Schools: A Systematic Review and Meta-analysis (Aug. 2016) Adolescent Research Review 1, no. 3; Weisburst, Patrolling Public Schools: The Impact of Funding for School Police on Student Discipline and Long-term Education Outcomes (2019) Journal of Policy Analysis and Management, Vol. 38 (2), pp. 338-365.

[345] Henning, supra, at p. 78.

[346] Id. at p. 79.

[347] Id. at p. 220

[348] Id.

[349] Taft et al., Intimate Partner Violence Against African American Women: An Examination of the Socio-Cultural Context (2019) 14 Aggression and Violent Behavior 50, 50-58.

[350] Rennison & Welchans, Intimate Partner Violence (Sept. 2009) U.S. Dept. of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics, p. 3.

[351] Catalano & Snyder, Female Victims of Violence (Jan. 2014) Violence Policy Center (as of Mar. 10, 2022).

[352] Seng et al., Disparity in Posttraumatic Stress Disorder Diagnosis among African American Pregnant Women (2011) 14 Archives of Women's Mental Health 295, 295-306.

[353] Palmetto et al., Predictors of Physical Intimate Partner Violence in the Lives of Young Women: Victimization, Perpetration, and Bidirectional Violence (2013) 28 Violence and Victims 103, 103-121; Langhinrichsen-Rohling et al., Rates of Bi-directional versus Uni-directional Intimate Partner Violence across Samples, Sexual Orientations, and Race/Ethnicities: A Comprehensive Review (2012) 3 Partner Abuse 199, 199–230.

[354] See generally Nat. Coalition Against Domestic Violence, Domestic Violence and the LGBTQ Community (June 6, 2018) (as of Mar. 10, 2022); Waters, Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, Queer, and HIV-Affected Intimate Partner Violence in 2015 (2016) Nat. Coalition of Anti-Violence Programs (as of Mar. 10, 2022).

[355] Jones & Thorpe, Domestic Violence and the Impacts on African American Women: A Brief Overview on Race, Class, and Root Causes in the United States (2016) 7 OMNES : The J. of Multicultural Society 22, 22-36 (as of Mar. 10, 2022).

[356] See generally, e.g., Hampton et al., Domestic Violence in the African-American Community (2009) 9 Violence Against Women 533, 539; Blassingame, The Slave Community (Oxford University Press 1972); Levine, Black Culture and Black Consciousness (Oxford University Press 1977).

[357] Hampton et al., supra, at p. 539; see generally Madhubuti, Black Men—Single, Dangerous, and Obsolete (Third World Press 1990); Staples, Black Masculinity: The Black Man's Role in American Society (Black Scholar Press 1982).

[358] Hampton et al., supra, at p. 539; see generally Madhubuti, Black Men—Single, Dangerous, and Obsolete (Third World Press 1990); Staples, Black Masculinity: The Black Man's Role in American Society (Black Scholar Press 1982).

[359] Sumter, Domestic Violence and Diversity: A Call for Multicultural Services (2006) 29 J. of Health and Human Services Administration 173, 175-176, 178-179.

[360] Sokoloff & Dupont, Domestic Violence at the Intersections of Race, Class, and Gender Challenges: Contributions to Understanding Violence against Marginalized Women in Diverse Communities (2005) 11 Violence against Women 38, 38-64.

[361] Young et al., Does African American Women's Racial Identity Mediate Gendered Racism on Anticipated Relationship Threat? (2021) 36 J. of Interpersonal Violence 9749, 9752.

[362] See, e.g., Carbone-Lopez et al., "Police Wouldn't Give You No Help" Female Offenders on Reporting Sexual Assault to Police (2015) 22 Violence against Women 1, 1-31.

[363] Manetta, Interpersonal Violence and Suicidal Behavior in Midlife African American Women (1999) 29 J. of Black Studies 510, 518; see generally Richie, Arrested Justice: Black Women, Violence, and America's Prison Nation (New York University Press 2012).

[364] Coburn Place, A Layered Look at Domestic Violence in the Black Community (as of Mar. 10, 2022).

[365] Harrison-Quintana et al., Injustice at Every Turn: A Look at Black Respondents in the National Transgender Discrimination Survey (as of Mar. 10, 2022).

[366] Nat. Coalition of Anti-Violence Programs, National Report on Hate Violence Against Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, Queer and HIV-Affected Communities Released Today (May 29, 2014) (as of Mar. 10, 2022).

[367] See, e.g., Finoh & Sankofa, The Legal System Has Failed Black Girls, Women, and Non-Binary Survivors of Violence (Jan. 28, 2019) Am. Civil Liberties Union (as of Mar. 10, 2022).

[368] Asbury, African-American Women in Violent Relationships: An Exploration of Cultural Differences, in Hampton, Violence in the Black Family: Correlates and Consequences (1987) pp. 86-106; Hampton & Yung, Violence in Communities of Color: Where We Were, Where We Are, and Where We Need to Be, in Jenkins & Gullotta, Preventing Violence in America (1996) pp. 53-86.

[369] Blue Shield of California Foundation Perceptions of Domestic Violence in California's African American Communities: Roots, Prevalence and Resources (Feb. 2019), p. 11 (as of Apr. 15, 2022) (hereinafter "Blue Shield of California Foundation 2019").

[370] Id. at p. 12.

[371] Blue Shield of California Foundation, Key Insights into the Experiences of Black Californians from a Statewide Survey about COVID-19, Equity, and Domestic Violence (Apr. 2021) (as of Mar. 25, 2022).

[372] Blue Shield of California Foundation 2019, supra, at p. 17.

[373] Id. at p. 20.

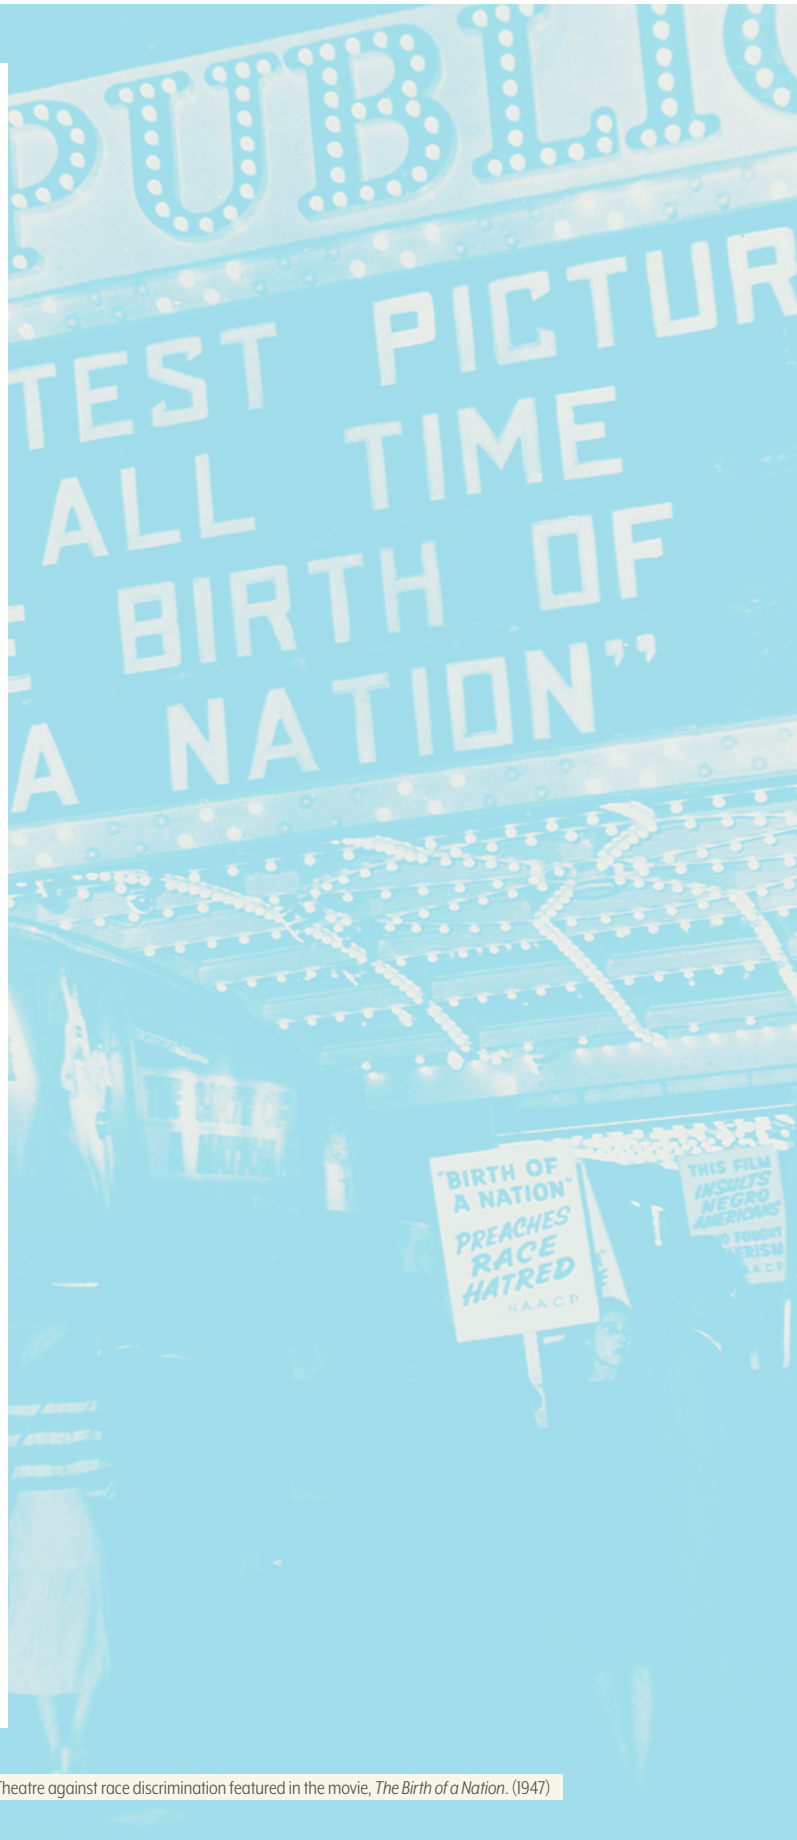
CHAPTER 9 Control Over Creative, Cultural, & Intellectual Life

COURTESY OF PHOTO BY LIBRARY OF CONGRESS/CORBIS/VCG VIA GETTY IMAGES



People picketing under the marquee of the Republic Movie Theatre against race discrimination featured in the movie, The Birth of a Nation. (1947)

I. Introduction

At its inception, the United States created a series of laws and policies that denied African Americans the ability to create and own art and engage in sports and leisure activities.[1] During the period of enslavement, state governments controlled and dictated the forms and content of African American artistic and cultural production.[2] Following the end of the enslavement period, governments and politicians embraced minstrelsy, which was the popular racist and stereotypical depiction of African Americans through song, dance, and film.[3] Government support of minstrelsy, which was enormously profitable, encouraged white Americans to laugh at, disregard, and reimagine the enslavement of African Americans as harmless and entertaining.[4]

Federal and state governments failed to protect African American artists, culture-makers, and media-makers from discrimination and simultaneously promoted discriminatory narratives. State governments forced African American artists to perform in segregated venues.[5] The federal government actively discriminated against African Americans during wars, and projected a false image of respect for African American soldiers in propaganda.[6] Federal and state governments allowed white Americans to steal African American art and culture with impunity—depriving African American creators of valuable copyright and patent protections.[7] State governments encouraged segregation and discrimination against African American athletes.[8] State governments denied African American entrepreneurs and culture-makers access to leisure sites, business licenses, and funding for leisure activities.[9] State governments memorialized the Confederacy as just and heroic through monument building, while suppressing the nation's actual history.[10] States censored cinematic depictions of discrimination against and integration of African American people into white society.[11] Today, African American artists, culture-makers, presenters, and entrepreneurs must contend with the legacy of enslavement and racial discrimination as they attempt to pursue creative endeavors that empower and uplift African American communities.

Section III describes discrimination against African American artists. Section IV discusses the anti-Black narratives in American culture. Sections V and VI discuss government censorship and deprivation of intellectual property. Sections VII and VIII discuss discrimination against African American athletes and restraints on recreation by African Americans.

II. Discrimination Against African American Artists and Culture

African American artists have faced intense discrimination and restriction in the United States since the era of slavery. During the period of enslavement, enslaved people faced legal restrictions from many state governments while creating arts, crafts, and engaging in education.[12] Many enslaved people were highly talented craftspeople and artists, including seamstresses and tailors, blacksmiths, woodcutters, and musicians of all types.[13] They fabricated architectural materials, furnishings, musical instruments, such as banjos, and handicrafts, like baskets and rugs.[14] Free African American artists did engage in self-expression during the period of enslavement, however they had to rely on outside resources or wealthy white patrons to support their careers.[15]

Many enslaved people were highly talented craftspeople and artists, including seamstresses and tailors, blacksmiths, woodcutters, and musicians of all types.

Many white enslavers were suspicious of the subversive potential of African American art.[16] After 1730, South Carolina outlawed dancing, drumming, and playing loud instruments by enslaved people for fear that it would incite rebellions—other states enacted similar laws.[17] Concerned that literate enslaved people would incite insurrections, some southern enslavers banned enslaved people from learning to read or write.[18] Enslaved people who were not allowed to read or write, instead, developed traditions of song and dance to pass along subversive messages and resist slavery—and to share routes for escape.[19] Enslaved people created music during the period of enslavement, but they could not capitalize on their creative efforts the way that white people could.[20] Yet, through work songs, call and response, cries, and hollering, enslaved people coordinated labor, communicated with one another, and commented on the oppression they suffered.[21]

African American artists were subject to segregation by custom and by law, enforced by state and local governments.[22] African American musicians were forced to join segregated local chapters of professional musician associations, which were segregated due to racism in the music industry.[23] They were prohibited from employment in city symphonies, radio stations, and clubs outside of segregated African American neighborhoods—due to racist employers, unions, and police enforcement of segregation.[24] Concert venues were often segregated due to racist customs.[25]

African American musicians were subject to arbitrary, racist rules.[26] They could not make eye contact with white Americans who were usually standing right in front of the stage, while African Americans were confined to balconies.[27] African American musicians also could not stay at many hotels, were banned from restaurants, and were often served rotten food at others.[28] Such customs were enforced by state and local police.[29] African American artists who challenged segregation were met with violence—for example, a musician in Georgia was brutally beaten for refusing to say "sir" in response to a white man's question at a concert in 1951.[30] African American artists were driven from white towns in the south, barred from performing, and chased by white people brandishing guns.[31] An interracial all-woman jazz group performed at some integrated concerts, but were occasionally turned away and even jailed.[32] Consequently, governments failed to investigate or prosecute racist violence against African American artists.

African American sacred spirituals, hymns, gospel music, and freedom songs deeply influenced 20th-century American popular music.[33] Many acclaimed and influential American musical artists began their careers in African American church choirs.[34] African American churches birthed gospel music—sound rooted in spirituals sung during slavery, integrated with chanting, clapping, and group participation.[35] Gospel choirs began broadcasting on public radio stations and church memberships grew to thousands.[36] Much of the music of the civil rights movement was inspired by gospel and congregational hymns.[37]

Despite creating and innovating styles of music, such as blues, gospel, rhythm and blues, soul, jazz, rock and roll, and disco, African American musicians and artists suffered from limited opportunities for financial success.[38] White artists appropriated and profited from African American music.[39] For example, under the 1909 copyright act, a record could be covered only after obtaining a license from the original artist.[40] However, many African American musicians' contracts robbed them of these copyright protections.[41] This led to a licensing regime that prevented African American musicians from gaining financial success.[42] African American musicians recorded music on "race records," which were played on segregated radio stations and marketed only to African Americans.[43] During the 1920s and 1930s, African American musicians were subjected to contracts where the copyright for their work would be assigned to their employer, while being paid less than white musicians who had similar contracts.[44] For example, Elvis Presley imitated African American blues and R&B singers, and due to these exploitative contracts, the original song creators whose work he appropriated were not even paid for the use of their music.[45] One of Elvis' hit songs, "That's All Right Mama," was originally written and recorded by Arthur Crudup, an African American man who was paid so little for his recordings that he had to work as a laborer selling sweet potatoes.[46] This type of appropriation was so pervasive that many Americans did not understand that these art forms were invented by African American artists.[47] The federal government neglected to take action to protect African American artists from financial exploitation.

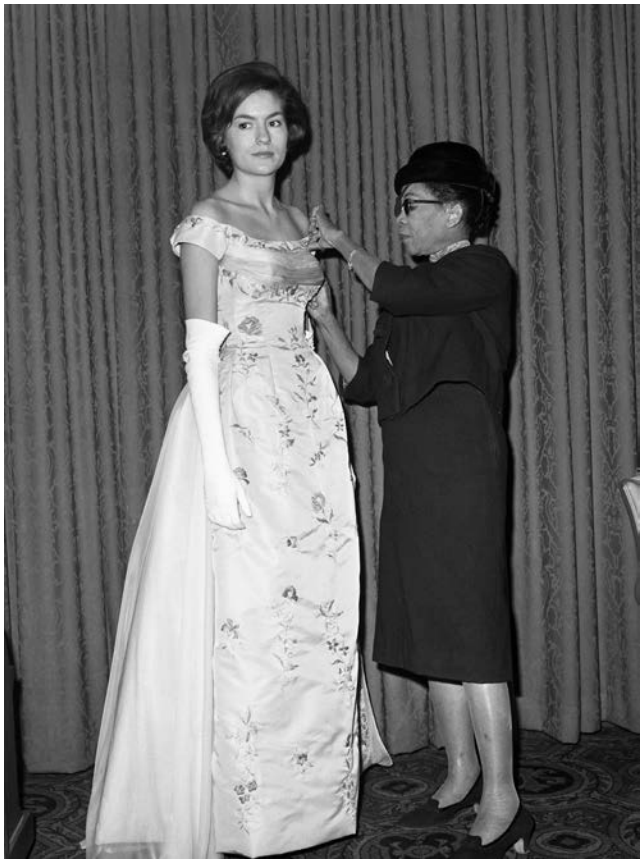
Many white enslavers were suspicious of the subversive potential of Black art. After 1730, South Carolina outlawed dancing, drumming, and playing loud instruments by enslaved people for fear that it would incite rebellions—other states enacted similar laws.

COURTESY OF BETTMANN ARCHIVE VIA GETTY IMAGES



Black fashion designer, Ann Lowe, adjusting the bodice of a gown she designed, worn by Alice Baker. (1962)

African Americans have historically been discriminated against by governments and employers for their fashion, hair, and appearance through criminalization and fines.[48] The United States Army did not allow African Americans to wear their hair in locs (locks, dreads, or dreadlocks) until 2017.[49] African American women in the army had been forced to straighten their hair with chemicals or hot irons, wear expensive and uncomfortable wigs, or cut their hair off to abide by the army's hair regulations.[50] Many states passed laws that prohibited sagging clothes in public places, and instituted a significant fine or jail sentence if an individual was caught sagging pants.[51] Sagging originated from hip-hop culture, and sagging laws target African American boys and criminalize African American adolescent fashion, inviting police to intrude in African American life.[52] In 2007, Shreveport, Louisiana passed a law banning sagging, resulting in African American men accounting for 96 percent of those arrested for sagging.[53] Schools have removed African American students for hairstyles that have violated their dress codes.[54] An African American student at a Texas school was told that he could not attend his prom because his locs were too long.[55] The CROWN Act, which stands for Creating a Respectful and Open World for Natural Hair, would prohibit discrimination based on hair texture or hairstyle.[56] While this act has been introduced in Congress, as of March 2022, it has not been passed.[57] As of 2021, only 13 states have passed versions of the CROWN Act.[58]

Many African American fashion designers who were influential in American fashion history, whose clients included first ladies and government officials, suffered from racism that was supported by federal and state governments.[59] Elizabeth Keckley was an African American woman and fashion designer who dressed the first lady, Mary Todd Lincoln.[60] Keckley was born an enslaved person and suffered violence and sexual assault from white enslavers.[61] Keckley worked as a seamstress for several years, attempting to raise money to pay back the loans

she used to purchase her freedom.[62] She faced legal restrictions in establishing her business—including the requirement that a white man vouch for her freedom.[63] Ann Lowe was an African American woman and fashion designer, who designed the wedding dress Jacqueline Bouvier wore when she married Senator John. F. Kennedy along with many other gowns for an exclusive clientele.[64] Lowe worked as a seamstress with her mother on a plantation in Alabama and later made dresses for wealthy white women in the South.[65] She could not get credit or rent a workspace in the business district in the South, and was forced to operate out of a segregated neighborhood.[66] Ann Lowe did not receive recognition in the fashion industry, despite her well-loved designs.[67]

Rap music, one of the most culturally potent and commercially successful forms of African American expression in the latter half of the 20th century, has been criminalized by federal, state, and local governments.[68] By the late 1980s, rappers were unable to book performances and were being subjected to intrusive searches and surveillance.[69] Rap lyrics and videos have been used in criminal trials to associate Black artists with crimes and to prove the substance of threats or incitements to violence during trial and sentencing.[70] One scholar found hundreds of cases in which rap lyrics have been used as evidence in criminal prosecutions.[71] Writing rap lyrics and making rap music videos has led to African American students being disciplined.[72] In Bell v. Itawamba County Sch. Bd. (2015), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit stated that a school could discipline a student for a rap music video he made off-campus, after learning that two white teachers allegedly sexually harassed several African American students.[73]

COURTESY OF BETTMANN ARCHIVE VIA GETTY IMAGES

Hattie McDaniel with her Academy Award. At the awards ceremony she was forced to sit at a separate table because the hotel in which it was held did not allow Black people into the building. (1940)

Law enforcement agencies and local governments have attempted to chill or criminalize the sale of rap albums based on their content, sometimes cancelling rap performances outright.[74] For example, law enforcement agencies attempted to suppress the music of Compton rap group N.W.A.'s 1988 debut album, "Straight Outta Compton," and particularly their song "Fuck Tha Police."[75] In 1989, the Assistant Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation Office of Public Affairs sent a letter to the distributor of the album, criticizing the group's lyrics regarding law enforcement and making the record label "aware of the FBI's position relative to this song and its message."[76] Law enforcement officials have attempted to prohibit record stores from selling rap albums to minors.[77] During a 1989 N.W.A. concert in Detroit, law enforcement in the crowd, which reportedly contained 200 police officers, rushed the stage and ended the concert early.[78]

California

In California, city governments decimated thriving African American neighborhoods with vibrant artistic communities.[79] California theaters denied entry to African American patrons.[80] In 1876, Charles Green, a African American man, was explicitly denied entry into the Maguire's New Theater in San Francisco.[81] The theater owner was sued by the U.S. Attorney but a jury acquitted him after the judge excluded evidence.[82] Decades later, from the 1930s to 1960s, Black projectionists and other movie house workers fought for employment and equal wages at movie houses—striking, negotiating, and picketing in the face of violent confrontations with local police.[83] In San Francisco, African American artists had limited opportunities due to segregation.[84] The bassist, Vernon Alley, described "the time in San Francisco when black bands couldn't play east of Van Ness Avenue, and that's true. I was a part of it."[85] Alley stated that white musicians' unions fought against African American musicians who attempted to play in downtown San Francisco.[86] Many African American musicians struggled to make a living by playing behind curtains for tourists or out of sight at strip clubs.[87] Consequently, the state openly allowed segregation and discrimination against African American musicians, workers, and artists.

African American Californians continue to face discrimination in the television and film industries in California. In 1940, when Hattie McDaniel became the first African American actor to receive an Academy Award, she was forced to sit at a separate table because the hotel in which the awards ceremony was held did not allow African American people into the building.[88] Today, research has shown that Hollywood studio executives associate casting African American actors with financial risk.[89] In a vicious cycle, Black-led projects are characterized as economically inviable; therefore, they are underfunded, despite earning higher returns.[90] African American actors face a lack of opportunity and African American people are underrepresented in top management in the film and television industries, as well as in off-screen talent in Hollywood.[91] The state has failed, overall, to adequately engage in civil rights enforcement in the motion picture industry.

In San Francisco, African American artists had limited opportunities due to segregation. The bassist, Vernon Alley, described "the time in San Francisco when black bands couldn't play east of Van Ness Avenue, and that's true. I was a part of it."

For a brief period in the 1940s and 1950s, the Fillmore neighborhood in San Francisco was home to a vibrant African American community and referred to by locals as "the Harlem of the West."[92] The Fillmore was home to a vibrant African American jazz scene, social clubs, and was an important cultural hub.[93] In the 1950s and 1960s, the City of San Francisco tore down Black-owned jazz clubs and businesses and built an expressway through the district in the name of "redevelopment."[94] (See Chapter 5 on housing.)

In the 1930s and 1940s, the zoot suit, a particular style of suit with a long coat and loose pants, became an icon of resistance against assimilation for communities of color.[95] The increase in migration of Mexican Americans and African Americans to Los Angeles resulted in the growth of interracial communities of color, which were targeted by the Los Angeles Police Department.[96] To confront the dehumanizing social and economic conditions imposed by the wartime political economy, local officials, and the mainstream press, the zoot suit became a symbol of resistance for those who wore it.[97] However, in the eyes of state officials and law enforcement, the zoot suit and those who wore it were labelled as criminal and hypersexual.[98]

African Americans in Los Angeles were victims of the mob violence and criminalization by local police that preceded and followed the Zoot Suit Riots of Los Angeles.[99] In June 1943, the Zoot Suit Riots of Los Angeles stemmed from tensions between white servicemen at the new Naval Reserve Armory and local Mexican American youth.[100] Violence broke out as gangs of white sailors attacked brown and African American youth in zoot suits.[101] On the worst day of the violence, white soldiers and civilians poured into Los Angeles and attacked the African American neighborhoods of Watts, as well as other neighborhoods around Los Angeles.[102] All 94 nonwhite civilians who were seriously injured were arrested by the Los Angeles Police Department, compared to only two of the 18 white servicemen who participated.[103] The police arrested and jailed Mexican American and African American victims of the mobs rather than the white sailors.[104] The Los Angeles Police Department engaged in preventative enforcement based on racial profiling, targeting African Americans among other communities in Los Angeles.[105] Law enforcement efforts to publicize crackdowns on youth resulted in hundreds of arrests in the summer of 1942.[106] This show of force was designed to reassure white middle classes that wartime police forces could maintain law and order by rounding up innocent youth of color, many of whom were African American.[107]

Local governments in California have discriminated against, punished, and penalized African American students for their fashion, hairstyle, and appearance.

COURTESY OF BETTMANN ARCHIVE VIA GETTY IMAGES

Watts, California- Armed with clubs, pipes and bottles, this self-appointed posse of uniformed men was all set to settle the Zoot Suit War when the Navy Shore Patrol stepped in and broke it up. All 94 nonwhite civilians who were seriously injured were arrested by the Los Angeles Police Department, compared to only two of the 18 white servicemen who participated. (1943)

In March 2018, at Tenaya Middle School in Fresno, school officials pulled an African American student out of class for a haircut with shaved-in designs.[108] They cited a dress code policy and separated him from other students.[109] They also prevented him from going to lunch and gave him extra work to complete.[110] In 2015, an African American biracial student was not allowed to attend school in Clovis because his hair was too long, in violation of the school dress code.[111] The student was given a warning, a subsequent lunch detention, two hours of after school detention, a four-hour after school detention, and three additional unofficial violations.[112]

Historically, state-funded California museums have excluded African American art from their institutions. In 2019, the Los Angeles Museum of Contemporary Art began an informal audit of its collection to increase the representation of African American Artists.[113] In 2020, the museum announced a list of new acquisitions that included African American artists such as Lauren Halsey, LaToya Ruby Frazier, and Senga Nengudi.[114] The University of California, Los Angeles's Hammer Museum engaged in a similar audit. In July 2020, the longest tenured curator at the San Francisco Museum of Modern Art resigned after stating that he did not believe in discrimination.[115] The resignation was related to a larger problem at the museum with respect to racial equality.[116] The museum's staff is only four percent African American and employees report that key leadership positions are dominated by white Americans.[117]

California has also criminalized African American rap artists. Los Angeles law enforcement leaders had been targeting rapper Nipsey Hussle's businesses, before and after his death in 2019—alleging gang activity and stopping hundreds of people in a predominantly African American neighborhood, while making very few arrests.[118] For over 20 years, California courts allowed rap lyrics to be used as evidence related to street gang activity.[119]

III. Anti-Black Narratives in Arts and Culture

The federal government has produced and promoted anti-Black narratives through a series of racist and white supremacist cultural projects across time, beginning with minstrelsy. Minstrelsy was a performance of "Blackness" by white Americans in exaggerated costumes and black make-up, known as blackface.[120] White Americans distorted the hair and facial features of African Americans and demeaned their language, accents, mannerisms, and character.[121] The first minstrel shows were performed in the 1830s in New York by white people with blackened faces and torn clothing.[122] These performances depicted African Americans as lazy, ignorant, superstitious, hypersexual, and criminal.[123]

The minstrel performance became a cross-generational racial parody and stereotype made for white amusement. The performance of minstrelsy relied on racist stereotypes that dehumanized African Americans. This dehumanizing allowed white Americans to secure their own positive identity.

In 1830, Thomas Dartmouth Rice created the popular blackface character, "Jim Crow."[124] By 1845, the minstrel show led to the creation of a whole entertainment industry that thrived on prejudicial stereotypes against African Americans.[125] Blackface minstrelsy grew after the end of the Civil War alongside racial hatred, and the legal segregation laws that proliferated across the country after the end of the war took their name from this primary character in minstrel shows.[126] Minstrel performances eventually expanded beyond the stage and entered radio and television airwaves, as well as movie theaters.[127] The minstrel performance became a cross-generational racial parody and stereotype made for white amusement.[128] The performance of minstrelsy relied on racist stereotypes that dehumanized African Americans.[129] This dehumanizing allowed white Americans to secure their own positive identity.[130] Minstrelsy repeated and entrenched this dehumanization into national and local American culture.[131] Watching and engaging in demeaning depictions of African Americans, like blackface performances, was even a common pastime for U.S. presidents.[132]

The federal government endorsed dehumanizing narratives of African Americans as violent and propagated white supremacist narratives of the Ku Klux Klan as saviors of the nation through the medium of cinema. The Birth of a Nation, which bore its origin title The Clansman, for its first month of screenings, is an unapologetically racist 1915 silent film directed by D.W. Griffith.[133] The film, which premiered in Los Angeles at Clune's Auditorium, takes place between the Civil War and Reconstruction.[134]

Essentially a powerful propaganda tool, it glorifies the rise of the KKK, the white supremacist terrorist group, and depicts them as white saviors attempting to "restore order" to the nation.[135] Woodrow Wilson had the film shown at the White House—a federal government endorsement of white supremacy and anti-Blackness.[136]

From the silent film era through the 1950s, the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) was an important filmmaking agency in the federal government.[137] The films produced by the USDA reinforced problematic racial stereotypes against African American communities.[138] USDA motion pictures supported separate-but-equal laws and customs.[139]

Government war propaganda during World War II employed the strategic use of motion pictures as war propaganda.[140] This propaganda achieved two intertwined objectives, a false image of American democracy and the reinforcement of racist stereotypes about African American people.[141] The Office of War Information, a government censorship agency, blocked racial depictions of discrimination against nonwhite people to show a falsely ideal racial democracy.[142] The Office of War Information also approved blackface and jokes perpetuating and relying upon Black stereotypes.[143]

The Office of War Information, a government censorship agency, blocked racial depictions of discrimination against nonwhite people to show a falsely ideal racial democracy. The Office of War Information also approved blackface and jokes perpetuating and relying upon Black stereotypes.

Federal and state governments have constructed racist monuments on state property and altered school curriculum—glorifying slavery and white supremacy, perpetuating the "Lost Cause" myth, and erasing African American history.[144] State and local governments have collaborated with the United Daughters of the Confederacy, which seeks to memorialize and preserve Confederate culture for future generations,[145] to memorialize the "Lost Cause" myth—that the rebels were patriots and not traitors to the nation.[146] Organized and systematic efforts to manipulate and distort the nation's history—began immediately after the end of the Civil War.[147] These included erecting Confederate monuments, many of them placed on courthouse grounds; naming schools, streets, and military bases after Confederate officers; and lobbying Congress for holidays.[148] The construction of these monuments coincided with a historical period in which increased racial terror through lynching and violence against African American people was at an all-time high.[149] (See Chapter 3 on racial terror for more information.) Monument construction has coincided with moments in which African American communities seem to gain some political power or voice.[150] The Supreme Court ruling of Brown v. Board of Education, which declared segregation unconstitutional, and the civil rights movement triggered another wave of Confederate monuments across the country.[151]

COURTESY OF BETTMANN ARCHIVES VIA GETTY IMAGES

Little Richard protesting record companies over royalties. Little Richard sold the rights to the song "Tutti Fruity" for a reported $50, and received half a cent for each record sold. "I was a dumb black kid and my mama had 12 kids and my daddy was dead," Little Richard reportedly said, "I wanted to help them, so I took whatever was offered." (1984)

Federal and state governments have enacted laws to protect Confederate monuments and other monuments to white supremacy.[152] Alabama, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia recently enacted these laws between 2012 to 2017.[153] In 2009, the U.S. Supreme Court also protected government monuments from free speech challenges in Pleasant Grove City v. Summum—a protection that includes Confederate monuments.[154]

African Americans were denied access to the mainstream media for much of American history, due to segregation and racism.[155] Since the 2000s, many newspapers have apologized for blatantly racist news coverage that they have engaged in for over a century-long period that encompasses the slavery era to today.[156] Consequently, African Americans formed their own media—the African American press.

Freedom's Journal was one of the first of many subsequent African American newspapers and publications that would be formed throughout the United States.[157] These publications advocated for community cohesiveness, demonstrated racial pride, and challenged legislation.[158] The staff members of small, struggling African American publications often risked their lives to refute white supremacy in the news.[159] Ida B. Wells was a journalist for the Memphis weekly known as The Free Speech.[160] She conducted investigations, finding that mobs regularly lynched innocent victims as part of a racial terror regime.[161] This was work that should have been done by federal and state law enforcement agencies. She found that the African American men who were charged with raping white women were often involved in consensual relationships with them.[162] After she published her findings in an editorial, a white mob destroyed The Free Speech, suffering no legal consequences.[163] African American newspapers like The Baltimore Afro-American, The Chicago Defender, and The Pittsburgh Courier served as a corrective to the lies of the white press, and advanced the early civil rights movement.[164]

African Americans were often invisible in white press and mainstream media, unless they were alleged to have committed crimes.[165] They were often denied courtesy titles such as Mrs. and Mr., which were given to white Americans.[166] When African Americans were cast in television shows, they acted out narratives crafted by white Americans that pigeonholed them in roles as domestics, criminals, brutes, or lazy and deceitful.[167] In 1945, John H. Johnson established Ebony magazine—one of the first magazines to be founded by and operated for African Americans.[168] Ebony highlighted historical figures who had been left out of textbooks.[169] The magazine also worked with corporations who sought to advertise to African American communities.[170] In 1979, Robert Johnson (no relation to John H. Johnson), a cable industry lobbyist, started a television channel called Black Entertainment Television (BET).[171] By the 1990s, he sold BET to Viacom for $2.3 billion, making him the first African American billionaire in U.S. history.[172]

American television has a sordid history of creating television shows and series that reinforce racism against African Americans and are written, conceived, and produced by white Americans.[173] White Hollywood has been complicit in the racist practices that thwarted African American freedom struggles.[174] The first African American sitcom originated from a radio program called Amos 'n' Andy, in the 1940s, in which two white men portrayed African American characters.[175] According to testimony by Dr. Darnell Hunt before the California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans, "[C]rime procedurals were found to routinely glamourize policing and to legitimize the criminal justice system, while downplaying the degree to which African Americans are racially profiled and victimized by both." This finding is particularly alarming given what we know about the normalizing effects of media, about the potential for media, in this case, to condition police officers, prosecutors, juries, judges, and/or vigilantes to perceive African American bodies as a threat, and police violence against them as justified."[176] This is important because, as Erika Alexander stated in her testimony, "[s]tory is the conduit to our mind, but once the seed is planted, it is the quickest way to our heart."[177]

The television industry was almost entirely white for many of its initial decades.[178] African American writers and actors in the 1970s faced exclusion at nearly every turn.[179] Television executives held the racist presumption that white writers could write for any audience, but African American writers only could contribute to African American shows.[180] The African American screenwriters who are employed by mainstream television networks are often tasked with crafting stereotypical narratives of African American people and story lines that are acceptable to white producers, studio executives, and viewers.[181] In 2005, the gap in median annual salary between white and African American writers in the television industry was nearly $15,000.[182] According to a 2017 survey of the television industry, 91 percent of shows are led by

Ida B. Wells was a journalist for the Memphis weekly known as The Free Speech. She conducted investigations, finding that mobs regularly lynched innocent victims as part of a racial terror regime. This was work that should have been done by federal and state law enforcement agencies. She found that the Black men who were charged with raping white women were often involved in consensual relationships with them. After she published her findings in an editorial, a white mob destroyed The Free Speech, suffering no legal consequences.

white creators and producers.[183] Only 1.3 percent of U.S. full-power commercial TV stations were Black-owned in 2019.[184] African Americans are largely underrepresented in the entertainment industry.[185] While they comprise 12.4% of the general population in 2020, African Americans only constituted 3.9% of major studio heads, 6.8% of network CEOs.[186] They comprised 4.5% of broadcast show creators, and 7.4 % of digital show creators for the 2019-2020 season.[187] Federal and state governments have neglected to address the anti-Black discrimination in the entertainment industry.

The buying practices of radio advertisers in the U.S. have been characterized by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) as racially discriminatory—minority broadcasting stations earn 63 percent less than other stations with comparable market shares.[188] Despite this, the FCC has failed to enact regulations to protect African American radio stations and media businesses.[189] Of the 11,000 commercial radio stations across the country, fewer than 180 are owned by African Americans—about 1.6 percent of the total.[190] Carole Cutting is an African American radio station owner who started a jazz station in 1999 in Springfield, Massachusetts—where there were no Black-owned radio stations.[191] She went through a 15-year legal battle to be able to finally get her broadcast license and is the only African American to own a commercial radio station, AM or FM, in New England.[192]

In 2020, the National Association of Black-Owned Broadcasters called on Congress to pass a bill that would reinstate a tax incentive to encourage people to sell radio stations to members of minority communities and women.[193] The legislation would bring back a tax break enacted in 1978 to account for the history of racism in broadcast licensing.[194] In the years it was in effect, minority ownership increased, however, in 1995, the tax incentive was overturned by Congress.[195] African Americans have proposed that the FCC approve a new technology called radio geo-targeting—that would allow radio stations to provide geographic-specific traffic, weather, public interest information, and advertising to their local communities.[196] Geo-targeting would allow African American radio stations to better engage listeners, allow for more African American ownership, and more effectively reach African American communities.[197] As of September 2021, the proposal was pending FCC approval.[198] Consequently, the federal government has engaged in discriminatory regulation of the media, which has harmed African American media professionals and business owners.

African American women face excessive racism and discrimination on social media today. In 2018, Amnesty International and Element AI found that African American women on Twitter were 84 percent more likely than white women to receive hateful tweets.[199] Despite this harassment, African American women online are innovators who contribute greatly to digital cultural spaces.[200] African American activists say that their remarks on racism are disproportionately stifled on Facebook.[201]

California

In the 1850s, blackface minstrelsy dominated entertainment in San Francisco.[202] Minstrel songs were played during a banquet for the new University of California president in 1899.[203]

COURTESY OF PAUL BERSEBACH/MEDIANEWS GROUP/ORANGE COUNTY REGISTER VIA GETTY IMAGES

Cemetery workers cover a confederate monument at Santa Ana Cemetery after it was defaced with orange paint. The monument honored confederate soldiers who fought for the Confederate States of America during the Civil War. (2019)

California has been home to racist monument and memorial construction for centuries. The Native Sons of the Golden West is a California organization that has erected racist monuments throughout the state.[204] It was formed on July 11, 1865 with the goal of honoring the Forty Niners, the first white people to settle in California and take advantage of the gold rush and has erected monuments through the state.[205] In the 1920s, the Native Sons of the Golden West Grand President wrote that "California was given by God to a white people, and with God's strength we want to keep it as He gave it to us."[206] The United Daughters of the Confederacy had 14 chapters across California[207] and erected plaques, monuments, and other memorials dedicated to Confederate generals and soldiers across California, such as in Monterey and San Diego, throughout the 1940s and 1950.[208]

California has erected a great number of Confederate monuments, including a dozen or more state markers and cemetery memorials.[209] Some of these monuments were erected by southern veterans of the Confederacy who moved to southern California after the Civil War and sought to memorialize their service through the creation of monuments.[210] The Mendocino coastal town of

Fort Bragg is named after a Confederate army general and enslaver, as of March 2021, the town has not yet changed its names despite numerous requests.[211]

In the radio, film, and television industries, California has neglected to adequately address widespread discrimination. Out of the hundreds of radio stations in California, only two are African American owned.[212] The State of California has, overall, neglected to enforce the civil rights of African American people or address the widespread practice of anti-Black discrimination in Hollywood.[213] African Americans have been depicted in crude stereotypical film roles in Hollywood: as servants, rapists, and enslaved people—or they were barred from roles in films altogether.[214]

The Los Angeles Times apologized for being "an institution deeply rooted in white supremacy" for most of its history and admitted to a record that included indifference and "outright hostility" toward the city's nonwhite population—acknowledging the underrepresentation of Black journalists in the newsroom.

The Los Angeles Times apologized for being "an institution deeply rooted in white supremacy" for most of its history and admitted to a record that included indifference and "outright hostility" toward the city's nonwhite population—acknowledging the underrepresentation of African American journalists in the newsroom.[215] For instance, the Times won a Pulitzer Prize for its coverage of the August 1965 civil unrest in Watts. While much of the Watts story's content was reported by a 24-year-old African American advertising messenger, Robert Richardson, the reporters and editors of record were nearly all white.[216] Richardson covered the disturbances, driving to the scene and phoning in his reports.[217] He was designated a "reporter trainee" after the uprisings but was only provided minimal mentorship or opportunities to enhance his skills. He left the paper the following year.[218]

In contrast, California's African American newspapers hired African American reporters and writers and invested in them. From 1850 to 1870, the earliest African American newspapers published in California included The Mirror of the Times, The Pacific Appeal, and The Elevator.[219] These newspapers emphasized civil rights, community, and racial politics.[220] Writers and editors were free to be activists and journalists.[221] The California Eagle was founded in 1879 and helped ease African Americans' transition to the west—providing them with housing and job information, and other information essential to surviving in a new environment.[222] With Charlotta Spears Bass at the helm, over the years, the Eagle protested racism in the motion picture industry, in the military, and successfully waged battles against discriminatory hiring in Los Angeles—work that should have been done by the state government.[223] The state government has failed to prevent discrimination in mainstream media in California.

California's Social Media Transparency and Accountability Act of 2021, Assembly Bill 587, would require social media platforms to publicly disclose their corporate policies regarding online hate, disinformation, extremism, harassment, and foreign interference, as well as key metrics and data regarding the enforcement of those policies.[224] However, the bill only applies to social media companies that have at least $100 million in revenue—which would exclude many websites where racist commentary and discourse is highly prevalent, such as Parler.[225] As a result, California's attempts to address white supremacy and racism targeted at African Americans online may still leave many vulnerable to abuse. In conclusion, the State of California has promoted blackface minstrelsy, funded confederate monuments, and neglected to enforce the civil rights of African American artists, culture makers, and media makers.

IV. Racist Censorship

State censorship of depictions of African Americans in movies, art, and books was constitutional until 1952.[226] The institutions that regulated cinema, including the Production Code Administration, state censorship boards, and film studios themselves, produced a warped and racist view of African American life in cinema.[227] State government censorship was strongest from 1915 to 1952.[228] States with active censorship boards focused on censoring miscegenation, the depiction of African American women's sexuality, depictions of racial discrimination and lynching, and depictions of integration.[229] States engaged in censorship to generate cultural narratives that upheld white supremacy, and rendered it invisible to the public—erasing depictions of Black power, humanity, and anti-Black state violence.[230] After the U.S. Supreme Court banned state censorship in 1952, Hollywood began to casually depict violence against African Americans on screen.[231] Scholars argue that the proliferation of these scenes has helped normalize anti-Black violence in society.[232]

States and local governments have engaged in racist censorship of books written by African American authors, primarily in public schools and in prisons. Many public high schools across the nation have banned acclaimed novels written by African American authors.[233] Toni Morrison's acclaimed novels have been banned for "depicting the inappropriate topic of…racism," and for being "filthy," in 1998 in Florida, and 2007 in Kentucky.[234] Texas law prohibits teachers from portraying slavery and racism as "anything other than deviations from, betrayals of, or failures to live up to the authentic founding principles of the United States,"—explicitly prohibiting the New York Times's 1619 Project, which places African Americans and the consequences of slavery at the center of American history.[235] In 2021, in York, Pennsylvania, an all-white school board banned books related to racial justice, which mentioned key African American civil rights leaders, such as Rosa Parks and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.— stating that they "may lean more toward indoctrination rather than age-appropriate academic content."[236] After sustained protests from community members, students, and teachers, the school board reversed the ban.[237]

State officials across the country have banned books on the enslavement of African American people, civil rights, and novels by African American authors in prisons and carceral settings.[238] For example, as of 2021, Wisconsin bans Ralph Ginzburg's 100 Years of Lynching, but allows incarcerated people to read Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf—presumably the first was banned for obscenity and yet the latter was deemed to be acceptable.[239] Florida banned the Equal Justice Initiative's Lynching in America report—one of the most comprehensive reports available on the lynching of African Americans—because it was supposedly a threat to prison security.[240] To maintain the lie of white cultural supremacy, state governments have therefore participated in censoring African American artistic work that was critical of American institutions, deemed subversive, or threatened white supremacy.

California

In the 1930s, African American activists protested pro-lynching films at movie theaters, fought against Hollywood's depictions of African American people, and tried to use film to promote the fight for civil rights.[241] Early films that depicted lynching scenes included Frisco Kid (1935), Barbary Coast (1935), Fury (1936), and They Won't Forget (1937).[242] These films made African Americans "nauseous" because they glorified and applauded lynching—even when the person being lynched was not Black.[243] These films encouraged and justified lynching at a time when the lynching of African Americans was still highly prevalent.[244]

Many public schools and prisons in California have censored the literature of African American authors. The Oakland Board of Education banned Alice Walker's book The Color Purple in 1984, due to "troubling ideas about race relations, man's relationship to God, African history, and human sexuality"—approving it only after nine months of community advocacy.[245] At Irvington High School in Fremont, Richard Wright's novel Native Son, was banned for being "unnecessarily violent" in 1998.[246] At the state level, the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation still maintains a list of banned books for its prisons.[247]

The Oakland Board of Education banned Alice Walker's book The Color Purple in 1984, due to "troubling ideas about race relations, man's relationship to God, African history, and human sexuality"—approving it only after nine months of community advocacy.

V. Deprivation of African American Intellectual Property

The federal government's copyright laws routinely deprived African American artists of legal protection because this regime allowed art created by African American artists to be appropriated and stolen by white artists.[248] As a result of complex and convoluted requirements of the 1909 Copyright Act, artists unfamiliar with legal requirements could easily find their works injected into the public domain.[249] This resulted in the loss of economic rights and copyright protection—which resulted in generations of lost wealth for African Americans.[250] Additionally, the federal and state governments have not legally allowed descendants of enslaved people to own art made by their enslaved ancestors or photographs taken of their enslaved ancestors—depriving them of rightful earnings.[251]

Only 3% of U.S. patents went to African American inventors from 1970 to 2006

Even though Black people were leaders in invention, they could not access patent protections due to institutional racism and state-sanctioned anti-Black discrimination and violence.[252] There are estimates that racial violence accounts for 1,100 missing patents won by African Americans.[253] Cyrus McCormick received a patent for the mechanical reaper, even though it was actually invented by Jo Anderson, a man who was enslaved by the McCormick family.[254] Obtaining a patent was difficult and expensive, and some African American inventors could not afford a lawyer.[255] Some patent applications may have been rejected due to racial discrimination.[256] To avoid discrimination, some African Americans relied on white partners to apply for patents under the white person's name.[257] One inventor, Henry Boyd, invented a new type of bed frame and partnered with a white man who applied for the patent in his name.[258]

Obtaining a patent was more difficult for African American artists and innovators because it often involved working with white lawyers who engaged in racist and unfair dealings—and the federal government took no action to ensure that African American innovators' patents were properly documented and preserved.[259] African American innovators faced additional professional and financial barriers, in addition to racism, that white innovators did not face.[260] In 1913, the U.S. Patent Office surveyed approximately 8,000 registered patent attorneys and found 1,200 inventions attributed to people of African American ancestry.[261] However, the Office was only able to confirm 800 of them—a large undercount because attorneys reported failing to recall the names or inventions of some of their African American clients.[262] This failure to recall the names of African American inventors and their inventions resulted in African American inventors being cheated out of profits for their creative work.[263]

Government-enforced racial segregation and disinvestment in African American communities resulted in a dearth of resources that crippled African American invention.[264] These racist practices suppressed the ability of African Americans to receive patents for their inventions.[265] Today, African American patentees are underrepresented in America.[266] There are wide disparities between the number of U.S. patents issued to African American inventors and the total number of patents issued in general.[267] For example, one 2010 study found that from 1970 to 2006, African American inventors received six patents per million people, compared to 235 patents per million for all U.S. inventors.[268] According to Professor Kevin J. Greene's testimony before the California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans, American copyright law disadvantages African American creators because it enables appropriation and under-compensation.[269] There are significant disparities in how African American and white music performers have been compensated for copyright use.[270] Professor Greene stated, "It's not just some problem that happened 200 years ago, it's a problem that's ongoing and happening today."[271] Throughout American history, the federal government historically deprived African American artists and innovators of intellectual property rights, copyright protections, and patent protections resulting in intellectual and cultural theft and exploitation.

There are estimates that racial violence accounts for 1,100 missing patents that should have been given to African Americans. Cyrus McCormick received a patent for the mechanical reaper, even though it was actually invented by Jo Anderson, a man who was enslaved by the McCormick family.

VI. Discrimination Against African American Athletes

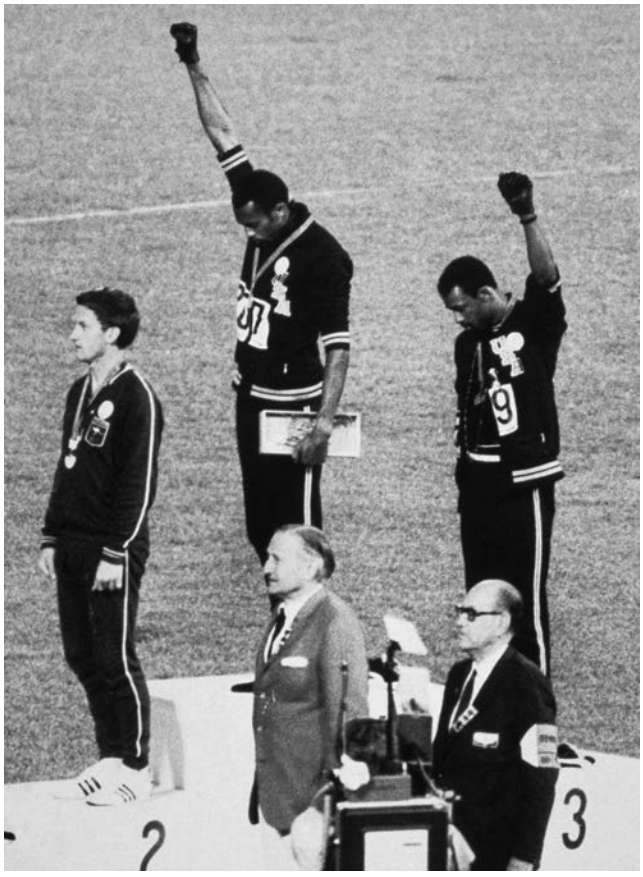
Following the end of slavery, most African American athletes were forced to compete in segregated teams, sports, and organizations.[272] Prior to World War II, some African Americans played sports at white universities—where they were picked for their talent, yet ridiculed and mistreated by white students.[273] Despite the inherent inequality of segregation, African American colleges and their football programs thrived in the mid-20th century.[274] Many Americans believed Historically Black Colleges and Universities were of lower quality than white higher education institutions, so athletic achievement was a way to dispute this narrative.[275] HBCUs had fewer material resources but produced high numbers of professional athletes—particularly in football.[276]

The reintegration of sports was a long and slow process because white Americans who held positions of power were hesitant to break the tradition of segregation.[277] Most major college athletics programs did not allow African American players until 1947.[278] The "gentlemen's agreement" was a standard, unwritten rule that allowed coaches to bench African American athletes during intercollegiate contests with all-white colleges and universities.[279] In 1955, Georgia's Governor asked the State Board of Regents to prohibit Georgia's all-white football teams from playing against teams with African American players.[280]

During the 1960s, the government and the sports industry punished African American athletes who engaged in racial justice and political protests, or resisted racial oppression.[281] Muhammad Ali, a African American Muslim boxing champion, was stripped of his world heavyweight title for refusing to be drafted into the U.S. armed forces.[282] When explaining why he would not join the army, he pointed out the irony of being drafted to fight on behalf a nation in which he was subjected to racial oppression.[283] "My conscience won't let me go shoot my brother, or some darker people...for big powerful America," he said.[284] "They never called me nigger, they never lynched me, they didn't put no dogs on me, they didn't rob me of my nationality, rape and kill my mother and father... Shoot them for what?"[285] Ali was charged with a felony, fined, and banned from boxing.[286] Later the Supreme Court would overturn his conviction. Justice John Harlan stated that the government had misinterpreted the doctrine of Black Muslims by not recognizing Ali as a conscientious objector.[287] Ali experienced racial and religious discrimination by the government—which refused to recognize his religious beliefs and punished him for his resistance to racism.

African American Olympic athletes have faced racial discrimination in athletics.[288] The Amateur Sports Act of 1978, gave the United States Olympic and Paralympic Committee, a private organization, exclusive jurisdiction over all matters related to the Olympics.[289] The federal government has provided funding for the Olympics when they are held in the United States.[290] In 1968, African American Californian track athletes, Tommie Smith and John Carlos, protested the lack of African Americans on the United States Olympic Committee, as well as the stripping of Muhammad Ali's heavyweight belt at the Olympics.[291] They raised their black gloved fists in a Black power salute during the National Anthem, while standing on the victory podiums of the Olympic Games.[292] Subsequently, the International Olympic Committee kicked them out of the Olympic Village and banned protest during the Olympics.[293] When Smith and Carlos returned to America, their families received death threats.[294] Today, many African American

COURTESY OF BETTMANN ARCHIVE VIA GETTY IMAGES



Tommie Smith and John Carlos protested the lack of African Americans on the United States Olympic Committee, as well as the stripping of Muhammad Ali's heavyweight belt at the Olympics. They raised their black gloved fists in a Black power salute during the National Anthem, while standing on the victory podiums of the Olympic Games. (1968)

Olympic athletes are discriminated against—from being suspended for legal marijuana use to being forbidden from wearing swimming caps designed for natural African American hair.[295] Most Olympic athletes, many of whom are African Americans, live in poverty and receive little compensation for their hard work—while high-ranking Olympic committee executives and organizers are compensated generously, due to the billions of dollars in profit from sponsorships, donations, and broadcasting rights.[296]

Similarly, studies have shown that the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) has profited from the labor of poor African American students, many of whom live below the federal poverty line—and the United States Supreme Court has supported this through caselaw.[297] The NCAA prohibits college athletes from being compensated for their labor.[298] Many public universities, which are government funded, generate millions of dollars in revenue due to football and basketball teams that are part of the NCAA.[299] Black students constitute nearly 60 percent of the rosters of football and basketball teams, and just 11 percent of the rosters of all other sports.[300] African American athletes who risk their health and safety to play these sports while in school do not receive any compensation.[301] Much of the money generated by football and basketball athletes is spent on salaries for coaches and administrators and on the construction of lavish facilities.[302]

COURTESY OF BETTMANN ARCHIVE VIA GETTY IMAGES

U.S. women's team for the 1936 Berlin Olympics. The two African American women pictured, Louise Stokes and Tidye Pickett, qualified three years earlier for the 1932 Olympics in track and field but were not allowed to participate due to their race.

African Americans began to play baseball in the late 1800s and historically joined professional teams with white players.[303] However, due to racism and legal segregation laws, they were forced to leave these teams by 1900.[304] In 1920, an organized league structure, called the National Negro League, was formed by Black businesspeople and athletes in Kansas City, Missouri.[305] The leagues were professional and became central to economic development in many Black communities.[306] In 1945, the segregation policies of baseball changed when Branch Rickey signed Jackie Robinson of the Negro League's Kansas City Monarchs to a contract that would bring Robinson into the major leagues in 1947.[307]

Football has a history of racial discrimination in the United States, sanctioned by state and federal governments.[308] Recently, the NFL has engaged in racist practices against Black athletes—many of whom suffered brain injuries while playing professional football.[309] The NFL used "race-norming"—a racist medical practice where Black players were assumed to have lower cognitive function than white players as part of a dementia test to determine payouts in a brain injury settlement.[310] As of January 2022, there was only one Black head coach in the NFL.[311]

Tennis, like football, was originally a sport for elite white men.[312] Due to segregation laws, most tennis clubs explicitly or implicitly prohibited African Americans from participation.[313] Public courts were not fairly distributed in Black neighborhoods or accessible to Black players.[314] Today, prominent African American women tennis players, like Serena Williams, are more likely to be disciplined, fined, and criticized while playing.[315]

In the early 1950s, the National Basketball Association (NBA) had an unspoken rule that there could not be more than two Black players on a team, later that number was expanded to three.[316] More recently, in 2020, African American women in the Women's National Basketball Association went on strike to protest anti-Black police violence—building upon a long history of protests for racial justice.[317] Following the lead of Black women, Black male professional basketball players in the NBA protested anti-Black police violence in a historic strike—refusing to play games and talk to journalists.[318] Due to their efforts, sports arenas in areas with large African American communities were turned into voting locations for the 2020 general election to allow for safe, in-person voting—work that should have been done by federal and state governments.[319] (See Chapter 4 on political disenfranchisement.) There is consequently a history of racism in basketball, like in many other sports, which has harmed African American athletes.[320]

There have long been inequalities between men's and women's sports—however, for African American women, this is compounded by race.[321] One of the first women's track teams in the United States began at the all-Black Tuskegee Institute in 1929.[322] Three years later, two African American women, Louise Stokes and Tidye Pickett, qualified for the 1932 Olympics in track and field but were not allowed to participate due to their race.[323] Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 (Title IX) changed the landscape for women's sports. It requires any program or activity that receives federal financial assistance, including sports, to provide equal opportunities to all genders.[324] Title IX resulted in a significant increase in women athletes, however, the percentage of women in coaching positions greatly declined.[325] Today, Black women represent 88 percent of professional women's basketball, but there are no Black women in head coaching positions.[326] Despite title IX's legal guarantee of equal opportunity, African American parents have reported more sports programs for boys than girls in their communities.[327] Fifty-three percent of white girls are most likely to be involved with sports at age six or younger, while only 29 percent of Black girls are.[328] Due to the lack of title IX enforcement that centers African American women, they have suffered the consequences of both racism and sexism in the sports industry—including underrepresentation in sports leadership and limited access to sports in general. The history of sports in the United States is one of racial discrimination, segregation, and the exploitation of African American male and female athletes—a history in which governments have played a significant role.

California

Many Black football players experienced discrimination in California's colleges and universities. The University of Southern California did not permit black athletes to play until the 1920s.[329] While the University of California, Los Angeles did allow Black players to play in starting positions on its football team, the Los Angeles community was not as accepting of Black athletes.[330] At San Jose State College, Black athletes reportedly faced discrimination in athletics, such as overbearing coaches, a lack of academic assistance, exploitative demands made on Black participants, prejudice outside of the sport, and hostility in the campus Greek system and the local community.[331] Professor Harry Edwards, a sociologist who helped organize Black athletes against discrimination was called "unfit to teach" by California governor and later president, Ronald Reagan.[332]

Black athletes have often protested discrimination in sports in California. Take for instance Colin Kaepernick, a Black Californian who was the quarterback for the San Francisco 49ers.[333] In 2016, he knelt during the National Anthem in protest of anti-Black police violence.[334] Subsequently, the President of the United States, said that he should, "find a country that works better for him."[335] The National Football League then stated that it would fine teams whose players did not stand for the National Anthem.[336] Kaepernick was ultimately told he would be released from his contract by the general manager and coach of the 49ers.[337] Since then, all NFL teams have refused to sign Kaepernick on as a player, despite his clear record of success and athleticism.[338]

The University of California system has also reproduced racial inequities in its revenue-generating athletic programs.[339] It has some of the lowest graduation rates for African American male student athletes, who comprise a large majority of the male student athlete population, in comparison to overall graduation rates.[340] As of 2018, the Black male student-athlete graduation rate for the University of California, Berkeley was 39 percent, much lower than the 91 percent graduation rate for students overall.[341] The graduation rate for Black male student-athletes at the University of California, Los Angeles was 57 percent, while the overall graduation rate was 91 percent.[342] More generally, Black male student-athletes rarely accrue the benefits of higher education, beyond athletics.[343] Black athletes reported that coaches prioritize athletic accomplishment over academic engagement and discouraged participation in activities beyond their sport.[344] Though many Black athletes aspire to become professional players, the NFL and National Basketball Association draft fewer than two percent of student athletes each year.[345] The University of California system pressures Black student-athletes to labor for its highly profitable athletic programs while they receive no compensation, risk damage to their health, and divert their focus from their education—all for the unlikely chance at being drafted into professional sports.

VII. Restraints on African American Leisure and Recreation

Across the United States, state and local governments have prohibited African Americans from participating in leisure.[346] Public parks, recreation centers, and pools[347] and the passageways to access them[348] are located away from African American communities, restricted, or closed. Further, various government statutes, including anti-cruising, anti-gathering, and curfew laws, have often targeted African Americans' ability to enjoy leisure time.[349]

California

The State of California engaged in racist restrictions on African American business owners through zoning ordinances, licensing laws, fire and safety codes, and anti-nuisance provisions, which discriminated against African American business owners and their African American customers. Racist state actions against predominantly African American leisure sites, included denying liquor or food licenses and heightened police surveillance at Black-owned bars and restaurants.[350] In Shaw v. California Dept of Alcoholic Beverage Control, African American tavern owners brought a civil rights action against the California Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control and the City of San Jose in 1986.[351] The African American tavern owners sued for violation of their civil rights based upon improper revocation of their liquor license and discriminatory enforcement of the law.[352] The court agreed that the loss of the bar's liquor license was due to racially discriminatory harassment by the San Jose police force.[353]

Cities in California also used eminent domain to seize the land of African American business owners who sought to establish leisure enterprises. The Manhattan Beach authorities in Southern California, prohibited the growth and development of Black-owned leisure businesses, such as Bruce's Beach.[354] In 1912, Ms. Willa "Willie" Bruce purchased two lots near Manhattan Beach from white real estate brokers for $1,225. She developed the land with a cottage, food establishment, and store—called Bruce's Lodge.[355] The lodge was popular with African American Los Angeles residents.[356] By 1926, six other African American families had bought property near the lodge for vacation homes.[357] This caused many white neighbors and beachgoers to complain, harass, and attack the African American beachgoers, their families, and their establishments.[358] The Manhattan Beach Board of Trustees and a white Manhattan Beach resident threatened to report Bruce's Beach for allegedly selling liquor during the prohibition, so that all the people on Bruce's property could be arrested.[359]

In 1924, Manhattan Beach authorities enacted new laws with fines and penalties for violations of parking and zoning laws to discourage African American visitors.[360] For example, "10 minute only" parking signage was put up to prevent visitors from staying because parking would be extremely limited.[361] Ordinance 273 prevented "bathhouses" in the same area as Bruce's, so there could be no further bathhouse developments or expansions at the beach.[362] Manhattan Beach authorities then used eminent domain to condemn the beach as a public park under the Park and Playground Act of 1909.[363] This action was petitioned for by white citizens in the area, and backed by Ku Klux Klan members, including those who befriended Board of Trustee members.[364] Today, the two parcels

COURTESY OF MERRIAM MATTHEWS PHOTOGRAPH COLLECTION/UCLA

Louise and Byron Kenner in bathing suits at Bruce's Beach, with a beach house visible behind them. Bruce's Beach, in the city of Manhattan Beach, was purchased by Willa and Charles Bruce in 1912. They built a beach resort. The city closed down the resort in the 1920s by proposing to build a park and imposing eminent domain. (c. 1920) of land that were part of Bruce's Beach are now worth millions.[365] In 2021, California Governor Gavin Newsom signed Senate Bill No. 796, authorizing the county to transfer the land back to the Bruce family after nearly 100 years.[366] The Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors voted unanimously to begin the process of transferring the land.[367] That process included a plan for the county to lease the land as well as an option to purchase the land back from the family for up to $20 million, and the family did then sell the property to the county.[368]

Local governments in the State of California restricted access to public pools for African American Californians. The Brookside Plunge was a public pool in Pasadena, which opened on July 4, 1914.[369] It was initially only open to nonwhite individuals on Wednesday afternoons and evenings.[370] Eventually, it only opened for a shorter time—on Tuesdays between 2pm and 5pm—in retaliation to a legal challenge from African American taxpayers in the area.[371] The Los Angeles branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People sued the city following the denial of six Black men to the pool.[372] Though they won, Pasadena closed the pool until the NAACP secured an injunction forcing the pool to reopen in 1947 with no racial restrictions.[373] The pool site suffered from a lack of financial support and closed in 1983, leading a local swim coach and several donors to form the AAF Rose Bowl Aquatic Center.[374] This center was supposed to be open to all, but discouraged access for African American people due to the "country club" atmosphere.[375] The Pasadena city council ignored this issue and allowed the formation of the center with public funds.[376]

City and county police departments in California engaged in targeted harassment of Black owned businesses that provided leisure opportunities to Black Californians. In 1927, the Parkridge Country Club was sold to a group of Black entrepreneurs. After the Ku Klux Klan burned a cross on the front lawn and white club members sued the previous owner for the sale, the Black entrepreneurs were forced to withdraw their bid.

City and county police departments in California engaged in targeted harassment of African American owned businesses that provided leisure opportunities to African American Californians. In 1927, the Parkridge Country Club was sold to a group of African American entrepreneurs.[377] After the Ku Klux Klan burned a cross on the front lawn and white club members sued the previous owner for the sale, the African American entrepreneurs were forced to withdraw their bid.[378]

VIII. Conclusion

African Americans have suffered from discrimination in almost every type of cultural and artistic pursuit, including arts, sports, leisure, fashion, literature, media, and music. The United States has historically denied African Americans to own their intellectual and artistic property, engage in leisure activities without restriction, and receive fair compensation for their athletic talent. State and federal governments have endorsed blackface minstrelsy, promoted racist cinematic depictions of African Americans, allowed segregation in arts and culture, denied patents to African American inventors, and punished African Americans for protesting racial injustice. Federal and state governments failed to protect African American artists, culture-makers, and media-makers from discrimination while simultaneously promoting discriminatory narratives.

Today, African American artists, culture-makers, presenters, and entrepreneurs must contend with the legacy of enslavement, as they continue to be deprived of rightful profits from their intellectual, artistic, athletic, and creative labors. African Americans continue to face racial discrimination, difficulties in obtaining patents and copyrights, and at times, are not even compensated at all for their creative and physical labors. African Americans are weighed down by the legacy of enslavement, echoing the impacts felt by their ancestors, even as they attempt to pursue creative endeavors that empower and uplift African American communities.

Endnotes

[1] Sambol-Tosco, Education, Arts, & Culture (2004), Thirteen, p. 1 (as of March 20, 2022); Newton, Slave Artisans and Craftsmen: The Roots of Afro-American Art (1977), 9(3) Plastic Arts and Crafts, 35.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Barnes, Yes, Politicians Wore Blackface. It Used to be All-American 'Fun' (Feb. 8, 2019), Washington Post (as of March 21, 2022).

[4] National Museum of African American History and Culture, Blackface: The Birth of An American Stereotype (Oct. 30, 2017), National Museum of African American History and Culture (as of March 21, 2022) (NMAAHC).

[5] Absher, The Black Musician and the White City: Race and Music in Chicago, 1900-1967 (2014), pp. 1-2, 157 (as of April 6, 2022)

[6] Koppes & Black, Blacks, Loyalty, and Motion-Picture Propaganda in World War II (Sept. 1986), 73 The Journal of American History 383.

[7] Rothwell, The Black Innovators Who Elevated the United States: Reassessing the Golden Age of Invention (Nov. 23, 2020), Brookings Institution (as of March 21, 2022).

[8] Reese, The Socio-Political Context of the Integration of Sport in America (1998), 3(4) Journal of African American Men, 5-22.

[9] Alison Rose Jefferson, Living the California Dream: African American Leisure Sites During Jim Crow Era (2020).

[10] Cox, Dixies Daughters: The United Daughters of the Confederacy and the Preservation of Confederate Culture (2003).

[11] Scott, Cinema Civil Rights: Regulation, Repression, and Race in the Classical Hollywood Era (2015).

[12] Sambol-Tosco, supra, at p. 1.

[13] Ibid.

[14] Ibid.

[15] National Humanities Center, Artists (2013), National Humanities Center (as of March 20, 2022); Douglas A. Jones Jr., Black Politics but Not Black People: Rethinking the Social and "Racial" History of Early Minstrelsy (2013), 57(2) The Drama Review 21, 24-25.

[16] Sambol-Tosco, supra, at p. 1.

[17] National Park Service, Performing Culture in Music & Dance, National Park Service, U.S. Dept. of the Interior (as of March 20, 2022); Hines, Black Musical Traditions and Copyright Law: Historical Tensions (2005) 10 Mich. J Race & L. 463, 472; Sambol-Tosco, supra.

[18] Stuckey, Slave Culture: Nationalist Theory and the Foundations of Black America (1987), p. 137; Sambol-Tosco, supra, at p. 2.

[19] Cox, The Superpower of Singing: Music and the Struggle Against Slavery (Dec. 8, 2021), National Park Service (as of March 20, 2022).

[20] Hines, supra, at p. 474.

[21] Sambol-Tosco, supra, at p. 1; Stuckey, supra, at pp. 20-26.

[22] Absher, The Black Musician and the White City: Race and Music in Chicago, 1900-1967 (2014), pp. 1-2, 157.

[23] Absher, supra, at pp. 9, 13-14, 56.

[24] Absher, The Black Musician and the White City: Race and Music inn Chicago, 1900-1967, 44 (2014). Absher, supra, at pp. 1, 21-22

[25] Absher, supra at pp, 23-25; Knopper, The Rope: The Forgotten History of Segregated Rock & Roll Concerts (Feb. 22, 2021), Rolling Stone (as of March 20, 2022).

[26] Knopper, supra; Lipsitz, Midnight at the Barrelhouse: The Johnny Otis Story (2010) pp. 46-48.

[27] Knopper, supra; Absher, supra at pp, 23-25; Hickey, Segregated Rock and Roll Concert Posters from the 1950s (2011-2012), Missouri State University (as of March 20, 2022).

[28] Knopper, supra.

[29] Knopper, supra; Lipsitz, supra, at pp. 46-48.

[30] Knopper, supra; Lipsitz, supra, at pp. 46-47.

[31] Knopper, supra; Lipsitz, supra, at p. 47.

[32] Knopper, supra; Megan Mayhew Bergman, The International Sweethearts of Rhythm (Nov. 20, 2011), 75 Oxford American (as of March 20, 2022); Handy, The International Sweethearts of Rhythm: The Ladies' Jazz Band from Piney Woods Country Life School (1998) p. 26.

[33] Gates, Jr., The Black Church: This Is Our Story, This Is Our Song (2021) pp. 2-5.

[34] Gates Jr., supra, at p. 6.

[35] Gates Jr., supra, at pp. 120-125.

[36] Ibid.

[37] Gates Jr., supra, at p. 135.

[38] See generally Hines, supra.

[39] Hines, supra, at pp. 492-493.

[40] Hines, supra, at p. 485.

[41] Hines, supra, at p. 485.

[42] Hines, supra, at p. 485.

[43] Hines, supra, at p. 479-80.

[44] Ibid.

[45] Hines, supra, at pp. 485-486.

[46] Ibid.

[47] Ibid.

[48] Myers, Soldiers Cheer Army's Decision to Authorize Dreadlocks in Uniform (Jan. 30, 2017), Army Times (as of March 20, 2022); Schwartzmann, Shreveport Repeals its Discriminatory "Saggy Pants" Ban (2019), ACLU (as of March 20, 2022).

[49] Myers, supra.

[50] Ibid.

[51] Luscombe, Florida City Ends Anti-Sagging Saga with Move to Allow Low Trousers (Sep. 14, 2020), The Guardian (as of March 20, 2022); Sinopole, "No Saggy Pants": A Review of the First Amendment Issues Presented by the State's Regulation of Fashion in Public Streets (2008) 113 Dickinson L.Rev. 329, 331-334.

[52] Mellor, Balenciaga's $1,200 sagging pants are being decried as racist (Sept. 7, 2021), Fortune (as of April 7, 2022); Henning, The Rage of Innocence: How America Criminalizes Black Youth (2021) pp. 50-55; Schwartzmann, supra.

[53] MacNeil, Black men make up 96 percent of sagging arrests in Shreveport (June 2, 2019) Shreveport Times (as of April 7, 2022); Schwartzmann, supra.

[54] Hening, supra, at p. 62.

[55] Weatherford, The CROWN Act (Oct. 9, 2020), Harpers Bazaar (as of March 20, 2022).

[56] Weatherford, supra; H.R. No. 2116, 117th Cong., 2d Sess. (2021).

[57] Ibid.

[58] Mercer, Banning Hair Discrimination Emerges as Racial Justice Issue (Nov. 29, 2021), Pew Charitable Trusts (as of March 20, 2022).

[59] Mann, From Slavery to the White House: The Extraordinary Life of Elizabeth Keckly (Sept. 14, 2020), The White House Historical Association (as of March 20, 2022).

[60] Ibid.

[61] Ibid.

[62] Mann, supra.

[63] Ibid.

[64] Thurman, Ann Lowe's Barrier-Breaking Mid-Century Couture (March 22, 2021), The New Yorker (as of March 20, 2022).

[65] Ibid.

[66] Ibid.

[67] Ibid.

[68] Dennis, The Music of Mass Incarceration (Dec. 1, 2020), American Bar Association (as of April 7, 2022); Hodgins, Rap Lyrics and Evidence of Guilt: The Racial Impact Of The Weaponization Of Evidence Rules (2021) Cardozo Journal of Equal Rights & Social Justice Blog (as of March 20, 2022).

[69] Nielson, "Can't C Me": Surveillance and Rap Music (2010), 40(6) Journal of Black Studies, 1254, 1258

[70] Hudson Jr., Rap Music and the First Amendment (2009), First Amendment Encyclopedia (as of March 20, [71] Dennis, supra.

[72] Hudson Jr., supra.

[73] Bell v. Itawamba County School Bd. (5th Cir. 2015) 799 F.3d 379.

[74] Hudson Jr., supra.

[75] Hudson Jr., supra.

[76] Steve Hochman, Compton Rappers Versus the Letter of the Law: FBI Claims Song by N.W.A. Advocates Violence on Police, L.A. Times (Oct. 5, 1989) (April 7, 2022); Letter from Milt Ahlerich, Ass't Dir., Off. Pub. Aff., FBI, to Gui Manganiello, Nat'l Promotions Dir., Priority Records (Aug. 1, 1989).

[77] Holmes & Subsaeng, When N.W.A. Terrified White America (2017) Daily Beast (as of Aug. 9, 2021). Jones, Ban(ned) in the USA: Popular Music and Censorship (1991), 15(1) Journal of Communication Inquiry, p. 73, 73-87.

[78] John Counts, Retired Detroit Sergeant Recalls Telling N.W.A. They Couldn't Play 'F Tha Police' at 1989 Concert (2015) MLive (as of April 7, 2022).

[79] Pepin, Music of the Fillmore (2000), PBS (as of March 20, 2022).

[80] Bellegarde Francois, A Lost World: Sallie Robinson, the Civil Rights Cases, and Missing Narratives of Slavery in the Supreme Court's Reconstruction Jurisprudence (2021), 109 Georgetown Law Journal 1015, 1049-50.

[81] Ibid.

[82] Ibid.

[83] Scott, Cinema Civil Rights: Regulation, Repression, And Race In The Classical Hollywood Era (2015) pp. 147-149.

[84] Carol Chamberland, Racism in the Clubs, Found SF (as of March 20, 2022).

[85] Ibid.

[86] Ibid.

[87] Ibid.

[88] Abramovitch, Oscar's First Black Winner Accepted Her Honor in a Segregated 'No Blacks' Hotel in L.A. (Feb. 19, 2015), Hollywood Reporter (as of March 20, 2022)

[89] Erigha, Racial Valuation: Cultural Gatekeepers, Race, Risk, and Institutional Expectations of Success and Failure (2021), 68(2) Social Problems, 393–408.

[90] Dunn et al., Black Representation in Film and TV: The Challenges and Impact of Increasing Diversity (March 11, 2021), McKinsey & Company (as of March 20, 2022).

[91] Ibid.

[92] Jackson & Jones, Remember the Fillmore: The Lingering History of Urban Renewal in Black San Francisco (2012), UCSB Center for Black Studies Research, p. 61 (as of April 7, 2022).

[93] Jackson & Jones, supra, at p. 65.

[94] Jackson & Jones, supra, at pp. 63-65.

[95] Alvarez, The Power of the Zoot: Youth Culture and Resistance during World War II (2009) p. 64.

[96] Alvarez, supra, at p. 27.

[97] Alvarez, supra, at p. 79.

[98] Alvarez, supra, at pp. 43, 65

[99] Alvarez, supra, at pp. 156, 165.

[100] Alvarez, supra, at pp. 160-170

[101] Ibid.

[102] Alvarez, supra, at pp. 176-79.

[103] Alvarez, supra, at p. 180.

[104] Ibid.

[105] Alvarez, supra, at p. 71.

[106] Alvarez, supra, at pp. 71-72.

[107] Alvarez, supra, at p. 72.

[108] Paggett, Cultural Incompetence: My Son was Kicked out of Class Because of His Hair (March 8, 2018), ACLU of Northern California (as of March 21, 2022).

[109] Ibid.

[110] Ibid.

[111] Abre' Connor, #LongHairDontCare... Unless You Live in Clovis (Sept. 3, 2015), ACLU of Northern California (as of March 21, 2022).

[112] Ibid.

[113] Miranda, How One Art Museum Has Reckoned with Race and Its Past (Oct. 22, 2020), Los Angeles Times (as of March 20, 2022).

[114] Ibid.

[115] Pogash, Its Top Curator Gone, SFMOMA Reviews Its Record on Race (July 22, 2020), New York Times (as of March 21, 2022).

[116] Ibid.

[117] Ibid.

[118] Levin, Revealed: How LAPD Targeted Nipsey Hussle's Street Corner and Store (Nov. 7, 2021), Guardian (as of March 21, 2022).

[119] People v. Olguin (1994) 31 Cal.App,.4th 1355.

[120] NMAAHC, supra.

[121] Ibid.

[122] Ibid.

[123] Ibid.

[124] Ibid.

[125] Ibid.

[126] Ibid.; Ferris State University, The Origins of Jim Crow, Jim Crow Museum (as of March 21, 2022).

[127] NMAAHC, supra.

[128] Ibid.

[129] Butcher, "Successful Beyond Expectation:" Blackface, Minstrelsy, and Racist Entertainment at the University of Wisconsin–Madison (Oct. 26, 2020), Public History Project, University of Wisconsin-Madison (as of March 21, 2022).

[130] Ibid.

[131] Ibid.

[132] Barnes, supra.

[133] Blakemore, "Birth of a Nation": 100 Years Later (Feb. 4, 2015), JSTOR Daily (as of March 21, 2022).

[134] Thomas Doherty, 'The Birth of a Nation' at 100: "Important, Innovative and Despicable" (Feb. 7, 2015), Hollywood Reporter (as of March 21, 2022).

[135] Blakemore, supra.

[136] Ibid.

[137] Winn, A Brief History of the USDA Motion Picture Service to 1943 (2013), Kinema: A Journal for Film and Audiovisual Media (as of March 21, 2022).

[138] J. Emmett Winn, Documenting Racism: African Americans in US Department of Agriculture Documentaries, 1941-42 (2014), at pp. 107-130.

[139] Ibid.

[140] See Koppes & Black, Blacks, Loyalty, and Motion-Picture Propaganda in World War II (1986), The Journal of American History, 383-406.

[141] Koppes, supra.

[142] Koppes, supra.

[143] Knppes, supra.

[144] Cox, Dixies Daughters: The United Daughters of the Confederacy and the Preservation of Confederate Culture (2003), pp. 1-3.

[145] Cox, supra, at pp. 1-3.

[146] Cox, supra, at p. 96.

[147] Cox, supra, at pp. 1-3; Murali, Shaping History: Monument-Toppling, Racial Justice and the Law (Dec. 2, 2019), Center for Art Law (as of March 21, 2022).

[148] Cox, supra, at pp. 1-3.

[149] Murali, su

[150] Ryan Best, Confederate Statues Were Never Really About Preserving History (July 8, 2020), FiveThirtyEight (as of March 21, 2022).

[151] Ibid.

[152] Murali, supra.

[153] Murali, supra.

[154] Murali, supra.

[155] Prattis, Racial Segregation and Negro Journalism (1947), 8(4) Phylon, 305-314.

[156] Staples, How the White Press Wrote Off Black America (July 10, 2021), The New York Times (as of March 21, 2022).

[157] Teresa, The Jim Crow-Era Black Press: Of and for its Readership, Organization of American Historians (as of March 21, 2022).

[158] Ibid.

[159] Ibid.

[160] Ibid.

[161] Staples, supra.

[162] Ibid.

[163] Ibid.

[164] Ibid.

[165] Ibid.

[166] Staples, The Radical Blackness of Ebony Magazine (Aug. 11, 2019), N.Y. Times (as of March 21, 2022).

[167] Ibid.

[168] Ibid.

[169] Ibid.

[170] Ibid.

[171] NPR, Black Entertainment Television: Robert Johnson (Dec. 14, 2017), NPR (as of March 21, 2022).

[172] Ibid.

[173] Chen, Black Television Through the Years (2022), University of Texas at Austin (as of March 21, 2022).

[174] Ibid.

[175] Ibid.

[176] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (December 8, 2021), Testimony of Dr. Darnell Hunt (as of February 8, 2022).

[177] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (December 8, 2021), Testimony of Erika Alexander (as of February 8, 2022).

[178] Chen, supra.

[179] Giorgis, Not Enough has Changed Since Sanford and Son (Sept. 13, 2021), Atlantic (as of March 21, 2022).

[180] Ibid.

[181] Ibid.

[182] Ibid.

[183] Ibid.

[184] Karr, FCC Media-Ownership Report Underscores the Agency's Historical Exclusion of Black People (Sept. 7, 2021) (as of March 21, 2022)

[185] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (December 8, 2021), Testimony of Dr. Darnell Hunt (as of February 8, 2022).

[186] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (December 8, 2021), Testimony of Dr. Darnell Hunt (as of February 8, 2022).

[187] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (December 8, 2021), Testimony of Dr. Darnell Hunt (as of February 8, 2022).

[188] Millar, Racism is in the Air: The FCC's Mandate to Protect Minorities from Getting Shortchanged by Advertisers (2000), Commlaw Conspecturs, p. 311 (as of March 21, 2022)

[189] Ibid.

[190] Young & Raphelson, Diversifying The Radio Dial: Black Station Owners Demand Action (July 22, 2020) WBUR (as of March 21, 2022).

[191] Ibid.

[192] Ibid.

[193] Ibid.

[194] Ibid.

[195] Ibid.

[196] Clay Jr., The FCC Must Act to Promote Minority-Owned Broadcasting (Sept. 29, 2021) (as of March 21, 2022).

[197] Ibid.

[198] Ibid.

[199] Amnesty International, Troll Patrol Findings: Using Crowdsourcing, Data Science & Machine Learning to Measure Violence and Abuse against Women on Twitter, Amnesty International (as of March 21, 2022).

[200] Whaley, We Aren't Alone On TikTok, Black Girls Find Visibility—And Racist Hate, Bitch Media (as of March 21, 2022).

[201] Guynn, Facebook While Black: Users Call it Getting 'Zucked' Say Talking about Racism is Censored as Hate Speech (July 9, 2020) (as of March 21, 2022).

[202] Hudson, West of Jim Crow: The Fight Against California's Color Line (2020) at p. 50.

[203] Hudson, Entertaining Citizenship: Masculinity and Minstrelsy in Post—Emancipation San Francisco (2008), 93 Journal of African American History 174, 181.

[204] Desmarais, Historic Wrongs on a Pedestal: Ugly Past Doesn't Vanish When the Artwork Does (Feb. 27, 2018) (as of March 21, 2022).

[205] Ibid.

[206] Ibid.

[207] Ohara, Inside California's Surprising History of Confederate Monuments (July 17, 2020), Cal Matters (as of April 7, 2022).

[208] Castillo, What's Left of Confederate Monuments in California (July 13, 2020), Cal Matters (as of March 21, 2022).

[209] Castillo, supra.

[210] Castillo, supra.

[211] Branson-Potts, California Confronts its Racist Past as Tributes to Confederates and Colonizers Fall (June 26, 2020), L.A. Times (as of March 21, 2022); Branson-Potts, California City Named for a Confederate General Will Not Put Name Change on November Ballot (June 23, 2020), L.A. Times (as of March 21, 2022).

[212] Redd, More than Music: How KDEE 97.5 FM Radio Serves Black Communities (Feb. 17, 2022), ABC 10 (as of March 21, 2022).

[213] Ford, What the 'Hollywood Jim Crow' Looks Like Today (Feb. 24, 2019), Atlantic (as of March 21, 2022).

[214] Ibid.

[215] Times Editorial Board, Editorial: An Examination of The Times' Failures on Race, Our Apology and a Path Forward (Sept. 27, 2020), L.A. Times (as of March 21, 2022).

[216] Ibid.

[217] Ibid.

[218] Ibid.

[219] Drapkin, "Advocate Our Own Cause": Black Newspapers in California (2016), Colored Conventions Project (as of March 21, 2022).

[220] Public Broadcasting Service, Newspapers: The California Eagle, Publisher – Charlotta Bass, Public Broadcasting Service (as of March 21, 2022).

[221] Ibid.

[222] Ibid.

[223] Ibid.

[224] Office of Assemblymember Jessie Gabriel, District 46, California Legislators Introduce Bipartisan Effort to Hold Social Media Companies Accountable for Online Hate and Disinformation (March 29, 2021), Assemblymember Jessie Gabriel, District 46 (as of May 31, 2023).

[225] Jabali, I've Been on Parler. It's a Cesspit of Thinly Veiled Racism and Hate (Jan. 12, 2021), Guardian (as of March 21, 2022); Syed, California Social Media Regulations – A Tougher Sell in 2021 (May 27, 2021), Cal Matters (as of March 21, 2022).

[226] Scott, supra, at p. 10.

[227] Scott, supra, at pp. 1-2.

[228] Scott, supra, at pp. 68.

[229] Scott, supra, at pp. 68-70; 187.

[230] Scott, supra, at pp. 1-4.

[231] Scott, supra, at pp. 108-109.

[232] Ibid.

[233] American Library Association, Banned & Challenged Classics, American Library Association (as of March 21, 2022) (ALA).

[234] Ibid.

[235] Powell, In Texas, a Battle Over What Can Be Taught, and What Books Can Be Read (Dec. 10, 2021), The New York Times (as of March 21, 2022).

[236] Paz & Cramer, How Students Fought a Book Ban and Won, for Now (Oct. 2, 2021), The New York Times (as of March 21, 2022).

[237] Ibid.

[238] Equal Justice Initiative, Banning Books in Prisons (Jan. 7, 2020), Equal Justice Initiative (as of March 21, 2022) (EJI 2020).

[239] Ibid.

[240] Ibid.

[241] Scott, supra, at pp. 147-149.

[242] Scott, supra, at p. 152-155.

[243] Ibid.

[244] Ibid.

[245] ALA, supra.

[246] Ibid.

[247] EJI 2020, supra.

[248] Greene, Copyright, Culture & Black Music: A Legacy of Unequal Protection (1999), 21 Hasting Comm Ent Law Journal 339, 357-58.

[249] Greene, supra, at pp. 353-54.

[250] Ibid.

[251] Schuessler, Your Ancestors Were Slaves. Who Owns the Photos of Them? (March 22, 2019), N.Y. Times (as of March 21, 2022); Perez-Pena, Settlement Over Artwork By an Ex-Slave (Oct. 7, 1993), N.Y. Times (as of March 21, 2022).

[252] Rothwell, supra.

[253] Cook, Violence and Economic Activity: Evidence from African American Patents, 1870-1940 (2014), 19(2) Journal of Economic Growth 221.

[254] Johnson, The Colorblind Patent System and Black Inventors (2019), American Bar Association (as of March 21, 2022).

[255] Ibid.

[256] Ibid.

[257] Ibid.

[258] Ibid.

[259] Rothwell, supra.

[260] Rothwell, supra.

[261] Rothwell, supra.

[262] Rothwell, supra.

[263] Rothwell, supra.

[264] Johnson, supra.

[265] Johnson, supra.

[266] Johnson, supra.

[267] Johnson, supra.

[268] Johnson, supra.

[269] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (December 8, 2021), Testimony of Professor Kevin J. Greene, (as of February 8, 2022).

[270] Ibid.

[271] Ibid.

[272] Reese, The Socio-Political Context of the Integration of Sport in America (1998), 3(4) Journal of African American Men 5, 6-8.

[273] Reese, supra, at p. 12.

[274] Tynes, The Golden Age of Black College Football Lost to Integration (Sep. 19, 2010), Ringer (as of March 21, 2022).

[275] Ibid.

[276] Ibid.

[277] Reese, supra, at pp. 12-14.

[278] UCLA, Black Bruin History at UCLA, UCLA (as of March 21, 2022).

[279] Miller, Slouching Toward a New Expediency: College Football and the Color Line During the Depression Decade (1999), 40(3) American Studies, 5, 9.

[280] Reese, supra, at p. 14.

[281] Brown, 'Shoot Them for What?' How Muhammad Ali Won His Greatest Fight (June 16, 2018), Washington Post (as of March 21, 2022).

[282] Ibid.

[283] Ibid.

[284] Ibid.

[285] Ibid.

[286] Ibid.

[287] Ibid.

[288] Reese, supra, at pp. 16-17.

[289] Stewart, The Price of Olympic Glory (July 22, 2021), Vox (as of March 22, 2021).

[290] United States General Accounting Office, Olympic Games: Federal Government Provides Significant Funding and Support (2000), United States General Accounting Office (as of March 21, 2022).

[291] Reese, supra, at p. 16.

[292] UCLA, Tommie Smith and John Carlos, UCLA (as of March 21, 2022).

[293] Ibid.

[294] Ibid.

[295] Germain, Simone Biles, Sha'Carri Richardson, and How the Olympics Failed Black Women (Aug. 13, 2021), ACLU (as of March 21, 2022).

[296] Stewart, supra; Berlin, The Olympic Color Barrier (Aug. 21, 201), Politico (as of March 21, 2022).

[297] Ingraham, NCAA Rules Allow White Students and Coaches to Profit Off Labor of Black Ones, Study Finds (Sept. 7, 2020), Washington Post (as of March 21, 2022); Drexel News, Study College Athletes Worth Six Figures Live Below Federal Poverty Line (Sep. 13, 2011), Drexel News (as of March 21, 2022).

[298] Ingraham, supra.

[299] Ibid.

[300] Ibid.

[301] Ibid.

[302] Ibid.

[303] Negro Leagues Baseball Museum, Negro Leagues History, Negro Leagues Baseball Museum (as of March 21, 2022).

[304] Ibid.

[305] Ibid.

[306] Ibid.

[307] Library of Congress, Breaking the Color Line: 1940 to 1946, Library of Congress (as of March 21, 2022).

[308] Associated Press, The NFL Will Stop Assuming Racial Differences When Assessing Brain Injuries (June 2, 2021), NPR (as of March 22, 2022).

[309] Ibid.

[310] Cineas, "Race Norming" and the Long Legacy of Medical Racism Explained (July 9, 2021), Vox (as of March 22, 2021).

[311] Mosley, "Is the NFL Black Head Coach In a 'No-Win' Situation?" (Feb. 1, 2022), SI.com (as off Aprill 11, 2022)

[312] Yolanda Hester, Before the Open Era: African Americans in Tennis during the 50s and 60s, UCLA (as of March 21, 2022).

[313] Ibid.

[314] Ibid.

[315] Prasad, Serena Williams and the Trope of the 'Angry Black Woman' (2018), BBC News (as of March 21, 2022).

[316] The Undefeated, Basketball's Battle for Racial Equality (Sep. 18, 2018), Andscape (as of March 21, 2022).

[317] Ibid.

[318] Mahoney, NBA to Resume After Historic Anti-Racism Protest Puts Post-Season on Pause, Global News (as of March 22, 2022).

[319] Ibid.

[320] Undefeated, su

[321] Kelley, WNBA Star Says Women's Basketball Isn't Popular Because Players are Predominantly Black, LGBTQ+ (Oct. 19, 2020), The Hill (as of March 21, 2022).

[322] History, Trailblazing Black Women in Sports (Feb. 4, 2010), History (as of March 21, 2022).

[323] Ibid.

[324] Women's Sports Foundation, Title IX, Women's Sports Foundation (as of April 7, 2022).

[325] Hutchins, et. al., Where are all the women coaches? (Dec. 31, 2019) The New York Times (as of April 7, 2022).

[326] Spruill, The WNBA Has No Black Women in Head Coaching Positions and That's a Problem (Jan. 8, 2020), SB Nation (as of March 21, 2022).

[327] Women's Sports Foundation, The Women's Sports Foundation Report Brief: Her Life Depends On It III & Girls and Women of Color (Jan. 21, 2016), Women's Sports Foundation (as of March 22, 2022).

[328] Women's Sports Foundation, supra.

[329] Demas, Integrating the Gridiron: Black Civil Rights and American College Football (2011), p. 8.

[330] Demas, supra, at pp. 29-33.

[331] Demas, supra, at p. 106.

[332] Ibid.

[333] White, Kap's NFL Absence Still Notable Despite Goodell's Claims (Sep. 7, 2020), NBC Sports (as of March 21, 2022).

[334] Ibid.

[335] Levin, Trump Also Told Colin Kaepernick That He Should Leave the Country (July 15, 2019), Slate as of March 21, 2022).

[336] Levin, supra.

[337] Ibid.

[338] Ibid.

[339] Harper, Black Male Student-Athletes and Racial Inequities in NCAA Division I College Sports (2018), USC Race and Equity Center (as of March 21, 2022).

[340] Ibid.

[341] Ibid.

[342] Ibid.

[343] Ibid.

[344] Ibid.

[345] Ibid.

[346] Austin, "Not Just for the Fun of It!" Governmental Restraints on Black Leisure, Social Inequality, and Privatization of Public Space (1998), Faculty Scholarship at Penn Law, 667-714.

[347] Ibid.

[348] Ibid.

[349] Ibid.

[350] Austin, supra, at p. 669.

[351] Austin, supra, at p. 675.

[352] Ibid.

[353] Austin, supra.

[354] Jefferson, Living the California Dream: African American Leisure Sites During Jim Crow Era (2020) pp. 34-35.

[355] Ibid.

[356] Ibid.

[357] Ibid.

[358] Ibid.

[359] Ibid.

[360] Ibid.

[361] Ibid.

[362] Jefferson, supra, at p. 40.

[363] Ibid.

[364] Jefferson, supra,at p. 42.

[365] Haiek et al., A Black Family Got Their Beach Back—and Inspired Others to Fight Against Land Theft (Oct. 10, 2021), NPR (as of March 21, 2022).

[366] Ibid.

[367] Ibid.

[368] Chappell, The Black Family Who Won the Return of Bruce's Beach Will Sell It Back to LA County (Jan. 4, 2023), NPR (as of May 31, 2023); see also Karlamangla, The Debate Around Bruce's Beach (Mar 9, 2023) N.Y. Times (as of May 31, 2023) (reporting that the land returned to the family was zoned for public use, making it difficult to develop the property).

[369] Richard Winton, Suit Accusing Coach of Racism Stirs Bitter Memories of Pool's Past (April 16, 2021), Los Angeles Times (as of March 21, 2022).

[370] Ibid.

[371] Ibid.

[372] Ibid.

[373] Ibid.

[374] Ibid.

[375] Ibid.

[376] Ibid.

[377] UCLA Library Digital Collections, Parkridge Country Club, Corona, 1925-1928, UCLA Library Digital Collections (as of March 21, 2022).

[378] Ibid.

CHAPTER 10 Stolen Labor and Hindered Opportunity

COURTESY OF E.F. JOSEPH/INTERIM ARCHIVES/GETTY IMAGES

I. Introduction

During enslavement, American government at all levels enabled and benefitted from the direct theft of African Americans' labor. Since then, federal, state, and local government actions have directly segregated and discriminated against African Americans and also paved the way for private discrimination in labor and employment. Federal, state, and local laws and policies, including those of California, have expressly and in practice limited what work African Americans can do and suppressed African Americans' wages and opportunities for professional advancement. Federal laws have also protected white workers while denying the same protections to African American workers, setting up and allowing private discrimination. Government and private discrimination have contributed to the inability of African Americans to build wealth over generations. Although progress has been made, African American workers continue to face serious discrimination today. The badges and incidents of slavery have carried forward. The devaluation of African Americans, their abilities, and their labor did not end. It simply took on different forms.

Around the time of the Civil War, state and local governments passed laws known as the Black Codes and "Jim Crow" laws. While these laws touched all aspects of life, one of their main goals was to control how African Americans earned a living in order to maintain African Americans as a servant class for white Americans. These laws limited African Americans' job opportunities and salaries and their ability to provide for their families.

The federal government itself directly discriminated against African American workers. African American workers were routinely excluded from federal employment until 1861 and, in 1913, President Woodrow Wilson allowed for the federal workforce be segregated. The segregated federal government demoted and relegated African American workers to lower paid jobs, and, for instance, forced African American workers to use separate toilets in the Treasury and Interior Departments. Although the military offered an opportunity for upward mobility for African Americans, its ranks remained segregated until 1960, with lower pay and rank for African American service members. Even as the overall proportion of African American service members has grown, military leadership has remained overwhelmingly white, with only two African American officials out of 41 total holding four-star rank in 2020.

At the Kaiser shipyards, Eastine Cowner, a former waitress, is working as a scaler to build SS George Washington Carver. Richmond, CA. (1943)

COURTESY OF GEORGE RINHART/CORBIS VIA GETTY IMAGES

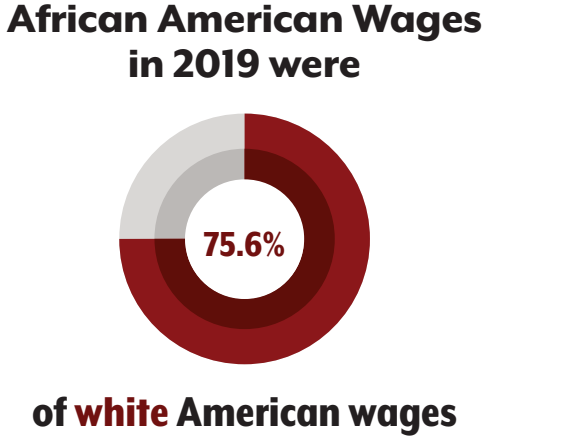
Railway workers with pneumatic drill. Undated photograph.

Although the federal government throughout history has passed laws, implemented policies, and made progress in protecting workers, its efforts were often limited in time and impact, and often left out African American workers due to compromises with racist southern legislators. After the Civil War, the Freedmen's Bureau provided for the welfare of previously enslaved African Americans, but it did so in a manner that reinforced racist notions, and lasted only seven years before being dismantled by Congress under pressure from white southerners. The federal government failed to prevent white Americans from using violence and terror to limit African Americans' ability to earn a living, and certified unions that excluded African American workers. Federal labor protections under the New Deal, which aimed to help American workers' economic prospects, excluded or harmed African Americans.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 included Title VII, which largely banned discrimination on the basis of race in employment. However, it did not remedy the discriminatory workplace structures that have accumulated for hundreds of years. In 1977, the Supreme Court limited these federal protections to only instances where an employee can prove that their employer intended to discriminate against them, an extremely high standard. Federal government affirmative action plans created in the 1970s did lead to an increase in the rate of minority employment in businesses that contracted with the federal government in those years, but an organized backlash has narrowed the scope and impact of these programs since in the early 1980s. Despite some progress in preventing labor discrimination against African American workers, the federal government has made little to no effort to address the harms of past government action.

Research has produced evidence that, as a result of the legacy of enslavement and subsequent and ongoing discrimination, white workers are paid more than African American workers, and African American and white workers are concentrated in different types of jobs.[1] As of 2019, median African American wages were equivalent to only 75.6 percent of white wages, falling from a height of 79.2 percent in 2000. Researchers estimate that between one-quarter to one-third of the wage gap between African American and white workers is due to racial discrimination.[2] Without a safety net of savings, African Americans can be more vulnerable to upheavals in the labor market and less able to advocate for higher wages or other benefits. As of 2020, 19.5 percent of African Americans were living in poverty compared to 8.2 percent of non-Hispanic white Americans.[3] Out of the 2021 S&P 500 and Fortune 500 companies, only six of the chief executive officers of those companies were African Americans.[4] In 2020, African Americans held only 8.7 percent of the board seats in Fortune 500 companies.[5]

Similar patterns of government neglect and discrimination exist in California. African American workers did not hold many government jobs in the state until World War II. When Bay Area Rapid Transit was built in 1967, no skilled African American workers were hired because the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB)-certified unions did not admit African American members. BART, though a government agency, refused to use its power to insist on non-discrimination policies by the unions. In 1996, California changed its constitution to ban the use of affirmative action in government employment and education with Proposition 209. Persistent discrimination and limited affirmative action have prevented African Americans from receiving the same wages and career opportunities as white Americans received with government support.



This chapter recounts this long history and the continuing impact of discrimination in labor and employment. Section III provides a brief summary of enslavement, a subject explored in greater detail in Chapter 2. Section IV discusses discrimination in the laws enacted and government programs carried out from the Civil War forward as well as government support of private discrimination in labor and employment. Section IV also includes discussion of the advances and limitations of civil rights laws. Section V outlines the history of discrimination in government employment. The effects still seen today from centuries of discrimination are summarized in Section VI.

II. Enslavement

The story of African Americans in the United States begins with stolen labor. The purpose of enslavement was to exploit the fruits of African American labor for the benefit of mostly white Americans. For a full discussion of enslavement, please see Chapter 2. The labor of enslaved African Americans built the infrastructure of the nation, filled the nation's coffers, and produced its main agricultural products for domestic consumption and export.[6]

Federal and state law treated African Americans themselves as commodities to be sold by enslavers.[7] This system exploited the labor and love of African American mothers to recreate and grow the enslaved labor force.[8]

Federal and state law exploited the labor and love of Black mothers to create and grow the enslaved labor force. Between 1619 and 1808, 300,000 enslaved people were trafficked to the United States. By 1860, approximately 3.9 million enslaved African Americans lived in the United States. Over the 200-plus years of slavery, enslavers extracted an estimated $14 trillion of free labor from enslaved people.

Over the 200-plus years of slavery's existence in this country, enslavers extracted an estimated $14 trillion of labor from the human beings they enslaved.[9] One recent study estimated that "enslaved workers were responsible for somewhere between 18.7 and 24.3 percent of the increase in commodity output per capita nationally between 1839 and 1859."[10] Through various forms of taxes and tariffs—often structured to protect the interests of enslavers—federal, state, and local governments all reaped financial benefit from this condoned economic activity.[11]

Enslavement effectively led to separate labor markets for Black and white Americans.[12] White workers had access to a larger and more desirable selection of jobs, while free Black workers were relegated to menial labor.[13] Frederick Douglass observed, "Finding my trade of no immediate benefit, I threw off my calking habiliments, and prepared myself to do any kind of work I could get to do."[14]

Although there were fewer legal limitations on African Americans in the North, white workers were more motivated to reduce competition from African Americans.[15] Less threatened by free Black workers in the South, white employers were more likely to employ Black workers in skilled jobs than free Black wage earners in the North.[16] In 1860, for example, approximately 10 percent of Black men in New York City worked in a skilled trade, while in Richmond the figure was 32 percent, and in Charleston, where one third of the population was Black, 76 of Black men worked in a skilled trade.[17] A few years earlier, in 1856, nearly 40 percent of Black artisans in Philadelphia reported that unrelenting racial prejudice had compelled them to abandon their trades.[18]

California

As discussed in Chapter 2, enslavement existed in California into the mid-1860s.[19] Enslavers brought enslaved African Americans with them when they moved west.[20] Additionally, California passed its own fugitive slave law in 1852 and, for the three years that it was in force, it prevented courts from recognizing the freedom of those fleeing to California.[21] California at the time strongly discouraged free African Americans from entering its territories.[22] The relatively few free African Americans who resided in California in the late 1700s and the decades that followed tended to work as fur traders, scouts, cowboys, and miners.[23]

California's lack of government oversight allowed slavery to take hold in certain regions, including where enslavers brought African Americans to mine for gold.[24]

By 1852, 300 enslaved persons were involved in gold mining, with other enslaved persons forced to work in other capacities.[25] The California Fugitive Slave Act, coupled with California's law prohibiting the taking of testimony from an African American person against a white person, posed a threat to the lives of both free and enslaved African American residents.[26]

One enslaver from Mississippi, Charles Perkins, brought three enslaved men, Robert Perkins, Carter Perkins, and Sandy Jones to California in 1849.[27] Perkins later left the men behind with a friend who released them in 1951.[28] The three freed men then set up a freight hauling business that earned them over $3,000 in personal property, worth around $98,000 in 2020 dollars, but in 1852, the California Supreme Court ordered the three back to slavery in Mississippi.[29]

III. Government Support of Private Discrimination

Following the Civil War, Congress created programs to benefit African Americans and passed statutes to protect their rights. But fierce opposition from white government officials undermined these programs and led to their premature end—while the Supreme Court undermined statutory protections, allowing state and local legislatures to impose segregation.

Throughout American history and as discussed in the preceding chapters, local and state governments with the tacit approval of the federal government passed many laws restricting African American conduct. The majority of southern African American families did not own land and were exploited by white landowners in the sharecropping system.[31] African American women were mostly relegated to domestic service jobs until well into the 20th century.[32]

When the federal government aimed to improve labor conditions in the 1930s with the New Deal, federal policies and programs often failed to benefit, or even harmed African Americans, often by design. New Deal programs purposefully linked benefits like healthcare, paid vacations, pensions, tuition benefits, social security, and unemployment benefits to employment with large corporations, which at the time, generally did not hire Black workers.[33] Southern members of the House and Senate from states that passed laws to prevent African American workers from voting were instrumental in structuring the New Deal to exclude industries in which most African American workers were employed, like agriculture, domestic services, and casual labor.[34]

When the federal government tried to remedy the racism faced by African American workers, the actions often lacked power to enact real change and often lasted only a short time.

COURTESY OF CORBIS VIA GETTY IMAGES

The United States government established Freedmen's Villages to house, clothe, and educate freed enslaved people. (c. 1863-1865)

Black Codes and Jim Crow laws aimed to consolidate and maintain economic and political power generally in the hands of white Americans by controlling the type of work available to African Americans, and how that work has been performed.[30] This governmental discrimination against African Americans supported private employment discrimination. Until the Great Migration, as discussed in Chapter 1 and 5, the majority of African Americans lived in the South, and the

Freedmen's Bureau: Short-Lived Paternalism

In the wake of the Civil War, the federal government created programs to aid African Americans and statutes to protect their rights. However, both failed to live up to their promise to give African Americans equal access to economic and labor opportunities or remedy the harms of slavery.

Immediately before the end of the Civil War, Congress created the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands to provide for the welfare of formerly enslaved African Americans, including through "issues of provisions, clothing, and fuel, as [necessary] for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen and their wives and children," according to the statute.[35] Commonly known as the Freedmen's Bureau, the agency had the authority to supervise labor relations in the South, with the mandate to provide education, medical care, and legal protections for formerly enslaved African Americans, along with the authority to rent out and eventually sell allotments of abandoned or confiscated land to free African Americans.[36]

The Federal Freedmen's Bureau withheld services and food in order to force African Americans into labor contracts, prosecuted Black workers, and enforced vagrancy laws to prevent African Americans from moving.

The original goal of the Freedmen's Bureau Act was the more radical notion of allowing African Americans the means to become self-sufficient.[37] In the closing days of the Civil War, Union General William Tecumseh Sherman issued Special Field Order No. 15, setting aside 400,000 acres of confiscated land for those who had been freed, and two months later, the Freedman Bureau's Act formalized the field order, "providing that each negro might have forty acres at a low price on long credit."[38] Many free African Americans and northern Republicans believed that land reform in the South—granting formerly enslaved African Americans access to their own land—was the true way that formerly enslaved people would be free from their enslavers.[39] The resulting independent African American farmers would provide a power base for a new social and political order in the postwar South.[40]

This new vision of social relations in the South was opposed by southerners as well as northerners who opposed enslavement but whose commitment was more to notions of free labor and capitalism than racial equality.[41] A large number of African American landowners would threaten plantations and disrupt the southern economy and social system.[42] White capitalists in the North and South believed that African American freedom should mean African American workers continuing to work on a plantation, although they would now be paid.[43] They did not believe that African Americans should be able to support themselves independently through subsistence farming, which would have led to less cotton being grown and posed a threat to the interests of cotton merchants and other capitalists in the South, elsewhere in the United States, and in Europe.[44] After the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, who had wished to give freed persons "'an interest in the soil,'"[45]Andrew Johnson became president and repudiated Lincoln's promises.[46] Proclaimed Johnson, "This is a country for white men, and by God, as long as I am president, it shall be a government for white men."[47] In less than a full harvest season, the land that Sherman had given to freed persons was returned to the prior owners.[48]

Although the Freedmen's Bureau tried to assert and protect the rights of the formerly enslaved, the Bureau under President Johnson perpetuated racist stereotypes, paternalistic attitudes, and continued to limit African Americans' economic and social power. Bureau agents often viewed formerly enslaved African Americans as children, unprepared for freedom, and needing to be taught the importance of work and wages.[49] The Freedmen's Bureau abandoned the possibility of land reform in the South, and focused on labor relations between African American and white southerners instead.[50]

Bureau agents did protect African American workers' rights by invalidating enslavement-like labor contracts, and they enforced contracts and settled wage disputes at the end of the harvest season.[51] However, the Bureau also harmed African Americans by acting on the racist belief that African Americans avoided work, and it was the Bureau's responsibility to reform such laziness.[52] One commander noted that emancipation only meant "liberty to work, work or starve."[53] General O.O. Howard, director of the Freedmen's Bureau, stated that African Americans must enter into labor contracts regardless of the contract terms because any Black man "who can work has no right to support by the government."[54] To this end, Bureau agents withheld social services and food in order to force African Americans into labor contracts,[55] prosecuted African American workers who broke labor contracts, enforced vagrancy laws, and imposed other restrictions on African Americans' mobility.[56] The Bureau allowed plantation owners to deduct unfairly large sums for supplies and rations, until many workers would receive little wages at all.[57] The wage guidelines for African American workers provided less pay for African American women regardless of their productive capacity.[58]

Nonetheless, the Freedmen's Bureau met severe resistance from southern politicians. In 1866, President Andrew Johnson vetoed the bill extending its existence past one year, and it was only enacted once Congress overrode the veto.[59] Six years later, in 1872, Congress bowed to pressure from white southerners and dismantled the Bureau.[60]

An 1865 Mississippi law required African Americans to enter into a labor contract with white employers by January 1 of every year or risk being in violation. The punishment for violation was a criminal conviction allowing the state or locality to force the African American to work without pay.

Black Codes and Other Laws Controlled African American Workers

Immediately after the Civil War, "Black Codes," passed by state and local governments in both the North and the South, governed the conduct of free African Americans. Free African Americans posed a threat to the racial hierarchy of slavery, and Black Codes were a range of laws to maintain the lower status of African Americans through restrictions on movement and activity, often in order to compel them to work in menial jobs for low pay.[61]

The Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution outlawed the institution of slavery, but it allowed involuntary servitude as a punishment for a crime. Mostly southern state and local governments used this loophole to develop a system of laws, often built around vagrancy laws, that turned African Americans into criminals, and then allowed the government to turn those labeled "criminals" into de facto enslaved persons, forced to labor without pay or freedom of movement.[62] For an in depth discussion of convict leasing, please see Chapter 11.

Vagrancy laws, passed by numerous states, criminalized unemployment.[63] An 1865 Mississippi law required African Americans to enter into a labor contract with white farmers by January 1 of every year or risk being in violation.[64] Violating such laws risked a criminal conviction that allowed the state or locality to force the African American to work without pay.[65] Means of compelling the labor of African Americans persisted even after some forced labor provisions were repealed. Other states "used open-ended fraud and false-pretenses laws to punish [workers] who had received advances and then breached contracts without repayment."[66]

Some jurisdictions used Black Codes to limit opportunities available to African Americans. Some laws prohibited employers from hiring workers who were already under contract; contract labor law gave employers nearly unlimited power over workers and often their family members as well; and individuals who quit jobs could be arrested and returned to their employers.[67] South Carolina enacted a statute in 1869 that criminalized simple breaches of labor contracts.[68] Probate courts could order that African American children be "apprenticed" to their former enslavers.[69] For an in-depth discussion of apprenticeship, please see Chapter 8. In South Carolina, African Americans were required to apply for a permit to do work that was not agriculture.[70] These codes often reinforced enslavement, even after it had been outlawed.

Later, as the Great Migration began, states also enacted laws that discouraged African Americans from migrating to places elsewhere in the country that offered better work opportunities with improved conditions and higher pay. After the Civil War, interstate labor recruiters known as emigrant agents helped African American workers leave the South towards better jobs in the North.[71] The Southern states lost large numbers of workers and even when workers did not move, the possibility of leaving improved African American workers' bargaining power.[72] The Southern states responded by passing laws that required emigrant agents to pay high license taxes.[73] The Supreme Court in 1900 ruled that one such law was constitutional, and allowed Southern states to hinder the ability of poor and rural African American laborers to move towards better jobs elsewhere.[74]

The Supreme Court Announces "Separate but Equal"

In 1866, Congress overrode President Johnson's veto to pass the Civil Rights Act of 1866, the first federal legislation banning discrimination on the basis of race.[75] As discussed in other chapters, the Civil Rights Act of 1866 was aimed at ensuring that African Americans had the same legal rights as white Americans. However, while criminalizing violations committed under color of law, the Act did not provide any civil remedy.[76]

The Civil Rights Act of 1875 allowed individuals to pursue a monetary penalty against businesses and other public accommodations that discriminated against African Americans.[77] This protection lasted only eight years, however, before the Supreme Court in 1883 decided in the Civil Rights Cases that the Fourteenth Amendment did not apply to private parties.[78]

The decision allowed private employers and other businesses to discriminate openly against African Americans with no repercussions.[79] Together with Plessy v. Ferguson in 1896, which condoned the doctrine of "separate but equal," the Supreme Court's decisions created the ability for both private and public employers to entrench an inferior labor market for African American workers, with lower wages, fewer protections, and limited opportunities for advancement for the next 100 years.

Lack of Government Protection from Violence

In both the North and the South, federal, state, and local governments neglected their duty to protect African American workers from violence as a tactic to limit their job opportunities. White land owners, employers, vigilante groups, and others used violence and terror, more closely examined in Chapter 3, to deter African Americans from earning fair wages for their labor and achieving economic success.[80] For decades following Emancipation, lynchings targeted African Americans who attempted to wield some political and economic influence or even take steps as limited as demanding pay for their work.[81] While private actors often were the perpetrators of these brutal killings, federal, state, and local governments, in failing to prosecute racial violence, accepted its use to limit economic and political opportunities of African Americans.[82]

COURTESY OF SMITH COLLECTION/GADO VIA GETTY IMAGES

African-American engineers, working in an apparently segregated office, located in Newport News, Virginia. (1936)

Legal Segregation

During the brief period of Reconstruction following the end of the Civil War until the 1870s, radical Republicans in the federal government passed laws increasing African Americans' economic and labor freedom. This included rights to change employers, keep a portion of crops grown through cooperative labor, and change locations.[83] But this progress was temporary.

After the Union army withdrew from the South, as discussed in Chapters 2, 3, and 4 on enslavement, political disenfranchisement, and racial terror, respectively, southern states passed laws and white Americans used racial terror and violence to prevent African Americans from voting. The southern Democrats took back control of state and local governments across much of the South and built a power base in the federal government.[84] In the South, state and local governments passed laws that created a formal, legally enforced system of segregation.[85] The federal government supported this system with a series of Supreme Court decisions culminating with Plessy v. Ferguson's official acceptance of "separate but equal" Jim Crow segregation regimes in 1896.[86]

To comply with Jim Crow laws, businesses would need to pay to erect segregated workspaces for Blacks, and thus many employers simply refused to hire any Black workers. As a result, most of the jobs available to African Americans were menial service jobs.

Segregation affected all aspects of African Americans' lives, including voting, marriage, education, transportation, access to public accommodations, and labor and working conditions.[87] For example, South Carolina passed a statute that essentially required employers to create two separate work spaces, as it forbid white textile workers from working in the same room or using the same entrances, exits, pay windows, doorways, stairways, or windows at the same time as African American workers.[88] African American textile workers in South Carolina could not use the same "water bucket, pails, cups, dippers or glasses" as white workers.[89] Not only did such laws directly regulate the labor of African Americans, they also made it more expensive to hire African American workers when such additional facilities were required.[90] In order to be compliant with state law, an employer would need to pay twice for compliant facilities if they hired any African American workers.[91] Many employers simply refused to hire any African American workers.[92] As a result, most of the jobs available to African Americans were menial and service jobs.[93]

COURTESY OF LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Photograph shows Sam Williams (center, holding dog), his wife Diccie Williams (center in white), their youngest son Sidney Williams (in front of Sam), and other men, women, and children in a cotton field. (c. 1908)

State and local governments' refusal to enforce the economic and civil rights of African Americans in contract and employment disputes allowed white Americans to exploit and discriminate against African Americans. African Americans in the South mostly remained in agriculture, in a sharecropping or tenant farming system.[94] Sharecropping and tenant farming emerged in the late 1860s and lasted into the 1940s, tying African American workers to agricultural work and rendering them unable to pursue other opportunity.95 A sharecropping or tenancy arrangement typically involved African American workers and tenants paying rent to a white farmer while living and working on the rented land. The tenant farmers purchased supplies—including seed, fertilizer, and tools—on credit from plantation stores that then attached significant markups to the supplies and charged high interest rates, often locking the tenant farmers into a permanent state of debt.[96] Tenants were required to pay off all debts before leaving the farm, and landlords enforced these requirements with threats of violence.[97] For decades, federal authorities did little to limit peonage, even after the Supreme Court declared the practice unconstitutional.[98]

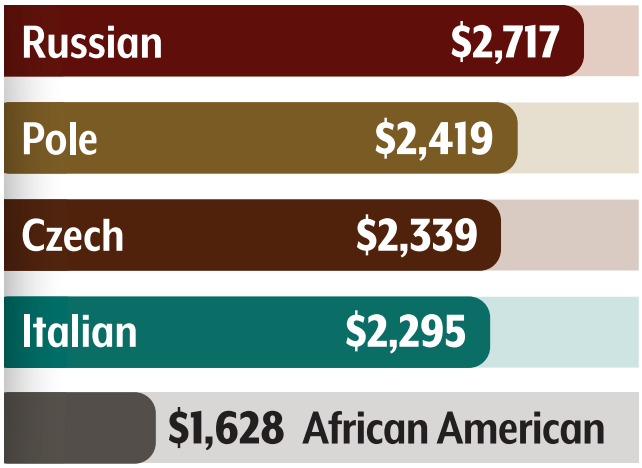
Although the sharecropping system also exploited poor white farmers, an added layer of racial terror plagued African American sharecroppers, with no hope of government or legal protection. In the South, an African American challenged a white American at the risk of severe violence, or death.[99] For example, in 1948, two white Americans beat an African American tenant farmer in Louise, Mississippi, because the African American farmer had asked for a receipt after paying for his water bill.[100] If an African American farmer tried to sell extra agricultural product without the landlord's permission, he could be whipped or killed.[101] "They could never leave as long as they owed the master, That made the planter as much master as any master during slavery, because the sharecropper was bound to him, belonged to him, almost like a slave," the grandson of a sharecropper told Isabel Wilkerson, the Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist and author of both The Warmth of Other Suns: The Epic Story of America's Great Migration and Caste: The Origins of Our Discontents.[102]

"One reason for preferring Negro to white labor on plantations is the inability of the Negro to make or enforce demands for a just statement or any statement at all. He may hope for protection, justice, honesty from his landlord, but he cannot demand them. There is no force to back up a demand, neither the law, the vote nor public opinion... Even the most fair and most just of the Whites are prone to accept the dishonest landlord as part of the system," wrote anthropologist Hortense Powdermaker.[103]

Elsewhere in the country, the Great Migration, as discussed in detail in Chapter 1 and 5, brought African Americans from the South to the North, Midwest, and West. "Blacks, though native born, were arriving as the poorest people from the poorest section of the country with the least access to the worst education[,]" wrote Wilkerson.[104] Largely excluded even from the better paying jobs in even the menial occupations, African American workers in the North and West earned the least money when compared with white recent immigrants at the time.[105] In 1950, African Americans in these regions had an annual income of $1,628.[106] Italian immigrants made $2,295, Czechs made $2,339, Poles made $2,419, and Russians made $2,717.[107]

ANNUAL INCOME DURING GREAT MIGRATION

White immigrant workers verses Black workers



Until well into the 20th century, African American women could mostly only find work as domestic servants for white employers.[108] Following the Civil War, new career opportunities opened up for women in the fields of teaching and nursing.[109] Black women who entered these professions could only work in segregated facilities.[110] A few decades later, private employers hired mostly white women as receptionists, department store clerks, and telephone and machine operators.[111] African American women took over household work as white women, including white immigrant women, moved into these better paying jobs with set work hours.[112]

In both the North and the South, African American female labor participation rates were double those of American-born white women and triple those of immigrant women. During the first half of the 20th century, the number of white female domestic workers fell from 1.3 million to 542,000, while Black women went from accounting for 30 percent of household workers around 1900 to about 60 percent of household workers at the end of World War II.[113] Some African American women working as servants lived in their employer's homes and were on call 24 hours a day.[114] Other African American women resorted to what was colloquially referred to as "slave markets," where they gathered on street corners early in the morning to wait for white housewives to bid on them for as little as fifteen cents an hour.[115] One woman at a Chicago "slave market" reported that she made 50 cents a day—the same money as she would earned for picking cotton in the field.[116]

During the first half of the 20th century, the number of white female domestic workers fell from 1.3 million to 542,000, while Black women went from accounting for 30 percent of household workers around 1900 to about 60 percent of household workers at the end of World War II. Some Black women working as servants lived in their employer's homes and were on call 24 hours a day.

In each of these eras, and through to the present, civil courts did not protect African Americans to the same degree as white Americans. However, there were exceptions. One scholar has found evidence that African Americans used civil courts in one district in Mississippi before the Civil War to vindicate their rights in claims over contracts and wages, and found that in many instances these litigants won their cases.[117]

But discrimination remained built into the law. Several states, including California, prohibited African American persons from testifying against those who were white.[118] African Americans additionally faced de jure and then de facto exclusion from juries.[119] Some states explicitly banned African Americans from jury service, while others tied jury service to voting, which was then limited to white men.[120] Exclusion continued by other means after the Supreme Court in 1879 ruled that a West Virginia statute limiting jury service to white men violated the Fourteenth Amendment.[121] Other forms of discrimination, including segregation, also limited access to justice.[122]

Over time, in addition to the racial terror discussed in Chapter 3 and the political disenfranchisement discussed in Chapter 4, the civil court system also contributed to a failure to protect African Americans against the theft or government taking of property, which often has been a source of income and sustenance. For example, in 1856, an enslaver, Thomas Howlett, directed that his plantation be sold and the proceeds given to his enslaved African American workers, who were to be freed upon his death.[123] Two courts upheld Howlett's will over the challenges of Howlett's white relatives, but the formerly enslaved workers never received the proceeds from the plantation sale.[124]

In another example, in 1964, Alabama sued two cousins, Lemon Williams and Lawrence Hudson, claiming that the 40-acre farm that the family had owned and operated since 1874 belonged to the state.[125] A state court judge ordered Lemon Williams and Lawrence Hudson off the land, though, in the same courthouse, investigating journalists found tax and property records showing that the family owned the farm.[126]

Barriers to justice, including those outlined above and in Chapter 11, continue for African Americans today. While the relationship between race and the civil justice system is under-researched, studies thus far indicate that African Americans under-utilize the civil justice system, including in the area of labor and employment. In a 2016 study conducted by legal scholar and professor Sara Sternberg Greene of low-income minority group attitudes toward the civil justice system, African American respondents were less likely than white American respondents to have considered seeking help for their civil legal issues, largely because of distrust in the legal system.[127] This lack of trust often stems from prior negative experiences.[128] African American people are more likely than white people to experience biased treatment in the judicial system, and individuals who experience discrimination are more likely to anticipate and perceive discrimination across institutional contexts.[129] There is also evidence that African Americans are reluctant to complain when they perceive discrimination or experience other grievances.[130] Additionally, social science research shows that litigants may find their attorneys through their professional networks, and African Americans have more limited professional networks.[131]

Underutilization of the civil justice system and lack of access to justice have particular impact in the area of labor and employment. African Americans hold a significant share of low-wage jobs, in sectors in which wage theft is prevalent, and yet the available evidence indicates that African Americans rarely bring wage theft claims.[132] African Americans are more likely than white Americans to file a discrimination lawsuit without a lawyer.[133] A 2010 study found that African Americans are half as likely as white Americans to have a lawyer.[134] In general, less than five percent of worker discrimination claims go to trial and result in a ruling for the plaintiff,[135] and self-represented litigants are significantly less likely to achieve a favorable outcome in a discrimination suit.[136]

Exclusion from Unions

Legal segregation laws not only confined African American workers in the South, but also impacted the economy of the entire country.[137] Segregation pitted workers of different races against one another, resulting in continued suppression of opportunity for Black workers and less collective power for workers of all races.138 Unions have a lengthy history in the United States as craftsmen have long joined together to solve problems related to their craft.[139] In the 18th century, strikes, labor organizing, and collective bargaining developed at the same time, and the first authenticated strike was called in 1786 by Philadelphia printers.[140] Unions reached their peak around World War II, as unions grew at the rate of approximately one million workers per year.[141]

Prior to World War II, many unions refused to accept Black people as members. Since before the Civil War, white workers have claimed that Black workers were not suited to skilled labor in order to avoid competition for jobs. In the North, companies and unions did not hire Black workers because white workers refused to work beside them, and for the sake of morale, the companies and unions would not force the issue. White workers sometimes walked off the job to force their employers to rid their workplace of Black employees.

Prior to World War II, many unions refused to accept African American people as members.[142] Since before the Civil War, white workers have claimed that Black workers were not suited to skilled labor in order to avoid competition for jobs.[143] In the North, companies and unions did not hire African American workers because white workers refused to work beside them, and for the sake of morale, the companies and unions would not force the issue.[144] White workers sometimes walked off the job to force their employers to rid their workplace of African American employees.[145]

Throughout the nineteenth century trade unions organized by white workers typically excluded African American workers; in 1902, African American workers scarcely made up three percent of members in unions.[146] In response to exclusion, African American workers sometimes formed their own unions.[147] For example, in 1869, African American delegates attended the Colored National Labor Union convention in Washington, D.C., which was a counterpart to the white National Labor Union.[148]

Government action sometimes supported labor unions' discrimination against African American workers.[149] For example, when the city of St. Louis built a segregated hospital for African American patients, white union members protested the hiring of a single African American tile setter.[150] The city fired the contractor and committed not to hire any contractor that employed African American workers.[151]

Legal segregation both reflected and intensified racial tension between workers. Segregation made contact between African American and white workers almost impossible, ensuring that African American and white workers would inhabit different worlds and making labor organizing across racial lines more dangerous and less likely to occur.[152] Legal segregation not only held down the wages of African American working-class Americans, it also prevented working class white workers from demanding higher pay, as long as African American workers could always be forced to work for less.[153]

The American Federation of Labor, founded in 1886 and survived today by the AFL-CIO, initially strived for racial equality[154] as leaders recognized the value of a united working class[155] However, legal segregation in the South proved to be too influential and federation leadership allowed local affiliates to exclude African American workers.[156]

African American workers protested exclusion throughout the 1920s[157] and 1930s.[158] The Federation's leaders' formal response was that the Federation did not discriminate, "human nature cannot be altered," and African American individuals ought to be grateful for what the Federation had done for them.[159]

Scholars have argued that legal segregation discouraged white and African American workers from working together for better working conditions and fostered a racial division that served the interests of southern planters and industrialists.[160] For example, beginning in the 1880s, African American and white tenant farmers and sharecroppers began to join biracial political parties to challenge the political and business elite of the South.[161] Scholars such as Jacqueline Jones, who testified before the Task Force, have argued that legal segregation and private racial discrimination were used to disrupt this burgeoning biracial political force.[162]

For example, before the Civil War, African American women, men, and children worked in the South. After the war, southern textile-mill owners reserved those jobs for white families, and advertised hazardous mill work as a welcome escape from sharecropping.[163] This drove a wedge between the African American and white rural poor.[164]

Exclusion from Occupational Licenses

Unions also played a part in how states excluded African American workers from skilled, higher paying jobs through what eventually became state licensure laws. A license from a state entity is required to practice some professions and trades, like electricians and doctors.[165] State, and sometimes local, governments, have designed these licensing requirements so that Black workers are less likely to qualify, which has intensified the impact of discrimination by private employers and unions.[166]

State licensure systems worked in parallel to exclusion by unions and professional societies[167] in a way that has been described by scholars as "particularly effective" in excluding Black workers from skilled, higher paid jobs.[168] White craft unions implemented unfair tests, conducted exclusively by white examiners to exclude qualified Black workers.[169]

For example, across the country from the late 1890s through the late 1930s, state laws allowed local mayors or city councils to appoint the members of the licensing board for plumbers.[170] This meant that the local plumbers' unions could exert significant influence over who sat on the licensing board.[171] From there, the boards erected barriers to avoid licensing African American plumbers, such as requiring a union apprenticeship—from which African American individuals were banned—before an applicant could even qualify to take a licensing exam.[172] Other barriers included a high school diploma, which was more difficult for Black workers due to education discrimination (as discussed in Chapter 6, Separate and Unequal Education), passing a personal interview conducted by a white person, or sometimes, even false test scores.[173]

COURTESY OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY ARCHIVE/UNIVERSAL IMAGES GROUP VIA GETTY IMAGES

"Housekeeper Pushing Young Girl on Toy Cart on Sidewalk, Port Gibson, Mississippi." (1940)

These methods, which were used by other professions as well,[174] did not ban African American workers outright. Because these statutes were outwardly neutral, courts have repeatedly found that they were constitutional without questioning the discriminatory motives and impact.[175] A few courts recognized the dangers of allowing licensing boards to control entry into the profession, but not enough to stem the tide.[176]

Government support made the discrimination worse. In Virginia, a white plumber explained his state's law requiring members of the plumber's union be part of the licensing board: [T]he Negro is a factor in this section, and I believe the enclosed Virginia state plumbing law will entirely eliminate him and the impostor from following our craft."[177] By 1924, 24 states and Puerto Rico had similar laws in place.[178]

And these laws were effective.[179] In 1973, Montgomery County, Alabama had only one licensed African American plumber, who, despite having spent four years studying the trade, was told he failed the local exam each time he took it. He was not allowed to see his exam papers or told what his score was. He was finally able to obtain a local license after passing the state master plumber's exam.[180]

Charlotte, North Carolina, similarly had only one African American plumber in 1968, and in Maryland in 1953, only two of the 3,200 licensed plumbers were African American.[181] The impact of these exclusionary efforts is still felt today: In 2021, the Bureau of Labor Statistics estimated that 87.2 percent of plumbers are white and only 7.1 percent are African American.[182]

The use of licensure to regulate jobs increased dramatically after the 1950s, when only five percent of professions required licensure in the United States.[183] In 2018, roughly 21.8 percent of professions required licensure.[184] Some of the reasons for this increase include trying to professionalize and legitimize certain jobs and an overall growth of fields that have historically required licensure.[185]

Regardless of the reason, one result of the growth is that discriminatory licensing standards have become more widespread. Even if these standards did not intend to exclude African American workers, the result was exclusion. One such method today is the bans on licensure for people with criminal records.

As discussed in Chapter 12, Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect, state and federal governments have criminalized African Americans throughout our nation's history, resulting in African Americans being more likely to have criminal records without necessarily committing crimes at higher rates than other races or ethnicities.[186] Race discrimination and disproportionality in the criminal justice system thus combine with laws like those excluding persons with criminal justice system involvement from licensure to close off avenues for work.

It is difficult for people with criminal records, who are disproportionately African American, to find jobs, even if their records are old or have little to do with the job, or if they have demonstrated rehabilitation.[187] When a license is required those challenges can become insurmountable. One 2016 study showed that there were 27,254 state occupational licensing restrictions against people with criminal records nationwide, 12,669 of which involve restrictions on licensure for people with any type of felony conviction and 6,372 of which involve restrictions for people with misdemeanor convictions.[188] 19,786 licensure restrictions were lifetime bans and 11,338 were mandatory and allowed no discretion by the board.[189] In some instances, upon release, formerly incarcerated persons cannot work in the very professions for which prison job rehabilitation programs trained them.[190] For example, while many prisons provide training programs on barbering, laws in every state prevent a formerly incarcerated person from working as a barber.[191]

Recently, efforts have begun to reform these criminal record exclusions.[192] Several states have now passed laws to revise licensing restrictions related to people's criminal records.[193] But thousands of restrictions still remain. A database funded by the United States Department of Justice shows that there are currently 12,989 consequences of having a criminal record for various licenses nationwide.[194]

Discrimination in Promotion and Pay

During World War I, African American workers began to make headway in previously white workplaces and industries. African American men took blue collar jobs previously held by immigrants who had shifted employment to the war effort; African American women took jobs previously held by white women and boys.[195] African American workers might earn 300 percent more doing industrial labor in the North than they earned doing agricultural labor in the South.[196] As discussed in Chapters 1 and 5, these job opportunities in the North and West led approximately three million African Americans to migrate from the South between World War I and World War II, and another five million to move between 1940 and 1980.[197]

Wherever they landed in the North, the Midwest, or the West, African Americans found more discrimination, which translated into racial job ceilings, pay differentials, and segregation by job type.[198] For example, Ford Motor Company refused to employ African American workers at a level above general labor outside of the Detroit area, and in the Chicago stockyards African American workers were excluded from jobs as foremen, as they were not permitted to supervise white workers.[199]

For example, Ford Motor Company refused to employ Black workers at a level above general labor outside of the Detroit area, and in the Chicago stockyards Black workers were excluded from jobs as foremen, as they were not permitted to supervise white workers.

In the urban industrial South, African American workers were categorized in lower-level jobs "helping" white workers, who would simply supervise work while taking home the higher wage.[200] One African American employee at the Firestone Company's Memphis plant described how: "You'd be classified as a 'helper,' but you'd be doing all the work. The white man would get the high wage … [but] he'd just be sittin' there watchin'."[201] As a result,

COURTESY OF KEYSTONE-FRANCE/GAMMA-KEYSTONE VIA GETTY IMAGES

Building site with whites on one side and African Americans on the other. (c. 1950)

African American workers were penalized both with lower wages and fewer advancement opportunities.

Black workers were often only hired in jobs that were far more physically dangerous.[202] For example, Ford Motor Company's foundry, where many African American workers were employed, had a lack of safety equipment, poor ventilation, and management-induced speed-ups that lead to worker injury and death.[203] One foundry worker described others finished a shift "so matted and covered with oil and dirt that no skin showed...we could [only] tell a friend by his voice."[204]

This pattern continued across manufacturing sectors for decades. African American workers were limited to lower-paying categories, barred from supervisory roles, and denied opportunities for advancement. For example, by 1970, one-fifth of autoworkers in Detroit were Black, but Black workers remained all but completely excluded from higher-level positions.[205]

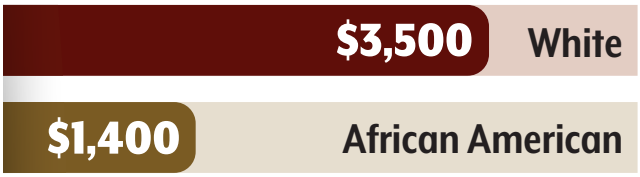
In 1968, African American autoworkers formed the Dodge Revolutionary Union Movement to protest racism at the plant. A writer in the organization's newsletter laid out the stark segregation and discrimination then present at the plant:

1. "95% of all foremen in the plants are white;
2. 99% of all the general foremen are white;
3. 100% of all plant superintendents are white;
4. 90% of all skilled tradesmen are white;
5. 90% of all apprentices are white; (6)...systematically all of the easier jobs are held by whites;
6. Whenever whites are on harder jobs they have helpers;
7. When Black workers miss a day they are required to bring 2 doctors' excuses as to why they missed work;
8. ...seniority is also a racist concept, since Black workers were systematically denied employment for years at the plant."[206]

This trend was not limited to manufacturing. In 1950, salaries of college-educated workers, in both the North and South, were significantly lower for African Americans across industries. For example, African American managers averaged an annual salary of around $1,400, while white managers averaged closer to $3,500.[207] In today's dollars, this translates to a monthly salary of approximately $1,396 for African American managers and $3,489 for white managers.[208] Discrepancies like this existed in professional, teaching, farming, clerical, sales, and skilled technician occupations as well.[209]

SALARY OF COLLEGE EDUCATED WORKERS

By Race in 1950

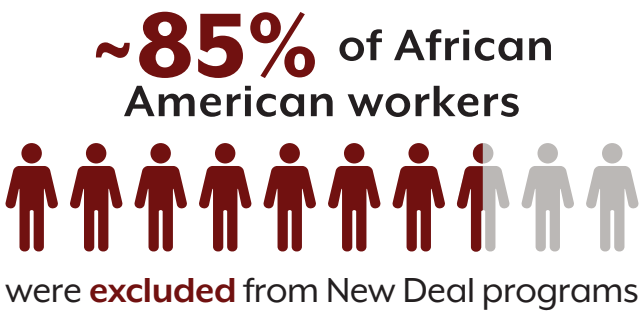


Exclusion from New Deal Protections

In the 1930s, the federal government under President Franklin D. Roosevelt sought to remake the relationship between employer and employees.[210] The New Deal transformed American society and set in motion the creation of the middle class[211]—but for white Americans.[212] The New Deal reshaped the role of the federal government in providing for American citizens.[213] Programs funded under the New Deal infused a huge amount of capital into the economy. Two researchers have estimated that the federal government spent almost $27 billion on various New Deal public works programs between 1933 and 1943.[214]

Southern Democrats, who rose to power by preventing African Americans from voting through a combination of violence and voter suppression laws, forced President Roosevelt essentially to exclude African Americans from New Deal programs and legislation.[215] While northern liberals at the time would not support explicitly racist language in the programs and statutes, the Southern Democrats' racist aim was accomplished in the structure of the programs themselves.[216] In order to pass numerous

New Deal laws, President Roosevelt compromised with the Southern Democrats to ensure their votes by largely excluding jobs mostly held by African Americans from the New Deal's protections like unemployment insurance, minimum wages, equalized bargaining power, or anti-child labor laws.[217] Agricultural and domestic-service workers, and anyone with seasonal or part-time jobs, were excluded from these benefits.[218] Approximately 85 percent of all African American workers in the United States at the time were excluded,[219] although some historians disagree that federal lawmakers intended to discriminate against African Americans.[220]



Congress also compromised to allow New Deal programs to be administered at the local level.[221] By the design of the Southern Democrats in Congress, southern local white government officials were in control of local relief efforts—individuals who held the view that African Americans should not receive relief of any kind if white southerners had laundry to be done or cotton to be picked.[222] While African American northerners received some governmental jobs and assistance, African American southerners did not.[223]

The following is a non-exhaustive list of labor-related New Deal laws and programs and the ways in which they have discriminated against African Americans. Many of the New Deal laws created the foundational structures that continue to provide Americans with a social safety net today.

National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933

The National Industrial Recovery Act created the National Recovery Agency, which established industry-specific minimum wages and employment protections. The National Recovery Agency eventually enacted over 540 codes providing for minimum wages and maximum hours in different industries.[224]

Many employers advocated for explicitly racist codes before the agency—one argued that African American workers made "a much better workman and a much better citizen, insofar as the South is concerned, when he is not paid the highest wage."[225] While explicit race-based codes were not adopted, the structure of geographic and occupational classifications in the codes often accomplished the same goal. An industry code would classify a state as either "Northern" or "Southern" for the purpose of setting a minimum wage, with "Southern" states often having a lower minimum.[226] And different occupations, governed by different codes, had different minimum wages. One example demonstrates how the government used both geographic and occupational classifications and exclusions to pay African American workers less and provide them fewer protections. Delaware was classified as being "Northern"—and thus subject to a higher minimum wage—for 449 industry codes, but was classified as being "Southern"—and thus subject to a lower minimum wage—for the fertilizer industry, where African American workers made up 90 percent of the industry.[227] John P. Davis, in a speech to the 25th Annual Conference of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in 1934 stated: "[T]he one common denominator in all these variations is the presence or absence of Negro labor. Where most workers in a given industry are Negro, that section is called South and inflicted with low wage rates. Where Negroes are negligible, the procedure is reversed."[228]

The purpose of the occupational and geographic differentials in the wage codes was clear to those involved in implementing the National Industrial Recovery Act at the time. The Executive Director of the National Recovery Agency's Labor Advisory Board wrote in 1934: "[T]o the degree the Southern rate is a rate for Negroes, it is a relic of slavery and should be eliminated."[229] That same year, Ira De A. Reid, of the National Urban League, wrote in the newspaper the Chicago Defender: "the Negro's initial attitude towards the national recovery act is best reflected in the interpretation of initials given by one observer who called it 'Negro Riddance Act.'"[230]

National Labor Relations Act of 1935 (Wagner Act)

The National Labor Relations Act of 1935 (NLRA or Wagner Act), proposed by Senator Robert Wagner, dramatically increased the power of organized labor by allowing officially certified unions in certain sectors the right to negotiate on behalf of all employees, if supported by a majority of workers.[231] The National Labor Relations Board (NLRB), the agency designated to administer the law, was abl -e to hold hearings and resolve disputes involving union representation.

The NLRA harmed African Americans by purposefully allowing unions to discriminate based on race and by failing to cover sectors of the economy that mostly employed African Americans.[232] This undermined the bargaining power of African American workers and their ability to participate in the newly-recovering economy for decades.[233]

Labor unions have played a critical role in the development of American society and the day-to-day experience of the American worker. During and after the New Deal, workers' and employers' power was uniquely balanced, which enabled an unprecedented improvement in the condition of the working class in America, the benefits of which continue to be seen today.[234] For example, workers with strong unions have been able to set industry standards for wages and benefits that help all workers, both union and nonunion.[235] "Union workers are more likely to be covered by employer-provided health insurance. More than nine in 10 workers covered by a union contract (94%) have access to employer-sponsored health benefits, compared with just 68 percent of nonunion workers."[236] As another example, union workers also have greater access to paid sick days. Nine in 10 workers covered by a union contract (91 percent) have access to paid sick days, compared with 73 percent of nonunion workers.[237]

While African American leaders proposed amendments to the NLRA to prohibit government certification of a union that did not allow African American workers to join and have all rights, the American Federation of Labor, the principal white-dominated federation of craft unions, opposed this protection due to its desire to eliminate competition from African American workers.[238] The American Federation of Labor and Southern Democrats won, and the final law protected the bargaining rights of unions with racist membership policies. This gave white labor organizers the power to exclude African American workers from contract negotiations and implement their racist views in the union contracts, protected by the federal government.[239]

The final law also excluded agricultural and domestic workers, another compromise to the Southern Democrats.[240]

Federal law essentially allowed unions to ignore and discriminate against African American workers by protecting segregated unions. Unions refused to admit African American workers or afford them the privileges of membership, segregated African American workers into less-skilled jobs, and used collective bargaining rights to force employers to replace African American workers with white workers, while the NLRB, the federal agency charged with administering the NLRA, stood out of the way.[241] For example, the NLRB-certified Building Service Employees Union in New York forced Manhattan hotels, restaurants, and offices to replace African American elevator operators and restaurant workers with white employees, and the federal agency took no action in response.[242]

In 1944, the U.S. Supreme Court held that unions were obligated to represent their members without discriminating on the basis of race, but did not require them to eliminate racial segregation in their membership or provide African American union members with a mechanism for enforcing their civil rights.[243]

Only in 1964 did the federal agency finally decide that it could revoke a union's government certificate due to its racial segregation.[244] Even then, individual African American workers still had limited recourse against racist union leadership. Employees subject to a racist union could not deal directly with their employer instead.[245] Additionally, even after the NLRB stopped certifying whites-only unions, seniority rules meant that African American workers would need years to secure wages comparable to those of white workers.[246]

Federal law essentially allowed unions to ignore Black workers by maintaining segregated unions, segregating Black workers into less-skilled jobs, locking them out of contract negotiations, and using collective bargaining rights to force employers to replace Black workers with white workers.

Social Security Act of 1935

The Social Security Act of 1935 created old-age and unemployment benefits to help seniors and those out of work. This landmark law followed the same pattern as the rest of the New Deal legislation in limiting how its benefits applied to African Americans through occupational carve outs for agricultural and domestic labor, and allowing local rather than federal administration,[247] although some historians dispute the allegation that Congress acted with racist intent in making these carve outs.[248] The Social Security Act created several programs that remain central to the government's efforts to ensure some minimal level of financial stability, including retirement insurance, unemployment insurance, and Aid to Families with Dependent Children programs.[249]

During the debate over the Social Security Act, Congress acknowledged the preponderance of African American workers in the agricultural and domestic labor sectors, but excluded these occupations despite accusations of racism.[250] Charles H. Houston testified on behalf of the NAACP: "In these States, where your Negro population is heaviest, you will find the majority of Negroes engaged either in farming or else in domestic service, so that, unless we have some provisions which will expressly extend the provisions of the bill to include domestic servants and agricultural workers, I submit that the bill is inadequate . . . "[251]

African Americans advocated for a nondiscrimination provision in the statute as protection from the racist local administration of previous New Deal relief statutes. For example, one activist pointed out that in the local administration of past emergency measures "there ha[d] been repeated, wide-spread, and continued discrimination on account of race or color as a result of which Negro men, women, and children did not share equitably and fairly in the distribution of the benefits accruing from the expenditure of such Federal Funds."[252] Congress did not include any such provision in order to secure the support of Southern Democrats.

COURTESY OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY ARCHIVE/UNIVERSAL IMAGES GROUP VIA GETTY IMAGES

Nine-year-old boy receiving twenty cents for hamper of beans he picked for a contract farmer, Homestead, Florida (1939)

Charles H. Houston expressed the view of many African Americans: "If we follow the history of the workmen's compensation acts, we know that two great classes of workers who will be excluded from the benefit of unemployment insurance; they are agricultural workers and domestic workers. Again, 3 out of every 5 Negro workers drop through the holes of the sieve."[253]

Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938

The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (FLSA), which is still in force today, provides the federal minimum wage, the maximum number of working hours before overtime pay is required, and the limits on child labor. Like other New Deal laws, in order to appease Southern Democrats, the law purposefully excluded certain occupational categories, like agriculture and domestic services, preventing the majority of African Americans from benefiting from the law's protections.[254] Because of these exclusions, the FLSA essentially outlawed child labor in industrial settings, where most white children worked at the time, and allowed child labor in agricultural and domestic work, where most African American children worked.[255]

Like other New Deal laws, the Fair Labor Standards Act excluded agriculture and domestic services from its labor protections. Because of these exclusions, the FLSA essentially outlawed white child labor and continued to allow Black child labor, because most white children worked in industrial settings and most Black children worked in agriculture.

Members of Congress were clear about the racist intent. For example, Florida Representative J. Mark Wilcox explicitly stated: "You cannot put the Negro and the white man on the same basis and get away with it. Not only would such a situation result in grave social and racial conflicts but it would also result in throwing the Negro out of employment and in making him a public charge. There just is not any sense in intensifying this racial problem in the South, and this bill cannot help but produce such a result."[256]

Congressman Cox of Georgia specifically objected to the possibility of equal wages because of the impact it would have on relieving the economic subjugation of African Americans central to the social organization of the South, stating the FLSA "will, in destroying State sovereignty and local self-determination, render easier the elimination and disappearance of racial and social distinctions."[257] As with other New Deal legislation, Congress included the agricultural and domestic service exemptions in order to secure the support from Southern Democrats needed to pass the legislation at all.[258]

Thus, when the FLSA passed without applying to agricultural or domestic workers, or to employers engaged in intrastate commerce such as service workers, it achieved the explicit aims of the drafting Congress. Like the other New Deal legislation, it accomplished the withholding of protections from many African Americans through these "race-neutral" occupational exclusions. These carve outs remained until the 1970s, and agricultural workers are still excluded from overtime protections.[259]

As originally enacted, the FLSA did not address pay for tipped workers.[260] While tipping prior to the Civil War had been frowned upon by many as an aristocratic, European practice incompatible with American democracy, after the war many restaurants and rail operators embraced tipping as a means of hiring newly freed African Americans without actually paying them—these workers were forced to labor for tips alone.[261] Tipping thus kept African American workers in an economically and socially subordinate position.[262]

Later the Supreme Court held that employers could count workers' tips toward their wages when calculating whether a worker was receiving minimum wage.[263] Employers did not need to pay their employees at all as long as workers' income from tips met or exceeded the established federal minimum wage.[264] Congress did not require a base wage for tipped employees until 1966.[265] Set then as fifty percent of the federal minimum wage, the tipped federal hourly minimum cash wage stands today at $2.13, where it has been for more than a quarter century.[266] The employer must make up the difference between this amount and the federal minimum hourly wage of $7.25 only if the employee's tips combined with the direct wages of at least $2.13 per hour do not equal the federal minimum hourly wage.[267]

The Federal Emergency Relief Administration (FERA) provided funding for state and local government programs in public works and the arts, and provided more than 20 million jobs. From 1935 to 1941 fewer than 20 percent of all WPA workers were women and only about three percent were Black women. Projects to train women in domestic skills were often explicitly limited to only white women.

Today's tipped wage system carries the legacy of slavery. While African American workers no longer are over-represented in the tipped workforce, studies of the restaurant industry have revealed that diners consistently tip African American servers less than white servers, regardless of service quality.[268] And 17 percent of tipped working people of color live in poverty, compared to less than 13 percent of all tip workers.[269]

Federal Emergency Relief Administration (1933 to 1935) and Works Progress Administration (1935 to 1941)

The Federal Emergency Relief Administration (FERA) provided funding for state and local government programs in public works and the arts, and provided more than 20 million jobs.[270] But the program disproportionately spent its funds on unemployed white workers, frequently refusing to hire African American workers for anything except unskilled work, and paying less than the officially stipulated wage.[271] One local administrator stated that "he had to tailor relief ...to accommodate the demands of southern plantation owners for cheap farm labor by curtailing [the level of] relief payments to agricultural laborers and sharecroppers."[272]

The Works Progress Administration (WPA) replaced FERA in 1935, but continued its racist and often sexist practices. For example, driven by the presumption that men were the primary earners and most in need of jobs amoung needy families, most projects created heavy construction-type work for men, ignoring women's wage needs and limiting their opportunities.[273] From 1935 to 1941 fewer than 20 percent of all WPA workers were women and only about three percent were African American women.[274] Projects to train women in domestic skills were often explicitly limited to only white women.[275] Government officials specifically pushed African American workers out of WPA jobs when local conditions required cheap agricultural labor. In Oklahoma, a WPA official closed an African American women's work project when there was a large cotton crop, writing to Washington, D.C.: "these women are perfectly able to do this kind of work and there is plenty of work to do."[276]

Civilian Conservation Corps (1933 to 1942)

The Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC), a public works program focused on conservation projects, employed over 2.5 million men during its tenure—African American and white women were completely excluded—just 10 percent of whom were African American men.[277] While this was somewhat similar to the percentage of African Americans in the population at large, the conditions of the CCC replicated the racist government intervention seen in other programs, with explicitly limited participation numbers, official segregation at work camps, and with African American workers restricted to the least-desirable unskilled jobs.[278] For example, in Georgia, local selection agents refused to enroll a single African American applicant for almost a year, and only relented and enrolled a token number of African Americans after federal agents threatened to withhold the state's entire allotment of funds.[279]

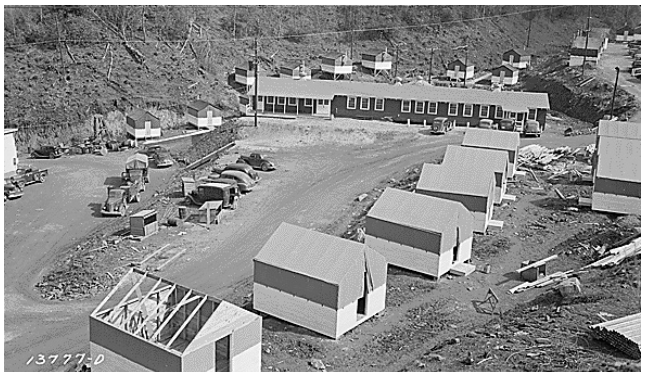
Tennessee Valley Authority

The Tennessee Valley Authority was a public utility created by the federal government to bring jobs and development to an area hit especially hard in the Depression. The project included construction, conservation, and social service jobs, and it remains one of the largest utilities in the country today.[280] It too continued the pattern of the other government works programs. African American workers were assigned to work separately on construction projects, and were only allowed to work at all if there were enough African American workers to make up a full segregated crew.[281] African American workers were also denied foreman or supervisory roles.[282]

COURTESY OF NATIONAL ARCHIVES



Tennessee Valley Authority. Fontana Dam, North Carolina. "Negro tent camp." (1942)

Agricultural Adjustment Administration

The federal government created the Agricultural Adjustment Administration (AAA) in 1933 to increase agricultural prices by paying farmers to grow fewer crops.[283] The administration of the AAA harmed African American workers in three specific ways.

First, the program reduced crop planting. For example, the agency limited the amount of land dedicated to cotton farming, but allowed each white landowner to decide which acres to stop cultivating, and most often they chose those worked by African American tenant farmers and sharecroppers.[284]

Second, landowners received federal payments, but the federal administration allowed white landowners to act as "trustees" for their African American tenants without oversight from the AAA.[285] Often, landowners never paid their African American tenants.[286]

Third, the AAA allowed disputes over payments to be brought to local elected county committees, and not a single African American farmer served on a county committee throughout the South.[287] The county committees, composed of white landlords and white tenants, ruled against African American tenants and directed the vast majority of benefits for the program to white farm owners.[288] In 1934, Ira De A. Reid of the National Urban League said that "[s]o far as the Negroes in the South are concerned the AAA [and other New Deal Agencies] might just as well be administered by the Ku Klux Klan."[289]

Fair Employment Practices Committee

Faced with enormous activist pressure, President Roosevelt during World War II attempted to protect African American workers, but these actions were temporary and did not have serious enforcement powers. In the lead up to World War II, civil rights activists demanded desegregation of the defense industry. Following a 1941 meeting of civil rights groups from across the country, activists formed the March on Washington Movement with the aim of using mass protest to desegregate the military and industrial workplaces that were central to the war effort.[290] Soon the movement had spread across the country, with local chapters from San Francisco to Washington, D.C.[291]

By June 1941, 100,000 or more African American workers from across the country were expected to march on the nation's capital, alarming President Roosevelt at the prospect of a mass protest in Washington, D.C. on the eve of the country's entry into war.[292] In response, he issued Executive Order 8802, which both banned discrimination on the basis of race in government employment, defense industries, and training programs and created the Fair Employment Practices Committee (FEPC) to investigate and address complaints of race discrimination.[293] While a step forward, FEPC had power over only public-financed wartime industries, and it did not have any real enforcement power. It was only able to issue recommendations, including the cancellation of defense contracts in cases of persistent discrimination.[294]

FEPC's impact varied around the country. From March 1942 to 1944, African American employment in war-production jobs rose from under three percent to over eight percent, and some African American workers found jobs as skilled labor in manufacturing and minor managerial roles.[295] The most progress was made in places where African American activists, progressive unions, and local civil rights organizations worked together with FEPC investigations to pressure for change. In St. Louis, a large March on Washington Movement chapter agitated to reinstate African American workers at a local arms plant, raise wages, and increase hiring of African American women. The organization used its resources to file and pursue FEPC complaints, justifying the establishment of a regional office to address the concerns of African American works, but pursued this official action hand-in-hand with mass rallies to general grassroots support.[296]

Under the weak enforcement system, other geographic areas were less successful. Both public officials and private employers in several southern cities refused to provide integrated defense employment, and the federal government did not force action.[297] FEPC had no mechanism to act against Alabama Governor Frank Dixon, who supported employment of African American war workers only within the bounds of the segregationist system already in place in the southern states.[298] FEPC disbanded in 1946 as the war ended, thus ending a temporary attempt of limited effectiveness to address labor discrimination.[299]

Between 1964 and the late 1970s, the federal government enacted affirmative action programs which increased the number of minority groups in government contracting work until the Supreme Court and the Reagan Administration effectively ended federal affirmative action in the 1980s.

Gains and Limitations of the Civil Rights Acts

Congress passed a series of civil rights laws in the 1960s prohibiting discrimination in employment, voting, and housing. Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 outlawed employment discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.[300]

Title VII created strong protection for African American workers throughout the country, making it illegal for an employer to (1) fail to hire or discriminate against a worker, or (2) limit job opportunities because of that worker's "race, color, religion, sex, or national origin."[301]

The law protects workers against current racial discrimination and segregation practices, but does not provide a way to right past wrongs.[302] It exempts "bona fide" seniority systems and professionally developed ability tests.[303] The former are also known as "last hired, first fired" systems, and the latter include tests developed as part of an application process, such as for firefighters, even though these can be employed in a discriminatory manner.[304] Strict adherence to a seniority system means that "last hired" African American workers, who more recently moved into positions now that racist discrimination is outlawed, will be "first fired," under the systems allowed by the law.[305] In 1977, the Supreme Court held that Title VII did not outlaw these seniority systems even when they discriminate against African American workers, stating that a seniority policy "does not become unlawful under Title VII simply because it may perpetuate pre-Act discrimination."[306]

Title VII is limited in other ways as well. The Supreme Court also drew a line between intentional and unintentional discrimination.[307] Currently, Title VII protects an employee if they can show that their employer intended to discriminate against them,[308] which can be difficult to prove. If the employee cannot prove their employer's racist intentions, Title VII protects them only if the challenged employment practice is not "job related" or not "consistent with business necessity."[309] For example, in Griggs v. Duke Power Company, the defendant company required a high school diploma or passing an intelligence test for certain jobs. Neither requirement was related to successful job performance, and both requirements disqualified African American applicants at a substantially higher rate than white applicants.[310] The requirements did not fulfill a genuine business need and was thus prohibited by the Act.[311] In 1965, Congress formed a federal agency called the Equal Opportunity Employment Commission to enforce Title VII and other employment statutes and regulations. The commission, which continues today, covers all industries, and not just wartime industries, like its predecessor, the Fair Employment Practices Committee.[312] It also has enforcement powers to assess penalties and issue orders, instead of only making recommendations.[313] However, the agency has been chronically underfunded, which has limited its ability to widely enforce federal protections against racial discrimination in a large number of cases.[314] The agency's staff numbers decreased from 3,390 to 1,968 between 1980 and 2018 despite the U.S. population increasing by more than 44 percent in that time.[315]

Limits of Affirmative Action

As the Civil Rights Acts were only forward-looking, between 1964 and the late 1970s, the federal government enacted affirmative action programs intended to address the effects of past racist discrimination and segregation.[316] These programs increased the number of underrepresented groups in government contracting work until the Supreme Court and the Reagan Administration in the 1980s effectively brought many federal affirmative action programs to an end.

In 1965, President Lyndon B. Johnson issued Executive Order 11246, which required government contractors to employ affirmative action to expand opportunities for underrepresented groups and established the Office of Federal Contract Compliance to enforce the order.[317] In 1972, the Nixon Administration approved the "Philadelphia Plan," which instituted numerical goals and timetables for the integration of Black and other racial minority workers into federal contracts.[318] In the late 1970s, President Jimmy Carter extended affirmative action requirements to state and local governments, educational institutions, and contractors—nearly every entity that did business with the federal government.[319] These executive actions, along with anti-discrimination laws improved labor market conditions for African Americans.[320] Between 1974 and 1980, the rate of minority employment in businesses that contracted with the federal government rose by 20 percent.[321] Local government set-aside programs also had impact. A 2014 study found that these programs led to a 35 to 40 percent reduction in the Black-white gap in self-employment, which is a proxy for small business ownership, though it appeared that the gains mostly benefited those who were better educated.[322]

By the late 1970s, an organized backlash had developed and a number of lawsuits challenged the constitutionality of affirmative action.[323] In response, the U.S. Supreme Court began narrowing the scope of affirmative action programs. The Court has not held that affirmative action is permissible as redress for past harms. The Court, however, did reject explicit race-based quota systems in Regents of the University of California v. Bakke in 1978. There, the Court held that it was permissible for government affirmative action programs—in this case, a state school—to consider an applicant's race in order to advance the interest of diversity, but that it was unconstitutional for an affirmative action program to employ race-based quotas.[324]

By the early 1980s, under President Ronald Reagan, the federal government began to restrict its enforcement of affirmative action requirements, halting the progress made during the preceding administrations.[325]

Housing Segregation Limits African American Job Opportunities

Despite the unquestionable progress made in civil and workers' rights since the Civil Rights Acts, numerous systemic issues continue to harm African American workers.

The government and private actions described in Chapter 5 created a segregated American landscape across the country. This residential segregation created an entrenched type of employment discrimination in the second half of the 20th century.

Following World War II, white workers followed the government incentives described in Chapter 5 and moved to the suburbs. Large industrial employers closed facilities in urban centers and followed the white workers. Black workers, who could not move to the suburbs due to the barriers erected by federal and local governments, were left behind in urban centers.

Following World War II, white workers followed the government incentives described in Chapter 5, Housing Segregation, and moved to the suburbs.[326] Large industrial employers closed facilities in urban centers and followed the white workers.[327] Black workers, who could not move to the suburbs due to the barriers erected by federal and local governments, were left behind in urban centers.[328] These barriers included discriminatory and inequitable government transportation policy decisions that limited urban African Americans' access to jobs,[329] like the Bay Area Rapid Transit (BART) system, designed in the 1960s. In an Oakland neighborhood that is one of the most diverse in the city and one of the densest parts of the region, BART trains run nearly 3 miles without stopping, whereas BART stations are only 1.75 miles apart in suburban areas that are less than half as dense.[330] As one transportation expert explained, "BART was literally designed ... to speed white suburban commuters past Black inner-city residents."[331] For an in depth discussion of transportation discrimination, please see Chapter 7.

Research has produced evidence that the phenomenon of "job suburbanization" caused significant decline in Black employment and increased Black-white labor inequality.[332] Examples of the movement of jobs to the suburbs abound. For instance, the Ford Motor Company moved all engine production sited at its River Rogue plant—at the time, the largest employer of Black workers in the Detroit region—to facilities in suburban

Brook Park, near Cleveland and Dearborn, outside of Detroit.[333] Michigan's Labor Market Letter observed the "creation of a very large and alarmingly consistent list of long-term unemployed" Black workers in the region.[334]

This exodus of major employers to the suburbs also prevented African Americans from fully taking advantage of benefits provided by unions. For example, the Communication Workers of America lost thousands of African American members when customer service call centers moved out of New York City and reopened in areas not easily accessible to African Americans living in the city.[335]

Between 1967 and 1987, the number of industrial jobs dropped precipitously in cities with large Black populations: by 64 percent in Philadelphia, by 60 percent in Chicago, by 58 percent in New York, and by 51 percent in Detroit.[336] Oakland and Los Angeles also experienced a decline in manufacturing.[337] Automobile and tire companies that had been prevalent in Los Angeles shuttered or moved to the suburbs as early as the 1950s.[338] An analysis of census data for the 15 largest metropolitan areas of the time found that between 1960 and 1970, the suburbs of these areas saw a 44 percent increase in jobs while central cities saw a seven percent decline.[339] Whereas nearly two thirds of jobs were in urban centers in 1960, by 1970, only 52 percent of jobs were in urban centers and in some cities, the majority of jobs were suburban.[340] Corporate executives occasionally admitted that avoiding Black communities "sometimes" motivated their decisions about where to locate.[341] Federal jobs in urban centers also dropped by more than 41,000 between 1966 and 1973.[342]

Corporate executives occasionally admitted that avoiding Black communities "sometimes" motivated their decisions about where to locate. Between 1970 and 1993, African Americans lost ground in nearly every economic category, with unemployment among African Americans rising from 5.6 percent to 12.9 percent.

By the early 1990s, the African American urban industrial working class had nearly disappeared nationwide. The impact was broad. Between 1970 and 1993, African Americans lost ground in nearly every economic category, with unemployment among African Americans rising from 5.6 percent to 12.9 percent.[343] If new manufacturing was built, for example, by American auto companies, studies have shown a consistent pattern of rural and suburban locations about thirty miles from the African American neighborhood.[344]

COURTESY OF H. ARMSTRONG ROBERTS/CLASSICSTOCK VIA GETTY IMAGES

African American settlement near steel foundry. Workers homes in East St. Louis, Illinois. (c. 1920)

More recently, U.S. trade policy added to the negative impact of automation and changing technology on jobs for African Americans.[345] Free trade policies and the resulting job losses in the manufacturing sector hit African American men especially hard, as this sector has offered relatively higher-paying jobs for those with lower levels of educational attainment.[346] These jobs were also more likely to be unionized and afford a range of attendant benefits, from health care to pensions.[347] African American workers were also disproportionately among those whose call center and customer service jobs were subject to offshoring. One study found that African Americans lost 646,500 good manufacturing jobs between 1998 and 2020, a 30.4 percent decline in total African American manufacturing employment, as part of the overall loss of more than 5 million manufacturing jobs during that time period.[348]

African American workers who have lost their jobs have been less likely than their white counterparts to find a replacement job, and when they found new jobs, they more likely to experience pay cuts.[349] The loss of jobs to free trade also depressed wages in the long term and intensified wealth inequality.[350] The impact has been far reaching. One researcher found that manufacturing decline between 1960 and 2010 had disproportionately harmed African American communities in the areas of wages, employment, marriage rates, house values, poverty rates, death rates, single parenthood, teen motherhood, child poverty, and child mortality.[351]

These harms may continue. More than a quarter of all African American workers are concentrated in 30 jobs at high risk of automation, according to a 2017 finding of the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies.[352]

According to one meta-study, from 1989 to 2014, employment discrimination against African Americans had not decreased.

Ongoing Discrimination

Legal segregation resulted in social separation between African American and white Americans, with lasting consequences. Employers often hire new employees by relying on their social networks, ethnic loyalties, apprenticeships, and union relationships. Legal segregation prevented Black workers from building these necessary formal and informal networks with white Americans, effectively barring Black workers from entering into new, mostly white workplaces or industries.[353]

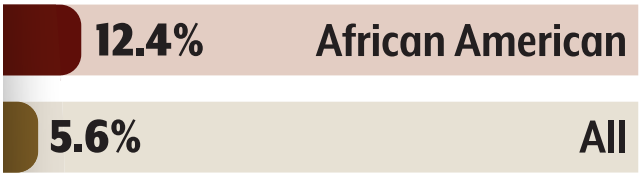
African Americans continue to experience labor discrimination today. One meta-analysis examining a 25-year period starting in 1989 found that discrimination against African Americans in the labor force had not decreased.[354] African Americans receive interview callbacks for jobs at lower rates than white people. In a study where equally qualified resumes with white-sounding and Black-sounding names were sent out, white applicants received 36 percent more callbacks than African American applicants.[355]

Even when researchers enhanced the resumes associated with Black-sounding names to make them stronger, white candidates still received more callbacks.[356] Another study found that African American candidates had stronger odds of being called for an interview when their resumes were stripped of information conveying racial or ethnic background.[357]

Discrimination against job applicants with criminal history is another factor limiting work opportunities for African Americans. As discussed above in the licensure section, this discrimination is mandated in some instances and permitted in others.[358] As mass incarceration has disproportionately impacted African Americans, they have disproportionately suffered post incarceration challenges. By 2010, people with felony convictions accounted for eight percent of all adults and 33 percent of African American adult males.[359] Having a felony conviction is worse for formerly incarcerated African American job applicants than white applicants.[360] One study found that African American men with no criminal history applying for entry-level jobs were less likely to receive a call back than white male applicants who had recently been incarcerated.[361] Research has shown that even in jurisdictions with "ban the box" policies barring employers from asking about a candidate's criminal history on a job application, African American applicants receive significantly fewer callbacks than white job applicants because employers may assume the African American applicants have a criminal history.[362]

While Black women have endured both racism and sexism and persistently had their labor devalued,[363] African American men experience discrimination in the labor market in unique ways. This is in part due to the criminalization of Black men and boys, examined in Chapter 11, which results in societal distrust and isolation of Black men and boys.[364] Growing emphasis on "soft skills" particularly disadvantages Black male job applicants, as many employers wrongly perceive Black men as lacking in these skills that are viewed as increasingly important.[365] Researchers have found that employers hold false negative beliefs about the dependability, motivation, and attitude of African American men, and are unlikely to change these racist beliefs during a written application or interview.[366]

UNEMPLOYED COLLEGE GRADUATES IN 2013



Racial employment gaps are worse among educated workers.[367] A 2014 study revealed that 12.4 percent of African American college graduates aged 22 to 27 were unemployed in 2013, compared to a rate of 5.6 percent for all college graduates in the same age range. 55.9 percent of employed African American recent college graduates worked in an occupation that typically does not require a four-year college degree.[368] Graduates in areas such as science, technology, math, and engineering fared better, but still experienced high unemployment and underemployment rates.[369] In 2013, African American recent college graduates majoring in nine of 12 broad categories had less than a 50 percent chance of holding a job that required their degree.[370] Another study found that African American individuals who received MBAs from Harvard between 2007 and 2009 began their careers earning approximately $5,000 less their white peers, and by 2015, the racial pay gap had increased to just under $100,000 annually.[371]

African American college graduates with a job that does not require a college degree (2013)

California

The historic gap in employment between African American and white individuals is seen in California. By every measure, African American Californians continue to lack access to labor markets available to white Californians and as a result continue to suffer harms that have compounded since before the founding of our country. In March 2022, for example, the most recent data available, the unemployment rate was 10.5 percent for African American Californians and 5.9 percent for white Californians.[372]

Lack of Government Protection

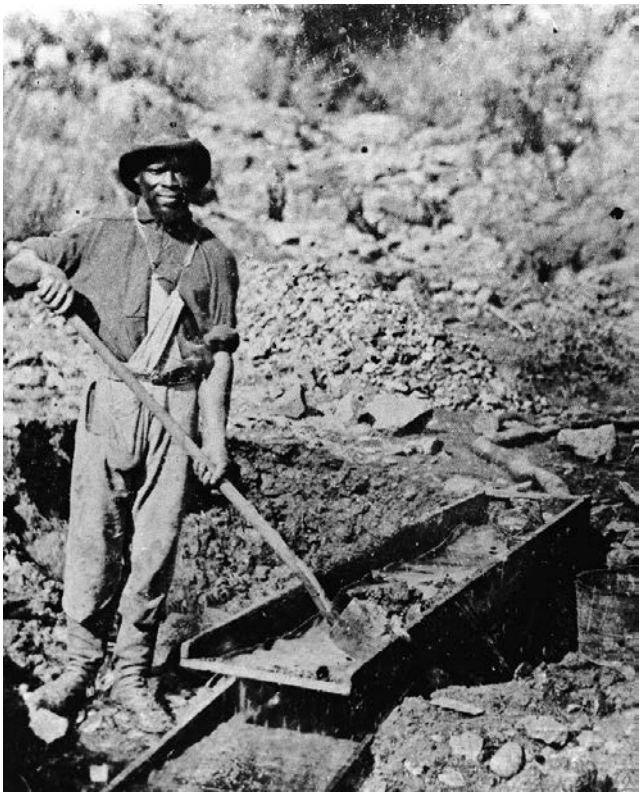
From its earliest days of statehood, California enacted a series of laws limiting the ability of African Americans to participate as full citizens of the state, as discussed in other chapters. These laws limited African Americans' voting rights, property rights, interracial marriage, and testimony in court or serve on a jury.[373] California barred the testimony of African American individuals in both civil and criminal proceedings.[374] These laws left African American Californians with little protection under the law, undermining their ability to advocate for themselves in the workplace, vindicate property rights, or even bear witness to the crimes they suffered.[375]

The discovery of gold in California 1848 drew migrants from across the country and beyond.[376] African Americans were among them. A small group of Black individuals established one of the earliest mining claims in Sacramento County, at "Negro Bar," near what is now Folsom, on property once owned by William Leidesdorff, an Afro-Caribbean businessman.[377] African Americans operated several successful mines, including Horncut Mine, a prosperous quartz mine in Yuba County, and the Washington Mine, a gold mine established in 1869.[378]

African American miners faced a hostile environment. Because African Americans lacked the right to testify in court during this period, African American miners were vulnerable to legal challenges and encroachments on their mining claims.[379] Frustrated by the discrimination they faced in California, including the state's discriminatory testimony and suffrage laws in particular, many Black miners left in the late 1850s for gold fields discovered in British Columbia, though some returned to the United States after the Civil War.[380] To this day, derogatory names like Negro Bar and Negro Flat are still used for locales in the mining region of California.[381] The California Department of Parks and Recreation currently operates the Negro Bar, Folsom Lake State Recreation Area.[382] However, the department is working with local community and stakeholders to change the name.[383]

African American mill workers played a significant role in the lumber industry from 1920 to 1960.[384] Experienced African American workers were actively recruited from the South to staff California mills.[385] Although vital to their employers, African American workers were paid less than their white counterparts and prohibited from undertaking supervisory duties.[386]

COURTESY OF HULTON ARCHIVE VIA GETTY IMAGES



An African-American miner poses with a shovel in Auburn Ravine during the Gold Rush, California. (1852)

During the late 1800s and early 1900s, African American workers were recruited from the South to work farms in the San Joaquin and Imperial Valleys.[387] Many African American farmworkers resisted the racist treatment they faced in California, and used contracted field work as a way to establish themselves as entrepreneurs, skilled workers, or yeoman farmers.[388] As a result, Californian farmers preferred to hire Mexican nationals and other nonwhite immigrants instead of African American workers.[389] Additionally, growing towns and settlements during the time often explicitly discriminated against and worked to exclude African Americans from living or working there. For example, fliers for the Maywood Colony, a huge development entirely surrounding the town of Corning, California, trumpeted:

> GOOD PEOPLE
> In most communities in California you'll find Chinese, Japs, Dagoes, Mexicans, and Negroes mixing up and working in competition with the white folks. Not so at Maywood Colony. Employment is not given to this element.[390]

In the early 1900s, African American workers were less likely to work in higher paying industrial jobs in the West than in the North.[391] By 1930, over 50 percent of African American men were working in the industrial sectors of the Northeast and Midwest, but no more than 30 percent in the West.[392] While industrial jobs often had significant downsides for African American workers, they offered better pay than unskilled positions.[393] Still, many California companies refused to hire African American workers.[394] For example, in 1940, aviation official W. Gerald Tuttle of the Vultee Aircraft Company in southern California announced, "I regret to say that it is not the policy of this company to employ people other than the Caucasian race."[395]

The interwar period saw a significant influx of African American workers and residents to California. As the number of African American residents increased in cities like San Francisco and Los Angeles, African American workers not only increased in number, but also began to move into professions from which they had previously been completely excluded.

The New Deal in California

As it did across the country, the Great Depression brought significant unemployment to the state. For example, manufacturing employment fell by 30 percent from 1929 to its lowest level in 1932, while payrolls fell by 50 percent, and unemployment among unionized workers rose to 33 percent.[396] The New Deal provided an influx of funding to the state.[397] For example, the Works Progress Administration employed over 100,000 workers in California.[398] Between 1933 and 1939, the federal government sent $2.2 billion to California in the form of grants and loans.[399]

California governments engaged in discriminatory practices as the rest of the country did in disbursing this federal money. Burbank and Glendale invoked city ordinances to exclude a company of African American workers organized under the Civilian Conservation Corps.[400] White residents of Richmond objected to an interracial Civilian Conservation Corps camp in 1935, until it was eventually replaced with an all-white company.[401]

Labor organizing has a long history in California[402] that over time has led to some of the nation's most worker protective laws.[403] The state enacted first enacted its labor code in 1937, consolidating provisions then in existence.[404] California has repeatedly amended its labor and employment laws since then. Like the government, however, California for decades exempted both agricultural and domestic workers from various protections. Assembly Bill 1066, signed into law in 2016, removed exemptions for agricultural employees that had been in place for hours, meal breaks, and other working conditions, including specified wage requirements, and it created phased-in overtime requirements for such workers.[405] California enacted a "bill of rights" for domestic workers in 2013, extending overtime pay rights to some,[406] but these workers remain without certain other protections.[407]

Wartime Integration and Exclusion from Unions

African American workers made large advancements in the Bay Area during World War II, moving into manufacturing and industrial work in large numbers. By 1944, African American workers were employed widely in wartime industries, especially in the shipyards.[408] For example, the City of Richmond saw a massive influx of war workers from 1940-45, when its population grew from 24,000 to 100,000, with the African American population increasing from 270 to 14,000 in those years.[409]

COURTESY OF E. F. JOSEPH/ANTHONY POTTER COLLECTION VIA GETTY IMAGES

African-American trainee welder Josie Lucille Owens working on the construction of the Liberty ship SS George Washington Carver at Kaiser shipyards in Richmond, California. (1943)

The Federal Employment Practices Committee, the federal anti-discrimination agency active during World War II, was largely ineffectual in California.[410] In 1945, FEPC reported: "More than twenty-six percent of the Negro working force were engaged in shipbuilding or ship repair. Another twenty-five percent were employed in servicing water transportation, which was largely government work; these two industries alone, the report concluded, accounted for approximately "12,000 Negro workers."[411] Even so, the boilermakers union, representing shipbuilders, allowed only white workers to join the main branch of the union, and relegated African American workers to an "auxiliary union" where they were not permitted to vote or file grievances, received limited benefits compared to white members, could not be promoted to foreman if the job involved supervising white workers, and were classified and paid as trainees even when qualified for skilled work.[412] In Los Angeles, the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Local 13, for example, excluded African American workers,[413] even though African American workers and organizations sued the boilermakers' union for discrimination.[414]

Federal agency hearings in 1941 concluded that "there were only ten black employees in Douglas Aircraft's workforce of 33,000, only two among Bethlehem Shipbuilding's nearly 3,000 Los Angeles employees, and only 54 among Lockheed Aircraft and Vega Airplane's 48,000 workers."

FEPC helped reveal racist hiring practices at Los Angeles airline manufacturing plants. Hearings in 1941 demonstrated that "there were only ten Black employees in Douglas Aircraft's workforce of 33,000, only two among Bethlehem Shipbuilding's nearly 3,000 Los Angeles employees, and only 54 among Lockheed Aircraft and Vega Airplane's 48,000 workers."[415] African American workers' organizations helped push against this racist hiring to open more of these jobs for African Americans.[416]

Ultimately, FEPC never recommended the cancellation of any defense contracts in California.[417] During and after the war, areas of California continued to experience job segregation.[418] For example, Oakland's employment patterns continued to have African American men and women in separate, lower-skilled, and lower-paid work.[419] When the end of the war brought layoffs, African American workers were disproportionately impacted. By the end of 1946, one third of all African American residents in the Bay Area and 40 percent of African American women were unemployed.[420]

Many African Americans also migrated to California during this period to pursue farming, though they encountered setbacks similar to those in other labor sectors. Approximately 30,000 to 40,000 African Americans travelled to the San Joaquin Valley after World War II. The majority settled in cities such as Fresno and Bakersfield, and about 7,000 settled in the Tulare Lake Basin, farmland owned by J.G. Boswell.[421] Still, African American field workers faced discrimination. Unlike their white counterparts, they were rarely promoted to operate machinery for higher pay, and were instead relegated to more demanding physical work for lower pay.[422] Moreover, like in factories, African American workers also experienced greater injury and danger from farm work.[423]

Fair Employment and Housing and Short Lived Affirmative Action

Several years before the federal government enacted its version of the law, California in 1959 passed the Fair Employment Practices Act, prohibiting employment discrimination on the basis of race by employers.[424] The present day version of the law is the California Fair Employment and Housing Act.[425] The California Department of Fair Employment and Housing currently enforces the Fair EHA, which also prohibits harassment based on several different protected categories, including race.[426] The state agency investigates, prosecutes, and mediates complaints of discrimination.[427]

California's support of the Department of Fair Employment and Housing has not been sufficient to meet the level of need. In 2013, the California Senate Office of Oversight and Outcomes reported that even though California had the strongest antidiscrimination law in the nation, the agency was funded with a "relatively miniscule allotment of resources[,]" which left the Department unable to fully enforce the law and protect workers.[428] The agency's investigations of employment discrimination claims "suffer[ed] from understaffing, poor quality, intake confusion, and premature case grading."[429] The oversight Office also unearthed a secret policy that had given the Governor's Office final say as to whether the discrimination law would be enforced against another California state agency, making it more difficult for government workers to bring a discrimination claim.[430] In the years since this report issued, the Department's budget has grown, but the number of complaints it receives each year has also risen.[431]

In 2013, a California government watchdog office reported that even though California had the strongest antidiscrimination law in the nation, the state agency tasked with investigating complaints was funded with a "relatively miniscule allotment of resources[,]" which left the Department unable to fully enforce the law and protect workers. The agency's investigations of employment discrimination claims "suffer[ed] from understaffing, poor quality, intake confusion, and premature case grading."

Like the federal government, government agencies in California also implemented affirmative action programs in employment. These programs produced mixed results. For example, between 1977 and 1995, the representation of African American tenured faculty members at the University of California system—which implemented affirmative action in its hiring—grew from 1.8 percent to only 2.5 percent, and for community colleges' faculty between 1984 and 1991, the proportion of African American faculty only grew from 4.9 percent to 5.7 percent.[432]

California's affirmative action programs were banned in 1996, after voters passed Proposition 209.[433] Proposition 209 amended the California Constitution to prohibit state institutions from considering race in hiring, contracting, and education.[434] According to polling data, Proposition 209 was supported by a majority of white and male voters, but opposed by a majority of African American, Latino, Asian American, and female voters.[435]

The evidence regarding Proposition 209's impact on employment opportunities is complex. In the 15-year period that followed Proposition 209 going into effect, the representation of African Americans, Latinos, and women in public sector relative to the private sector did not dramatically increase or decrease.[436] Men and women of color working for the State of California continued to earn less than their white, non-Hispanic male counterparts, and remained under-represented in high-level positions.[437]

Proposition 209's impact on the procurement process was more severe, as state and local governments were forced to abandon race-conscious contracting programs. Prior to Proposition 209's passage, awards of public contracts to businesses owned by people of color and women had been rising, reaching a high of 28 percent in 1994.[438] By 1998, awards had fallen to less than 10 percent, and they never recovered despite the increasing diversity in California.[439]

One study, published in 2006, found that only 32 percent of certified "minority business enterprises" in California's 1996 transportation construction industry were still in business 10 years later, and among those that had survived, businesses owned by African Americans had fared less well than others.[440] Another study published in 2015 found that Proposition 209 had led to a loss of between $1 billion and $1.1 billion annually for businesses owned by people of color or women.[441] As African American employers are more likely than their white counterparts to hire African American job applicants,[442] the closing of African American businesses may have also hurt African American employment.

Activists in California have worked to overturn Proposition 209, but have not been successful. In 2020, voters rejected Proposition 16, which would have repealed Proposition 209.[443]

Occupational Licensure in California

Nearly 21 percent of workers in California must obtain a license to work in their jobs. California required workers to obtain a license for 61 percent of lower-income occupations, ranking it the third most restrictive state nationwide, following only Louisiana and Arizona.[444]

California withholds or restricts access to licenses from persons with certain criminal convictions, which is more likely to harm African American residents. For example, as discussed in Chapter 11, some incarcerated Californians participate in a program to help battle wildfires.[445] Upon release, however, program participants would not be eligible to for jobs in many fire departments, because they cannot obtain an Emergency Medical Technician (EMT) certification.[446] California law specifically prohibits EMT certification for anyone who has been incarcerated for a felony within the past ten years, effectively disqualifying many people who participated in fire camp.[447] In 2020, recent attempts to remediate these issues related to firefighting have had limited success.[448]

California has made some strides in lifting restrictions on occupational licensure in recent years, with the passage of AB 2138, which prohibits California licensing boards from denying a license for, among other things, many convictions older than seven years and dismissed or expunged convictions.[449] While AB 2138 represents progress, other schemes remain in California which continue to have a racially discriminatory impact.[450]

IV. Discrimination in Government Employment

In addition to supporting legal segregation and enabling private discrimination, the federal and California governments discriminated against African American workers as employers. The federal government in civil and military service has refused to employ African American workers, segregated an integrated workforce, and relegated African American workers to lower paid, less-skilled occupations. The state and local governments in California have had similar patterns of discrimination.

In 1913, President Wilson officially segregated much of the federal workforce, including the Treasury, the Post Office, the Bureau of Engraving and Prints, the Navy, the Interior, the Marine Hospital, the War Department, and the Government Printing Office. The federal government created separate offices, lunchrooms, and bathrooms for white and Black workers.

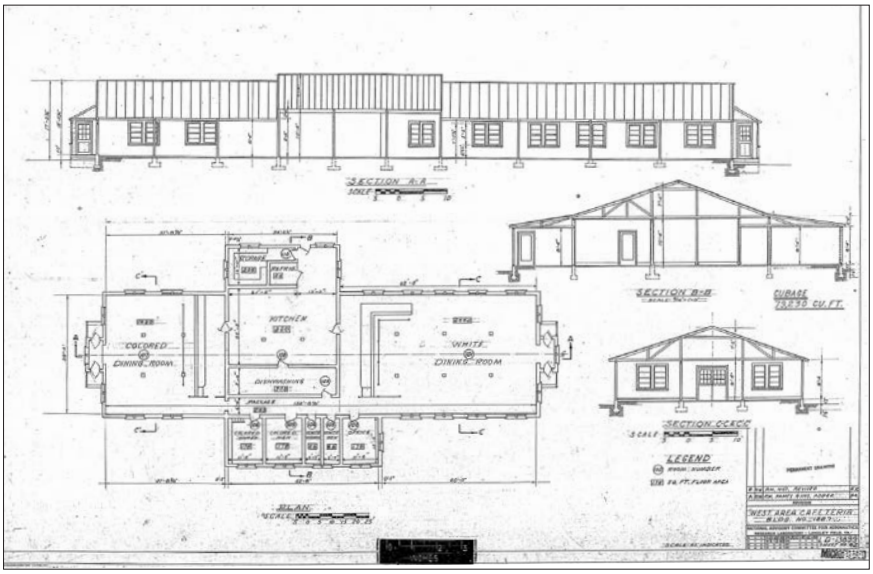
Segregation in the Federal Civilian Service

The federal civilian service reflected and shaped the racist labor environment of private employers. For much of the federal government's history, it was almost totally white or segregated. During the 19th century, there was no blanket ban on African American workers, but different officials were allowed to create a patchwork of regulations forbidding employment of African Americans.[451] The United States Postal Service was a striking example—in 1802, African American workers were banned from carrying mail.[452] African American workers were almost completely excluded from federal employment until 1861—the year an African American man was appointed as a clerk with the United States Postal Service in Boston.[453]

At the turn of the century, African Americans made up about 10 percent of the federal workforce.[454] Many African American workers found steady, valuable jobs in urban post offices, but there was little possibility for advancement.[455] President Roosevelt provided some support for threatened African American workers. In 1903, he refused to allow the town of Indianola, Mississippi, to drive out its African American postmaster, instead suspending service at the Indianola Post Office rather than accept the resignation of Postmaster Minnie Cox.[456] But this lasted only until the next year, when a white Postmaster was appointed.[457] And the tide turned with the election of President William Howard Taft in 1908, who stated in his inaugural address: "[I]t is not the disposition or within the province of the Federal Government to interfere with the regulation by Southern States of their domestic affairs," and that appointing African Americans to federal offices in prejudiced southern communities would do more harm than good.[458]

In 1913, President Wilson officially segregated much of the federal workforce, including the Treasury, the Post Office, the Bureau of Engraving

COURTESY OF SMITH COLLECTION/GADO VIA GETTY IMAGES



Blueprint for NASA/NACA's West Area Cafeteria at the Langley Research Center, showing a "White Dining Room" and a smaller, segregated "Colored Dining Room" for use by African American staff, including "human computers." (1948)

and Prints, the Navy, the Interior, the Marine Hospital, the War Department, and the Government Printing Office.[459] The federal government created separate offices, lunchrooms, and bathrooms for white and African American workers.[460] William McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, argued that segregation was necessary "to remove the causes of complaint and irritation where white women have been forced unnecessarily to sit at desks with colored men."[461] The federal government fired African American supervisors, and cut off African American employees' access to promotions and better-paying jobs, and it reserved those jobs for white employees.[462]

Postmaster General Albert S. Burleson segregated, demoted, or fired African American workers.[463] Though no official government records have been found that indicate how many African American postal workers were driven from their jobs, there was a clear pattern to segregate, reclassify, and discharge African American workers.[464]

President Wilson's decision to segregate an integrated federal workforce resulted in lower pay for African American workers cut off from better-paying jobs,[465] and created separate toilets in the Treasury and Interior Departments.[466] This damaged the ability of African Americans to build economic security. For example, in Washington, D.C., home of many federal jobs, African American homeownership fell after President Wilson's actions, in part because African American federal employees no longer had access to those better jobs and salaries.[467]

In 1979, the U.S. General Accounting Office found that exams administered by the Office of Personnel Management to screen applicants for federal jobs disqualified African American candidates at higher rates than white candidates, "offer[ing] no real opportunity for Black job seekers to be fairly assessed for federal jobs."[468] Few African American applicants received scores high enough to have a "realistic chance" of being considered for employment.[469]

A later study, commissioned by the U.S. Office of Personnel Management, examined the cases of all 11,920 federal workers fired in 1992, excluding the Postal Service and uniformed military services, and found that 39 percent of those fired were African American, even though African American workers comprised only 17 percent of the workforce at the time.[470] While federal personnel officials believed that African American employees were fired more often because they tended to be less experienced, less educated, and concentrated in lower-level jobs that experienced more turnover, the study found that, after every measurable factor was discounted, African American workers were still more likely to be fired at nearly every pay grade, from the lower rungs to the senior executive level.[471]

Despite the federal government's history of racism against African American workers, African American workers currently make up more of the federal civil service at over 18 percent than in the general population at 14 percent.[472] However, for the Senior Executive Service, the elite corps of experienced civil servants responsible for leading the federal workforce, only 10 percent are African American.[473]

Segregation in Military Service

The military reflected the rest of the federal government and American society in enacting racist and segregationist policies for much of its history. While African Americans have consistently served in the military since the very beginning of the country, the military has historically paid African American soldiers less than white soldiers and often deemed African Americans unfit for service until the military needed them to fight.[474] The military officially remained segregated until 1950.[475] African American soldiers consistently failed to be recognized for their contributions, and the government failed to follow through on promises of greater opportunities in exchange for service. While military service has provided an avenue for African Americans to achieve a measure of economic stability, it has consistently been a place of racial discrimination and segregation, particularly in the highest ranks. Today, there continues to be a limited number of African Americans in leadership roles.

President Woodrow Wilson's order to segregate the federal work force damaged Black economic security. In Washington, D.C., home of many federal jobs, Black homeownership fell after President Wilson's actions.

The Revolution and the War of 1812

African Americans' military service predates the republic itself, as do the government's actions discriminating against African American soldiers and failing to honor promises in exchange for their service. Both free and enslaved Black soldiers, from all 13 colonies, fought with the Continental Army and state militias in the American Revolution.[476] During the American siege of Yorktown in 1781, British troops, in order to extend dwindling food supplies, expelled all Black volunteer soldiers they had recruited with promises of freedom.[477] One British officer, admitting the betrayal, stated: "We had used them to good advantage, and set them free, and now, with fear and trembling, they had to face the reward of their cruel masters."[478] While Joseph Ranger, a free African American man from Virginia served in the Navy of Virginia and received wages, a land grant, and later a life pension from the U.S. Government, David Baker, an enslaved man on the Isle of Wight, was forced to join the American navy as a substitute for his enslaver, and was re-enslaved after the war.[479]

After the republic was established, the Second U.S. Congress passed the Militia Law of 1792 allowing only "free able-bodied white male citizen[s]" to serve in the national militia, which became the National Guard.[480] In 1796, James McHenry, the Secretary of War, declared, "No Negro, Mulatto, or Indian is to be recruited [in the Marine Corps]."[481] The U.S. Marine Corps continued this ban on African Americans for the next 167 years.

During the Civil War, Black soldiers took home net pay of $7 per month, compared to $13 per month for white soldiers. And Black soldiers faced a higher mortality rate than their white counterparts, largely due to racist differences in medical care on the battlefield.

During the War of 1812, regardless of the fact that African American soldiers were legally not allowed to serve, African American soldiers made up a significant portion of U.S. Navy forces, and approximately one-quarter of U.S. soldiers at the Battle of Lake Erie were African American.[482] While many volunteer African American soldiers were explicitly promised freedom or equal opportunities in the future in exchange for their service by the state or federal government, these promises never fully materialized.[483]

Like they had done during the Revolutionary War, British troops recruited African American soldiers by promising freedom and land in exchange for service, but they largely failed to deliver. In fact, Francis Scott Key's "The Star-Spangled Banner"—the national anthem—contains a little-known but controversial verse understood by some scholars to have been intended as a threat or admonition to African American soldiers who might have escaped slavery and joined the British cause in a bid for freedom and the means for self-support:

> No refuge could save the hireling and slave
> From the terror of flight or the gloom of the grave,
> And the star-spangled banner in triumph doth wave
> O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.[484]

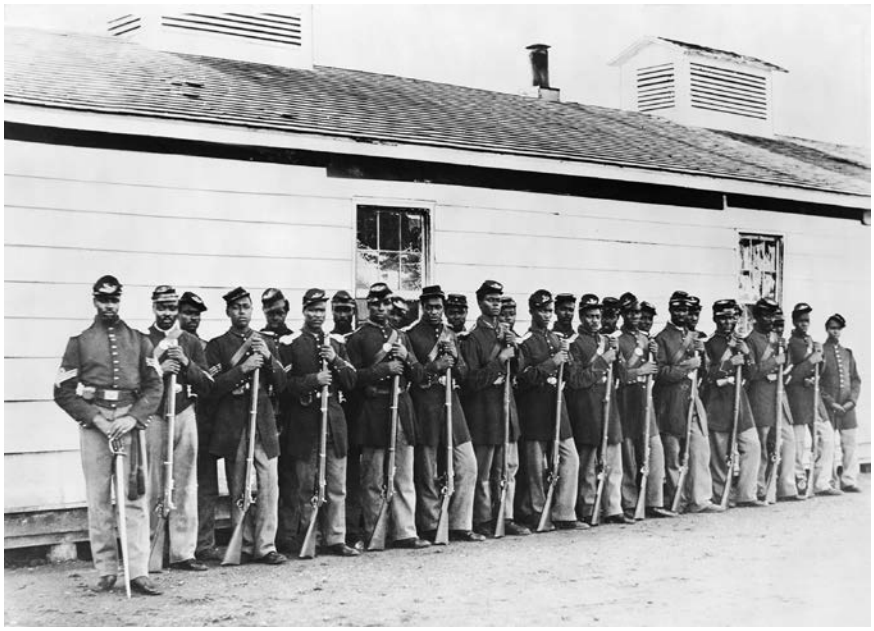
The Civil War

In the time of the Civil War, African Americans again attempted to join the war effort, notwithstanding the army's racist treatment and failures to follow through on promises. In 1862, Congress amended the law to permit African Americans to enlist in the Union Army, but initially, only in menial construction and camp services roles.[485] African American women labored in refugee camps as servants for Union officers and as laundresses for Union troops.[486] African Americans were finally admitted to military service in the Union following the Emancipation Proclamation in 1863.[487] Eventually, nearly 200,000 African American soldiers, roughly half of whom were formerly enslaved southerners, served in the Union Army.[488]

Once again, African American soldiers were afforded lesser treatment in their military service. African American soldiers were segregated, assigned lowly positions, had

COURTESY OF WILLIAM MORRIS SMITH /BETTMANN VIA GETTY IMAGES



Company E, Fourth Colored Infantry, at Fort Lincoln. African Americans have consistently served in the military since the very beginning of the country, but the military has historically paid Black soldiers less than white soldiers and often deemed African Americans unfit for service until the military needed them to fight. The military officially remained segregated until 1950. (1865) few opportunities for advancement to officer rank, received lower pay, and faced far more severe disciplinary measures.[489] Second Lieutenant R. H. Isabelle, the target during a purge of African American officers, resigned in disillusionment in 1863, stating that he "joined the [U]nited States army ...with the sole object of laboring for the good of the union supposing that all past prejudice would be suspended for the good of our Country and that all native born [A]mericans would unite together to sacrifice their blood for the cause as our fathers did in 1812 & 15," but he found that "the same prejudice still exist[s]."[490]

During the Civil War, Black soldiers took home net pay of $7 per month, compared to $13 per month for white soldiers.[491] And African American soldiers faced a higher mortality rate than their white counterparts, largely due to racist differences in medical care on the battlefield.[492] One solider lamented: "Wee [sic] are said to be U.S. Soldiers and behold wee [sic] are U.S. Slaves."[493]

In fact, a small number of African American soldiers did not serve willingly in the Civil War.[494] Starting in 1863, some Union officials used tactics similar to enslavers, press gangs, and man-stealers to grow the ranks of the Union Army.[495] One army engineer in 1863 stated that of men forced into service: "My men, Colonel, have not been drafted. They have been kidnapped in the night."[496] Despite President Lincoln declaring in 1865 that "without the military help of the Black freedmen, the war against the south could not have been won,"[497] African American soldiers were not treated on equal footing, and suffered economic and social hardship as a direct result of the government's actions during the war.

World Wars I and II

Following the Civil War, African American soldiers in the 9th and 10th Cavalries and the 24th and 25th Infantries became known as "Buffalo Soldiers."[498] With a few exceptions—West Point graduates Henry O. Flipper, John Hanks Alexander, and Charles Young—these all-Black regiments were led by white U.S. Army officers.[499] Buffalo Soldiers aided in the nation's westward expansion by building roads and participating in military actions that included the Red River War (1874-1875) and the Battle of San Juan Hill during the Spanish American War (1898).[500] These men were also some of the first national park rangers.[501]

However, the legacy of the Buffalo Soldiers is complex. These African American soldiers fought for their rightful citizenship rights by fighting for a white-led government in government in wars to take the Southwest and Great Plains from Native Americans.[502] Between 1870 and 1890, 18 African American Buffalo Soldiers earned Medals of Honor while fighting Native Americans.[503] Despite their service, Buffalo Soldiers faced discrimination.[504] Some were able to access higher education, secure better jobs, and own property, but others returned from service only to be lynched.[505]

While opportunity expanded in the military during the period after the Civil War and more African Americans joined the service, African American soldiers continued to serve in the armed forces under segregated and unequal conditions. But increased military needs prevailed and, by World War I, there were 380,000 Black soldiers out of the four million total soldiers, a proportion similar to that of Black men in the general population.[506]

During World War I, Black men volunteered to serve in eight all-Black army regiments but remained strictly segregated from white soldiers.[507] Black soldiers were subject to humiliations including wearing discarded Civil War uniforms, or performing for the amusement of white solders.[508] One Black soldier at the time lamented that "The spirit of Saint-Nazaire [Army station in France] is the spirit of the South."[509] This played out in the numbers: only 11 percent of Black soldiers saw combat in World War I, while the vast majority were relegated to menial labor.[510] This segregation reflected the larger condition of the American economy in that Black soldiers were prevented from moving up in ranks to supervisory positions, and positions in some specialized corps were blocked altogether.[511]

COURTESY OF NATIONAL ARCHIVES

15th Regiment Infantry New York National Guard. (c. 1919)

This pattern continued in the interwar years and in World War II, when African Americans continued to serve in the military service despite segregation and other racist policies.[512] For example, in 1941, the U.S. Army established the 78th Tank Battalion, the first African American armor unit. It was made up of African American enlisted men and white officers, but without opportunity for the African American soldiers to advance.[513]

Author James Baldwin remarked that the "treatment accorded the Negro during the Second World War [marked] a turning point in the Negro's relation to America...A certain hope died."[514]

During the Vietnam War, Black men were much more likely to die on the frontlines. In 1965, 25% of soldiers killed in action were African American.

This pattern extended to the Congressional actions aimed at helping soldiers returning from fighting in World War II. In 1944, the Congress passed the Serviceman's Readjustment Act of 1944, commonly known as the "GI Bill." The GI Bill included provisions to provide financial assistance for homeownership, opening small businesses, and education, but, like the New Deal legislation before it, it left implementation largely to racist state and local governments and contributed to housing discrimination.[515] As a result, its benefits were not fully realized for returning African American soldiers. For discussion of the role of the Veterans Administration in implementing and maintaining housing segregation, see Chapter 5. For a discussion of the VA's role in education discrimination, see the Chapter 6.

Post-World War II to the Present

In 1941, President Roosevelt issued Executive Order 8802 stating, "I do hereby reaffirm the policy of the United States that there shall be no discrimination in the employment of workers in defense industries or government because of race, creed, color, or national origin..." The Marine Corps received its first African American recruits, but continued to segregate. "Even though we were all Marines we were kept separate. We didn't have barracks, we lived in huts, built from cardboard, painted green. Camp Lejeune had barracks but we had huts. It was located in the back woods, amid water snakes and bears," said Marine Sergeant Carrel Reavis.[516]

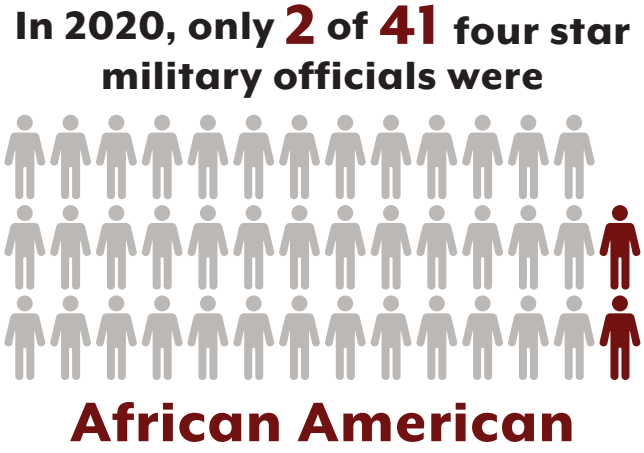
In 1948, President Harry S. Truman issued Executive Order 9981 to desegregate the military.[517] But, while the military formally integrated, serious racial discrimination persisted. For example, the army did not begin in earnest to integrate its forces until the Korean War, when demand for additional troops meant that the army had no choice but to send African American troops to replace white troops killed or injured in battle. Segregated all-Black army units persisted until 1954. In the Marines, full integration did not occur until 1960.[518]

Despite discrimination by the federal government, Black soldiers served and died for their country and have historically used it as a mode of upward mobility out of the South.[519]

The highest proportion of African American individuals ever to serve in an American war came in the Vietnam War.[520] Young Black men were disproportionately drafted during the Vietnam War years due to education and occupation deferments that were unavailable to Black men due to a centuries of education segregation and discrimination.[521]

In the Vietnam War, the American military no longer believed that African American men were not fit for combat.[522] African American men had a much greater chance of being on the front-line and suffered a much higher casualty rate.[523] In 1965 alone, African American soldiers were almost 25 percent of those killed in action.[524]

As the United States moved to an all-volunteer military following the Vietnam War and the end to conscription, African American soldiers enlisted at a much higher rate than white individuals, leading African American representation in the military to be roughly twice their representation in the U.S. population at large.[525]



Today, racial disparities in the military continue. Even as lower-level troops were integrated, leadership remained almost exclusively white. As late as 2020, of the 41 officials holding four-star rank, only two were African Americans.[526] Based on government data received through the Freedom of information Act, researchers have found evidence that African American service members have been substantially more likely than white service members to face military justice or disciplinary action.[527]Anecdotal news reports have presented a deep-rooted culture of racism and discrimination in all branches of the armed services.[528] On January 6, 2021, insurgents stormed the U.S. Capitol, carried a confederate flag inside the Capitol building, [529] and displayed a noose and gallows in front of it.[530] Of the more than 700 individuals charged in the January 6 insurrection, 81 people have ties to the military.[531]

California

Although African Americans were present in California going back to the Spanish conquest era, they made up only around one percent or less of the population of California until 1920, and under two percent until the 1940s.[532] Still, the pattern seen in the federal civilian service and military service persisted in California at both the state and local levels. African American workers faced segregation and racial discrimination in state and local employment. Even when progress was made, governments failed to meaningfully address past discrimination, and African American workers remained largely shut out of the higher-paid leadership roles—a trend that still exists in the present.

When Bay Area Rapid Transit system was built in 1967, no skilled Black workers were hired. When Oakland built a new central post office during the same period—not a single Black plumber, operating engineer, sheet metal worker, or other skilled laborer was hired.

Up until World War II, African American workers were absent from many public and private sector jobs in San Francisco. For example, no African American worker was employed as a public school teacher, police officer, firefighter, or streetcar conductor nor as a bank teller or bus or cab driver in the city before 1940.[533] There were no African American streetcar workers until 1942—with poet Maya Angelou being one of the first—though this was not due to a lack of available skilled workforce in the area, as evidenced by the fact that within two years there were over 700 African American platform operators.[534]

When Bay Area Rapid Transit (BART) system was built in 1967, no skilled African American workers were hired.[535] The National Labor Relations Board-certified unions did not admit African American members, and BART, though a government agency, refused to use its power to insist on non-discrimination policies by the unions.[536] And it was a similar story when Oakland built a new central post office during the same period—not a single African American plumber, operating engineer, sheet metal worker, iron worker, electrician, or steamfitter was hired for construction of the federally funded government building.[537]

The City of Pasadena in Southern California similarly employed almost no African Americans in government jobs prior to World War II. "In Pasadena they told me they don't hire Black teachers," said Ruby McKnight Williams, the first African American woman to be employed by the city in a professional capacity in the 1940s. When Ms. Williams was hired "I found out...that no [Black] men were employed by the city except garbage men and two or three men who swept City Hall. As for [Black] women, even the attendants in the restrooms at the Rose Bowl had never been colored."[538]

Other types of government actions enforced racist and segregationist policies on African American Californians in different parts of the state. For example, in 1970 Pasadena became the first city outside of the South under a federal court order to desegregate its schools. In its ruling on the matter, the district court concluded that the Pasadena school district had discriminated both in its placement of students and in its allocation of teachers. As the court observed, the district's failures to comply with its own integration policies had occurred "in connection with the teacher assignment, hiring, and promotion policies and practices of the District, its construction policies and practices, and its assignment of students."[539]

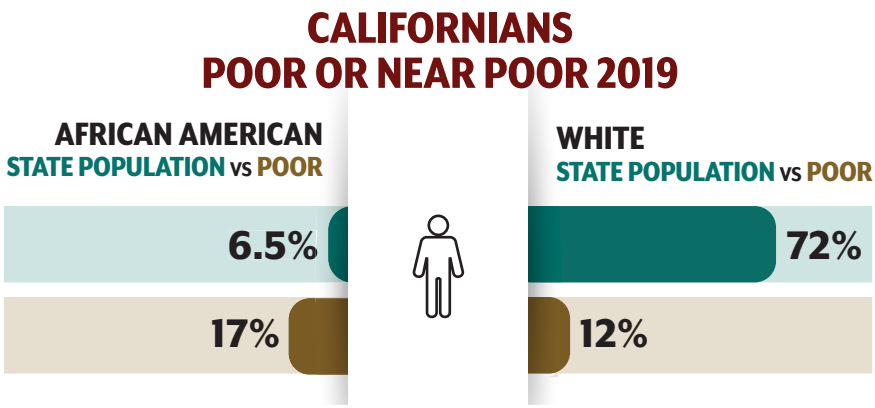
Some segments of the public sector like law enforcement and firefighting continued to discriminate against African American Californians. When they hired African American Californians, hostile work environments sometimes followed.[540] The San Francisco Fire Department, for example, had no African American firefighters before 1955, and by 1970, when African American residents made up 14 percent of the city's population, only four of the Department's 1,800 uniformed firefighters were African American.[541]

Public-sector employers have provided significant opportunities to African American workers, as compared to their private-sector counterparts—including in California. Even still, Black workers continue to encounter barriers to career advancement and higher pay.[542] As of 2018, African American workers account for 9.8 percent of California's state civil service, compared to 5.3 percent of the state's labor force and 5.5 percent of the population. However, that 9.8 percent share has been disproportionately concentrated in lower salary ranges; African American civil servants represented 12.6 percent of employees earning $40,000 or less but only 5.7 percent of workers earning more than $130,000.[543]

V. Effects Today

The cumulative impacts of the federal, state, and local governments' racial discrimination and segregation continue to harm African Americans today. In 2019, the median African American household earned 61 cents for every dollar earned by the median white household.[544] This is a slight increase from 2016, when African American households earned 56 cents to the dollar, a figure lower than it had been in 1968, after the passage of the Civil Rights Act in 1964.[545]

As a result of their higher unemployment rate and the persistent wage gap, African Americans experience higher levels of poverty.[546] In 2020, 19.8 percent of African Americans were living in poverty, compared to 8.3 percent of white Americans.[547] Due to a combination of racism and sexism, women have always had a higher rate of poverty than men.[548] Twelve percent of white women are impoverished, compared to 23 percent of African American women.[549] African American families are more likely than white families to have family members who are impoverished.[550] This has a destabilizing effect during periods of emergency. A 2020 study found that 36 percent of white families had enough savings to cover six months of expenses, versus 14 percent of African American families.[551] Another recent survey also found that 36 percent of African American respondents said that they had no money at all set aside for emergencies, compared to 24 percent of white respondents.[552] Without a safety net of savings, African Americans can be more vulnerable to upheavals in the labor market and are more likely to experience homelessness, as discussed in Chapter 5. During the COVID-19 pandemic, African Americans were more likely to hold jobs that exposed them to the novel coronavirus, and more likely to lose their jobs at the same time. They were more likely to see their savings shrink and more likely to not have enough to eat. As was the case after the 2008 recession, they are experiencing the slowest recovery.[553]



While African Americans have made significant advances into occupations and job categories that used to be subject to explicit segregation, or kept African American workers at the margins, there has been a limit to this progress. In 2021, an analysis of the 50 most valuable public companies demonstrated that only eight percent of "C-suite" executives—the highest corporate leaders, usually those that report to the Chief Executive Officer—are African American.[554] At least eight companies list no African American executives among their leadership team, as of December 2021.[555] Moreover, much of the gains that African Americans have made in employment and wages have been offset by the intensifying income inequality in the country as a whole.[556]

California

The numbers are similar for California. In 2019, the Public Policy Institute of California reported that about 17.4 percent of African American Californians were poor or near poor, compared to 12.1 percent of white people.[557] In 2020, the poverty rate was 14.6 percent among African American Californians and 7.9 percent among white residents.[558] Prior to the COVID-19 pandemic, Black families in California were nearly twice as likely to be in the bottom tier of income distribution than would be expected for their share of the population.[559] Factors that lead to African Americans often being first to suffer economic downturn and last to recover also persist in California. During the COVID-19 pandemic, sixty-eight percent of surveyed Black workers in Southern California who had lost their jobs reported that they were still looking for work a year after the start of the pandemic.[560]

African Americans are also under-represented in California's two major industries: Hollywood and Silicon Valley. In Hollywood, for example, in films released between 2015 and 2019, Black actors were less likely to be in lead roles than white actors, and Black actors were often funneled into race-related projects, which are typically less well funded.[561] Emerging African American actors received six leading role opportunities early in their careers, compared with nine for white actors.[562] African American talent is even more underrepresented in positions of creative control—African American directors directed six percent of films released between 2015 and 2019, African American producers produced six percent of those films, and African American screenwriters wrote four percent of those films.[563] In 2020, the Los Angeles Times conducted a study of diversity in Hollywood studios and reported that of 230 senior corporate executives, division heads, and other senior leaders in entertainment companies analyzed by the Times, 10 percent were African Americans.[564] Ninety-two percent of film industry C-suite executives were white, making the industry more homogenous than the energy and finance industries.[565]

A 2018 report revealed that in large tech firms in Silicon Valley, African Americans made up only 4.4 percent of all employees. 1.4 percent were executives, 2.5 percent were managers, and 2.9 percent were professionals.

The disparities are worse in Silicon Valley. Although between 2004 to 2014, African American college students were more likely to major in computer science than white students,[566] a 2018 report revealed that in large tech firms in Silicon Valley, African Americans made up only 4.4 percent of all employees. 1.4 percent were executives, 2.5 percent were managers, and 2.9 percent were professionals.[567]

A recent report also found that for every African American individual who is a direct employee of a tech company, there are 1.4 African American contract workers, who generally earn 75 cents for every dollar made by a direct employee and are far less likely to receive health benefits or paid time off.[568]

VI. Conclusion

Enslavement was the nation's original disregard for African American lives and theft of African American labor. Slavery persisted for more than 200 years, and when it formally ended, the nation found new ways, from the Black Codes to Jim Crow, to keep African Americans tethered to the lowest rungs of work. Discrimination, exclusion, and devaluation never ceased. For more than 150 years since the formal end of slavery, African Americans have been denied opportunity and pathways to higher wages and been shunted into the lowest paying, least protected, and oft times most dangerous work, or they have been denied work altogether.

The few instances of affirmative effort to remedy or at least neutralize discrimination were inadequate and short-lived. Severe employment and wage disparities and attendant socioeconomic gaps never closed because the root causes of discrimination, exclusion, and subjugation were never addressed and have been sanctioned by the government and allowed to persist and entrench. Centuries of government-supported and government-protected racism have produced a labor market that is so solidly and structurally anti-Black that it can now stand on its own. It cannot and will not come undone without an affirmative dismantling and concentrated investment in creating opportunity for full participation by African Americans and full valuation of their work.

Endnotes

[1] Reskin, The Race Discrimination System (2012) 38 Ann. Rev. Sociology 17, 21.

[2] See, e.g., Charles & Guryan, Studying Discrimination: Fundamental Challenges and Recent Progress (2011) 3 Ann. Rev. Economics 479; Fryer et al., Racial Disparities in Job Finding and Offered Wages (2013) 56 J.L. & Econ. 633, 670.

[3] Shrider et al., U.S. Census Bur., Income and Poverty in the United States: 2020 (Sept. 2021) p. 13 (as of Apr. 7, 2022).

[4] Kurt, Corporate Leadership by Race, Investopedia (Feb. 28, 2022) (as of Apr. 7, 2022).

[5] Deloitte, Fortune 500 Boards Still Decades Away from Representation Parallel to the Presence of Women and Minorities in the US Population, Deloitte (June 8, 2021) (as of Apr. 7, 2022).

[6] Trotter, Workers on Arrival: Black Labor and the Making of America (2019) pp. xvi, xx-xxi; see also California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (October 13, 2021) Testimony of Jacqueline Jones, (as of Apr. 7, 2022) (Jones Testimony) citing Berry, The Price for their Pound of Flesh: The Value of the Enslaved, from Womb to Grave, in the Building of a Nation (2017); Baptist, The Half has Never Been Told: Slavery and the Making of American Capitalism (2016); Beckert, Empire of Cotton: A Global History (2015); Beckert & Rockman, edits., Slavery's Capitalism: A New History of American Economic Development (2018).

[7] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. xvi; Jones Testimony, supra, a

[8] Jones Testimony, supra, at fn. 6, citing White, Ar'n't I a Woman? Female Slaves in the Plantation South (1985); Feinstein, When Rape was Legal: The Untold History of Sexual Violence during Slavery (2019); Morgan, Laboring Women: Reproduction and Gender in New World Slavery (2004).

[9] See Solomon et al., Center for Am. Progress, Systematic Inequality and Economic Opportunity (August 2019) p. 2 (as of Apr. 8, 2022).

[10] Stelzner & Beckert, Wash. Center for Equitable Growth, The Contribution of Enslaved Workers to Output and Growth in the Antebellum United States (June 24, 2021) p. 2 (as of Apr. 8, 2022).

[11] See Einhorn, American Taxation, American Slavery (2006); Jones Testimony, supra, at fn. 6; Finkelman, The American Suppression of the African Slavte Trade: Lessons on Legal Change, Social Policy, and Legislation (2015) 42 Akron L. Rev. 431, 434; Sawers, The Poll Tax Before Jim Crow (2017) 57 Am. J. Legal Hist. 166, 166-67.

[12] Jones, American Work: Four Centuries of Black and White Labor (1998) pp. 258-59.

[13] Ibid.

[14] Douglass, Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass: An American Slave (1968 ed.) pp. 117-18.

[15] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 259-60.

[16] Id. at p. 260.

[17] Ibid.

[18] Ibid.

[19] Smith, California's Last Slave Case, N.Y. Times (Mar. 5, 2014).

[20] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns: The Epic Story of America's Great Migration (2011) p. 233; De Graaf & Taylor, Introduction: African Americans in California History, California in African American History in Seeking El Dorado: African Americans in California (De Graaf et al., edits. 2001) p. 9; Hudson, West of Jim Crow: The Fight Against California's Color Line (2020) pp

[21] Stats. 1852, ch. 33, § 1, pp. 67-68 (as of Apr. 8, 2021); Wills, Slavery in a Free State: The Case of California, JSTOR Daily (Feb. 25, 2021) (as of Apr. 8, 2022).

[22] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns, supra, at fn. 20, p. 233; Hudson, West of Jim Crow, supra, at fn. 20, pp 21-22.

[23] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns, supra, at fn. 20, p. 233. Ibid.

[24] Taylor, African American Men in the American West, 1528-1990 (2000) 569 African Am. Male in Am. Life & Thought 102, 105.

[25] Ibid

[26] Wills, Slavery in a Free State, supra, at fn. 21; Hudson, West of Jim Crow, supra, at fn. 20, p. 23.

[27] Smith, Pacific Bound: California's 1852 Fugitive Slave Law (Jan. 6, 2014) Black Past (as of Apr. 8, 2022).

[28] Ibid.

[29] Ibid.

[30] Baradaran, The Color of Money: Black Banks and the Racial Wealth Gap (2017) pp. 18-22.

[31] See Jones, The Dispossessed: America's Underclasses from the Civil War to the Present (1992).

[32] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns, supra, at fn. 20, pp. 332-35; Jones, Labor of Love, Labor of Sorrow: Black Women, Work, and the Family from Slavery to the Present (2009) pp. 131-67 (discussing limited paid work options for Black women and attendant poor conditions and pay).

[33] See Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, p. 342; see also Perea, The Echoes of Slavery: Recognizing the Racist Origins of the Agricultural and Domestic Worker Exclusion from the National Labor Relations Act (2011) 72 Ohio State L.J. 95.

[34] Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33; Katznelson, Fear Itself: The New Deal and the Origins of Our Time (2013) p. 163; Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, at fn. 30, p. 101; Reich, A Working People: A History of African American Workers Since Emancipation (2013) p. 91.

[35] Freedmen's Bureau Bill (Mar. 3, 1865) Chap. XC, § 2, 13 Stat. 507.

[36] Reich, A Working People, supra, at fn. 34, p. 13.

[37] See Foner, Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863-1877 (2011) pp. 68-69; Gates, Jr., The Truth Behind "40 Acres and a Mule" African

Am. Hist. Blog (2013) (as of Apr. 10, 2022); see also Reich, A Working People, supra, at fn. 34, p. 11 (discussing freedmen's view of land ownership as key to economic autonomy).

[38] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, at fn. 30, p. 16, citing Fleming, "Forty Acres and a Mule" (1906) 182 North Am. Rev. 721, 729.

[39] Reich, A Working People, supra, at fn. 34, pp. 11-12.

[40] Id. at p. 12.

[41] Id. at pp. 13-15.

[42] Id. at p. 12.

[43] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, at fn. 30, p. 19; Reich, A Working People, supra, at fn. 34, p. 10

[44] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, at fn. 30, p. 19.

[45] Id. at p. 16, quoting Egerton, Wars of Reconstruction: The Brief, Violent History of America's Most Progressive Era (2014) p. 99.

[46] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, at fn. 30, p. 17.

[47] Trefousse, Andrew Johnson: A Biography (1989) p. 236.

[48] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, at fn. 30, p. 17.

[49] Reich, A Working People, supra, at fn. 34, p. 15.

[50] Id. at pp. 13-15; see also Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, at fn. 30, p. 18 (discussing President Johnson's view that capitalism, free trade, and the law of supply and demand would suffice to allow freedmen to secure remuneration and acquire land without the help of the state, even as the government was aiding private industry and after the government had given away land to white settlers).

[51] Reich, A Working People, supra, at fn. 34, p. 14.

[52] Jones Testimony, supra, at fn. 6; Reich, A Working People, supra, at fn. 34, p. 15.

[53] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 56, quoting a northern commander stationed in Columbia, South Carolina.

[54] Ibid.

[55] Ibid.

[56] Reich, A Working People, supra, at fn. 34, p. 15.

[57] Jones, Labor of Love, supra, at fn. 32, pp. 54-55.

[58] Id. at p. 62.

[59] History.com, Freedmen's Bureau (Jun. 1, 2010, updated Oct. 3, 2018) (as of May 31, 2023).

[60] Ibid.

[61] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, at fn. 30, pp. 18-21.

[62] Blackmon, Slavery by Another Name: The Re-Enslavement of African Americans from the Civil War to World War II (2008) pp. 1, 53.

[63] Ibid.

[64] Id. at p. 53.

[65] Id. at pp. 53-57.

[66] Schmidt, Principle and Prejudice: The Supreme Court and Race in the Progressive Era. Part 2: The "Peonage Cases" (1982) 82 Colum. L. Rev. 646, 651.

[67] Id. at p. 650; Reich, A Working People, supra, at fn. 34, p. 19.

[68] Schmidt, Principle and Prejudice, supra, at fn. 66, p. 651.

[69] Id. at p. 650; Reich, A Working People, supra, at fn. 34, p. 19. For an in-depth discussion of apprenticeship, please see Chapter 8.

[70] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns, supra, at fn. 20, p. 217.

[71] Bernstein, The Law and Economics of Post-Civil War Restrictions on Interstate Migration by African Americans (1998) 76 Tex. L. Rev. 781, 781-82.

[72] Id. at pp. 783, 786-87.

[73] Id. at 792-800.

[74] Williams v. Fears (1900) 179 U.S. 270; Bernstein, The Law and Economics of Post-Civil War Restrictions on Interstate Migration by African Americans, supra, at fn. 71, p. 801.

[75] Castel, The Presidency of Andrew Johnson (1979) p. 71; Franklin, The Civil Rights Act of 1866 Revisited (1989) 41 Hastings L.J. 1135, 1135-36.

[76] Civil Rights Act of 1866 (Apr. 9, 1866) Chap. XXXI, 14 Stat. 27; see also Kaczorowski, Enforcement Provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1866: A Legislative History in Light of Runyon v. McCrary, The Review Essay and Comments: Reconstructing Reconstruction (1988-89) 98 Yale L. J. 565, 579-90.

[77] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, at fn. 30, p. 37.

[78] Civil Rights Cases (1883) 109 U.S. 3 (1883).

[79] See, e.g., Saidel-Goley & Singer, Things Invisible to See: State Action & Private Property (2018) 5 Tex. A&M L. Rev. 439, 452; Engelman Lado, A Question of Justice: African-American Legal Perspectives on the 1883 Civil Rights Cases (1995) 70 Chicago-Kent L. Rev. 1123, 1174-75.

[80] See Equal Justice Initiative, Lynching in America: Confronting the Legacy of Racial Terror (3d ed., 2017), pp. 5

[81] Id. at pp. 12, 15-17.

[82] Id. at pp. 16

[83] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 56.

[84] Id. at pp. 56-57.

[85] Reich, A Working People, supra, at fn. 34, p. 58.

[86] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, at fn. 30, pp. 37-38; Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) 163 U.S. 537.

[87] See, e.g., Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns, supra, at fn. 20, pp. 38-45; Wilkerson, Caste: The Origins of Our Discontents (2020) pp. 116-17.

[88] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, at fn. 30, p. 38.

[89] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns, supra, at fn. 20, p. 41.

[90] Id. at p. 44; Jones Testimony, supra, a

[91] Jones Testimony, supra, at fn. 6

[92] Ibid.

[93] Wilkerson, Caste, supra, at fn. 88, pp. 132-34.

[94] Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33, p. 101.

[95] Jones, Labor of Love, supra, at fn. 32, p. 61; see also Slavery by Another Name: Sharecropping (Public Broadcasting Service Movie 2012).

[96] Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33, p. 101.

[97] Ibid.

[98] Ibid.; see also Schmidt, Principle and Prejudice, supra, at fn. 66, pp. 654-60.

[99] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns, supra, at fn. 20, pp. 38-39.

[100] Id. at p. 45.

[101] Id. at p. 53.

[102] Id. at p. 54.

[103] Ibid.

[104] Id. at p. 418.

[105] Ibid.

[106] Ibid.

[107] Ibid.

[108] Jones, Labor of Love, supra, at fn. 32, pp. 74, 154-56.

[109] Jones Testimony, supra, a

[110] Hine, Black Women in White: Racial Conflict and Cooperation in the Nursing Profession, 1890-1950 (1989); Fairclough, A Class of their Own: Black Teachers in the Segregated South (2007).

[111] Jones Testimony, supra, a

[112] Ibid.

[113] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, pp. 91-92.

[114] Jones Testimony, supra, at fn. 6, Labor of Love, supra, at fn. 32, pp. 166-67, 205-07 (describing exploitative conditions of long hours and grueling domestic work for little pay).

[115] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns, supra, at fn. 20, p. 333.

[116] Id. at p. 334.

[117] Welch, Black Litigants in the Antebellum American South (2018) pp. 64-81.

[118] Avins, The Right to be a Witness and the Fourteenth Amendment (1966) 31 Mo. L. Rev. 471, 473-74.

[119] Hoag, An Unbroken Thread: African American Exclusion from Jury Service, Past and Present (2020) 81 La. L. Rev. 55, 56-57; see also Forman, Juries and Race in the Nineteenth Century (2004) 113 Yale L.J. 895.

[120] Hoag, An Unbroken Thread, supra, at fn. 120, at pp. 58-59.

[121] Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303 (1880); Hoag, An Unbroken Thread, supra, at fn. 120, pp. 61-62.

[122] See, e.g., Higginbotham, Racism in American and South African Courts: Similarities and Differences (1990) 65 NYU L. Rev. 479, 521-45.

[123] Lewan & Barclay, When They Steal Your Land, They Steal Your Future, LA Times (Dec. 1, 2001) (as of Apr. 8, 2022).

[124] Ibid.

[125] Ibid.

[126] Ibid.

[127] See Sternberg Greene, Race, Class, and Access to Civil Justice (2016) 101 Iowa L.R. 1263, 1268

[128] Ibid.; see also Myrick et al., Race and Representation: Racial Disparities in Legal Representation for Employment Civil Rights Plaintiffs (2012) 15 N.Y.U. J. Legislation & Pub. Policy 705, 751-52.

[129] Sternberg Greene, Race, Class, and Access to Civil Justice, supra, at fn. 128, pp. 1268, 1275-79.

[130] Myrick et al., Race and Representation, supra, at fn. 129, p. 722.

[131] Id. at p. 724.

[132] Green Coleman, Disrupting the Discrimination Narrative: An Argument for Wage and Hour Laws' Inclusion in Antisubordination Advocacy (2018) 14 Stanford J. Civ. Rights & Civ. Liberties 49, 75-76; Green Coleman, Rendered Invisible: African American Low-Wage Workers and the Workplace Exploitation Paradigm (2016) 60 Howard L.J. 61, 64.

[133] Myrick et al., Race and Representation, supra, at fn. 129, p. 707.

[134] Blasi & Doherty, UCLA-RAND Center for L. & Pub. Policy, California Employment Discrimination Law and Its Enforcement: The Fair Employment Housing Act at 50 (2010) p. 12.

[135] Eyer, That's Not Discrimination: American Beliefs and the Limits of Anti-Discrimination Law (2012) 96 Minnesota L.R. 1275, 1276.

[136] Myrick et al., Race and Representation, supra, at fn. 129, pp. 707-08.

[137] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns, supra, at fn. 20, p. 317.

[138] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 294-96, 305-15.

[139] Reedy, Brief History of the American Labor Movement (1951) p. 1.

[140] Id. at p. 3.

[141] Id. at p. 29.

[142] Id. at p. 30.

[143] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 213, 216, 221-22, 248-53.

[144] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns, supra, at fn. 20, p. 316.

[145] Jones, Labor of Love, supra, at fn. 32, p. 128 (providing example of 1897 protest of the hiring of two African American female spinners at an Atlanta textile mill, where union staged a walk-out and the company fired the two African American women).

[146] History.com, Labor Movement (Mar. 31, 2020)

[147] Cassedy, African Americans and the American Labor Movement (Summer 1997) Prologue Magazine

[148] Ibid.

[149] Rothstein, The Color of Law: A Forgotten History of How our Government Segregated America (2017) pp. 155-56, 158.

[150] Id. at p. 156.

[151] Ibid.

[152] Reich, A Working People, supra, at fn. 34, pp. 58-59.

[153] Wilkerson, The Warmth of Other Suns, supra, at fn. 20, p. 317.

[154] Kersten, Labor's Home Front: The American Federation of Labor During World War II (2006) p. 77; Greene, Pure and Simple Politics: The American Federation of Labor and Political Activism, 1881-1917 (2006) p. 19.

[155] Greene, Pure and Simple Politics, supra, at fn. 155, p. 39.

[156] Kersten, Labor's Home Front, supra, at fn. 155, 78.

[157] Ibid.

[158] Ibid.

[159] Id. at p. 79.

[160] Reich, A Working People, supra, at fn. 34, pp. 58-59.

[161] Jones Testimony, supra, at fn. 6

[162] Ibid.

[163] Ibid.

[164] Ibid.

[165] See, e.g., Little Hoover Com., Jobs for Californians: Strategies to Ease Occupational Licensing Barriers (Oct. 2016) p. 5 (as of Apr. 29, 2022); Dept. Treas. Off. Economic Policy et al., Occupational Licensing: A Framework for Policymakers (Jul. 2015) p. 6 (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

[166] Freeman, The Effect of Occupational Licensure on Black Occupational Attainment in Occupational Licensure and Regulation (Rottenberg edit., 1980) pp. 165-66; Dept. Treas. Off. Economic Policy et al., Occupational Licensing, supra, at fn. 166, p. 41 (noting that "licensing policy falls in the purview of individual States").

[167] Bernstein, Licensing Laws: A Historical Example of the Use of Government Regulatory Power Against African-Americans (1994) 31 San Diego L. Rev. 89, 90.

[168] Klein et al., Was Occupational Licensing Good for Minorities? A Critique of Marc Law and Mindy Marks (2012) 9 Econ J. Watch 210, 222-23, citing Williams, The State Against Blacks (1982) pp. 90-91.

[169] Freeman, The Effect of Occupational Licensure on Black Occupational Attainment, supra, at fn. 167, p. 166, quoting Greene & Woodson, The Negro Wage Force (1969) p. 192.

[170] Bernstein, Licensing Laws, supra, at fn. 168, p. 94-97.

[171] Id. at p. 94.

[172] Id. at p. 94, fn. 29, citing Bloch, Craft Unions and the Negro in Historical Perspective (1958) 43 J. Negro Hist. 10, 23.

[173] Ibid., citing Williams, The State Against Blacks (1982) p. 94-95.

[174] See generally Bernstein, Licensing Laws, supra, at fn. 168 (describing the efforts to exclude Black workers from professions including medicine and barbering); Freeman, The Effect of Occupational Licensure on Black Occupational Attainment, supra, at fn. 167, p. 166 (describing the efforts in Georgia to exclude Black workers from becoming firemen on locomotives by way of licensure); Crawford & Das, D.C. Fiscal Policy Inst., Black Workers Matter: How The District's History of Exploitation & Discrimination Continues to Harm Black Workers (2020) p. 3 (as of Apr. 9, 2022) (describing occupational licensing bans written into Black Codes that prevented Black workers from working in any trade other than driving carts or carriages).

[175] Bernstein, Licensing Laws, supra, at fn. 168, p. 92 (noting that "lower courts universally accepted the general proposition that licensing statutes were constitutiona

[176] Id. at p. 97.

[177] Id. at pp. 96-97.

[178] Id. at p. 97.

[179] Id. at p. 98.

[180] Williams, Race and Economics: How Much Can Be Blamed on Discrimination (2013) p. 94, citing Shimberg et al., Occupational Licensing (1973) pp. 112-13.

[181] Bernstein, Licensing Laws, supra, at fn. 168, p. 98.

[182] U.S. Bur. Lab. Statistics, Labor Force Statistics from the Current Population Survey (2021) (as of Apr. 9, 2022).

[183] Decker, Occupational Licensing as a Barrier for People with Criminal Records: Proposals to Improve Anti-Discrimination Law to Address Adverse Employment Impacts from the Criminal Legal System (2021) 49 Fordham Urban L.J. 189, 197.

[184] Ibid.

[185] See Dept. Treas. Off. Economic Policy et al., Occupational Licensing, supra, at fn. 166, pp. 19-22; Decker, Occupational Licensing, supra, at fn. 184, p. 197.

[186] See, e.g., Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, Enforcement Guidance on the Consideration of Arrest and Conviction Records in Employment Decisions under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act (2012) pt. V(A)(2).

[187] For example, while people with criminal records are half as likely to get a callback to get an interview than those without a record, African American men with records are one-third as likely to get a callback as those without records. Natividad Rodriguez & Avery, Nat. Employment L. Project, Unlicensed & Untapped: Removing Barriers to State Occupational Licenses for People with Records (2016) p. 8.

[188] Id. at pp. 1, 5 fn. 12, 10.

[189] Id. at pp. 1, 5 fn. 10, 14

[190] Petersilia, When Prisoners Come Home: Parole and Prisoner Reentry (2003) p. 114.

[191] Ewald, Barbers, Caregivers, and the "Disciplinary Subject": Occupational Licensure for People with Criminal Justice Backgrounds in the United States (2019) 46 Fordham Urban L.J. 719, [192] See generally Alexander, The New Jim Crow: Mass Incarceration in the Age of Colorblindness (2012 ed.) pp. 140-177; Natividad Rodriguez & Avery, Unlicensed & Untapped, supra, at fn. 188; Dept. Treas. Off. Economic Policy et al., Occupational Licensing, supra, at fn. 166, pp. 35-37.

[193] Nerbovig, License to Clip (Jul. 10, 2018) The Marshall Project; see also Love & Schlussel, Collateral Consequences Resource Center, From Reentry to Reintegration: Criminal Records Reform in 2021 (2022) pp. 8-11 (describing legislative efforts in 2021 to reform licensure schemes).

[194] A search of the National Inventory of Collateral Consequences of Conviction database for "Business licensure and participation" in the "Consequence Type" field yielded 12,989 consequences. See Nat. Reentry Resource Center, Nat. Inventory of Collateral Consequences of Conviction (as of Apr. 9, 20

[195] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, p. 319.

[196] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 78. Adjusting for the higher cost of living in the North, "increases in migrant earnings ranged from a low of about 56% to a possible high of 130 percent." Ibid.

[197] Ibid.

[198] Id. at p. 86.

[199] Id. at pp. 86-87.

[200] Id. at p. 88.

[201] Ibid.

[202] Thomas, Life for Us is What We Make it: Building Black Community in Detroit, 1915-1945 (1992) pp. 106-107.

[203] Ibid.

[204] Ibid.

[205] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, p. 367.

[206] Geschwender, Class, Race, & Worker Insurgency: The League of Revolutionary Black Workers (1977) p. 91.

[207] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (October 13, 2021) Testimony of William Spriggs, (as of Apr. 7, 2022) (Spriggs Testim

[208] U.S. Bur. Labor Statistics, Consumer Price Index Inflation Calculator (comparing Jan. 1950 dollars with Jan. 2022 dollars) (as of Apr. 9, 2022).

[209] Spriggs.Testimony, supra, at fn. 207.

[210] Jones Testimony, supra, at fn. 6

[211] Stasch, The Creation and Destruction of the Great American Middle Class (1930-2010) (2018) pp. 26-27.

[212] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, at fn. 30, p. 101.

[213] Walker & Brechin, The Living New Deal: The Unsung Benefits of the New Deal for the United States and California, IRLE Working Paper No. 220-10 (2010) Inst. Research on Labor & Employment, pp. 23-28.

[214] Id. at pp. 15-17.

[215] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, at fn. 30, p. 101; Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33, pp. 102-03.

[216] Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33, pp. 103-04; Jones Testimony, supra, a

[217] Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33, pp. 102-03; 120-21.

[218] Jones Testimony, supra, at fn. 6

[219] Jones Testimony, supra, a

[220] See, e.g., DeWitt, The Decision to Exclude Agricultural and Domestic Workers from the Social Security Act (2010) 70 Soc. Sec. Bulletin 4.

[221] Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33, p. 104.

[222] Jones Testimony, supra, at fn. 6

[223] Ibid.

[224] Social Welfare History Project, The National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933 (2011) Va. Commonwealth Univ. (as of Apr. 9, 2022).

[225] Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33, p. 104.

[226] Id. at p. 106.

[227] Ibid.

[228] Ibid.

[229] Dubal, The New Racial Wage Code, UC Hastings Research Paper Forthcoming (May 28, 2021) Harvard L. & Policy Rev., pp. 15-16.

[230] Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33, p. 107, citing Caldwell, What the NRA is Doing to the Race!, Chi. Defender (May 26, 1934) p. 10.

[231] Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 150, p. 158.

[232] Id. at 155-56, 158-59.

[233] Id. at 158-61.

[234] Walker & Brechin, The Living New Deal, supra, at fn. 214, p. 33.

[235] McNicholas et al., Economic Policy Inst., Why Unions Are Good for Workers—Especially in a Crisis Like COVID-19 (Aug. 25, 2020) (as of Apr. 9, 2022).

[236] Ibid.

[237] Ibid.

[238] Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33, pp. 123-24.

[239] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, p. 343.

[240] Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33, p. 122.

[241] Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 150, p. 158.

[242] Ibid.

[243] Steele v. Louisville & Nashville R.R. Co. (1944) 323 U.S. 192; Meltzer, The National Labor Relations Act and Racial Discrimination: The More Remedies the Better? (1974) 42 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1, 4; Jones, Race, Economic Class, and Employment Opportunity (2009) 72 L. & Contemporary Problems 57, 78.

[244] Independent Metal Workers Local 1 (Hughes Tool Co.) (1964) 147 N.L.R.B. 1573; Meltzer, The National Labor Relations Act and Racial Discrimination, supra, at fn. 244, pp. 5-6.

[245] Emporium Capwell Co. v. Western Addition Community Organization (1975) 420 U.S. 50; Jones, Race, Economic Class, and Employment Opportunity, supra, at fn. 244, p. 78.

[246] Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 150, p. 161.

[247] Section 210(b) of the Social Security Act excludes agricultural service and domestic labor in a private home from old-age benefits; and Section 907(c) defines "employment" to exclude agricultural labor and domestic service in a private home for purposes of unemployment benefits. See Social Security Act (Aug. 14, 1935) Chap. 531, tit. II, § 210(b)(1)-(2), 49 Stat. 620, 625; Chap. 531, tit. IX, § 907(c)(1)-(2), 49 Stat. 620, 643.

[248] See DeWitt, The Decision to Exclude Agricultural and Domestic Workers from the Social Security Act, supra, at fn. 221.

[249] Martin & Weaver, Social Security: A Program and Policy History (2005) 66 Soc. Sec. Bull.

[250] Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33, pp. 111-12.

[251] Economic Security Act, Hearings before House Com. on Ways & Means on H.R. No. 4120, 74th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 798 (1935), testimony of Charles H. Houston, NAACP.

[252] Economic Security Act Hearings, supra, at fn. 252, p. 602, testimony of George Haynes, Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America.

[253] Economic Security Act, Hearings before Sen. Com. on Finance on Sen. No. 1130, 74th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 646 (1935), statement of Charles H. Houston, NAACP.

[254] Dubal, The New Racial Wage Code, supra, at fn. 230, p. 18.

[255] See, e.g., Walters & Briggs, The Family Economy, Child Labor, and Schooling: Evidence from the Early Twentieth-Century South (1993) 58 Am. Sociological Rev. 163, 164.

[256] 82 Cong. Rec. 1404 (1937)

[257] 82 Cong. Rec. App'x 442 (1937).

[258] Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33, p. 117.

[259] Dubal, The New Racial Wage Code, supra, at fn. 230, p. 18.

[260] Li, Economic Security & Opportunity Initiative, Georgetown L. Center on Poverty & Inequality, A Civil Rights Issue: The Tipped Minimum Wage & Working People of Color (2018) p. 1.

[261] Ibid.

[262] Ibid.

[263] Ibid.

[264] Ibid.

[265] Ibid.

[266] Ibid. See also U.S. Dept. Labor, Minimum Wages for Tipped Employees (Jan. 1, 2022) (as of Apr. 9, 20

[267] See U.S. Dept. Labor, Tips (as of Apr. 9, 2022).

[268] Li, A Civil Rights Issue, supra, at fn. 261, p. 2.

[269] Ibid.

[270] Deeben, Family Experiences and New Deal Relief: The Correspondence Files of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, 1933–1936 (Fall 2012) Prologue Magazine.

[271] Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 150, p. 156.

[272] Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, p. 102, quoting Katznelson, When Affirmative Action Was White: An Untold History of Racial Inequality in Twentieth Century America (2005) p. 37.

[273] Jones, Labor of Love, supra, at fn. 32, p. 182

[274] Ibid.

[275] Id. at p. 218.

[276] Id. at pp. 219-220.

[277] Hoak, The Men in Green: African Americans and the Civilian Conservation Corps, 1933-1942, William & Mary Theses, Dissertations, & Master Projects (2002) p. 2.

[278] Ibid.; see also Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 150, p. 157.

[279] Hoak, The Men in Green, supra, at fn. 278, pp. 14-15.

[280] Reuters, Factbox: Largest U.S. Electric Companies by Megawatts, Customers (April 29, 2014).

[281] Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 150, pp. 156.

[282] Ibid.

[283] Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33, p. 107

[284] Linder, Farm Workers and the Fair Labor Standards Act: Racial Discrimination in the New Deal (1986) 65 Tex. L. Rev. 1335, 1361.

[285] Perea, The Echoes of Slavery, supra, at fn. 33, p. 108.

[286] Ibid.

[287] Ibid.

[288] Ibid.

[289] Id. at p. 107, citing Caldwell, What the NRA is Doing to the Race!, Chi. Defender (May 26, 1934) p. 10.

[290] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, pp. 134-35.

[291] Ibid.

[292] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, p. 351; March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom, Stanford Martin Luther King, Jr., Research & Education Inst. (as of Apr. 23, 2022).

[293] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 135.

[294] Engstrom, The Lost Origins of American Fair Employment Law: Regulatory Choice and the Making of Modern Civil Rights, 1943-1972 (2011) 63 Stan. L.Rev. 1071, 1073; Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 150, p. 162.

[295] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 136.

[296] Ibid.

[297] Ibid.

[298] Chamberlain, Victory at Home: Manpower and Race in the American South during World War II (2003) p. 57.

[299] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, p. 354.

[300] 42 U.S.C. § 2000e, et. seq.

[301] 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a). The statute also prohibits discrimination by employment agencies, labor organizations, and training programs. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(b)-(d).

[302] Henson, Purposes of Title VII (2019) 33 Notre Dame J.L., Ethics, and Pub. Pol'y 221, p. 233, quoting 110 Cong. Rec. 7213 (1964).

[303] Id. at pp. 233-34.

[304] Id. at pp. 233-34.

[305] Comment, The Inevitable Interplay of Title VII and the National Labor Relations Act: A New Role for the NLRB (1974) 123 U. Pa. L. Rev. 158, 162-63.

[306] Int'l Bhd. of Teamsters v. United States (1977) 431 U.S. 324, 353-54.

[307] Id. at p. 335 fn. 15.

[308] Ibid.

[309] 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(k)(1)(A)(i).

[310] Griggs v. Duke Power Co. (1971) 401 U.S. 424, 425-26, 431.

[311] Id. at p. 435-36.

[312] 42 U.S. Code §§ 2000e-2, 2000e-3, 2000e–5.

[313] U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Com., Chapter 11 Remedies (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[314] Barnes, Is the EEOC Protecting Workers or Discriminatory Employers? (Sept. 4, 2019) Forbes; Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, p. 362; Linderman, At the EEOC, harassment cases can languish for years (Apr. 9, 2018) AP N

[315] Gilway, The Persistent Black-White Unemployment Gap is Built into the Labor Market (Sept. 28, 2020) Housing Today.

[316] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 361-62.

[317] Affirmative Action Policies Throughout History (2022) Am. Ass'n for Access, Equity and Diversity.

[318] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, p. 362.

[319] Menand, The Changing Meaning of Affirmative Action (Jan. 13, 2020) The New Yorker.

[320] See, e.g., Donohue & Heckman, Continuous Versus Episodic Change: The Impact of Civil Rights Policy on the Economic Status of Blacks (1991) 29 J. Econ. Lit. 1603, 1640-41, citing Leonard, The Impact of Affirmative Action on Employment (1984) 2 J. Lab. Econ. 439.

[321] Menand, The Changing Meaning of Affirmative Action, supra, at fn. 320.

[322] Chatterji, et al., The Impact of City Contracting Set-Asides on Black Self-Employment and Employment (2014) 32 J. of Labor Economics 507, 510.

[323] Iheukwumere & Aka, Title VII, Affirmative Action, and the March Toward Color-Blind Jurisprudence (2001) 11 Temp. Policy & Civ. Rights L. Rev. 1, 7-9.

[324] Regents of Univ. of Calif. v. Bakke (1978) 438 U.S. 265, 318-319

[325] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 166.

[326] Id. at pp. 140-44; Jones Testimony, supra, at fn. 6.

[327] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 141; Jones Testimony, supra, a

[328] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 141; Jones Testimony, supra, a

[329] Spieler, Racism Has Shaped Public Transit, and It's Riddled with Inequities (2020) Kinder Inst. for Urban Research, Rice University; Sánchez et al., Moving to Equity: Addressing Inequitable Effects of Transportation Policies on Minorities (2003) The Civil Rights Project: Harvar

[330] Spieler, Racism Has Shaped Public Transit, supra, at fn. 330.

[331] Ibid.

[332] Miller, When Work Moves: Job Suburbanization and Black Employment (2018) Nat'l Bureau of Economic Research Working Paper Series, pp. 3-4.

[333] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 141.

[334] Id.

[335] Reich, A Working People, supra, at fn. 34, p. 164.

[336] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 162.

[337] De Graaf & Taylor, Introduction in Seeking El Dorado, supra, at fn. 20, p. 36.

[338] Ibid.

[339] Jack Rosenthal, Large Suburbs Overtaking Cities in Number of Jobs They Provide (Oct. 15, 1972) N.Y. Times.

[340] Ibid.

[341] Keita Cha-Jua, The New Nadir: The Contemporary Black Racial Formation (2010) 40 The Black Scholar 38, 40.

[342] Ibid.

[343] Id. at pp. 40-41.

[344] Lusane, Race in the Global Era: African Americans at the Millenium (1997) p. 12.

[345] Zessoules, Trade and Race: Effects of NAFTA 2.0 and Other Low-Road Approaches to Trade on Black Communities (July 18, 2019) Center for Am. Progr

[346] Ibid; Rangel & Wallach, Trade Discrimination: The Disproportionate, Underreported Damage to U.S. Black and Latino Workers From U.S. Trade Policies (Jan. 8, 2021) pp. 13-15. See Chapter 6 for discussion of the discrimination that has shaped educational outcomes for African Americans.

[347] Zessoules, Trade and Race, supra, at fn. 346; Rangel & Wallach, Trade Discrimination, supra, at fn. 347, pp. 13-15; Scott et al., Botched Policy Responses to Globalization Have Decimated Manufacturing Employment with Often Overlooked Costs for Black, Brown, and Other Workers of Color (Jan. 31, 2022) Economic Policy I [348] Scott et al., Botched Policy Responses, supra, at fn. 348.

[349] Ibid.

[350] Zessoules, Trade and Race, supra, at fn. 346.

[351] Rangel & Wallach, Trade Discrimination, supra, at fn. 347, p. 14, citing Gould, Torn Apart? The Impact of Manufacturing Employment Decline on Black and White Americans, CEPR Discussion Paper No. DP12992 (2018).

[352] Overton, Black to the Future: Will Robots Increase Racial Inequality?, State of Black Am.

[353] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, p. 314; Jones Testimony, supra, a [354] Quillian et al., Meta-Analysis of Field Experiments Shows No Change in Racial Discrimination in Hiring Over Time (2017) Proceedings of the Nat. Academy of Sciences (PNAS).

[355] Ibid.

[356] Bertrand & Mullainathan, Are Emily and Greg More Employable than Lakisha and Jamal? A Field Experiment on Labor Market Discrimination, NBER Working Paper No. 9873 (2003), Nat. Bur. of Economic Research, pp. 2-4.

[357] Kang et al., Whitened Résumés: Race and Self-Presentation in the Labor Market (2016) 61 Admin. Science Quarterly, pp. 22

[358] Segall, Mass Incarceration, Ex-Felon Discrimination & Black Labor Market Disadvantage (2011) 14 U. Pa. J. L. & Soc. Change pp. 159-60.

[359] Shannon et al., The Growth, Scope, and Spatial Distribution of People With Felony Records in the United States, 1948–2010 (2018) Demography.

[360] Segall, Mass Incarceration, supra, at fn. 359, p. 168-70.

[361] Jones & Schmitt, A College Dree Is No Guarantee (2013) Center for Economic & Policy Research, p. 11.

[362] Agan & Starr, Ban the Box, Criminal Records, and Statistical Discrimination: A Field Experiment (2016) U. Mich. L. & Econ. Research Paper Series, p. 4.

[363] See, e.g., Fyre, Racism and Sexism Combine to Shortchange Working Black Women (Aug. 22, 2019) Center for Am. Progress; Banks, Black Women's Labor Market History Reveals Deep-Seated Race and Gender Discrimination (Feb. 19, 2019) Working Economics Blog; Cohen, Black Women Were Half as Likely to Be Hired for State or Local Jobs Than White Men, a Report Says (Mar. 18, 2021) N.Y. Times; Dill & Duffy, Structural Racism And Black Women's Employment In The US Health Care Sector (Feb. 2022) 41 Health Affairs 265; Study Highlights Barriers Black Women Face in Corporate America (Aug. 18, 2020) Philanthropy News Digest.

[364] Breaking the Cycle: Overcoming Challenges Faced by Black Boys and Men (Nov. 19, 2020), Webinar Materials, The Brookings Inst., pp. 10-11, [365] Moss & Tilly, "Soft" Skills and Race: An Investigation of Black Men's Employment Problems (1996) 23 Work & Occupations, p. 260.

[366] Pager et al., Employment Discrimination and the Changing Landscape of Low-Wage Labor Markets (2009) 2009 U. Chi. Legal Forum, pp. 321-322.

[367] Darity & Mullen, From Here to Equality: Reparations for African Americans in the Twenty-First Century (2020) pp. 45-46.

[368] Jones & Schmidt, A College Degree Is No Guarantee, supra, at fn. 362, p. 1.

[369] Id. at pp. 1, 10-11.

[370] Id. at p. 11.

[371] Kitroeff, Business School Is Worth $22,000 More If You're White or Asian (Jan. 7, 2016) Bloomberg.

[372] Cal. Employment Development Dept., Labor & Workforce Dev. Agency, California Labor Market Review, March 2022 (as of Apr. 27, 2022).

[373] De Graaf & Taylor, Introduction in Seeking El Dorado, supra, at fn. 20, p. 10.

[374] People v. Hall (1854) 4 Cal. 399, 403-405 (quoting civil and criminal provisions barring testimony).

[375] De Graaf & Taylor, Introduction in Seeking El Dorado, supra, at fn. 20, [376] Terrell, African Americans and the Gold Rush (Feb. 2, 2021), Inside Adams, Science, Technology & Bus.

[377] See Cal. Dept. of Education, Key Points in Black History and the Gold Rush (as of Apr. 8, 2022); Savage, The Influence of William Alexander Leidesdorff on the History of California (1953) 38 J. Negro History 322, 322.

[378] A History of African Americans in California: Industry (2004) Five Views: An Ethnic History Site Survey for California (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[379] Ibid.

[380] Cal. Dept. of Education, Key Points in Black History and the Gold Rush, supra, at fn. 378.

[381] A History of African Americans in California: Industry, supra, at fn. 379.

[382] Negro Bar, Folsom Lake State Recreation Area, Cal. Dept. of Parks and Recreation (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[383] Ibid.

[384] A History of African Americans in California: Industry, supra, at fn. 379.

[385] Ibid.

[386] Ibid.

[387] Ibid.

[388] Ibid.

[389] Ibid.

[390] Loewen, Sundown Towns: A Hidden Dimension of American Racism (2005),

[391] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 80.

[392] Ibid.

[393] Reparations Task Force Meeting – October 2021, supra, at fn. 6, testimony of Jacqueline Jones, citing Weaver, Negro Labor: A National Problem (1946) p, 109.

[394] Ibid.

[395] Ibid.

[396] Walker & Brechin, The Living New Deal, supra, at fn. 214, p. 53.

[397] Id. at p. 47

[398] Id. at p. 48.

[399] Ibid.

[400] Loewen, Sundown Towns, supra, pp. 100,

[401] Id. at p. 239.

[402] Labor History Timeline: California and the United States, Cal. Assembly Com. on Pub. Employees, Retirement & Soc. Sec. (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[403] Oxfam, The Best States to Work Index: A Guide to Labor Policy in US States, Oxfam Research Report (2018) p. 3.

[404] Assem. Bill No. 2100 (Jan. 22, 1937) ("An act to establish a Labor Code, thereby consolidating and revising the law relating to labor and employment relations . . . .").

[405] Assem. Bill No. 1066 (2015-2016 Reg. Sess.), as filed on Sept. 12, 2016).

[406] Domestic Worker Bill of Rights (AB 241), Calif. Dept. of Industrial Relations.

[407] Sen. Bill No. 1257 (2019-2020 Reg. Session).

[408] Broussard, In Search of the Promised Land: African American Migration to San Francisco, 1900-1945 in Seeking El Dorado, supra, at fn. 20, p. 198.

[409] Reparations Task Force Meeting – October 2021, supra, at fn. 6, testimony of Jacqueline Jones, citing Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 150, p. 5.

[410] Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 150, pp. 162-66 (describing instances of inaction by the Federal Employment Practices Committee and disregard for limited efforts by the Committee).

[411] Broussard, In Search of the Promised Land in Seeking El Dorado, supra, at fn. 20, p. 199, citations omitted.

[412] Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 150, p. 160.

[413] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 113.

[414] Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 150, p. 165.

[415] Leonard, In the Interest of All Races: African Americans and Interracial Cooperation in Los Angeles During and After World War II in Seeking El Dorado, supra, at fn. 20, p. 311; Alvarez, The Power of the Zoot: Youth Culture and Resistance during World War II (2008) p. 20.

[416] Alvarez, The Power of the Zoot, supra, at fn. 416, pp.

[417] Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 150, p. 162.

[418] Reparations Task Force Meeting – October 2021, supra, at fn. 6, testimony of Jacqueline Jones, citing Self, American Babylon: Race and the Struggle for Postwar Oakland (2005), pp. 54-57, 83.

[419] Ibid.

[420] De Graaf & Taylor, Introduction in Seeking El Dorado, supra, at fn. 20, p. 32.

[421] Arax & Warzmann, The King of California: J.G. Boswell and the Making of a Secret American Empire (2003) p. 264.

[422] Id. at pp. 117, 161, 257, 283-84.

[423] Ibid.

[424] Cal. Dept. of Fair Employment & Housing, Legal Records and Reports (2022) (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[425] Cal. Gov. Code, § 12940.

[426] Ibid.; Cal. Dept. of Fair Employment & Housing, Employment Discrimination (2022) (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[427] Cal. Dept. of Fair Employment & Housing, About DFEH (2022) (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[428] Korber & Adkisson, Department of Fair Employment and Housing: Underfunding and Misguided Policies Compromise Civil Rights Mission (Dec. 18, 2013) Cal. Sen. Off. Oversight & Outcomes, pp. 1-2.

[429] Id. at p. 1.

[430] Id. at p. 2.

[431] Department of Fair Employment and Housing, AllGov: California (as of Apr. 11, 2022); Cal. Dept. of Fair Employment & Housing, Report to the Joint Legislative Budget Committee: March 2015 (Mar. 2015) p. 18; Cal. Dept. of Fair Employment & Housing, 2020 Annual Report (2020), p. 11.

[432] Tierney, Affirmative Action in California: Looking Back, Looking Forward in Public Academe (1996) 65 J. Negro Education 122, 126.

[433] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, pp. 165-66. In order to avoid loss of federal funding to state or to run afoul of the courts, Proposition 209 included four exceptions: to keep the state or local governments eligible to receive money from the federal government; to comply with a court order in force as of the effective date of this measure (the day after the election); to comply with federal law or the United States Constitution; and to meet privacy and other considerations based on sex that are reasonably necessary to the normal operation of public employment, public education, or public contracting. Proposition 209: Prohibition Against Discrimination or Preferential Treatment by State and Other Public Entities (Nov. 1996) Cal. Legislative Analyst's Off.

[434] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, pp. 165-66; Proposition 209, supra, at fn. 434; Bleemer, Affirmative Action, Mismatch, And Economic Mobility After California's Proposition 209 (2020) U.C. Berkeley, Research and Occasional Paper Series: CSHE.10.2020, pp. 6-7; Cal. Const., art. I, [435] Oppenheimer, Color-Blindness, Racism-Blindness, and Racism-Awareness: Revisiting Judge Henderson's Proposition 209 Decision (2011) 13 Berkeley J. African Am. L. & Policy 101, 106.

[436] Sumner et al., Proposition 209 and Public Employment in California: Trends in Workforce Diversity (2008) Thelton E. Henderson Center for Soc. Justice, Berkeley Law, pp. 5-6; Equal Opportunity: The Evidence from California (2012) Thelton E. Henderson Center for Soc. Justice, Berkeley Law, p. 9.

[437] Equal Opportunity: The Evidence from California, supra, at fn. 437, p. 9.

[438] Id. at p

[439] Ibid.

[440] Morris et al., Free to Compete? Measuring the Impact of Proposition 209 on Minority Business Enterprises (2006) Discrimination Research Center, pp. 2, 20-21.

[441] Lohrentz, The Impact of Proposition 209 on California's MWBEs (2015) Equal Justice Soc., p. 2.

[442] Conrad et al., African Americans in the U.S. Economy (2005) p. 3; Stoll et al., Why Are Black Employers More Likely than White Employers to Hire Blacks? (2001) Inst. For Research on Poverty, pp. 1-2.

[443] Cal. Sec. of State, California Statement of Vote, General Election November 3, 2020, p. 14.

[444] See Little Hoover Com., Jobs for Californians, supra, at fn. 166, pp. 15-16.

[445] Gurrola v. Duncan (E.D. Cal. 2021) 519 F. Supp. 3d 732, 736, appeal pending at Gurrola v. Duncan, Case No. 21-15414 (9th Cir.) ("[I]n 2017, 650 incarcerated individuals assisted in suppressing the Pocket, Tubbs, and Atlas Fires. A.B. No. 2147 § 1(c). In 2018, close to 800 incarcerated individuals assisted with the Camp Fire in Butte County. Id. § 1(d). And, in 2019, over 400 incarcerated individuals helped battle the Kincade Fire. Id. § 1(e).").

[446] Romo, California Bill Clears Path For Ex-Inmates to Become Firefighters (Sept. 11, 2020) NPR.

[447] Cal. Code Regs., tit. 22, § 100214.3(c)(6) ("The medical director shall deny or revoke an EMT [certificate] if . . . the applicant . . . [h]as been convicted and released from incarceration for said offense during the preceding ten (10) years for any offense punishable as a felony.") EMT certification can be denied for several other types of criminal records as well. See generally Cal. Code Regs., tit. 22, § 100214.3(c).

[448] Gurrola, supra, 519 F.Supp.3d at 736-37.

[449] Assem. Bill. No. 2138, Licensing boards: denial of application: revocation or suspension of licensure: criminal conviction (2017-2018 Reg. Sess.); Cal Bus. & Prof. Code § 7.5 et [450] See, e.g., Assem. Bill 3039 – Dept. of Social Services Occupational Licensing - Summary. At least one non-profit determined that 55.5 percent of its clients seeking exemptions from the Department of Public and Social Services were African American women who were "hit especially hard by DSS's restrictive criminal record screening rules, given the disproportionate rate of arrests and low-level criminal convictions in communities of color." Ibid.

[451] U.S. Postal Service, Postal History: African American Postal Workers in the 20th Century (as of Apr. 11, 2022); Wilson and Race, President Wilson House (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[452] U.S. Postal Service, Postal History, supra, at fn. 452.

[453] Ibid.; Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, p. 259.

[454] Little, How Woodrow Wilson Tried to Reverse African American Progress (Jul. 14, 2020) History.com.

[455] U.S. Postal Service, Postal History, supra, at fn. 452.

[456] Ibid.

[457] Id. at fn. 3.

[458] William Howard Taft, Inaugural Address (March 4, 1909) U. of Cal., American Presidency Project.

[459] Little, How Woodrow Wilson Tried to Reverse African American Progress, supra, at fn. 455; see also Baradaran, The Color of Money, supra, at fn. 30, p. 66 ("Wilson purged the federal bureaucracy of any blacks who had managed to secure a government job. He prohibited the hiring of any black employees and fired those his predecessor had hired.").

[460] Little, How Woodrow Wilson Tried to Reverse African American Progress, supra, at fn. 455.

[461] Yellin, Racism in the Nation's Service: Government Workers and the Color Line in Woodrow Wilson's America (2013), p. 135; On this Day, Apr. 11, 1913, President Wilson Authorizes Segregation Within Federal Government, Equal Justice Initiative (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[462] Little, How Woodrow Wilson Tried to Reverse African American Progress, supra, at fn. 455.

[463] MacLaury, The Federal Government and Negro Workers Under President Woodrow Wilson (2000), U.S. Dept. of Labor.

[464] The Post Office Department and Jim Crow (Dec. 31, 2005) The American Postal Worker Magazine, Am. Postal Workers U

[465] Aneja & Xu, The Costs of Employment Segregation: Evidence from the Federal Government under Woodrow Wilson, NBER Working Paper No. 27798 (Sept. 2020) Nat. Bur. of Economic Research, pp. 2, 11-12.

[466] Lehr, The Racist Legacy of Woodrow Wilson (Nov. 27, 2015) The Atlantic.

[467] Little, How Woodrow Wilson Tried to Reverse African American Progress, supra, at fn. 455.

[468] Race in America, U.S. Government Accountability Off.

[469] Federal Employment Examinations: Do They Achieve Equal Opportunity And Merit Principle Goals? (May 15, 1979) Report to the Congress by the Comptroller General of the United States, p. 24.

[470] Frank Greve, Federal Study Confirms Link of Race, Firings (Oct. 20, 1994), Seattle Times.

[471] Ibid.

[472] Executive Branch Employment by Gender and Race/National Origin, Policy, Data, Oversight: Data, Analysis & Documentation, U.S. Off. of Personnel Management; QuickFacts, United States, U.S. Census Bur.

[473] Senior Executive Service, Fiscal Year 2014-2018, U.S. Off. of Personnel Management, Office of Strategy and Innovation Data Analysis Group at p. 7.

[474] The Army and Diversity, U.S. Army Center of Military History.

[475] Ibid.

[476] Timeline: From the Beginning, Black Am. in the U.S. Army; Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 103-04.

[477] Frey, Water from the Rock: Black Resistance in a Revolutionary Age (1991) p. 170.

[478] Hine & Jenkins, A Question of Manhood, Volume 1: A Reader in U.S. Black Men's History and Masculinity, "Manhood Rights": The Construction of Black Male History and Manhood, 1750-1870 (1999), pp. 197-98, quoting Hessian captain Johann E

[479] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, p. 104.

[480] The Militia Act of 1792, Second Congress, Session I. Chapter XXVIII; Nat. Guard, About the Guard, How We Began (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[481] Nat. Museum of the Marine Corps., African Americans in the United States Marine Corps Timeline.

[482] Am. Battlefield Trust, War of 1812 Facts: What roles did African Americans Play in the War of 1812? (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[483] Smith, Wedged Between Slavery and Freedom: African American Equality Deferred (Aug. 14, 2017) Nat'l Park Service.

[484] Brockell, The Ugly Reason 'The Star-Spangled Banner' Didn't Become our National Anthem for a Century (Oct. 18, 2020) Washington Post.

[485] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 48.

[486] Jones Testimony, supra, a

[487] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 49.

[488] Timeline: From the Beginning, supra, at fn. 477.

[489] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, p. 288.

[490] Id. at pp. 286-87.

[491] Freeman et al., The Fight for Equal Rights: A Recruiting Poster for Black Soldiers in the Civil War (1992) 56 Soc. Education 2, pp. 118-120.

[492] The Civil War by the Numbers, Am. Experience, PBS; Lee, Socioeconomic Differences in the Health of Black Union Army Soldiers (2009) Soc. Sci. History, p. 427-57.

[493] Berlin et al. , Freedom: A Documentary History of Emancipation, 1861-1867, Series II: The Black Military Experience (1982) p. 725, citing an Anonymous Virginia Black Solder to an Unidentified Washington Official, December 1865.

[494] Trotter, Workers on Arrival, supra, at fn. 6, p. 51.

[495] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12, pp. 288-89.

[496] Berlin et al. , Freedom, supra, at fn. 494, Army Engineer to the Headquarters of the Department of the South, p. 56.

[497] Lincoln's Proclamation to Establish a "Bureau of Colored Troops" , African Am. Civil War Memorial, Nat. Park Service (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[498] Nat. Museum of African Am. History & Culture, Buffalo Soldiers, Legend and Legacy (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[499] Ibid.

[500] Ibid.

[501] Ibid.; Nat. Park Service, Buffalo Soldiers (as of Apr. 11, 2022).

[502] Nat. Museum of African Am. History & Culture, Buffalo Soldiers, supra, at fn. 499.

[503] Ibid.

[504] Ibid.

[505] Ibid.

[506] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12,

[507] Ibid.

[508] Ibid.

[509] Ibid.; Jack D. Foner, Blacks and the Military in American History: A New Perspective (1974) p. 121, quoting a black officer.

[510] Jones, American Work, supra, at fn. 12,

[511] Ibid.

[512] Timeline: From the Beginning, supra, at fn. 477.

[513] Ibid.

[514] Dalfiume, The "Forgotten Years" of the Negro Revolution, 55 J. Am. History, 90, 90, quoting James Baldwin as quoted in Yinger, A Minority Group in American Society (1

[515] Brown, The Whiteness of Wealth: How the Tax System Impoverishes African Americans—And How We Can Fix It (2021), pp. 15-16; Callahan, How the GI Bill Left Out African Americans (Nov. 11, 2013) Demos.

[516] Nat. Museum of the Marine Corps., African Americans in the United States Marine Corps Timeline, supra, at fn. 482.

[517] Executive Order 9981, Establishing the President's Committee on Equality of Treatment and Opportunity in the Armed Services (July 26, 1948).

[518] Korb, History of Integration in the U.S. Armed Services (Jul. 13, 2021) MilitaryTime.

[519] Conde, For Many Black families, Military Service is a Chance at Upward Mobility (Nov. 11, 2021) NBC News; Wilcox et al., Black Men Making it in America: The Engines of Economic Success for Black Men in America, Inst. for Family Studies, p. 16.

[520] African-Americans in Combat, History Detectives, Public Broadcasting Service.

[521] Murray, Blacks and the Draft: A History of Institutional Racism (1971) 2 J. Black Studies 57, 69-70.

[522] African-Americans in Combat, supra, at fn. 521.

[523] Ibid.

[524] Ibid.

[525] Ibid.

[526] Cooper, African-Americans Are Highly Visible in the Military, but Almost Invisible at the Top (May 25, 2020) Wash. Post.

[527] Christensen & Tsilker, Racial Disparities in Military Justice: Findings of Substantial and Persistent Racial Disparities Within the United States Military Justice System, Protect Our Defenders, pp.

[528] Stafford, et al., Deep-Rooted Racism, Discrimination Permeate US Military (May 27, 2021) AP News.

[529] Cramer, Confederate Flag an Unnerving Sight in Capitol (Jan. 9, 2021) N.Y. Times.

[530] Romey, Decoding the Hate Symbols Seen at the Capitol Insurrection (Jan. 12, 2021), Nat'l Geographic.

[531] Watson & Legare, Over 80 of Those Charged in the January 6 Investigation Have Ties to the Military (Dec. 15, 2021) CBS News.

[532] Gibson & Jung, Historical Census Statistics on Population Totals by Race, 1790 to 1990, and by Hispanic Origin, 1970 to 1990, for the United States, Regions, Divisions, and States (Sept. 2002) U.S. Census Bureau, Population Division: Working Paper No. 56, Table 19, at p. 47; A History of African Americans in California: Industry, supra, at fn. 379.

[533] Broussard, In Search of the Promised Land in Seeking El Dorado, supra, at fn. 20, p. 198.

[534] Rothstein, The Color of Law, supra, at fn. 150, p. 165.

[535] Id. at p. 168.

[536] Id. at pp. 168-69.

[537] Id. at p. 168.

[538] Hudson, West of Jim Crow: The Fight Against California's Color Line (2020) p. 234, quoting Ruby Williams; see also Rampersad, Jackie Robinson: A Biography (1997) p. 22 ["By 1940, a year before Jack Robinson's departure from Pasadena, the city had not yet hired, as one editorial indignantly put it, 'a single [African American] policeman, fireman, regular day-time school teacher, meter-reader, or any other type of employee for the utilities; no, not even a janitor or an elevator boy in the City Hall.' Pasadena employed some African Americans in the part, street, and refuse departments, and then only as laborers, never as clerks. At some point, the post office began to hire African Americans, and a county office gingerly broke the Jim Crow rule; but most businesses did not, and all trade unions scorned African Americans as members. The result was chronic unemployment and a growing despair. In 1924, after the city rebuffed a petition to appoint an African American policeman (by then Los Angeles had an African American detective and several African American patrolmen and firemen), the Eagle summed up its concern: 'The condition of affairs surrounding the racial issues in Pasadena is nothing less than nauseating.'"].

[539] Spangler v. Pasadena City Board of Education (C.D. Cal. 1970) 311 F. Supp. 501, 504.

[540] AB 3121 Meeting Materials, pp. 258-259; Jones Testimony, supra, at fn. 6

[541] United States v. City and County of San Francisco (N.D. Cal. 1988) 696 F. Supp. 1287, 1290.

[542] Madowitz et al., Public Work Provides Economic Security for Black Families and Communities (Oct. 2020) Center for Am. Progress.

[543] 2018 Annual Census of Employees in State Civil Service: Report to the Governor and Legislature (Mar. 2020) Cal. Dept. of Human Resources, pp. 10, 19.

[544] Semega, Income and Poverty in the United States: 2019 (Sept. 15, 2020) United States Census.

[545] Manduca, Income Inequality and the Persistence of Racial Economic Disparities (2018) 5 Sociological Science 182, pp. 182, 190.

[546] Darity & Mullen, From Here to Equality, supra, at fn. 368, p. 44.

[547] Poverty Rate by Race/Ethnicity (CPS) (2020) Kaiser Family Found., State Health Fa

[548] Mason, Moments of Disparate Peaks: Race-Gender Wage Gaps Among Mature Persons, 1965-2007 (2011) Rev. Black Political Econ. 38, p. 1-25.

[549] Jones Testimony, supra, a

[550] Whitehead, Support from Family Does Not Replace the Social Safety Net (Apr. 2016) Center for Poverty Research, U.C. Davi.

[551] Bhutta, et al., Disparities in Wealth by Race and Ethnicity in the 2019 Survey of Consumer Finances (2020) FEDS, Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

[552] Akabas, et al., New BPC Survey Shows Americans Need Better Ways to Save for Emergencies (Feb. 25, 2021) Bipartisan Policy Center.

[553] Bohn et al., Black Californians Struggle within a Challenging Job Market (Feb. 24, 2021) Pub. Policy Inst. of Calif.; Smart, COVID-19 Job Market Wreaks Havoc on Black Women (Apr. 15, 2021) U.S. News & World Report; Goldman et al., Racial and Ethnic Differentials in COVID-19-Related Job Exposures by Occupational Standing in the US (2021) 16 PLoS ONE; Gould & Wilson, Black Workers Face Two of the Most Lethal Preexisting Conditions for Coronavirus—Racism and Economic Inequality (June 1, 2020) Econ. Policy Inst.; Tracking the COVID-19 Economy's Effects on Food, Housing, and Employment Hardships (Sept. 23, 2021) Center on Budget and Policy Priorities; Williams, Laid Off More, Hired Less: Black Workers in the Covid-19 Recession (Sept. 29, 2020) Rand Corp., the Rand Blog.

[554] Jan, The Striking Race Gap in Corporate America (Dec. 15, 2021) Wash. Post.

[555] Ibid. These companies are Walmart, Nvidia, Cisco, Pfizer, T-Mobile, Costco, Honeywell and Qualcomm.

[556] Reed, The Surprising Cross-Racial Saga of Modern Wealth Inequality (Jun. 29, 2020) The New Republic.

[557] Jones Testimony, supra, a

[558] Poverty Rate by Race/Ethnicity (CPS), supra, at fn. 548.

[559] Bohn et al., Black Californians Struggle within a Challenging Job Market, supra, at fn. 554.

[560] Kaplan & Hoff, Almost 70% of Black workers in Southern California who lost their jobs said they were still looking for work a year after the start of the pandemic (Mar. 2, 2022) Business Insider; Essential Stories: Black Worker COVID-19 Economic Health Impact Survey (Feb. 2022) UCLA Ctr. For the Advancement of Racial Equality at Work, pp. 18-19.

[561] Dunn et al., Black Representation in Film and TV: The Challenges and Impact of Increasing Diversity (March 11, 2021) McKinsey & Company.

[562] Ibid.

[563] Ibid.

[564] Faughnder & James, Hollywood's C-suites Are Overwhelmingly White. What Are Studios Doing About It? (July 1, 2020) Los Angeles Times.

[565] Dunn et al., Black Representation in Film and TV, supra, at fn. 562.

[566] Spriggs.Testimony, supra, at fn. 207.

[567] Is Silicon Valley Tech Diversity Possible Now? (Jun. 26, 2019) Center for Employment Equity, U. Mass-Amhe

[568] Shining a Light on Tech's Shadow Workforce, Contract Worker Disparity Project (as of Apr. 29, 2022).

CHAPTER 11 An Unjust Legal System

COURTESY OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY ARCHIVE/UNIVERSAL IMAGES GROUP VIA GETTY IMAGES

Young Black men enslaved as part of the convict labor system of Florida. (1915)

I. Introduction

As discussed in the previous chapters, throughout history, the American government at all levels has treated African Americans as criminals for the purposes of social control, and to maintain an economy based on exploited African American labor. This criminalization of African Americans is an enduring legacy of slavery. These persisting effects of slavery have resulted in the over-policing of African American neighborhoods, the mass incarceration of African Americans, and other inequities in nearly every corner of the American legal system.

This long history of criminalization began with enslavement and has created what some describe as a caste-like system in America where African Americans are in the lowest caste of America's racial hierarchy.[1] As the following chapter will show, this criminalization of African Americans has resulted in a criminal justice system that, overall, physically harms, imprisons, and murders African Americans more than other racial group relative to their percentage of the population. While constitutional amendments[2] and federal civil rights laws[3] have tried to ameliorate this mistreatment of African Americans, the inequities that remain are so significant that some scholars have argued that, as it relates to African Americans, U.S. society has replaced legal segregation with the criminal justice system.[4] African Americans are more likely than white Americans to be arrested, convicted, and to serve lengthy prison sentences. [5] African American adults are 5.9 times as likely to be incarcerated than white people.[6] The experiences of African Americans with the criminal justice system also result in a general mistrust of the civil justice system[7] where African Americans also face barriers to accessing justice such as obtaining a lawyer.[8]

In California, the history of the inequities African Americans experience is similar to the rest of the country's history. Although enslavement did not exist on the same scale in California that it did in southern states, California has contributed to the inequities African Americans have experienced and continue to experience. For example, California law once prohibited African Americans from testifying in court cases involving white people.[9] More recently, California's punitive criminal justice policies, such as the state's three-strikes law, have resulted in large numbers of African Americans in prisons and jails.[10] Although there is very little scholarship on African Americans' experience in the civil legal system compared to scholarship on their experience in the criminal justice system, there is evidence that African Americans have historically experienced and continue to experience discrimination, such as lack of access to a lawyer[11] and racial bias among jurors.[12]

Well after the Civil War, federal, state, and local governments criminalized African Americans as a way to control and exploit them. Some scholars argue that this system intensified during legal segregation.

Section II will discuss the historical criminalization of African Americans and implicit bias. Section III will discuss discrimination in policing. Section IV will discuss discrimination in trial and sentencing. Section V will discuss discrimination in incarceration. Section VI will discuss the effects of contact with the criminal justice system. Lastly, section VII will discuss the experience of African Americans in the civil legal system.

II. Criminalization of African Americans

It is well established in the historical scholarship that American society has criminalized African Americans starting with enslavement.[13] Federal, state, and local governments, in order to subjugate African Americans and maintain their enslaved status, criminalized African Americans as a way to control them. This system survived the abolition of slavery and the Civil War and as some scholars argue, intensified during legal segregation. Once enslavement ended, white Americans created a new legal and social system to continue to socially control and exploit approximately four million African Americans.[14]

Southern states passed laws which criminalized African Americans by prohibiting every day, harmless behavior and punishing violations with harsh penalties.[15] State and local governments then leased out unjustly accused, prosecuted, and convicted African Americans to private companies to work to pay off their fines.[16] Between approximately the 1870s and 1940s, this system of leasing essentially created a new form of slavery.[17] In the segregated South, laws that segregated African Americans treated African Americans as peripheral in American society by physically separating them from white people.[18] Segregation continued to criminalize African Americans by imposing criminal punishments, such as fines and jail time, for violations of laws discriminating against African Americans.[19]

From approximately the 1950s to the 1990s, "law and order" or "tough on crime" political campaigns and the war on drugs resulted in laws that punished African Americans and resulted in their mass incarceration.[20]

The Slave Codes and the Fugitive Slave Act

The American legal system's early criminalization of African Americans through legalized social control and punitive laws stretches back to the colonial era and became more punitive over time as discussed in Chapter 2, Enslavement. Oppression of African Americans began with cases in the first American colony of Virginia.[21] In the 1640 case of John Punch, the courts punished three servants running away from their employer.[22] This was one of the first documented court cases involving the rights of African Americans.[23] Two of the servants were white and the third was African American, but they all committed the same crime.[24] The court ordered whippings for all three, but ordered that the white servants serve their employer for three more years[25] while it ordered the African American servant, John Punch, to serve his enslaver for the rest of his life.[26]

The first laws also treated African Americans more harshly than whites. Virginia passed the Casual Killing Act of 1669, which declared that if an enslaved person died while resisting their enslaver, the enslaver would not be considered to have acted with malice, which effectively made it legal for enslavers to kill the people they enslaved.[27] According to one scholar, most of the major slave codes were from 1680 to 1682 as they marshalled previously piecemealed legislation into one code. In 1705, Virginia passed "An act concerning Servants and Slaves," which combined older laws regarding forced labor in Virginia. This law prohibited African Americans from engaging in activity that white people were free to do such as resisting a white person,[28] holding weapons,[29] and leaving their plantation without permission.[30] The laws in Virginia became a model for other southern states throughout the slavery era.[31]

Much like Virginia, other colonies adopted their own slave codes and ensured that the law subjected African Americans to criminal penalties more harshly than white people. Eventually, every enslaving state had its own slave code. Slave codes, in territories like the District of Columbia,[32] and states like Alabama[33] and North Carolina,[34] all fundamentally treated African Americans as inferior to white people.

Although Americans frequently believe that the North was not segregated, this was not the case in reality. In 1849, the Massachusetts Supreme Court held that segregated schools were permissible under the state's constitution.[35] The Michigan Supreme Court held in 1855 that a steamboat company could refuse to sell an overnight cabin to African American abolitionist William Howard Day.[36] Courts in southern states even cited to this case—which was in a northern state—when ruling against African Americans in other cases involving segregation in schools, streetcars, and public accommodations.

Virginia passed the Casual Killing Act of 1669, which declared that if an enslaved person died while resisting their enslaver, the enslaver would not be considered to have acted with malice, which effectively made it legal for enslavers to kill the people they enslaved.

Federal laws and court decisions criminalized African Americans for asserting their human right to be free. The Fugitive Slave Acts of 1793[37] and 1850[38] required that all enslaved people seeking freedom by crossing state lines to free states be returned to their enslavers. In 1857, the U.S. Supreme Court held in Dred Scott v. Sandford that African Americans—whether enslaved or free—were not citizens of the United States and therefore did not have the rights and privileges of the U.S. Constitution.[39] There are many documented examples of court laws, court decisions, and associated documents[40] during this time that demonstrated that the American legal system treated African Americans as inferior, with fewer rights, and who were therefore subject to more punitive treatment under the law.

After the Emancipation Proclamation and the end of the Civil War, Congress made several efforts to safeguard the rights of African Americans. Congress passed the Thirteenth Amendment, which outlawed slavery.[41] Congress also passed the Civil Rights Act of 1866, which defined African Americans as citizens in order to protect the civil rights of newly freed people.[42] To primarily protect their physical safety, Congress passed the Ku Klux Klan Act to eliminate extralegal violence against formerly enslaved people.[43] Congress also created the Freedmen's Bureau in order to provide food, clothing, fuel, and other forms of assistance to destitute formerly enslaved people.[44]

But, as discussed in previous chapters, white supremacist southern politicians rose to power after the contested U.S. presidential election of 1876. U.S. troops withdrew from key cities in the southern states, and the Freedmen's Bureau had already been dismantled in 1872 because of southern political pressure. As a result, these amendments and statutes were largely ignored or circumvented for a century.[45]

The Black Codes

Southern states passed the Black Codes and vagrancy laws to criminalize, socially control, and maintain formerly enslaved African Americans in a lower social caste and as a source of exploited, free labor.[46] Though often confused with segregation laws, the Black Codes existed to criminalize the everyday activities of African Americans in southern states during the years immediately after the end of slavery until the Reconstruction Act of 1867.[47] If arrested and convicted of violations, African Americans again had little to no control over their own lives. This provided an opportunity for white Americans in economic and political power to continue using Black labor to support the southern economy.[48] Moreover, Black Codes and vagrancy laws were a revival of a legal system that existed during the slavery era and further contributed to the social control of African Americans, enabling their economic exploitation.[49]

During slavery, white Americans generally believed that free African Americans were suspicious, as white Americans saw free African Americans as "masterless" and therefore unhoused or vagrant, and most likely fleeing from the law.[50] In some states, police arrested African Americans if they could not prove that they worked for a white employer.[51] They could not change employers without permission.[52] African Americans could not sign labor contracts without a discharge paper from their previous employer.[53] This placed all the power in employers, much like slavery placed all the power in enslavers, and left African Americans with little control over their ability to find other work.

Other Black Codes supported the forced labor of Black children, as discussed in Chapter 8, Pathologizing the African American Family. As part of the Black Codes, states passed vagrancy laws that declared African Americans who were unemployed and without a permanent residence as vagrants and therefore subject to fines or imprisonment, which criminalized and controlled African Americans.[54]

While the Black Codes ended in the 1860s, ex-Confederate states passed vagrancy laws after the end of Reconstruction.[55] All former states in the confederacy, except Arkansas and Tennessee, passed vagrancy laws by 1865.[56] After the police arrested African Americans for minor infractions, they leased them to a private company or a white private citizen who would pay the fine in exchange for the person's forced labor.[57] Under this system, incarcerated people could often never earn enough to repay the plantation enslaver to their satisfaction, and allowed the plantation enslaver to continue exploiting African American workers for many years.[58]

In a system known as "convict leasing," state laws and the U.S. Constitution allowed private entities to force African Americans into doing the same work, on the same land, and even for the same people as when they were enslaved.

Convict Leasing and Re-enslavement

In a system known as "convict leasing," laws and the U.S. Constitution allowed private entities to force formerly enslaved people and descendants of enslaved people into doing the same work, on the same land, and even for the same people as African Americans would have done when they were enslaved.[59] African American men and boys were arrested on vagrancy charges or minor violations, fined, and forced to pay off their fine through convict leasing. The convict leasing system was legal because the Thirteenth Amendment allowed forced labor for people who had been convicted of a crime.[60] Therefore, the legal system considered incarcerated people to have few rights because, in the words of the Supreme Court of Virginia, they were "slaves of the state."[61]

In some instances, the private citizens who benefitted from this system were former enslavers or even former Confederate soldiers, such as the owner of the Angola State Penitentiary land,[62] which was formerly a plantation, as will be discussed below in the incarceration section of this chapter.

The conditions under which incarcerated people worked in the convict leasing system were oppressive. Unlike in the slavery era, lessees had no incentives to keep incarcerated people healthy or alive, so the convict leasing system was "worse than slavery."[63] Working and living conditions for incarcerated people were dangerous, unhealthy, and violent.[64]

Archaeologists recently discovered a mass grave of incarcerated people's remains in Sugar Land, Texas at the Bullhead Camp Cemetery that was once part of the Central State Prison Farm owned by the State of Texas.[65] In this mass grave, on land that was once owned by enslavers and their descendants, archaeologists found 95 bodies of men and boys and possibly one woman—almost all of whom were African Americans—who were participants in the state-sanctioned convict leasing system, which existed in Texas between 1871 and 1911.[66]

Historical documents showed that incarcerated individuals at this plantation frequently died from heat stroke, malnourishment, extreme physical activity for extended periods of time, and disease.[67] Further, the incarcerated individuals had occupational injuries and wounds from gunshots and corporal punishment.[68] Convict leasing, such as what occurred in Sugar Land, Texas, existed throughout the American South.[69] Further, a variety of individuals and businesses used convict leasing,[70] such as Tennessee Coal, Iron & Railroad Co., which U.S. Steel owned.[71] Scholars indicate that convict leasing gradually ended by around the 1940s,[72] as each state stopped leasing convict labor to private individuals and business.

COURTESY OF THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Convicted children working in the fields. (1903)

Legal Segregation and Racial Terror

During the era of legal segregation, southern state and local governments implemented a system of legalized social control to separate African American and white Americans. As discussed below, these laws were a legacy of slavery because they criminalized African Americans in a post-slavery era by mandating their separation from white Americans and provided for criminal punishments for any violations. The United States Supreme Court case Plessy v. Ferguson, which upheld the rule of "separate but equal," legalized laws that required the separation of African Americans and white people in nearly all public places such as parks, businesses, and public transportation.[73] Laws provided for criminal penalties such as fines and imprisonment through the legal justice system—only for African Americans—who violated segregation laws.[74]

In addition, as Chapter 3, Racial Terror, discusses, government actors and private citizens routinely punished African Americans who violated these laws—or even appeared to be breaking racial norms created by white people—through extrajudicial means such as lynching, racial massacre, and social fear-mongering. Lynching also contributed to the popular belief among Americans that African American people were assumed to be guilty.[75] White lynch mobs murdered African American suspects who were later found to be innocent.[76] Sometimes these murders occurred for no reason at all and at least one targeted a pregnant woman and her unborn child.[77] White mobs often framed the lynching as a method of self-defense against African Americans who were portrayed as dangerous criminals who posed a threat to white society.[78]

Segregation laws were legal until the 1950s and 1960s when landmark cases such as Brown v. Board of Education and laws like the Civil Rights Act of 1964 found them unconstitutional or made them illegal.[79]

Although Americans often associate segregation laws as a southern phenomenon, the northern legal system also discriminated against African Americans and treated them as inferior after the Civil War through court cases and laws.[80] This discrimination is particularly apparent in a line of cases involving the rights of African Americans on railroad cars.[81] In 1867, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court ruled against Mary Miles who refused to sit in the colored-only section of a streetcar.[82] Courts in southern states, such as the Florida Supreme Court[83] and the Tennessee Supreme Court,[84] later cited the Miles case in other cases in which the courts decided against African Americans who sought to sit in the whites-only sections of streetcars.[85] It is also well-established that, from the 1880s to 1960s, northern states had laws that allowed segregation in schools and public accommodations.[86]

Tough on Crime Era and the War on Drugs

The civil rights movement ended legal segregation and made explicit discrimination against African Americans in the text of court cases and statutes illegal. However, scholars argue that legalized social control continues today in the legal system despite existing civil rights laws and regulations.[87] These scholars argue that the incarceration of African Americans, particularly African American men, occurs in our legal system in two stages.[88]

First, police, prosecutors, and judges have significant discretion as to who they may stop, search, arrest, and prosecute even in a supposedly racially neutral system.[89] During this first stage, the implicit bias—which the previously described history of America's criminalization of African Americans created—affects decision makers and results in high numbers of African Americans in prison.[90] Second, as discussed above, several court cases prevented legal challenges to racial discrimination.[91]

White lynch mobs murdered Black suspects who were later found to be innocent. Sometimes these murders occurred for no reason at all, and even targeted Black children. White mobs often framed the lynching as a method of self-defense against African Americans who were portrayed as dangerous criminals who posed a threat to white society.

Several laws in the decades during and after the Nixon administration provided for increasingly harsh penalties on criminal defendants that resulted in a higher likelihood of African Americans in prison than white Americans.[92] During the post-civil rights era, both Republican and Democratic politicians ran on "tough on crime" or "law and order" political platforms that popularized especially punitive criminal laws—particularly laws prohibiting drug sales, distribution, possession, and use—to gain support from voters.[93] John Ehrlichman, who had been Nixon's domestic policy advisor, explained:

"The Nixon campaign in 1968, and the Nixon White House after that, had two enemies: the antiwar left and black people. You understand what I'm saying? We knew we couldn't make it illegal to be either against the war or black, but by getting the public to associate the hippies with marijuana and blacks with heroin, and then criminalizing both heavily, we could disrupt those communities. We could arrest their leaders, raid their homes, break up their meetings, and vilify them night after night on the evening news. Did we know we were lying about the drugs? Of course we did."[94]

Much like what Ehrlichman describes, and many scholars have noted, Republican politicians essentially sought to appeal to the backlash against the civil rights movement by supporting punitive criminal laws.[95] Democratic politicians such as President Bill Clinton also ran on tough on crime platforms during his campaigns and supported punitive laws once in office.[96]

These political campaigns often relied on the negative stereotypes of African Americans as criminals built by the previous three centuries of American law and order. George H.W. Bush produced a series of advertisements for his 1988 presidential campaign against Democratic nominee Michael Dukakis that featured an African American man named Williiam Horton. These advertisements exploited the stereotype of African American men as predators and rapists of white women. William Horton was convicted of murdering a white woman and stabbing her partner while on furlough through a weekend pass from prison. The furlough was granted through a Massachusetts program when Dukakis was governor of Massachusetts. The advertisement primarily consisted of a voice-over summarizing Horton's crimes and a mug shot where he looked particularly threatening. The advertisement also nicknamed Mr. Horton "Willie."[97] The "Willie Horton" advertisements inaccurately portrayed bi-partisan supported furlough programs. These programs were used in all 50 states, and afforded incarcerated individuals the opportunity to leave prison for a certain amount of time to visit family, search for employment, and prepare for life out of prison.[98] Thousands of incarcerated individuals safely took advantage of furlough programs in the nation, and William Horton was the rare tale of a disaster.[99]

Once politicians entered office, racist political campaigns morphed into racist policies. In 1971, President Nixon declared a "War on Drugs."[100] In the speech on it, he described drug abuse as "Public Enemy Number One."[101] This marked the beginning of the federal government's effort to fight illegal drugs by significantly increasing penalties, enforcement, and incarceration of people who possessed, distributed, and sold illegal drugs.[102] Rather than treat drug use as a public health issue, the American government chose to treat illegal drug use as a criminal justice issue.[103] Federal and state governments chose to punish drug users rather than offer medical help. The war on drugs, which continues today, [104] is a cause for the high numbers of imprisoned African Americans, as evidence exists to suggest that African Americans use drugs at approximately the same rate or less than white Americans.[105]

Federal and state governments chose to punish drug users rather than offer medical help. The war on drugs, which continues today, is a cause for the high numbers of imprisoned African Americans, as evidence exists to suggest that African Americans use drugs at approximately the same rate or less than white Americans.

In the decades that followed Nixon's announcement initiating the war on drugs, Congress passed laws that harshly punished criminal defendants. During the presidency of Ronald Reagan, Congress passed the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986, which allocated $1.7 billion to the war on drugs and provided for mandatory minimum sentences for various drug offenses.[106]

The law included far more severe punishment for the distribution of crack cocaine (cocaine in a solid pellet form) than the punishment for powered cocaine (cocaine in a fine powdered form),[107] even though there is no scientific difference between these forms of the drug.[108] The law established a 100 to 1 disparity in the punishment created for the distribution of crack and powdered cocaine.[109] Distribution of only five grams of crack resulted in a minimum five-year federal prison sentence.[110] Meanwhile, distribution of 500 grams of powder cocaine resulted in the same sentence.[111]

In 1988, Congress added even harsher penalties to the law.[112] The change allowed public housing authorities to evict any tenant who allows any form of drug-related criminal activity to occur in or near public housing premises[113] and eliminated many federal benefits, such as student loans, for anyone convicted of a drug offense.[114] An arrest is not required to evict entire families from public housing, as long as an agency employee determines that a household member or guest has engaged in drug related activity.[115] Scholars have argued that these policies perpetuate residential segregation.[116]

The law also expanded the use of the death penalty for serious drug-related offenses and imposed new mandatory minimums for drug offenses.[117] This Anti-Drug Abuse Act has had a disproportionate effect on African Americans because African Americans have more commonly used crack cocaine rather than powered cocaine.[118] One study found that the probability that a Black man would enroll in college dropped 10 percent after the passage of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986.[119] Another showed that close to one third of individuals arrested for drug possession in the U.S. are African American adults.[120]

Some scholars argue that other laws passed during this time intensified drug law enforcement by incentivizing local law enforcement to stop, search, prosecute, and/or incarcerate large numbers of people. During the presidency of President Bill Clinton, Congress passed the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994 or "The 1994 Crime Bill," which made several changes to the law, such as increased federal penalties for many crimes; made a variety of offenses federal crimes; and provided federal funding in ways that encouraged the growth of a more punitive criminal justice system.[121]

Some scholars have argued that this bill contributed to the exponential growth of the prison population in the United States in part by promising $8 billion to states if they adopted "truth-in-sentencing" laws, which required that incarcerated people serve at least 85 percent of their sentences.[122] To name another example,

In 1984, Congress passed the Comprehensive Forfeiture Act which allows the police to keep assets of people engaging in criminal activity. Numerous studies around the country have found that the police are more likely to seize money and property from Black defendants.

Congress passed the Comprehensive Forfeiture Act of 1984, which as some scholars argue, incentivizes police to engage in over-policing because it allows them to keep assets of people engaging in criminal activity.[123] Numerous studies around the country have found that the police are more likely to seize money and property from African American defendants.[124]

Implicit Bias

As federal, state, and local governments intentionally and methodically criminalized African Americans, Americans, regardless of race, began to associate African Americans with crime. This enduring legacy of slavery has resulted in an American society that is biased against African Americans. Psychologists have documented, for almost 60 years, that the stereotype of African Americans as violent and criminal.[125] This association is not only strong, it is also appears to be automatic (unconscious).[126] Other studies show that in cases involving a white victim, the more stereotypically Black a defendant is perceived to be, the more likely that person is perceived to be dangerous.[127]

A new but growing body of scholarship shows that police officers are frequently biased against African Americans.[128] New policing technologies may perpetuate how police treat African Americans because they use algorithms that replicate human biases.[129]

California

Much like courts in southern states and northern states, California courts and the legislature also discriminated against African Americans throughout history.

In 1874, the California Supreme Court upheld school segregation in San Francisco.[130] In 1919, the California Supreme Court decided a case against an African American couple, the Garys, who fought to keep their Los Angeles property against a racially restrictive covenant.[131] These cases show that California courts were actively involved in legitimizing discrimination against African Americans.

In addition to court cases, California also passed discriminatory laws. As discussed in other chapters, in 1850, the state prohibited marriage between African American and white Americans[132] and prohibited African Americans from testifying in civil and[133] criminal court cases that involved white people.[134] The California Supreme Court upheld this law prohibiting testimony from African Americans.[135] Like other states and the federal government, California also passed its own Fugitive Slave Law in 1852.[136] Much like southern states, California also had vagrancy laws.[137]

More recently, California passed the Mulford Act on July 28, 1967, which made it a misdemeanor to carry loaded firearms in public.[138] The bill was in response to the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense, which was formed in Northern California in 1966 and organized legal armed demonstrations in the state to support and protect African Americans.[139] In February 1967, 20 armed Panthers escorted Malcom X's widow Betty Shabazz to the Malcom X Grassroots Memorial in San Francisco.[140] In April 1967, 12 armed Panthers led a protest against a Contra Costa County Sheriff who killed a young Black man.[141] It was against this backdrop that state Assemblyman Donald Mulford introduced legislation to ban the carrying of firearms in public places.[142] In response to the proposed legislation, a group of Panthers walked inside the Assembly chamber at the California Capitol while carrying firearms to protest.[143]Although Assemblyman Mulford had denied that the legislation was racially motivated, after that demonstration, Assemblyman Mulford added a provision to Assembly Bill 1591 that would also include a ban on carrying loaded weapons in state buildings.[144]

California has also imprisoned African American activists. Romaine "Chip" Fitzgerald and Geronimo Pratt, both influential members of the Black Panther Party, were sentenced to life in prison for separate murders in 1969 and 1971, respectively.[145] Even though by 1990 there was substantial evidence indicating that Geronimo Pratt was framed, the California Supreme Court refused to overturn his conviction at the time and a Los Angeles

COURTESY OF DAVE RANDOLPH/SAN FRANCISCO CHRONICLE VIA GETTY IMAGES

San Francisco Police raid Black Panthers in the Fillmore District (1969)

County Deputy District Attorney argued against Pratt's parole stating, "he is still a revolutionary man." [146] While Fitzgerald remained in prison for over 51 years until his death at age 71,[147] Pratt was eventually released in 1996 after documents confirmed that the government's key witness was an undercover police operative who posed as a member of the Black Panther Party.[148] Advocates argue that other African American political activists currently imprisoned in California should be considered political prisoners because they have been denied parole as a result of their political affiliations.[149]

III. Policing

Police have harassed, brutalized, and killed African Americans since the slavery era. The stereotypes created to support slavery and that have carried through to the modern day have resulted in implicit biases against African Americans in the American public at large and in our police force. Due to implicit bias in policing, and the effects of residential segregation, African American communities are paradoxically both under and over-policed depending on the type of crime.[150] The police and the American public see African Americans not as victims, but as criminals. The legacy of slavery continues to devalue African American lives today as police are more likely to stop, arrest, and kill African Americans than white Americans.

Slave patrols were made up of ordinary citizens, like farmers, hotelkeepers, and brick makers, who banded together to catch, return, and discipline freedom seekers and prevent revolts.

Slave Patrols

Slavery era "slave patrols" were an early form of policing and one of the first patrols began in the Carolina colony in the early 1700s.[151] Slave patrols were made up of ordinary citizens, like farmers, hotelkeepers, and brick makers,[152] who banded together to catch, return, and discipline freedom seekers and prevent revolts.[153] Some slave patrol members were community leaders and the enslavers who enslaved large numbers of people in the region.[154] Some slave patrols had written patrol enforcement instructions, member rosters, and correspondence.[155] Others were more informal and simply consisted of all adult men in a community.[156]

Slave patrols had many similarities with modern police departments. Much like current police departments, some slave patrols had hierarchical organization structures that mimicked military units with ranks such as captain.[157] Slave patrols also used dogs to attack enslaved people by biting them but also to instill fear, and used bloodhounds to track down enslaved people.[158] Freedom seekers learned to run without shoes and put black pepper in their socks to make the slave patrols' bloodhounds sneeze and throw them off their scent.[159]

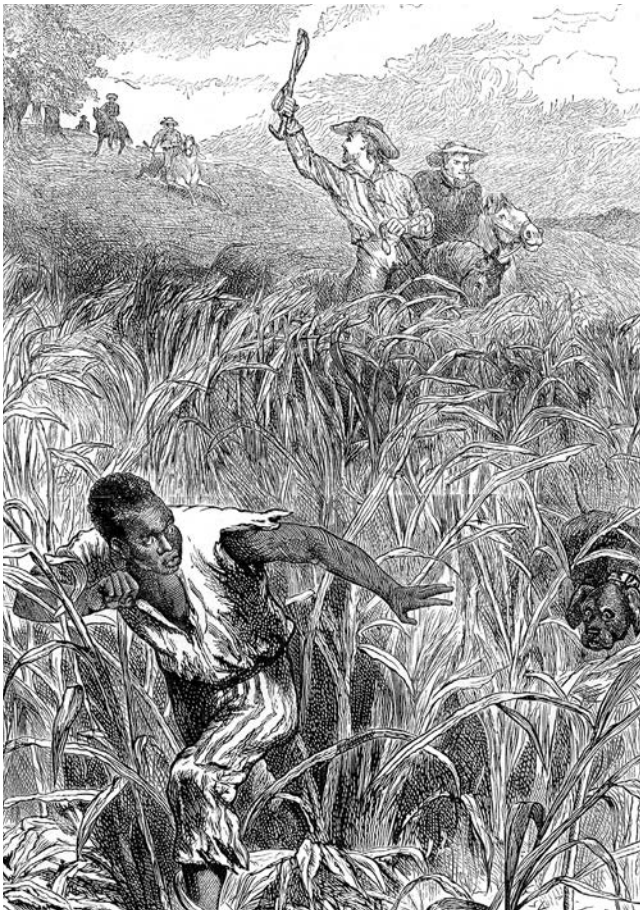
Much like slave patrols, police have continued to use dogs against African Americans in the 20th century through the present. Police used dogs against demonstrators during the civil rights movement.[160] The United States Department of Justice noted in its 2015 report that the Ferguson Police Department "exclusively set their dogs against black individuals, often in cases where doing so was not justified by the danger presented." In Baton Rouge, Louisiana, police dogs bit at least 146 people from 2017 to 2019 and almost all of whom were Black.[161]

Law Enforcement Targeting of African American Political Leaders

Law enforcement agencies have not only targeted African Americans and physically hurt them, but the federal government has targeted African American political leaders to neutralize their effectiveness. As discussed in Chapter 3, Racial Terror and Chapter 4, Political Disenfranchisement, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and state intelligence agencies, like the Mississippi Sovereignty Commission, targeted civil rights leaders and activists to deter them. The Mississippi Sovereignty Commission openly discussed murdering civil rights activists[162] and were implicated in false convictions of activists.[163] The Federal Bureau of Investigation has continued surveillance action today against Black Lives Matter organizers.[164]

COURTESY OF DUNCAN1890/DIGITALVISION VECTORS VIA GETTY IMAGES



Vintage engraving of an African American man running through long grass chased by men on horseback with dogs. (c. 1880)

Over-Policing

A majority of African Americans live in communities where there are higher rates of violent crime. As described in Chapter 5, Housing Segregation, due to government-sanctioned residential segregation, African Americans are far more likely than white Americans to live in impoverished neighborhoods with higher rates of violent crime.[165] Sixty-two percent of African Americans live in highly segregated, metropolitan areas that experience a high degree of violent crime, while the majority of white Americans live in "highly advantaged" neighborhoods where there is little violent crime.[166] As Dr. Bruce Appleyard testified during the December 7, 2021 Task Force Meeting, there may be a connection with formerly redlined communities and higher rates of police stopping and searching of African Americans.[167]

Studies suggest that police treat African Americans differently than white Americans. Some scholars believe that police arrest large numbers of African Americans for relatively minor crimes, such as loitering, drug possession, and driving infractions. In 2019, African Americans comprised 26 percent of all arrests yet they only made up 13.4 percent of the population.[168] According to a recent large-scale analysis of racial disparities in of nearly 100 million state patrol police stops in 33 states, researchers found that police officers stop African Americans more often than white drivers relative to their share of the driving-age population.[169] Drivers—after controlling for age, gender, time, and location—are more likely to be ticketed, searched, and arrested when they are African American than when they are white.[170] There is also evidence that the bar for searching African American drivers is lower than for searching white Americans.[171] A 2021 study of traffic stop data in Florida shows that approximately 42 percent of police officers in that state discriminate during traffic stops and that minority drivers are less likely to be able to leave with a warning when compared to white drivers.[172] Another study shows that police use more force against African American and Latino suspects in the beginning stages of interactions.[173]

Some early data also indicates that police may have arrested a large number of African Americans, relative to their proportion of the population, for violating social distancing rules during the COVID-19 pandemic.[174]

Some research indicates that American society views African Americans so differently than the rest of the population that marketing professionals have identified and potentially exploited this trend.[175] Marketing has targeted African Americans for consumer products to defy racism and project a middle class identity.[176] Respondents in one study indicated that being well groomed is a way to defy racism by showing worthiness.[177]

The daily ongoing fear of racial profiling has an enduring effect on African Americans. Former First Lady Michelle Obama discussed her fears about her daughters becoming the victims of racial profiling:[178] "The fact that they are good students and polite girls, but maybe they're playing their music a little loud, maybe somebody sees the back of their head and makes an assumption." "Many of us still live in fear as we go to the grocery store, walking our dogs, or allowing our children to get a license." Obama said.[179]

Policing in African American communities, such as through "stop and frisk" techniques, "communicates to Black men that they are objects of disdain by the state and that their citizenship is degraded."[180]

A 2017 study of officer-worn body camera footage showed police officers speaking significantly less respectfully to African Americans than to white Americans in everyday traffic stops after controlling for officer race, infraction severity, stop location, and stop outcome.[181]

Federal programs and nationwide policing practices have contributed to this over-policing. Operation Pipeline is a federal program in which over 300 state and local law enforcement agencies train officers to use pretextual stops and consent searches on a large scale for the interception of the transportation of drugs. "Broken Windows," an aggressive crime prevention strategy, emphasizing arresting people for committing both major and minor offenses, was first implemented in New York City in the 1990s.[182] It resulted in arrests of disproportionate numbers of Latino and African American youth.[183]

Under-Policing and the Dismissal of African American Victims

In addition to perceiving African Americans as more dangerous, Americans and police officers are also less likely to view African Americans as victims of crimes, particularly in areas of violence against women and girls, and mass shootings. Evidence of such under-policing is apparent in the popular news coverage of many cases in which law enforcement authorities appear to have ignored the disappearance of African American women, girls, and children.

Crimes against Black women are poorly investigated and sometimes ignored altogether. When police actually attempt to investigate alleged crimes against Black women, they often believe the victims are not credible.

Although Black women experience more sexual violence, Black women have historically not received the same level of attention as white women following sexual assaults.[184]As one scholar explains: "Crimes against Black women are poorly investigated and sometimes ignored altogether. When police actually attempt to investigate alleged crimes against Black women, they often believe the victims are not credible. Further, the few sexual assault crimes that actually lead to police charges are frequently not pursued by prosecutors[,] . . . denying [Black women] access to justice."[185] Black women and girls are disproportionately more likely to be victims of sex trafficking in the United States than women and girls of other races.[186]

These biases are rooted in history. In 1855, a judge instructed a jury that Missouri's laws protecting women who resist sexual assault did not apply to a 19-year-old enslaved woman, Celia, who killed her enslaver when he was attempting to rape her, after she had already endured five years of rape resulting in the birth of two of his children.[187]

This trend also extends to crimes against African American children. African American children on average remain missing longer than non-Black children.[188] African American women and girls, in particular, go missing in numbers larger than their proportion of the population.[189] Not only the police but also the media[190] typically pay them less attention compared to missing white women and girls.[191] Police and prosecutors sometimes have also improperly handled these cases.[192] In Atlanta, Georgia, during the late 1970s and early 1980s, a serial killer murdered approximately two dozen children, many of whom were African American boys.[193] Police arrested and prosecutors convicted Wayne Williams of killing two adults, but prosecutors never tried or convicted him of killing any children, even though many believe he murdered the missing children.[194] In fact, prosecutors have never obtained a conviction for the murders of all the missing children.[195]

Similarly, African American transgender and gender non-conforming people receive inadequate police protection, even though they are more likely to suffer violent crime.[196] Advocates have described an increasing "epidemic of violence" against the transgender community,[197] and studies show that Black transgender women are significantly more likely to experience violence or be murdered compared to white transgender women.[198] In 2019, for example, African American transgender women made up 91 percent of all transgender people killed by violent crime.[199] Despite experiencing greater levels of violence, African American transgender people are also less likely to seek and receive help from the police.[200] This is because African American transgender people suffer much higher rates of harassment and assault when interacting with the police.[201]

Some very new and limited scholarship shows that "mass shootings" occur more in Black communities than in other communities and more frequently than is covered in media reports.[202] Part of the reason is due to the fact that the definition of "mass shootings" is different, depending on the government agency, and the media tends only to cover "mass public shooting" rather than mass shootings that grow out of violence between individuals or groups.[203]

Black children on average remain missing longer than non-Black children. Black women and girls, in particular, go missing in numbers larger than their proportion of the population. Not only the police but also the media typically pay them less attention compared to missing white women and girls.

Employment Discrimination

Employment discrimination in police departments against African American applicants may exacerbate discrimination and police brutality against African Americans. The Obama administration's Task Force on 21st Century Policing noted in its recommendations that the diversity of the nation's law enforcement agencies was an important aspect in developing community trust in the police.[204] The United States Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has identified problems with hiring, retention, harassment, and promotion of African American police officers.[205] Police officers have publicly complained in news outlets throughout the country about issues around discrimination and harassment against African American police officers and correctional officers.[206] These conditions have resulted in many departments that have very few African American police officers. Some scholars have argued that this lack of diversity in police departments contributes to discrimination and police brutality against African Americans.

Extrajudicial Police Killings

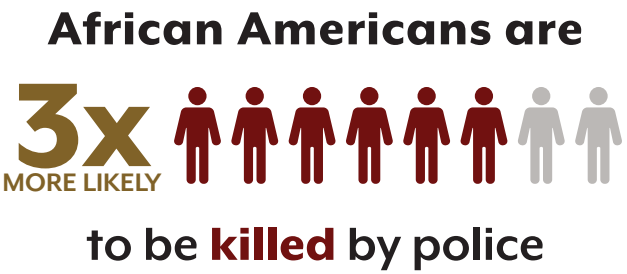
There is a very long history of police officers killings of African Americans throughout the United States, from the slavery era to present day. This history has not been limited to the southern states, but as discussed in Chapter 3, Racial Terror, is also part of California's history.

A study of thousands of use of force incidents has concluded that African Americans are far more likely than other groups to be the victims of police violence.[207] African Americans are 2.9 times more likely to be killed by police than white people.[208] In fact, the statistics may be worse than this because, according to one study of data from 1980 to 2019, more than half of all killings by police in the U.S. go unreported in the USA National Vital Statistics System database from which some analysis is drawn.[209]

There are many well-publicized examples of police killing African Americans such as: George Floyd (Minneapolis, Minnesota) and Breonna Taylor (Louisville, Kentucky).[210] Some have died while in police custody, like Sandra Bland in Waller County, Texas. Others have likely died because of police neglect, such as Mitrice Richardson who disappeared in Malibu, California in 2009.

California

Police violence against African Americans is similar in California.[211] Statistics from California's Racial and Identity Profiling Advisory Board's 2022 report, drawing on data from 18 law enforcement agencies, including



More than half of all killings by police in the U.S. go unreported in the USA National Vital Statistics System database from which some analysis is drawn.

California's 15 largest agencies, shows that police stopped a higher percentage of people perceived to be African American for reasonable suspicion that the person was engaged in criminal activity than any other racial group.[212]

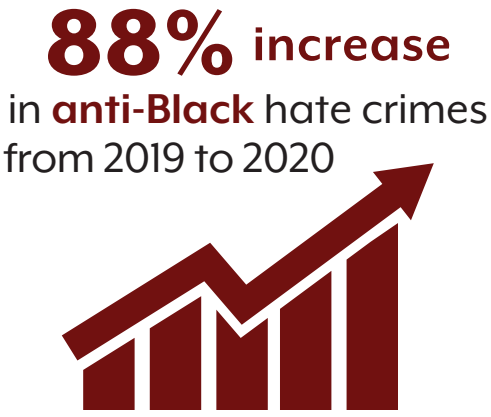
In 2020, African Americans made up about seven percent of the population, but those perceived to be African American made up 17 percent of people police stopped,[213] and 18 percent of the people police have shot or seriously injured.[214] African American Californians are about three times more likely to be seriously injured, shot, or killed by the police relative to their share of the state's population.[215]

Officers searched, detained on the curb or in a patrol car, handcuffed, and removed from vehicles more people who the officers perceived as African American than individuals they perceived as white.[216] Search discovery rate analysis showed that individuals who police perceived as African American had the highest search rate.[217] People perceived to be African American were also more likely to have police use force against them compared to people perceived as white.[218] Police officers also reported ultimately taking no action during a stop most frequently when stopping a person they perceived to be African American, [219] suggesting there may have been no legitimate basis for the stop.

As in the rest of the country, the Operation Pipeline Program in California led to racial profiling in the state. In a 1999 report by the California State Legislature, the California Highway Patrol described Operation Pipeline enforcement efforts as a way to find illegal drugs by generating "a very high volume of legal traffic enforcement stops to screen for criminal activity, which may include drug trafficking."[220] As one California Highway Patrol sergeant said in an interview, "It's sheer numbers. . . Our guys make a lot of stops. You've got to kiss a lot of frogs before you find a prince." [221] California Highway Patrol canine units were involved in nearly 34,000 such stops in 1997 and only two percent of those stopped were carrying drugs. [222] In 1999, the American Civil Liberties Union sued the California Highway Patrol and alleged that Operation Pipeline taught officers to stop African American and Latino male drivers for little or no reason.[223] The California Highway Patrol admitted in court documents that its officers were twice as likely to stop Black drivers than white drivers, and were more likely to ask Black drivers for permission to search their cars than white drivers.[224]

Relatedly, an analysis of data from 2000 to 2008 in California showed that African Americans were significantly more likely than white people to be arrested for a marijuana offense.[225] After the legalization of cannabis in California, news reports indicated that Black entrepreneurs who try to start new cannabis related businesses face challenges and delays, including a slow licensing processes.[226] For an in depth discussion of discrimination in licensure, see Chapter 10, Stolen Labor and Hindered Opportunity.

African Americans are also increasingly victims of hate crimes both nationwide and in California. According to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, 48.5 percent of single-bias hate crime incidents were motivated by anti-Black bias in 2019.[227] According to the California Attorney General's report on hate crimes in the state in 2020, 34.3 percent of single-bias hate crimes were motived by anti-Black bias.[228] Anti-Black bias events were the most prevalent of all types of hate crimes and increased 88 percent from 2019 to 2020.[229]



There are numerous high-profile incidents of police killing African Americans in California such as Ezell Ford (Los Angeles); Kendrec McDade (Pasadena); Wakeisha Wilson (Los Angeles); Anthony McClain (Pasadena); Oscar Grant (Oakland); Dijon Kizzee (Los Angeles); Richard Risher (Los Angeles); Stephon Clark (Sacramento); and Alfred Olango (San Diego). These deaths and many others nationwide have sparked increased activism and public awareness on the issue of police brutality. Activists established the first chapter of Black Lives Matter in Los Angeles and it is now a global network of activists.[230]

Police departments throughout the state have histories of violence against African Americans.

In Los Angeles before the turn of the century, the city's police had a history of violence against other historically marginalized groups such as Native Americans, Latinos, and Asian Americans. As more African Americans moved to the city, the time period between the 1920s to the 1960s was characterized by police brutality against African Americans and protests, such as the Watts Rebellion in 1965. Much like many other historical events that are often considered "riots," what occurred in Watts was a reaction to injustice or a "rebellion." For further discussion of rebellions, please see Chapter 3, Racial Terror.

The Los Angeles Police Department, the largest police department in California and one of the largest in the country, once referred to African American suspects as "dog biscuits."

In the 1980s, the Los Angeles Police Department, which is the largest police department in California and one of the largest in the country, referred to African American suspects as "dog biscuits."[231] Victims of police dogs sued and alleged that the department disproportionately used dogs in minority neighborhoods, which resulted in police dogs inflicting 90 percent of their reported bites on African Americans or Latinos.[232] In 2013, the Special Counsel to the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department, which is the largest sheriff's department in California and the country, found that African Americans and Latinos comprised 89 percent of the total individuals who were bitten by the department's dogs from 2004 to 2012.[233] During the same time, the Special Counsel found that the number of African Americans that police dogs bit increased 33 percent.[234]

Often, such incidents of police brutality led to community protests that, in turn, sometimes continue brutality by police.[235] The beating of Rodney King by the LAPD is one such example.[236] On March 3, 1991, Rodney King stopped his car after leading LAPD officers on a pursuit.[237] Officers beat Rodney King and were captured on video.[238] The officers were charged but, despite strong video evidence against the officers, were ultimately acquitted.[239]

There is also at least some evidence that law enforcement gangs—which are groups of peace officers within an agency that engage in a pattern of on-duty behavior that intentionally violates the law or fundamental principles of professional policing[240]—such as those alleged in the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department, have exacerbated the brutalization of African Americans by law enforcement in California.[241] In 1990, at least 75 Lynwood resident filed a class action lawsuit alleging that the sheriff's department allowed the "Vikings," a sheriff's department deputy gang, to carry out racially motivated violence in the community.[242]

In Los Angeles County, which is the state and country's most populous county,[243] as of April 2022, police have killed 964 people since 2000, 24 percent of whom were African American even though African Americans comprised only eight percent of the population during that time.[244] Los Angeles police have also historically appeared to ignore the disappearance of African American women.[245] Lonnie David Franklin Jr. was believed to have murdered several African American women and girls in the Los Angeles area.[246] He was not arrested and convicted until 2016, due to what activists believe was police neglect.[247]

In the Bay Area, police brutality became such a concern that the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense, which later became the Black Panther Party, formed to provide protection to African Americans from the police during the 1960s.[248] Two young activists, Huey Newton and Bobby Seale, saw brutality against civil rights protestors as part of a long history of police violence.[249] Eventually, the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense evolved into an organization that provided several other services to the community such as medical clinics and free breakfasts for children.[250] In fact, the Black Panthers even engaged in forms of "counter-mapping," which is a form of activism in which marginalized groups use maps to challenge inequality, to propose the creation of new police districts in Berkeley, California.[251] In the San Francisco Bay Area, according to a study, 27 percent of the people police killed were Black even though they only comprised seven percent of the population at the time.[252]

Discrimination by Californian police against African Americans is not limited to large police departments like the Los Angeles Police Department and the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department. According to analysis of traffic stops by the San Diego Police Department from 2014 to 2015, officers are more likely to search and question African American drivers than white drivers even though officers were less likely to find them with contraband.[253] An evaluation of 2016 to 2018 data showed that both the San Diego Police Department and Sheriff's Department were more likely to stop, search, and use force against African Americans and people with disabilities than other groups.[254] Further, African Americans were 4.3 times more likely than white people to be arrested by the police department for drug possession even though research shows that African American and white people use and sell drugs at similar rates.[255] The police department also stopped African Americans at a rate three times higher than white people.[256] Both agencies used higher levels of force against African Americans compared to other groups.[257] Both agencies used more severe levels of force against African Americans than white people at every level of alleged resistance.[258]

After the fatal shooting of Stephon Alonzo Clark by members of the Sacramento Police Department, the Attorney General conducted a review of the Sacramento Police Department's policies, procedures, and training regarding the use of force, and issued two reports to help guide the police department's reform efforts.[259]

COURTESY OF JUSTIN SULLIVAN VIA GETTY IMAGES

Sacramento, California- Hundreds packed a special city council meeting at Sacramento City Hall to address concerns over the shooting death of Stephon Clark by Sacramento police. (2018)

In California's rural and suburban regions, the California Attorney General has investigated[260] and secured a stipulated judgment[261] involving the Kern County Sheriff's Department regarding unlawful practices such as unreasonable use of force, stops, searches, and seizures, and failure to exercise appropriate management and supervision of deputies. The Attorney General has also investigated[262] the Bakersfield Police Department, and secured a stipulated judgment for the police department to strengthen its engagement with the community.[263] The Attorney General is also reviewing the practices of the Torrance Police Department amidst serious allegations of racist text messages, some of which contained disparaging comments about African Americans, and other discriminatory conduct.[264]

As a result of community activism and increased nationwide public awareness of police brutality against African Americans in 2020 in particular, California has recently taken steps to attempt to address the numerous concerns with policing in the state. Assembly Bill 89 raises the minimum qualifying age to be a police officer from 18 to 21 years of age and sets other minimum qualification requirements for peace officers in an effort to reduce uses of deadly force.[265] Assembly Bill 750 makes it a crime for a police officer to make a false statement to another peace officer if that statement is included in a peace officer report.[266] Assembly Bill 1506 requires the California Department of Justice to investigate and review for potential criminal liability all officer-involved shootings that result in the death of unarmed civilians in the state.[267] Senate Bill 2 creates a process to decertify police officers for misconduct, preventing such officers from being able to join any another agency in California.[268] California was one of only four states without that power.[269] Assembly Bill 118 creates pilot programs to allow community organizations to respond to 911 calls rather than police.[270] Assembly Bill 26 requires officers to intervene if they witness another officer using excessive force, and requires officers to report the use of force and prohibits retaliation against reporting officers.[271] But these reforms do not alone address the many years of discrimination African Americans have experienced at the hands of the criminal justice system.

IV. Trial and Sentencing

History

During the slavery era, most states denied African Americans the right to service on juries, as most states linked the ability to serve on juries to the ability to vote.[272] As discussed in Chapter 3, Racial Terror, African Americans were not allowed to vote in most states during this time. Most states also denied African Americans the right and protections of a jury trial, leaving African Americans vulnerable to unjust convictions.[273]

After the Civil War, the Civil Rights Act of 1875 outlawed race based discrimination in jury selection.[274] As discussed in Chapter 4, Political Disenfranchisement, the 14th and 15th Amendments guaranteed African American men the right to vote and serve on juries.[275] In some states, racially integrated juries protected the rights of African American defendants and prosecuted white perpetrators of racial violence.[276]

In the South, after Reconstruction, and until the 1960s, numerous allegations of crimes involving African American defendants and white victims never made it to trial.[277] Instead, the accused African American person was lynched.[278] As discussed in Chapter 3, Racial Terror, prosecutors rarely tried or convicted the white Americans who tortured and murdered African Americans through race massacres and lynchings. The same all-white juries who did not indict white perpetrators of violence convicted African American defendants, imposed harsh sentences for minor crimes, often with little evidence.[279] According to the Select Committee of the Senate outlined in the Report on Alleged Outrages in the Southern States in 1871, "In nine cases out of ten the men who commit the crimes constitute or sit on the grand jury, either they themselves or their near relatives or friends, sympathizers, aiders, or abettors."[280]

The U.S. Supreme Court did not decide until 1935 that excluding African Americans from juries because of race was unconstitutional.[281] In Norris v. Alabama, eight African American teenagers were convicted by an all-white jury and sentenced to death for the rape of two white women in Scottsboro, Alabama, despite overwhelming evidence of their innocence.[282] No African American person had served on a jury in Scottsboro in living memory.[283]

After Norris v. Alabama, many jurisdictions continued to exclude African Americans from jurors by using peremptory strikes or other pretexts.[284]

Systemic Bias Today

Today, systemic problems in the criminal justice system continue to discriminate against African Americans. Courts throughout the country have and continue to be underfunded, which can result in barriers in accessing justice, such as case delays.[285] Although courts in California are now required to take into account an individual's ability to pay when setting bail,[286] in other parts of the country wealthy defendants can essentially purchase their pre-trial freedom through the cash bail system, whereas low-income defendants might suffer additional harsh consequences solely because of their inability to pay. This occurs despite three waves of attempts to reform the cash bail system nationwide.[287] As discussed in the civil legal system discussion of this chapter, lack of diversity in the legal profession may also exacerbate the discrimination African Americans face in the criminal justice system.[288] Scholars argue that racial bias against African American defendants results in discriminatory choices by prosecutors, who make important decisions in the criminal justice system,[289] although empirical evidence exists of such bias only seems to exist in certain types of crimes.[290]

One study showed that when witnesses knew that the perpetrators were Black, witnesses who claimed to not be racially biased were more likely to incorrectly identify the perpetrator than witnesses who stated they were racially prejudiced.

Discrimination against African Americans in the criminal justice system not only results from racial biases in police, but also in witnesses and jurors. One study showed that when witnesses knew that the perpetrators were African American, witnesses who claimed to not be racially biased were more likely to incorrectly identify the perpetrator than witnesses who stated they were racially prejudiced.[291] Lack of diversity on juries continues to be a nationwide problem.[292] A study in North Carolina showing that qualified African American jurors were struck from juries at more than twice the rate of qualified white jurors.[293] Scholars have identified the following as factors contributing to underrepresentation on juries: "racial discrimination in jury selection," socioeconomic barriers preventing participation by African Americans, "judicial discrimination that allows racially demarcated jury representation," and "institutional racism and bureaucratic discrimination in perpetuating judicial inequality."[294]

One scholar has shown that study participants remembered and misremembered legally relevant facts in racially biased ways.[295] The author of the study argues that implicit racial biases affect the way judges and jurors encode, store, and recall, relevant case facts, which leads to the conclusion that implicit memory biases operate in legal decision-making.[296] A lack of jury diversity can also harm African Americans in family courts and the child welfare system, which the Chapter 8, Pathologizing, the African American Family, discusses in more detail.

The lack of diversity in juries can result in poor trial and sentencing outcomes for African Americans.[297] According to a 2017 report from the United States Sentencing Commission, African American men who commit the same crimes as white men are given prison sentences that are about 20% longer, even after controlling for prior criminal history.[298] African Americans are more likely than white Americans to be serving sentences of life, life without parole, or sentences of 50 years or more.[299]

Capital Punishment

As discussed in Chapter 3, Racial Terror, advocates have argued that capital punishment is the modern day, legal equivalent of lynching. The U.S. Supreme of Court has acknowledged that the death penalty has a discriminatory effect on African Americans. In Furman v. Georgia, U.S. Supreme Court Justice William Douglas noted that there is evidence of racial discrimination in the imposition of the death penalty[300] and that an African American would be more likely to get the death penalty when convicted for rape when compared to a white American.[301] Regardless, the Supreme Court still decided that the death penalty is constitutional in some circumstances.[302] Currently, 27 states have the death penalty while 23 states and the District of Columbia do not.[303] Three states, such as California, currently have a gubernatorial moratorium on executions.[304]

In the states where executions still occur, African American men are overrepresented among people federal and state governments execute.[305] A 2015 meta-analysis of 30 studies showing that those responsible for the murders of white people were more likely than those responsible for the murders of African American people to face a capital prosecution.[306]

California

Historically, California barred African Americans from serving on juries.[307] Lack of diversity on juries continues to be a widespread problem throughout California as, a 2020 study showed that racial discrimination is an "ever-present" feature of jury selection in California.[308] The study found that California prosecutors' use of peremptory challenges to exclude African Americans from juries is still pervasive.[309] In the last 30 years, the California Supreme Court has reviewed 142 cases involving Batson claims, which is the process by which a party can object to a preemptory challenge because of a juror's race, and found a violation only three times.[310] In fact, from 2006 to 2018, California courts held that there was a Batson error in just 18 out 683 cases.[311] It has been over 30 years since the California Supreme Court held that there was a Batson violation involving a Black juror.[312]

Prosecutorial misconduct, which is generally when a prosecutor violates their duty to refrain from improper methods calculated to produce a wrongful conviction,[313] also continues to be an issue in California's criminal courts as one study of 4,000 state and federal appellate rulings in California from 1997 through 2009 discovered that courts found prosecutorial misconduct in 707 cases, which on average, amounts to about one case a week during that time.[314]

California is one of several states that have a three-strikes law. Although amended by Proposition 36 in 2012 to apply to only serious or violent felonies,[315] California's initial three-strikes law, imposed life sentence for almost any crime—no matter how minor—if the defendant has two prior convictions for crimes that were serious under the California Penal Code. The general goal of the three-strikes law was to deter offenders, particularly violent ones, from committing crimes again.

The cases of Leandro Andrade is an example of how California's three strikes law was especially punitive and led to excessive sentencing.[316] In 1982, Andrade committed three residential burglaries during the same day while unarmed and when nobody was in the homes he burglarized.[317] Then, in 1995, he stole five videotapes, which were worth $84.70 and was arrested for shoplifting.[318] Later that same year, he stole four videotapes, which were worth $68.84 and was arrested for shoplifting.[319] Under California's three strikes law at that time, the third strike could be for any crime and did not necessarily need to be a serious or violent felony.[320] As a result, he received a sentence of 50 years to life.[321]

In Furman v. Georgia, U.S. Supreme Court Justice William Douglas noted that there is evidence of racial discrimination in the imposition of the death penalty and that an African American would be more likely to get the death penalty when convicted for rape when compared to a white American.

These policies have resulted in longer sentences for African Americans in California correctional facilities.[322] Recent reforms in California, which this chapter discusses below, have offered alternatives to incarceration for some individuals, but many African Americans still served excessive prison sentences for years.[323]

V. Incarceration

History

The history of criminalization of African Americans since slavery and the inequities in policing, trials, and sentencing have resulted in an overrepresentation of African Americans in jails and prisons, a phenomenon known as mass incarceration. As this chapter has described, American society began to criminalize African Americans starting from the era of slavery through Black Codes, vagrancy laws, and segregation laws. Further, "law and order" or "tough on crime" political campaigns in the 20th century resulted in particularly punitive sentencing and parole systems, which have led to the imprisonment of large numbers of African Americans. Although correctional authorities did not always uniformly collect data on the race of prisoners, there is evidence from the U.S. Department of Justice showing that African Americans have comprised a percentage of prisoners exceeding their percentage of the population outside of correctional facilities, from at least 1926 to 1986.[324]

One study has found that while Black and white incarcerated people were equally likely to break rules, correctional authorities were more likely to report infractions by Black people.

The percentage of prisoners admitted to state and federal institutions who are African American has consistently grown, and which general population trends cannot explain.[325] Although the imprisonment rate of African Americans has generally decreased since 2006,[326] African Americans continue to be overrepresented both nationwide and in California in adult incarceration, solitary confinement, capital punishment, and juvenile incarceration.

Adult Incarceration

The United States has the highest imprisonment rate—the number of people in prison or jail as a percentage of its total population—in the world.[327] Numerous academics, activists, and politicians have called for an end to mass incarceration, and there have been reforms in several states such as Texas, Kansas, Mississippi, South Carolina, Kentucky, and Ohio.[328]

These reforms largely focus on reducing excessive prison sentences. However, advocates argue that these efforts are not sufficient to undo decades of prison expansion. [329] One study estimates that at current rates, it will take 72 years to cut the U.S. prison population in half.[330] Despite reforms, African Americans continue to be overrepresented in prisons nationwide: 20 percent of prisoners in federal and state correctional facilities were African Americans even though they made up just 13.4 percent of the population in 2019.[331] In 2021, African Americans comprise 38.3 percent of people in federal prisons across the country.[332]

In addition to overrepresentation of African Americans in correctional facilities, federal and state officials continue to use the labor of incarcerated people.[333] In fact, some present-day prisons where incarcerated people still perform labor are on land that was once a plantation where enslaved people worked before the Civil War and where southern states similarly enslaved African Americans after the Civil War through convict leasing.[334] Angola Louisiana State Penitentiary shows how, in some ways, the American correctional system continues the legacy of slavery.[335]

Angola, which is currently outside of present day Baton Rouge, was originally a plantation named for the African country from which most of its enslaved people were trafficked.[336] After the Civil War and abolition of slavery, former Confederate Major Samuel Lawrence James received a lease of Louisiana State Penitentiary and all its incarcerated individuals.[337] Under this lease, James subleased the majority of African American people who were incarcerated to land owners to replace enslaved people while others continued to work on levees, railroads, and road construction while others were given clerical and craftsmanship work.[338] Later, there were also attempts to industrialize prison labor by forcing incarcerated people to make shoes and clothing.[339] In 1898, the State of Louisiana banned convict leasing and, in 1901, the State of Louisiana purchased the prison camp and resumed control of its prisoners.[340] More recently, incarcerated people in Angola continue to engage in production to sell goods such as growing crops like wheat, corn, soybeans, cotton, milo,[341] sugar cane,[342] and even producing art.[343] To this day, approximately 65 percent of incarcerated people in Angola are African Americans.[344]

Correctional facilities, such as the Federal Prisons Industries of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, argue that these programs teach marketable job skills.[345] But some academics argue that these work programs are not beneficial.[346]

Correctional Discipline

African Americans also experience discrimination in the correctional disciplinary system. At least one study has found that while African American and white incarcerated people were equally likely to break rules, correctional authorities were more likely to report infractions by African American people.[347]

There is an overrepresentation of African Americans in solitary confinement. Scholars have defined solitary confinement as when correctional facility officials separate incarcerated people from the general population and hold them in their cells for an average of 22 hours or more per day for 15 continuous days or more.[348] A 2018 study showed that both federal and state correctional facilities placed large numbers of African American males in solitary confinement. African American males in prison made up approximately 42.5 percent of the prison population but comprised 46.1 percent of the people in solitary confinement.

Juvenile Incarceration

African Americans are also overrepresented in the juvenile justice system. As discussed in Chapter 8, Pathologizing the African American Family, American culture tends to see African American children not as children, but as adults. African American students are subject to discipline at a higher rate than other groups in schools nationwide. In 43 states and the District of Columbia, Black students are arrested at higher levels relative to their percentage of the population.[349] There is also evidence that these racial disparities in school-based disciplinary actions are associated with county-level rates of racial bias.[350] This sort of disciplinary actions and bias contribute to how African Americans are eventually pushed to incarceration through the school-to-prison pipeline, as described in Chapter 6, Separate and Unequal Education and Chapter 8, Pathologizing the African American Family.

African American youth comprise 41 percent of youth in juvenile facilities even though they make up 15 percent of all youth in America.[351] African American youth are more than four times as likely to be detained or committed in juvenile facilities as their white peers.[352] African American youth are more likely to be in custody than white youth in every state except Hawaii.[353]

As a result of their experiences with the juvenile justice system, many African Americans distrust the system.[354] This report further discusses the enduring impact of the juvenile justice system on African American families in Chapter 8, Pathologizing the African American Family.

California

The previously described history of the criminal justice system in America, such as California three-strikes laws and similar policies that have affected large numbers of African Americans, has led to several conditions that have caused California to lead the way in expansion of prisons in the United States until recent reforms. That history, particularly from the 1980s to present, has contributed to what has been described as "the biggest prison building project in the history of the world" here in California.[355] The City of Los Angeles imprisons more people than any other American city.[356] According to one scholar, law enforcement officials often arrested, incarcerated, and/or instructed African Americans to leave Los Angeles during the 1920s and 1930s.[357]

African Americans are overrepresented in correctional facilities. Approximately 28.3 percent of California's prisoners were African American, when they make up about 6 percent of the population.[358] Further, Black people who are incarcerated in California correctional facilities also experience forms of segregation from the moment they enter a facility.[359]

California has a history of extremely poor conditions in its numerous prisons, which disproportionately harms African Americans, as they are more likely to be in prison and to serve longer sentences due to systemic racism. Like the federal government, California still houses and invests in the incarceration of people in large numbers. It houses approximately 100,000 people in its facilities, has forecasted a budget of approximately $227.2 billion for 2021-22, and operates 35 adult facilities.

In a 2011 U.S. Supreme Court case called Plata v. Brown, the Court ordered the State of California to reduce its prison population because the medical and mental health care in California prisons was so bad that it violated the U.S. Constitution's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment.[360] Since the decision in 2011, California has been required to decrease the number of people in state correctional facilities.[361] Later that year, the state passed Assembly Bill 109, which reduced overcrowding in state facilities by shifting incarceration responsibilities from state to local authorities for certain people convicted of low-level offenses.

In 2011, the medical and mental health care in California prisons was so bad that the U.S. Supreme Court ordered the State to immediately reduce its prison population because the living conditions grossly violated the U.S. Constitution's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment.

California also passed several other laws to reduce its prison population including:

- Proposition 36 limits California's three-strikes law to serious or violent felonies for third strike offenders and establishing a process for third strike offenders to ask a court to reduce their term under certain circumstances.
- Assembly Bill 2942 allows courts to resentence a defendant on the recommendation of district attorneys.
- Senate Bill 567 requires criminal courts to only impose a maximum term if a jury considers aggravating facts regarding the offense and permits a criminal defendant and other parties to dispute facts in the record or present additional facts for the purposes of sentencing.
- Senate Bill 73 ended the prohibition against probation and suspended sentencing for certain types of drug offenses.
- Assembly Bill 484 changes the requirement that a person who is granted probation after being convicted of furnishing or transporting certain controlled substances serve 180 days in a county jail as a condition of probation.
- Senate Bill 136 ended a sentence enhancement that added an extra year for anyone convicted of recommitting a felony for each prior prison or felony jail time they already served.
- Assembly Bill 32 prohibits California, as a state, from entering into or renewing a contract with a private, for-profit prison to incarcerate people.
- Other laws attempt to end private financial incentives to incarcerate large numbers of people in correctional facilities.
- Assembly Bill 2542 or the Racial Justice Act, prohibits the use of race, ethnicity, or national origin to seek or obtain convictions or impose sentences. The Racial Justice Act is also an attempt to address previous court decisions and systemic issues in the state's criminal justice system, which have made it nearly impossible for criminal defendants to challenge racial bias.[362]

Many of these laws are new so it is difficult to evaluate their impact on African Americans.

While individuals serve their prison sentences, the State of California uses their labor in many ways. The California Prison Industry Authority produces myriad products such as clothing, furniture, cleaning products, and food.[363] They also perform a wide range of duties in areas such as laundry, kitchen, and general maintenance.[364] The California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection employed around 1,600 incarcerated individuals to fight forest fires in May 2021.[365]

As previously discussed, some scholars have challenged the value of these programs because they do not necessarily provide incarcerated people with marketable job skills. Incarcerated individuals are often tasked with low skill work and obtaining a job as a firefighter can be particularly difficult, even for people without criminal records.[366]

Although California has attempted to reform its juvenile justice system in recent years, it has a well-documented and troubled history of juvenile incarceration.[367] The number of incarcerated youth reached unprecedented heights in the 1990s.[368] California housed over 10,000 youth in 11 facilities throughout the state in 1996.[369] Since that time, the state has attempted to make several systemic reforms to not only reduce the population of incarcerated youth but also to improve the treatment of youth who are in such facilities.[370]

There have also been recent attempts to decentralize the juvenile justice system and provide localized services for juveniles who are accused of crimes.[371] To that end, most recently, Senate Bill 823 provided for the closure of the California Department of Corrections and

Rehabilitation's Division of Juvenile Justice, formerly the California Youth Authority, and established the Office of Youth and Community Restoration in the California Health and Human Services Agency.[372]

But many racial inequities for young African Americans remain. Currently, in California, African American youth are 31.3 times more likely to be committed to imprisonment in the state's juvenile justice system than white youths. As of June 2020, of the total 782 youth in California juvenile detention facilities, 227 were African American. In that same time, African American youth made up 36 percent of those committed to a juvenile detention facility even though they comprised only 14 percent of the population in California.

The number of incarcerated youth reached unprecedented heights in the 1990s. California housed over 10,000 youth in 11 facilities throughout the state in 1996.

The treatment of African American youth as criminals in California begins at an early age when they are in school. School administrators, teachers, and school police, often treat young African American students as criminals. As Jacob Jackson testified at the October 12, 2021 Task Force hearing, he was targeted by his teacher and school police when he was a student at Crenshaw High School in Los Angeles.[373] More information on the juvenile justice system in California is available in Chapter 8, Pathologizing the African American Family.

VI. Effects

The lingering negative impact of contact with the criminal justice system are wide-ranging and far-reaching. African Americans who have had contact with the criminal justice system experience significant discrimination when looking for a home or a job, when they are trying to vote,[374] or serving on juries.[375] Just observing the effects of the criminal justice system can negatively affect the mental health of African Americans,[376] and lead to mistrust of the legal system.[377] Although California has passed laws to limit the lingering harms of the criminal justice system, these changes will not fully address the many years of effects of contact with the criminal justice system that many African Americans have experienced.

Devon Simmons, who served 15 years in prison for crimes he committed as a teenager in Harlem, explained:[378] "You've got to find a way to reinvent yourself and promote yourself to the world. But there's a stigma. For a long time, for example any application for school, housing, a job, you needed to check the box saying you're formerly incarcerated. The disenfranchisement pushes a lot of people into the informal market—selling drugs, for example."[379]

African Americans who have been incarcerated experience significant levels of housing instability soon after they leave prison. The Prison Policy Initiative estimates that returning citizens are almost 10 times more likely to be unhoused than the general public, and the problem among Black returning citizens is worse than other racial groups.

Lingering Discrimination

African Americans who have been incarcerated experience problems finding a permanent place to live. As discussed in the Chapter 5, Housing Segregation, African Americans have experienced homelessness dating back to slavery,[380] regardless of whether they have participated in the criminal justice system.

African Americans who have been incarcerated experience significant levels of housing instability soon after they leave prison.[381] The Prison Policy Initiative estimates that returning citizens are almost 10 times more likely to be unhoused than the general public,[382] and the problem among African American returning citizens is worse than other racial groups.[383] Another study offers an example of the collateral damage of incarceration. Having a recently incarcerated father greatly increases the risk of child homelessness, a phenomenon that is more likely experienced by African American children than white children.[384]

Finding jobs is also difficult for African American returning citizens.[385] Lack of employment opportunities for returning citizens can have a broader, negative impact on their families. Scholars argue that the high number of incarcerated members of African American families contribute to the Black-white wealth gap.[386] Although the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits consideration of a job applicant's criminal history if it negatively impacts African American job applicants, these cases are difficult for plaintiffs to prove. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the federal agency which enforces civil rights laws in employment, recognizes that employers' consideration of a conviction or arrest are factors that are particularly problematic for African American men because they are more likely to have criminal histories.[387]

To address these issues, there is a nationwide movement to prohibit employers from considering a job applicant's criminal history before employers consider their qualifications for a job. This movement is also referred to as the "ban the box" movement. Currently, 36 states and over 150 cities and counties have "banned the box" or prohibited employers from asking about conviction or arrest history, and delay background checks until later in the hiring process. But much like other criminal justice reforms discussed in this chapter, these new laws do little to address the many decades of discrimination African American returning citizens experienced when looking for work throughout American history.

Laws that deprive people with convictions of the right to serve on a jury also disproportionately harm African Americans. Some states exclude people from serving on juries when they commit misdemeanors, although reliable nationwide statistics on the number of African American people who cannot serve on juries is unavailable because no national database exists to track such data. Because African Americans are incarcerated more than other groups, they are also more likely to be excluded from jury participation as well. As discussed above, lack of jury diversity is a legacy of slavery and a serious and nationwide problem.[388]

Some states also deprive people who have criminal convictions of the right to vote. A 2003 study found that regions with large nonwhite prison populations are more likely to pass laws restricting the right of people with convictions to vote.[389] Depriving people who have convictions diminishes the political power of African Americans.[390] The Sentencing Project estimates that approximately 1.3 million African Americans of voting age cannot vote because of past convictions, which is a rate 3.7 times greater than that of non-African Americans.[391] In fact, over 6.2 percent of the African American population cannot vote because of past convictions compared to 1.7 percent of the non-African American population.[392]

Contact with the criminal justice system through incarceration affects the mental health of African Americans. Studies show that incarceration was associated with perceived discrimination, depressive symptoms, and psychological distress,[393] and the impact is long lasting.[394] Incarceration negatively affects the overall physical health of African American people after they leave prisons and jails as discussed in Chapter 12, Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect. As discussed in Chapter 8, Pathologizing the African American Family, there is also evidence that mass incarceration negatively impacts family members of African Americans who have been incarcerated, both during and after their incarceration.

A 2018 study found that a police murder of an unarmed African American triggered days of poor mental health for African Americans living in the state where that murder occurred.

Even for African Americans who have not had direct contact with the criminal justice system, just observing the effects of the criminal justice system takes a toll on African American's mental health. A 2018 study found that a police murder of an unarmed African American triggered days of poor mental health for African Americans living in the state where that murder occurred.[395] This total number of painful days over a year was comparable to the rate diabetics experienced.[396]

These negative experiences with the criminal justice system have caused many African Americans, and African American men in particular,[397] to distrust police.[398] As a result, African Americans are less likely to call the police than Latinos and white people.[399] This distrust likely leads to an underutilization of police and government services in general, such as the civil legal system, as will be discussed below. As the Kerner Commission noted in 1968, "To some Negroes police have come to symbolize white power, white racism, and white repression. And the fact is that many police do reflect and express these white attitudes. The atmosphere of hostility and cynicism is reinforced by a widespread belief among Negroes in the existence of police brutality and in a 'double standard' of justice and protection—one for Negroes and one for whites."[400]

California

In California, as discussed earlier, courts also contributed to the growing body of law that discriminated against African Americans. California's Fair Practice Act specifically and explicitly banned testimony by "negroes, or persons having one-half or more of negro blood" in any civil court case to which a white person was a party.[401] Free African American activists, who were enslaved people's greatest allies, could not be witness in any court proceedings.[402]

Currently, there is some evidence that African Americans experience discrimination in the civil legal system. The civil legal system is the system through which African Americans can obtain remedies, such as money, for the discrimination they experience in nearly every area of their life as identified in the chapters on labor, education, housing, racial terror, and wealth. But African Americans with low incomes face several systemic problems in the underfunded court systems both nationwide and in California when attempting to access justice such as obtaining a lawyer.

There appears appear to be very little scholarship on African Americans' distrust of the legal system as a whole and how that affects their underutilization of the civil law system,[403] but some evidence does indicate that their contact with the criminal justice system negatively affects trust in the civil legal system. The California Judicial Council Advisory Committee on Racial and Ethnic Bias provided some helpful insight when it studied the treatment of minorities in state courts and public perceptions of fairness in 1997.[404]

The Committee noted in 1997 that members of the Council had developed the impression from opinion surveys of over 2,000 Californians and public hearings that "many minority-group members do not believe that they will receive equal justice in the California courts. Several speakers pointed to the large percentage of minority-group members, particularly African American males, who inhabit state's jails and prisons."[405]

In California, returning citizens still experience discrimination in the areas of housing, employment, jury participation, and voting. Much like under federal law, housing providers may lawfully consider the criminal history of returning citizens under California law.[406] As a result, African American returning citizens still face many barriers when obtaining housing. California has made some recent progress towards implementing reforms to mitigate the effects of contact with the criminal justice system in the state[407] by passing the following laws:

- Proposition 47 ("The Safe Neighborhoods and School Act"): This 2015 law essentially allowed people convicted of non-serious felonies to mitigate the effect of their convictions;[408]
- Proposition 57 ("The Public Safety and Rehabilitation Act of 2016"): This 2016 law sought to give people who committed nonviolent crimes an opportunity for early parole;[409]
- Assembly Bill 1076 ("The Clean Slate Act"): This 2018 law allows automatic criminal record relief in certain circumstances and makes several other changes to make it more difficult for employers to discriminate against certain people who have had contact with the criminal justice system;[410]
- Assembly Bill 1008 ("The Fair Chance Act"): This 2018 law made it illegal for most employers in California to ask about the criminal record of job applicants before making a job offer; [411]
- Senate Bill 393 ("Consumer Arrest Record Equity Act"/"C.A.R.E Act"): This 2019 law allows for any person who is arrested but not convicted of a crime to ask a court to seal their record;[412]
- Senate Bill 310 (The Right to a Jury of Your Peers): This 2017 law allows people who were convicted of a felony to serve on juries if they have finished their prison time and are not on parole, probation, or other post-prison supervision; and
- Proposition 17: This 2020 voter initiative restored voting rights to people on parole.

While these new laws certainly help mitigate the negative effect an arrest and conviction can have for someone who has had contact with the criminal justice system—they do very little to remedy the many decades of discrimination African Americans suffered before California passed these laws.

VII. Discrimination in the Civil Justice System

The civil legal system is an especially important part of the legal system in the United States because it is the system through which Americans can solve common and ordinary problems. Americans must use the civil legal system to solve everyday problems in nearly every area of life such as family law, housing, health, finances, employment, government services, wills and estates, and education. Nationwide, approximately 47 percent of Americans experience at least one civil legal problem in their household each year.[413] Unlike in the criminal justice system, there is no constitutional right to counsel in all types of cases in the civil legal system. But a lawyer is crucial to prevailing in any civil case.

Historically, African Americans have experienced discrimination in the civil legal system nationwide and in California. American government and its citizens have used the civil legal system to subjugate African Americans during and after slavery. For an in depth discussion of the impact of the civil legal system on labor and employment rights, see Chapter 10, Stolen Labor and Hindered Opportunity. African Americans today continue to face numerous barriers in access to civil justice, including lack of resources and access to courts, and lack of diversity in the legal profession.

Systemic Barriers

The U.S. Supreme Court notoriously held in Dred Scott v. Sandford that African Americans—whether enslaved or free—were not citizens of the United States and therefore did not have the rights and privileges of the U.S. Constitution.[414] After slavery ended, many federal civil decisions harmed African Americans, such as cases that legalized segregation,[415] that prevented the federal government from outlawing racial discrimination by private citizens,[416] and that protected the economic liberties of white Americans over the civil rights of African Americans.[417] Further, in many states throughout the country African Americans could not testify in a case in which a white person was a party.[418] These government actions that occurred after slavery ensured African Americans remained in the lowest caste of the American racial hierarchy.

Evidence exists that African Americans' negative past experiences with the criminal justice system contribute to resistance to seeking help from the civil legal system.[419] One study has shown that Black claimants are underrepresented in federal court cases and white claimants are overrepresented.[420]

Members of historically marginalized communities, including African Americans, have long faced difficulties accessing justice due to systemic problems like underfunding.[421] Underfunded courts have reduced hours and staff, resulting in case delays and a decreased ability to provide services, such as resources for litigants without lawyers. These problems particularly affect people with low incomes, who are disproportionately African American.

According to the Legal Services Corporation, which Congress created to provide attorneys to low-income Americans, approximately 21 percent of people who have family incomes at or below 125 percent of the federal poverty line identified as African American in 2016.[422] In that same year, approximately 71 percent of low-income households experienced at least one civil legal problem, which included issues with domestic violence, veterans' benefits, disability access, housing conditions, and healthcare.[423] Americans with low incomes received inadequate or no legal help for 86 percent of their civil legal problems in 2016.[424]

Lack of Diversity in the Legal Profession

Historically, law schools and bar associations have discriminated against African Americans by preventing their entry into law schools and the profession.[425] As discussed in Chapter 6, Separate and Unequal Education, predominately-white graduate schools like law schools routinely excluded African Americans until the 1960s.[426] The American Bar Association, the main profession association of attorneys in the United States prohibited African Americans from joining until 1943.[427] African American lawyers founded the National Bar Association instead.[428] Chapter 10, Stolen Labor and Hindered Scholars also argue that the bar exam, the licensure exam for lawyers, is culturally biased against and designed to exclude historically marginalized groups, like African Americans. Nationwide, in 2020, African Americans comprised eight percent of students in law schools, but only about 5 percent of lawyers, even though they were 13.4 percent of the country's population.

Opportunity, provides an in depth discussion of racial discrimination against African Americans by professional guilds and licensure process. The American Bar Association initially rescinded the membership of William H. Lewis in 1912, the first African American assistant U.S. attorney general and two other African American men because leaders determined that they had elected him "in ignorance of material facts" and that "the settled practice of the Association has been to elect only white men as members."[429]

Today, scholars argue that the Law School Admissions Test and law school accreditation continues this discrimination.[430] Scholars also argue that the bar exam, the licensure exam for lawyers, is culturally biased against and designed to exclude historically marginalized groups, like African Americans. Nationwide, in 2020, African Americans comprised eight percent of students in law schools, but only about 5 percent of lawyers,[431] even though they were 13.4 percent of the country's population.[432] Only 61 percent of African Americans passed the 2021 bar examination on their first attempt nationwide, a rate much lower than that of white, Hispanic and Asian test takers.[433]

As a result, African Americans are underrepresented in the national legal profession and federal judiciary. Nationwide, in 2020, African Americans comprised 9.8 percent of federal judges even though African Americans make up 13.4 percent of the population.[434]

In general, lawyers in the legal system are particularly important as they "play a vital role in the preservation of society"[435] and "an officer of the legal system and a public citizen have special responsibilities for the quality of justice."[436] Scholars argue that a law degree is a springboard to lucrative and powerful careers, which are closed off to many African Americans.[437] Advocates argue that African American attorneys provide African American litigants and defendants with much needed and effective culturally appropriate legal services. [438]

California

These same issues exist in California. Much like California criminal courts, the state's civil courts have been historically underfunded,[439] which leads to many conditions that result in inadequate resources for the public such as limited services for self-represented litigants, decrepit facilities, and limited court staff.

As a result of underfunded courts, civil cases move slowly and cases are often not resolved for years. The COVID-19 pandemic, which caused statewide court closures and resulted in continuances of hearings and trials, has also further lengthened the time it takes for civil cases to resolve.[440] Approximately 55 percent of Californians experience at least one civil legal problem in their household each year.[441] But according to the State Bar of California, 85 percent of Californians received no or inadequate legal help for their civil legal problems.[442] People with low incomes, many of whom are African American, struggle with problems related to housing, health, finances, employment, family law issues, disability benefits, and many other civil law issues.[443]

Individuals with Black-sounding names receive half the callbacks of those with white-sounding names in response to calls for legal representation.

California has passed laws that provide for counsel in certain civil cases, like those involving family law issues.[444] But, overall, in the vast majority of civil cases, there is no right to counsel both nationwide and in California. Some studies show that African Americans, in particular, face unique impediments in obtaining access to a lawyer.[445] One study showed that those with Black-sounding names receive one-half the callbacks of those with white-sounding names in response to calls for legal representation.[446]

Although African Americans are not underrepresented in the California judiciary, they are underrepresented in the statewide legal profession. In 2020, eight percent of judges were African American.[447] In California, during 2019, African Americans comprised four percent of lawyers even though they comprise 6 percent of the population in the state.[448] These numbers have "remained stagnant" in the last 30 years.[449]

While this lack of diversity presents a problem for creating trust in both the criminal and civil legal system, it is especially problematic for African Americans because it is the system through which they can address the discrimination they continue to experience as this report discusses in the across all of its chapters.

VIII. Conclusion

Rooted in the tools to maintain slavery, social control of African Americans continued through American history as the Black Codes and segregation laws. Federal and state governments continue the legacy of slavery by criminalizing African Americans today. California court cases and statutes contributed to a national body of law that explicitly discriminated against African Americans. As a result of legalized discrimination against African Americans, the American general public developed and perpetuated biases and stereotypes against African Americans. American politicians capitalized on these racist stereotypes to win office and implement more laws and policies that have imprisoned more African Americans than white Americans compared to their shares in the population. This ensured that African Americans remained in the lowest caste of the American racial hierarchy.

Much like in the criminal justice system, the effects of slavery in the civil legal system have caused African Americans to experience significant inequities. African Americans, particularly those with low incomes, experience numerous barriers in the underfunded court systems, both nationwide and in California, that prevent them from accessing justice in civil courts.

Endnotes

[1] See, e.g., Alexander, The New Jim Crow (2020) (Alexander); see also Wilkerson, Caste: The Origins of Our Discontents (2020).

[2] See, e.g., U.S. Const., 13th, 14th, and 15th Amends.

[3] See, e.g., The Civil Rights Act of 1866, The Reconstruction Acts of 1867-1868, The Ku Klux Klan Act, The Civil Rights Act of 1875, The Civil Rights Act of 1964, The Voting Rights Act of 1965, and The Fair Housing Act of 1968.

[4] Alexander, supra.

[5] The Sentencing Project, Report of the Sentencing Project to the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Contemporary Forms of Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia, and Related Intolerance (March 2018) (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[6] Ibid.

[7] Greene, Race, Class, and Access to Civil Justice (2016) 101 Iowa L. Rev. 1263, 1266–67 (Greene); DeVito, Of Bias and Exclusion: An Empirical Study of Diversity Jurisdiction, its Amount-in-Controversy Requirement, and Black Alienation from U.S. Civil Courts (2021) 13 Geo. J. L. & Mod. Critical Race Persp. 1 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[8] Libgober, Getting a Lawyer While Black: A Field Experiment (2019) 24 Lewis & Clark L. Rev. 53 (Libgober) (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[9] The Civil Practice Act, Stats. 1851, ch. 1, § 394, p. 113; The Criminal Act of 1850, Stats. 1850, ch. 99, § 14, p. 230.

[10] See, e.g., Sutton, Symbol and Substance: Effects of California's Three Strikes Law on Felony Sentencing (2013) 47 Law & Soc'y Rev. 1 (2013), 37–71 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[11] Libgober, supra.

[12] Death Penalty Clinic, Berkeley Law, Whitewashing the Jury Box: How California Perpetuates the Discriminatory Exclusion of Black and Latinx Jurors (June 2020) (as of Apr. 13, 2022).

[13] See generally Hinton and Cook, The Mass Criminalization of Black Americans: A Historical Overview (2021) 4 Ann. Rev. Criminology 261-286 (as of Apr. 13, 2022).

[14] U.S. Census, Map Showing the Distribution of the Slave Population of the Southern States of the United States Compiled from the Census of the 1860 (as of Apr. 24, 2022); see generally Office of Coast Survey, National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, Mapping Slavery in the Nineteenth Century (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[15] See generally Blackmon, Slavery by Another Name: The Re-Enslavement of Black Americans from the Civil War to World War II, (2008) (Blackmon) at pp. 53-54, 99-100.

[16] See generally Blackmon, supra.

[17] Ibid.

[18] Ibid.

[19] Ibid.

[20] See generally Alexander, supra, at pp. 50-73.

[21] See generally Higginbotham Jr., Virginia Led The Way in Legal Oppression, (May 21, 1978), The Washington Post (as of Apr. 24, 2022) (Higginbotham); see also Newby-Alexander, The "Twenty and Odd": The Silences of Africans in Early Virginia Revealed (2020) 57 Phylon 25–36 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[22] General Court, Minutes of the Council and General Court of Colonial Virginia (July 9, 1640), p. 466 (as of Apr. 24, 2022); Higginbotham, supra; The court's sentence suggests that he was not already enslaved as it would be nonsensical to sentence an already enslaved person to a sentence in which they must be enslaved for the rest of their life.

[23] General Court, Minutes of the Council and General Court of Colonial Virginia (July 9, 1640), p. 466 (as of Apr. 24, 2022); Higginbotham, supra; the court's sentence suggests that he was not already enslaved as it would be nonsensical to sentence an already enslaved person to a sentence in which they must be enslaved for the rest of their life.

[24] Ibid.; see generally Higginbotham, supra;

[25] Ibid.; see generally Higginbotham, supra.

[26] Ibid. see generally Higginbotham, supra.

[27] Commonwealth of Virginia Legislature, Act I. An act about the casual [sic] killing of slaves (1669) Act I. (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[28] An act concerning Servants and Slaves XXXIV (1705), Records of the American Colonies, p. 459 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[29] An act concerning Servants and Slaves XXXV (1705), Records of the American Colonies, p. 459 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[30] Ibid.

[31] Higginbotham, supra.

[32] A Member of the Washington Bar, The Slavery Code of The District Columbia Together with Notes and Judicial Decisions Explanatory of the Same (1862) (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[33] Slaves, and Free Persons of Color, A Digest of the Laws of the State of Alabama (1833) (as of May 31, 2023).

[34] North Carolina General Assembly, An Act Concerning Slaves and Free Persons of Color (1831) (as of Apr. 24, 2022); Philadelphia Female Anti-Slavery Society, Extracts from the American Slave Code (compiling extracts from slave codes in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Tennessee, Arkansas, Missouri, Kentucky, Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, and the District of Columbia) (as of Apr. 24, 2022) (Extracts).

[35] Roberts v. City of Boston (Mass. 1849) 59 Mas

[36] Day v. Owen (Mich. 1858) 5 Mich. 520.

[37] The American Slave Code, An Act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping the service of their masters Extracts from the American Slave Code (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[38] Ibid. The American Slave Code, An Act to amend, and supplementary to, the Act entitled "An Act respecting Fugitives from Justice, and Persons escaping from the Service of their Masters," Extracts From the American Slave Code (as of Apr. 13, 2022).

[39] Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857) 60 U.S. 393.

[40] U.S. Library of Congress, Collection: Slaves and the Courts, 1740 to 1860 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[41] U.S. Const., 13th Amend.

[42] See generally Kaczorowski, To Begin the Nation Anew: Congress, Citizenship, and Civil Rights after the Civil War The American Historical Review Vol. 92, No. 1 (Feb., 1987), pp. 45-68 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[43] An act to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for other purposes Pub. L. No. 42-22 (Mar. 4, 1871) 17 Stat. 13 (as of Apr. 13, 2022).

[44] See generally Everly, Freedmen's Bureau Records: An Overview (Summer 1997) National Archives and Records Administration's Prologue Magazine (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[45] Alexander, supra, at pp. 36-38.

[46] Hammad, Shackled to Economic Appeal: How Prison Labor Facilitates Modern Slavery While Perpetuating Poverty in Black Communities (2019) 26 Va. J. Soc. Pol'y & L. 65, 66-67 (Hammad); Whitehouse, Modern Prison Labor: A Reemergence of Convict Leasing Under the Guise of Rehabilitation and Private Enterprises (2017) 18 Loy. J. Pub. Int. L. 89, 90 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[47] Hammad, supra, at p. 66.

[48] Blackmon, supra, at pp. 52-53

[49] Ibid.

[50] Johnson, African Americans and Homelessness: Moving Through History (2010) 40 Journal of Black Studies 583–605 (as of Apr. 24, 2022) (Johnson).

[51] See generally Blackmon, supra.

[52] Ibid.

[53] Ibid.

[54] Ibid.

[55] Id. at pp. 52-54.

[56] Id. at p. 53.

[57] Ibid.

[58] Alexander, supra, at p. 11.

[59] See, e.g., Angola Museum at the Louisiana State Penitentiary, History of Angola (as of Apr. 16, 2022) (History of Angola).

[60] U.S. Const., 13th Amend.; see generally Pope, Mass Incarceration, Convict Leasing, and the Thirteenth Amendment: A Revisionist Account (2019) 94 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1465, 1467 (as of Apr. 24, 2022)

[61] See, e.g., Ruffin v. Commonwealth (Va. 1871) 21 Gratt. 790, 796.

[62] History of Angola, supra.

[63] Oshinsky, Worse Than Slavery (1996).

[64] Ibid.; Blackmon, supra.; Cardon, "Less Than Mayhem": Louisiana's Convict Lease, 1865-1901 (2017) 58 Louisiana History: The Journal of the Louisiana Historical Association 417 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[65] Clark, Goshawk Environmental Consulting, Inc., Back to Bondage Forced Labor in Post Reconstruction Era Texas: Forced Labor in post Reconstruction Era Texas (August 2020), at p. 5 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[66] Ibid.

[67] Id. at p. 300

[68] Ibid.

[69] Blackmon, supra.

[70] Blackmon, supra; Crouch, One Dies Get Another: Convict Leasing in the American South, 1866-1928, (1996); Mancini, Race, Economics, and the Abandonment of Convict Leasing (1978) 63 The Journal of Negro History 339–352 (as of Apr. 24, 2022) ; Ledbetter, The Long Struggle to End Convict Leasing in Arkansas (1993) 52 The Arkansas Historical Quarterly 1–27 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[71] Blackmon, supra, at p. 294-296.

[72] Id. at p. 377-382.

[73] Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) 163 U.S. 537.

[74] Alexander, supra, at pp. 38-44.

[75] Coffin v. United States (1895) 156 U.S. 432, 453; Equal Justice Initiative (EJI), Lynching in America: Confronting the Legacy of Racial Terror (2015), p. 20 (as of Apr. 24, 2022) (EJI 2015).

[76] Jordan, A History Lesson: Reparations for What? 58 N.Y. Ann. Surv. Am. L 557 at p. 588-589.

[77] Id. at p. 591.

[78] EJI 2015, supra, at p. 20.

[79] See generally Alexander, supra, at pp. 40-44.

[80] Luxenberg, The Forgotten Northern Origins of Jim Crow (Feb. 12, 2019), Time, Op-Ed (as of Apr. 24,

[81] Ibid

[82] West Chester & Phil. R.R. Co. v. Miles (Pa. 1867) 55 Pa. 209.

[83] Patterson v. Taylor (Fla. 1906) 51 Fla. 275.

[84] Morrison v. State (Tenn. 1906) 116 Tenn. 534.

[85] Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) 163 U.S. 537, 548.

[86] See generally Jim Crow Museum, Examples of Jim Crow Laws - Oct. 1960 – Civil Rights (2001) (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[87] See, e.g., Alexander, supra; Small, The War on Drugs Is a War on Racial Justice (2001) 68 Social Research 896–903 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[88] Alexander, supra, at 130.

[89] Ibid.

[90] Alexander, supra, at pp. 133-136, 144-149.

[91] Alexander, supra; 137-154.

[92] Alexander, supra, at pp. 50-73.

[93] Ibid.

[94] Baum, Legalize It All: How to Win the War on Drugs (April 2016), Harper's Magazine at p. 22 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[95] Primuth, Ronald Reagan's Use of Race in the 1976 and 1980 Presidential Elections (2016) 100 The Georgia Historical Quarterly 36–66 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[96] See generally Alexander, supra, at pp. 71-73.

[97] Schwartzapfel and Keller, Willie Horton Revisited The Marshall Project (May 13, 2015) (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[98] Ibid.

[99] Ibid.

[100] President Richard M. Nixon, Remarks About an Intensified Program for Drug Abuse Prevention (June 17, 1971) (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[101] Ibid.

[102] Gorman, "War On Drugs" Continues In United States Under New Leadership (1993) 307 BMJ: British Medical J. 369–371 (as of Apr. 24, 2022); see also Reuter, Why Has US [sic] Drug Policy Changed So Little over 30 Years? (2013) 42 Crime and Just. 75–140, at pp. 80-85 (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[103] See generally Feldman, Public Health and the Policing of Black Lives, (2015) 7 Harvard Pub. Health Rev. 1–3. (as of Apr. 24, 2022); American Public Health Association, Policy Statement: Defining and Implementing a Public Health Response to Drug Use and Misuse (Nov. 5, 2013) (as of Apr. 24, [104] See, e.g., Hudak, Biden should end America's longest war: The War on Drugs Brookings (Sep. 2021) (as of Apr. 24, 2022); see also Farber, The War on Drugs turns 50 today. It's time to make peace (June 17, 2021), The Washington Post (as of Apr. 13, 2022).

[105] See McCabe, Race/Ethnicity and Gender Differences in Drug Use and Abuse Among College Students National Library of Medicine (2007) 6 J. Ethn Substance Abuse 75-95 (as of Apr. 13, 2022); U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, National Institutes of Health, Drug Use Among Racial/Ethnic Minorities (Revised) National Institute on Drug Abuse (2003) (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[106] Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-570, (Oct. 27, 1986) 100 Stat. 3207 (codified as amended at 21 U.S.C. § 801 et seq).

[107] Ibid.

[108] Vagins and McCurdy, Cracks in the System: Twenty Years of the Unjust Federal Crack Cocaine Law American Civil Liberties Union (Oct. 2006), at p. ii (as of Apr. 13, 2022).

[109] Ibid.

[110] Ibid.

[111] Ibid.

[112] Controlled Substances Act 21 U.S.C. § 801 et seq.

[113] 21 U.S.C. § 860.

[114] 21 U.S.C. § 862.

[115] See generally Silva, Collateral Damage: A Public Housing Consequence of the War on Drugs (2015) 5 U.C. Irvine L. Rev. 783 (as of Apr. 25, 202

[116] Williams, Fair Housing's Drug Problem: Combatting the Racialized Impact of Drug-Based Housing Exclusions Alongside Drug Law Reform (2016) 54 Harvard Civ. Rts.-Civ. Liberties L. Rev. 769, 779 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[117] Ibid.

[118] Sklansky, Cocaine, Race, and Equal Protection (1995) 47 Stan. L. Rev. 1283–1322 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[119] Britton, Does Locked Up Mean Locked Out? The Effects of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986 on Black Male Students' College Enrollment, Berkeley Institute for Research on Labor and Employment (April 9, 2019, updated November 2020) p. 22 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[120] Borden, Every 25 Seconds: The Human Toll of Criminalizing Drug Use In The United States, (Oct. 12, 2016), Human Rights Watch & Am. Civil Liberties Union, p. 6 (2016).

[121] 34 U.S.C. 12631§ et seq; see generally Eisen, The 1994 Crime Bill and Beyond: How Federal Funding Shapes the Criminal Justice System Brennan Center (Sept. 9, 2019) (as of Apr. 24, 2022).

[122] Eisen et al., Undoing the 1994 Crime Bill Democracy & Justice: Collected Writings, (2019), at pp. 71–72 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[123] Blumenson and Nilsen, Policing for Profit: The Drug War's Hidden Economic Agenda, (1998) 65 U. Chi. L. Rev. 35, 51-52, 82 (as of Apr. 25, 2022); Rainbolt, Crime, Property, and Justice Revisited (The Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act of 2000) (2003) Public Affairs Quarterly, vol. 17, no. 3, at pp. 219–239 (as of Apr. 25, 2022); U.S. v. Reese (9th Cir. 1993) 2 F.3d 870, 878, 880 [involving police officers who used excessive force and were at least partly incentivized by keeping seized drug money].

[124] See, e.g., American Civil Liberties Union, Half of People Facing Civil Forfeiture in Montgomery County are African-American (October 19, 2015) (as of Apr. 25, 2022); Fritz, Timbs v. Indiana: Civil Forfeiture, Racism, and the War on Drugs (May 14, 2021) 98 Denv. L. Rev. Forum 1 [summarizing findings in various jurisdictions] (as of Apr. 25, 2022); Lee et. al., Taken: How Police Departments Make Millions By Seizing Property (April 22, 2020) (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[125] Eberhardt et al, Seeing Black: Race, Crime, and Visual Processing The Journal of Personality and Social Psychology Vol. 87, No. 6 (2004), p. 876 [summarizing and citing to previous research] (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[126] Ibid.

[127] Eberhardt, et al., Looking Deathworthy: Perceived Stereotypicality of Black Defendants Predicts Capital-Sentencing Outcomes, Psychological Science (2006) (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[128] Weir, Policing in black & white American Psychological Association, Monitor on Psychology (December 2016) Vol. 47, No. 11 at p. 36 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[129] Moy, A Taxonomy of Police Technology's Racial Inequity Problems (2021) 2021 U. Ill. L. Rev. 139 (as of Apr. 25, 2022); see generally Okidegbe, When They Hear Us: Race, Algorithms and the Practice of Criminal Law (2020) 29-SUM Kan. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y, 329 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Selbst, Disparate Impact in Big Data Policing (2017) 52 Ga. L. Rev. 109 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Richardson et al., Dirty Data, Bad Predictions: How Civil Rights Violations Impact Police Data, Predictive Policing Systems, and Justice (2019) 94 N.Y.U. L. Rev. Online 192 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[130] Ward v. Flood (1874) 48 Cal. 36, 52.

[131] Los Angeles Inv. Co. v. Gary (1919) 181 Cal. 680, 684.

[132] Stats. 1850, ch. 140, p. 424.

[133] The Civil Practice Act, Stats. 1851, ch. 1, § 394, p. 113.

[134] The Criminal Act of 1850, Stats. 1850, ch. 99, § 14, p. 230.

[135] People v. Howard (1860) 17 Cal. 63, 65.

[136] An Act Respecting Fugitives from Labor, and Slaves Brought to This State Prior to Her Admission into the Union, Chap. XXXIII, April 15, 1852; see generally Smith, Remaking Slavery in a Free State: Masters and Slaves in Gold Rush California in Pacific Historical Review vol. 80, No. 1 (2011) pp. 28-63 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[137] See generally Berger, Surveying the Golden State (1850-2020) Vagrancy, Racial Exclusion, Sit-Lie, and the Right to Exist in Public California Legal History Vol. 16 (2021) pp. 212-16 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[138] Leonardatos, California's Attempts to Disarm the Black Panthers (1999) 36 San Diego L. Rev. 947, 970, 978 (as of Apr. 25, 2022) (Leonardatos).

[139] Id. at pp. 967–70, 986; King, Heller as Popular Constitutionalism? The Overlooked Narrative of Armed Black Self-Defense (2018) 20 U. Pa. Const. L. 1237, 1256–57 (as of Apr. 25, 202

[140] Leonardatos, supra, at p. 968.

[141] Ibid.

[142] Id. at p. 970; see also Zick, Framing the Second Amendment: Gun Rights, Civil Rights and Civil Liberties (2020) 106 Iowa L. Rev 229, 255-256 (as of Apr. 25, 2022); Riley, Indians and Guns (2012) 100 Geo. L.J. 1675, 1712 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[143] Leonardatos, supra, at pp. 969-971.

[144] Id. at p. 987.

[145] Churchill, A Not So Friendly Fascism?: Political Prisons and Prisoners in the United States (2006) CR: The New Centennial Review vol. 6, no. 1, pp. 1-54 (as of Apr., 25 2022) (Churchill).

[146] Ibid

[147] Autodidact 17, Black Panther Chip Fitzgerald joins ancestors Amsterdam News (April 15, 2021) (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[148] Churchill, supra.

[149] Martin, Elmer G. Pratt, Jailed Panther Leader, Dies at 63 (June 3, 2011), N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[150] Chalfin et al., Police Force Size and Civilian Race National Bureau of Economic Research (Dec. 2020) (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[151] Hadden, Slave Patrols: Law and Violence in Virginia and the Carolinas (2001) (Hadden).

[152] Williams, Jr., Slave Patrol Ordinances of St. Tammany Parish, Louisiana, 1835-1838 (1972) Louisiana History: The Journal of the Louisiana Historical Association vol. 13, no. 4, p. 404 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[153] Hadden, supra.

[154] Russ, supra, at p. 403.

[155] Russ, supra, at p. 404-412.

[156] Russ, supra, at p. 403.

[157] Russ, supra, at pp. 401-403.

[158] Spruill, Slave Patrols, "Packs of Negro Dogs" and Policing Black Communities (2016) Phylon (1960-) vol. 53, no. 1, 2016, pp. 42–66 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[159] Narrative of Walter Rimm, Image 254 of Federal Writers' Project: Slave Narrative Project Vol. 16, Texas, part 3, Lewis-Ryles, 1936 (as of Apr. 5, 2022); see also U.S. Library of Congress, Collection: Born in Slavery: Slave Narratives from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936 to 1938 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[160] See generally Parry, Police Dogs and Anti-Black Violence Black Perspectives (July 31, 2017) (as of Apr. 25, 2022); Stephens, Police Wanted "A Dog That Would Bite A Black Person," (Oct. 29, 2020), The Marshall Project (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[161] Stole and Toohey, The City Where Police Unleash Dogs on Black Teens The Marshall Project (February 12, 2021) (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[162] Sack, Mississippi Reveals Dark Secrets of a Racist Time (Mar. 18, 1998), N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[163] See generally Memorandum in Support of Application for Clemency of Clyde Kennard Pardon Docket No. 06-0005; Minchin, Clyde Kennard: A Little-Known Civil Rights Pioneer Mississippi History Now (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[164] German, The FBI has a history of targeting black activists. That's still true today (June 26, 2020), The Guardian (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[165] Krivo and Peterson, Extremely Disadvantaged Neighborhoods and Urban Crime (1996) Social Forces 75(2): pp. 619-648 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[166] Krivo et al., Segregation, Racial Structure, and Neighborhood Violent Crime (2009) American Journal of Sociology vol. 114, no. 6 pp. 1765–1802 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[167] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Dec. 7, 2021), Testimony of Bruce Appleyard, (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[168] U.S. Census Bureau, Quick Facts: U.S. (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[169] Pierson et al., A large scale analysis of racial disparities in police stops across the United States (2017), Nature Human Behavior 4, 736–745 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[170] Ibid.

[171] Ibid.

[172] Goncalves and Mello, A Few Bad Apples? Racial Bias in Policing vol. 111, No. 5, American Economic Rev. 1406-41 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[173] Kahn et al., How Suspect Race Affects Police Use of Force in an Interaction Over Time (2017) vol. 41, No. 2, (2017) Law and Human Behavior 117-126 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[174] Engel et al., Racial Disparities and COVID-19 National Commission on COVID-19 and Criminal Justice, Council on Criminal Justice, (Nov. 2020), at p. 9 (as of Apr. 25, [175] Lamont and Molnár, How Blacks Use Consumption to Shape Their Collective Identity (2001) vol. 1, No. 1 (2001) Journal of Consumer Culture (as of Apr. 25,

[176] Ibid.

[177] Id. at p. 37.

[178] Columbia Broadcasting System (CBS), CBS This Morning, Interview with Michelle Obama, Former First Lady of the United States (May 7, 2021), CBS (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[179] Ibid.

[180] Butler, Stop and Frisk and Torture-Lite: Police Terror of Minority Communities (2014) 12 Ohio St J. Crim. L. 57, 57 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[181] Voigt et al., Language from police body camera footage shows racial disparities in officer respect (2017) vol. 114, No. 25, Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[182] Kamalu and Onyeozili, A Critical Analysis of the 'Broken Windows' Policing in New York City and Its Impact: Implications for the Criminal Justice System and the African American Community (2018) vol. 11, No. 1, Afr. African J. of Criminology and Just. Stud. Studies 71 (Apr. 25, 2022).

[183] Ibid.

[184] Sood, Biases Behind Sexual Assault: A Thirteenth Amendment Solution to Under-Enforcement of the Rape of Black Women (2018) vol. 18, No. 2, U. Md. L.J. Race, Religion, Gender & Class 405, 413 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[185] Id. at pp. 405-407.

[186] See generally Davey, Snapshot on the State of Black Women and Girls: Sex Trafficking in the U.S. (2020) (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[187] See generally University of Michigan College of Literature, Science, and the Arts, The Celia Project (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[188] See, e.g., van de Rijt, et al., Racial and gender differences in missing children's recovery chances vol. 13, No. 12 (December 31, 2018) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[189] U.S. Department of Justice, Federal Bureau of Investigation, 2020 NCIC Missing Person and Unidentified Person Statistics (2020) (as of Apr. 26, 2022); U.S. Census Bureau, Quick Facts: U.S. (as of Apr. 25, 2022.)

[190] Sommers, Missing White Woman Syndrome: An Empirical Analysis of Race and Gender Disparities in Online News Coverage of Missing Persons (2016), vol. 106, No. 2 The J. of Crim. L. and Criminology 275–314 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[191] See generally Our Black Girls (as of Apr. 26, 2022); see also Black Coalition Fighting Back Serial Murders (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[192] See, e.g., Burch, Who Killed Atlanta's Children? (Apr. 30, 2019), N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[193] Ibid.

[194] Ibid.

[195] Ibid.

[196] See Human Rights Campaign Foundation, A National Epidemic: Fatal Anti-Transgender Violence in the United States in 2019 (Nov. 2019) p. 2 (as of May 19, 2022).

[197] Rummler & Sosin, 2021 is Now the Deadliest Year on Record for Transgender People (Nov. 18, 2021), PBS (as of May 19, 2022).

[198] Sherman et al., Transgender and Gender Diverse Community Connection, Help-Seeking, and Mental Health Among Black Transgender Women Who Have Survived Violence: A Mixed-Methods Analysis (2021) 28 Violence Against Women 890, 892, 908.

[199] Human Rights Campaign Foundation, supra.

[200] Nat. Center for Transgender Equality, Blueprint for Equality: A Transgender Federal Agenda for the Next Presidential Administration and Congress (Oct. 2016) p. 28 (as of May 19, 2022).

[201] Id.

[202] Barton et al., Mass Shootings Are Soaring, with Black Neighborhoods Hit Hardest (September 3, 2020), The Trace (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[203] Ibid.

[204] U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, Advancing Diversity in Law Enforcement, (Oct. 2016) (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[205] Ibid.

[206] See, e.g. Cagle, Long Beach Police Department pilot alleges racial discrimination on the job (February 17, 2022) Spectrum News, (as of Apr. 25, 2022); Choi et al., Black female police offices allege discrimination, harassment in lawsuits (Jan. 7, 2022) National Broadcasting Company News (as of Apr. 25, 2022); Baker, Black Campus Police Officers Say They Suffered 'Unbearable' Racism (June 22, 2021) N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 25, 2022.)

[207] The Washington Post, Police shootings database 2015-2022 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[208] Campaign Zero, Mapping Police Violence Database (Mar, 15 2022), Campaign Zero, (as of Apr. 25, [209] Sharara, et al., Fatal police violence by race and state in the USA, 1980-2019: a network meta-regression (Oct. 2, 2021), The Lancet (as of Apr. 25,

[210] See, e.g., Say Their Names Memorial (as of Apr. 25, 2022); Stanford Green Library Exhibit (as of Apr. 25, 2022); #Say Their Names (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[211] See Rosenhall, California's attempt to reduce police shootings, explained (July 18, 2019 and updated on May 7, 2021) [summarizing data from government and scholarly sources] (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[212] Cal. Department of Justice, Racial and Identity Profiling Advisory Board Annual Report 2022 pp. 6-8 (as of Apr. 25, 2022) (RIPA

[213] Id. at p. 8.

[214] Mendelson, Police Use Force on Black Angelenos at Dramatically Higher Rates, Data Shows Rates (July 7, 2020) [summarizing data from the California Department of Justice and American Community Survey] (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[215] Premkumar et al., Police Use of Force and Misconduct in California (Oct. 2021) Public Policy Institute of California, p. 3 (as of May 31, 2023).

[216] RIPA 2022, supra, at p. 8.

[217] Ibid.

[218] Id. at p. 9.

[219] Id. at p. 8.

[220] Gross and Bames, Road Work: Racial Profiling and Drug Interdiction on the Highway (2002) 101 Mich. L. Rev. 651. [internal citation omitted] (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[221] Webb, Driving While Black: Tracking Unspoken Law-Enforcement Racism (January 9, 2007), Esquire (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[222] ACLU, ACLU Files Racial Profiling Lawsuit Against the California Highway Patrol (June 1999), ACLU (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[223] Ibid.

[224] Zamora, CHP stops more minorities/ Agency admits law-abiding blacks, Latinos run greater risk of being pulled over (Apr. 20, 2001), S.F. Gate (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[225] White and Holman, Marijuana Prohibition in California: Racial Prejudice and Selective-Arrests (2012) 19 Race, Gender and Class J. 75 (as of Apr. 25, [226] Krupnick, 'A farce of social equity': California is failing its Black cannabis businesses (Nov. 4, 2021), The Guardian (as of Apr. 25, 2022); Major, Five Years After Recreational Legalization, California is Failing its Black Cannabis Business Owners (Nov. 9, 2021), Black Enterprise (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[227] U.S. Department of Justice, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Criminal Justice Information Services Division, Hate Crime Statistics 2019 Hate Crime Statistics (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[228] Cal. Department of Justice, Hate Crime in California (2020), p. 8 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[229] Id. at p. 31.

[230] See generally Rickford, Black Lives Matter (2016) 25 New Labor Forum 34 (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[231] Newton, L.A. Finds Mixed Results in Curbing Police Dog Bites (Mar. 1, 1996), L.A. Times (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[232] Lawson v. Gates (Cal. Lawson v. Gates (Super. Ct. L.A. County of Los Angeles, Mar. 27, 1995) No. BC 91-31232).

[233] Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department Special Counsel, 33rd Semiannual Report of Special Counsel (September 2013), at p. 9 (as of Apr. 26, 2021)

[234] Ibid.

[235] See generally Roussell and Gascón, Defining 'Policeability': Cooperation, Control, and Resistance in South Los Angeles Community-Police Meetings (2014) 61 Social Problems 237 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[236] See generally Meyer, Police Shootings at Minorities: The Case of Los Angeles (1980) 452 The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science 98 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Knight, Justifiable Homicide, Police Brutality, or Governmental Repression? The 1962 Los Angeles Police Shooting of Seven Members of the Nation of Islam (1994) 79 The Journal of Negro History 182 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Herbert, Morality in Law Enforcement: Chasing 'Bad Guys' with the Los Angeles Police Department (1996) 30 Law & Society Rev. 799 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Stuart, Constructing Police Abuse after Rodney King: How Skid Row Residents and the Los Angeles Police Department Contest Video Evidence (2011) 36 Law & Social Inquiry 327 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[237] Ibid.

[238] Ibid.

[239] Ibid.

[240] Pen. Code, § 13670, subd. (a)(2)).

[241] Center for Juvenile Law and Policy, Loyola Marymount University Loyola Law School, 50 Years of Deputy Gangs in the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department: Identifying Root Causes and Effects to Advocate for Meaningful Reform (Jan. 2021) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[242] Id. at p. 24.

[243] U.S. Census Bureau, 2020 Population and Housing State Data (Aug. 12, 2021) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[244] Los Angeles Times Staff, Police Have Killed 963 People in L.A. County Since 2000 (Apr. 12, 2022), L.A. Times (Apr. 26, 2022).

[245] Branson-Potts, Grim Sleeper's victims were vulnerable, young, and at times ignored (May 5, 2016), L.A. Times (as of Apr. 26, 202

[246] Ibid.

[247] Ibid.

[248] See generally Murch, Living for the City: Migration, Education, and the Rise of the Black Panther Party in Oakland, California, (2010); Street, The Historiography of the Black Panther Party (2010) 44 J. Journal of American Studies 351 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[249] Ibid.

[250] Ibid.

[251] Alderman and Inwood, How Black Cartographers Put Racism on the Map (Feb. 24, 2021), Next City (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[252] Peele, et al., Exclusive: Blacks are only 7% of the Bay Area, but 27% of those killed by police (June 28, 2020 and updated on Sept. 2, 2020), The Mercury News (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[253] Chanin, et al., Traffic enforcement in San Diego, California: An analysis of SDPD vehicle stops in 2014 and 2015 (Nov. 2016) p. 71 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[254] Campaign Zero, We evaluated policing in San Diego. Here's what we found (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[255] Ibid.

[256] Ibid.

[257] Ibid.

[258] Ibid.

[259] Cal. Department of Justice, Sacramento Police Department Report & Recommendations 2019 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Cal. Dept. of Justice, Review of Sacramento Police Department Report & Recommendations Phase II 2020 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[260] Complaint for Injunctive Relief, People ex rel. Becerra v. County of Kern (Cal. Super. Ct. County of Kern, Dec. 22, 2020) No. BCV-20-102971 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[261] Stipulated Judgment, People ex rel. Becerra v. County of Kern (Cal. Super. Ct., County of Kern, Dec. 22, 2020) No. BCV-20-102971 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[262] Complaint for Injunctive Relief, People ex rel. Bonta v. City of Bakersfield (Cal. Super. Ct., County of Kern, Aug. 23, 2021) No. BCV-21-101928 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[263] Stipulation for Entry of Final Judgment and Permanent Injunction, People ex rel. Bonta v. City of Bakersfield (Cal. Super. Ct., County of Kern, Aug. 23, 2021) No. BCV-21-101928 Stipulated Judgment (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[264] Cal. Dept. of Justice, Attorney General Bonta Launches Independent Review of Torrance Police Department (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[265] Assem. Bill No. 89 (2021-2022 Reg. Sess.).

[266] Assem. Bill No. 750 (2021-2022 Reg. Sess.).

[267] Assem. Bill No. 1506 (2019-2020 Reg. Sess.).

[268] Sen. Bill No. 2 (2021-2022 Reg. Sess.).

[269] Id. at § 2, subd. (b).

[270] Assem. Bill No. 118 (2021-2022 Reg. Sess.).

[271] Assem. Bill No. 26 (2021-2022 Reg. Sess.).

[272] See Federal Judiciary Act of 1789, § 29, 1 Stat. 73, 88 (1789) ("[J]urors shall have the same qualifications as are requisite for jurors by the laws of the State of which they are citizens....").

[273] Equal Justice Initiative, Race and the Jury: Illegal Racial Discrimination in Jury Selection (2021) (as of Apr. 26, 2022) (EJI 202

[274] 18 U.S.C. § 243 (1948) ("No citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude . . . .").

[275] U.S. Const., 14th & 15th Amends.

[276] EJI 2021, supra, [citing Douglas L. Colbert, Challenging the Challenge: Thirteenth Amendment as a Prohibition Against the Racial Use of Peremptory Challenges 1 Cornell Law Review 76, (1990)].

[277] Grimsley, African American Wrongful Convictions Throughout History (Feb. 28, 2013), Innocence Project (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[278] Equal Justice Initiative, Lynching in America: Confronting the Legacy of Racial Terror (3rd ed. 2017) p. 32 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[279] EJI 2021, supra.

[280] Report on the Alleged Outrages in the Southern States by the Select Committee of the Senate (Washington, D.C.: 1871), 179 (quoting Judge Daniel Russell of North Carolina); Cong. Globe, 42d Cong., 1st Sess. 158 (1871) (statement of Senator Sherman quoting the report).

[281] Norris v. Alabama (1935) 294 U.S. 587.

[282] Id. at p. 588.

[283] Id. at p. 591.

[284] EJI 2021, supra.

[285] Graetz, Trusting the Courts: Redressing the State Court Funding Crisis (2014) 143 Daedalus 96 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Archer, Tackling Tough Issues: Scrutiny of State Court Funding, Sentencing Guidelines Aims to Improve the System (2004) 90 ABA Journal 8 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Podgers, In Defense of the Courts: A Symposium Finds Consensus on the Need, but No Easy Path to Restoring Court Funding (2011) 97 ABA Journal 56 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[286] In re Humphrey (2021) 11 Cal.5th 135; see also Sen. Bill 262 (2021-2022 Reg. Sess.) §§ 3, 4, 5 (amending Pen. Code, § 1269bb, and adding sections 1269d, and 1302.5.).

[287] See generally Brunt, Toward a Just Model of Pretrial Release: A History of Bail Reform and a Prescription for What's Next (2018) vol. 108, No. 4, J. of Crim. L. and Criminology 701, 709–738 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[288] Boyd, Representation on the Courts? The Effects of Trial Judges' Sex and Race (2016) vol. 69, No. 4, Political Res. Q. 788–799 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[289] See generally Barkow, Prosecutorial Administration: Prosecutor Bias and the Department of Justice (April 2013) 99 Va. L.Rev. 271, 271–342 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[290] Compare Sloan, Racial Bias by Prosecutors: Evidence from Random Assignment (June 14, 2019) U. of Notre Dame, Dept. of Econ. (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[291] Edlund, Eyewitness Racial Attitudes and Perpetrator Identification: The Lineup Method Matters (2008) vol. 10, No. 1, North Am. J. of Psychol. 15, 25, 28 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[292] Joshi and Kline, Lack of Jury Diversity: A National Problem with Individual Consequences (September 1, 2015) Am. Bar. Assn. (as of Apr. 15, 2022).

[293] Coleman, The Persistence of Discrimination in Jury Selection: Lessons from North Carolina and Beyond (June 2018) 42-JUN Champion 28, 32 (citing additional studies) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[294] Fukurai et al., Where Did Black Jurors Go? A Theoretical Synthesis of Racial Disenfranchisement in the Jury System and Jury Selection (1991) vol. 22, No. 2, J. of Black Studies 196–215 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[295] Levinson, Forgotten Racial Equality: Implicit Bias, Decisionmaking, and Misremembering (2007) 57 Duke L.J. 345, 398–407 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[296] Id. at p. 345.

[297] See generally Sommers, On Racial Diversity and Group Decision Making: Identifying Multiple Effects of Racial Composition on Jury Deliberations (2006) vol. 90, No. 4, J. of Personality and Social Psychol. 597–612 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[298] Schmitt et al., Demographic Differences in Sentencing: An Update to the 2012 Booker Report U.S. Sentencing Commission (Nov. 2017), at p. 17 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[299] Sawyer, Visualizing the Racial Disparities in Mass Incarceration (July 27, 2020), Prison Policy Initiative (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[300] Furman v. Georgia (1972) 408 U.S. 238, 251.

[301] Ibid.

[302] Id. at p. 239.

[303] Death Penalty Information Center, State by State (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[304] Ibid.

[305] Ndulue, Enduring Injustice: The Persistence of Racial Discrimination in the U.S. Death Penalty (Sept. 2020), Death Penalty Information Center, pp. 28-29 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[306] Baumgartner et al., #BlackLivesDon'tMatter: Race-of-Victim Effects in US Executions, 1976-2013 Politics, Groups, and Identities (2015), at p. 4 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[307] The California Civil Practice Act, Stats. 1851, ch. 1, § 394, p. 113; The California Criminal Act of 1850, Stats. 1850, ch. 99, § 14, p. 230.

[308] Semel et al. , Whitewashing the Jury Box: How California Perpetuates the Discriminatory Exclusion of Black and Latinx Jurors (June 2020), Berkeley Law Death Penalty Clinic (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[309] Id. at p. v.

[310] Id. at p. 23.

[311] Id. at p. viii.

[312] Id. at p. 23.

[313] Ridolfi and Possley, Preventable Error: A Report on Prosecutorial Misconduct in California 1997-2009 (Oct. 1, 2010), Northern Cal. Innocence Project, Santa Clara Univ. School of Law, p. 2 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[314] Ibid.

[315] Couzens and Bigelow, The Amendment of the Three Strikes Sentencing Law (May 2017), California's Three Strikes Sentencing Law, California Courts, p. 5 (as of Apr. 16, 2022); see also Stanford Law School, Three Strikes Basics (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[316] Lockyer v. Andrade (2003) 538 U.S. 63; see generally Chemerinsky, Cruel and Unusual: The Story of Leandro Andrade (2003) 52 Drake L.Rev 1, 2 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[317] Lockyer, supra, at p. 66.

[318] Ibid.

[319] Ibid.

[320] Id. at p. 67.

[321] Id. at pp. 68-69.

[322] Sutton, Symbol and Substance: Effects of California's Three Strikes Law on Felony Sentencing (2013) vol. 47, No. 1, Law & Society Rev. 37–71 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[323] Gius, The Unintended Consequences of the Three Strikes Laws: The Impact of Long Term Imprisonments on Family Structures (2017) vol. 43, Nos. 1-2, Internat. J. of Sociology of the Family 17–24 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[324] Langan, Race of Prisoners Admitted to State and Federal Institutions, 1926-86 U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs (1991), pp. 1-54 (as of Apr. 26, 2022) (Langan).

[325] Id. at p. 5.

[326] Gramlich, Black imprisonment rate in the U.S. has fallen by a third since 2006 (May 6, 2020), Pew Research Center (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[327] Widra and Herring, States of Incarceration: The Global Context 2021 (Sept. 2021), Prison Policy Initiative (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[328] American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), Smart Reform is Possible: States Reducing Incarceration Rates and Costs While Protecting Communities (Aug. 2011), ACLU, pp. 6, 9 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[329] See, e.g., Ghandnoosh, U.S. Prison Population Trends: Massive Buildup and Modest Decline (Sept. 17, 2019), The Sentencing Project (as of Apr. 26, 202

[330] Ibid.

[331] U.S. DOJ Office of Justice Programs, Prisoners in 2019 (Oct. 2020), pp. 1, 16 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[332] Federal Bureau of Prisons, Inmate Race (last visited Apr. 26, 2022).

[333] Federal Bureau of Prisons, UNICOR (trade name for Federal Prison Industries): Program Details (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[334] See, e.g., Selby, How the 13th Amendment Kept Slavery Alive: Perspectives From the Prison Where Slavery Never Ended (Sept. 17, 2021), The Innocence Project (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[335] Ibid.

[336] Angola Museum at the Louisiana State Penitentiary, History of Angola (as of Apr. 26, 2022) (History of Angola); see also Cardon, "Less Than Mayhem": Louisiana's Convict Lease, 1865-1901 (2017) vol. 58, No. 4, La. History: The J. of the La. Historical Assn. 417–441 (as of Apr. 26, 2022) (Less Than Mayhem).

[337] History of Angola, supra; see also Less Than Mayhem, supra.

[338] History of Angola, supra.

[339] History of Angola, supra; see also Less Than Mayhem, supra.

[340] History of Angola, supra.

[341] Prison Enterprises, Agriculture, (as of Apr. 16,

[342] Hardy, Angola inmates make sugar cane syrup the old-fashioned way (Dec. 23, 2014), The Advocate (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[343] Schrift, Angola Prison Art: Captivity, Creativity, and Consumerism (2006) The Journal of American Folklore, Vol. 119, no. 473 at pp. 257–74 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[344] Louisiana Dept. of Corrections, LA DPS&C Website (as of Apr. 26, [345] Federal Bureau of Prisons, Federal Prison Industries Program Details (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[346] See generally Hammad, supra, at p. 66.

[347] Poole and Regoli, Race, Institutional Rule Breaking, and Disciplinary Response: A Study of Discretionary Decision Making in Prison (1980) Law & Society Review Vol. 14, no. 4, pp. 931–946 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[348] Association of State Correctional Administrators and the Liman Center for Public Interest Law at Yale Law School, Reforming Restrictive Housing: The 2018 ASCA-Liman Nationwide Survey of Time-in Cell (October 2018) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[349] Blad and Harwin, Black Students More Likely to Be Arrested at School (January 24, 2017), Education Week (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[350] Riddle and Sinclair, Racial disparities in school-based disciplinary actions are associated with county-level rates of racial bias (April 2, 2019) Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[351] National Center for Juvenile Justice, Easy Access to Juvenile Populations (EZAPOP) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[352] Ibid.

[353] Ibid.

[354] Pennington, Engaging Parents As A Legitimacy-Building Approach in Juvenile Delinquency Court (2012) 16 U.C. Davis J. Juv L. & Pol'y 481, 486 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[355] Gilore, Golden Gulag: Prisons, Surplus, Crisis, and Opposition in Globalizing California, (2007).

[356] Hernández, City of Inmates: Conquest, Rebellion, and the Rise of Human Caging in Los Angeles, 1771-1965 (2017).

[357] Id. at pp. 172-173.

[358] U.S. Census Bureau, Quick Facts: California (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[359] See generally Goodman, "It's Just Black, White, or Hispanic": An Observational Study of Racializing Moves in California's Segregated Prison Reception Centers (Dec. 2008) Law & Society Rev. Vol. 42, no. 4, at pp. 735–770 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); see also Goodman, Race in California's Prison Fire Camps for Men: Prison Politics, Space, and the Racialization of Everyday Life (2014) Journal.of Sociology Vol. 120, no. 2, at pp. 352–94 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[360] Plata v. Brown (2011) 563 U.S. 493.

[361] See generally Bachrach and Sexton, The End of Mass Incarceration in California: What Comes Next? (2016) Boom: A Journal of California Vol. 6, no. 2 pp. 4–7 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[362] California State Legislature, Assembly Bill 2542 (2019-2020) (as of Apr. 26, 2022); see also Office of Governor Gavin Newsom, Governor Newsom Signs Landmark Legislation to Advance Racial Justice and California's Fight Against Systemic Racism & Bias in Our Legal System (Sep. 30, 2020) (as of Apr. 26, 202

[363] Cal. Prison Industry Authority, Strategic Business Plan 2021-2024 p. 3 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[364] Ibid.

[365] Cal. Dept. of Corrections and Rehabilitation, Conservation (Fire) Camps (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[366] See, e.g. Stygar, Thinking Outside the Box: A Point-Based System of Reintegration for California's Inmate Firefighters (2020) 56 Cal. Western L.Rev. 455, 456 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[367] Macallair, After the Doors Were Locked: A History of Youth Corrections in California and the Origins of the Twenty-First-Century Reform, (2013).

[368] Ibid.

[369] Ibid.

[370] Ibid.

[371] Ibid.

[372] Sen. Bill No. 823 (2019-2020 Reg. Sess.) .

[373] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (Oct. 12, 2021), Testimony of Jacob Jackson, (as of Apr. 25, 2022).

[374] The Sentencing Project, Locked Out 2020: Estimates of People Denied Voting Rights Due to a Felony Conviction (Oct. 30, 2020) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[375] See generally Joshi and Kline, Lack of Jury Diversity: A National Problem with Individual Consequences American Bar Association (Sep. 1, 2015) (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Jackson-Gleich, Rigging the Jury: How Each State Reduces Jury Diversity By Excluding People with Criminal Records (Feb. 18, 2021), Prison Policy Initiative (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[376] Bor et al., Police Killings and their Spillover Effects on the Mental Health of Black Americans: a Population-based, Quasi-Experimental Study (June 21, 2018), The Lancet (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[377] See generally Burks, African American Men's Negative Personal Experiences With and Trust in Police (2021), Walden University Dissertations and Doctoral Studies (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[378] Colin, It's Never Too Late to Go to College and Rewrite Your Story (Dec. 7, 2021), N.Y. Times (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[379] Ibid.

[380] Johnson, supra, at pp. 583-605.

[381] Western et al., Stress and Hardship after Prison (2015) American J. of Sociology Vol.. 120, no. 5 pp. 1525–1528 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[382] Couloute, Nowhere to Go: Homelessness Among Formerly Incarcerated People (Aug. 1, 2018), Prison Policy Initiative (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[383] Ibid.

[384] Wildeman, Parental Incarceration, Child Homelessness, and the Invisible Consequences of Mass Imprisonment (2014) The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Vol. 651, pp. 74–96 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[385] Couloute and Kopf, Out of Prison & Out of Work: Unemployment Among Formerly Incarcerated People [summarizing and analyzing data from the Bureau of Justice Statistics and scholarly sources] (Jul. 1, 2018), Prison Policy Initiative (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Gurusami, Working for Redemption: Formerly Incarcerated Black Women and Punishment in the Labor Market (2017) Gender and Society Vol. 31, no. 4, pp. 433–56 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[386] Sykes and Maroto, A Wealth of Inequalities: Mass Incarceration, Employment, and Racial Disparities in U.S. Household Wealth 1996 to 2011 (2016) The Russell Sage Foundation, Journal of the Social Sciences Vol. 2, pp. 129–152 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[387] U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Com., Enforcement Guidance on the Consideration of Arrest and Conviction Records in Employment Decisions under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (Apr. 25, 2012) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[388] See generally American Bar Association, Lack of Jury Diversity: A National Problem with Individual Consequences (Sept. 1, 2015), ABA (as of Apr. 26, 2022); see generally Jackson-Gleich, Rigging the jury: How each state reduces jury diversity by excluding people with criminal records (Feb. 18, 2021), Prison Policy Initiative (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[389] Behrens et al., Ballot Manipulation and the "Menace of Negro Domination": Racial Threat and Felon Disenfranchisement in the United States, 1850-2002 (2003) Am. Journal of Sociology Vol. 109, pp. 559-605 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[390] Uggen and Manza, Democratic Contraction? Political Consequences of Felon Disenfranchisement in the United States (2002) Am. Sociological Review Vol. 67, pp. 777-803; Harvey, Ex-Felon Disenfranchisement and Its Influence on the Black Vote: The Need for a Second Look (1994) 142 Univ. of Pa. L. Rev. 1145–89 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[391] The Sentencing Project, Locked Out 2020: Estimates of People Denied Voting Rights Due to a Felony Conviction (Oct. 30, 2020) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[392] Ibid.

[393] Assari et al., Discrimination Fully Mediates the Effects of Incarceration History on Depressive Symptoms and Psychological Distress Among African American Men, Journal of Racial and Ethnic Health Disparities (2018) pp. 243-252 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[394] Office of the Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation, The Psychological Impact of Incarceration: Implications for Post-Prison Adjustment (Nov. 30, 2001), The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[395] Bor et al., Police killings and their spillover effects on the mental health of black Americans: a population-based, quasi-experimental study (June 21, 2018), The Lancet Vol 392, pp. 302-210 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[396] Ibid.

[397] See, e.g., Burks, African American Men's Negative Personal Experiences with and Trust in Police (Feb. 2021), Walden University Dissertations and Doctoral Studies (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[398] Roberts, The Social and Moral Cost of Mass Incarceration in African American Communities (2004) Univ. of PA Carey Law School, Penn Law: Legal Scholarship Repository 1271, 1287 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[399] Durose and Langton, Requests for Police Assistance, 2011 U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs Bureau of Justice Statistics, (2013) p. 4 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[400] National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, Report of The National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders (1968) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[401] The Civil Practice Act, Stats. 1851, ch. 1, § 394, [402] California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans (September 23, 2021), Testimony of Stacey Smith[citing Smith, Freedom's Frontier) (2014) pp. 71-72] (as of May 31, 2023).

[403] Greene, supra, at pp. 1270; DeVito, Of Bias and Exclusion: An Empirical Study of Diversity Jurisdiction, Its Amount-in-Controversy Requirement, and Black Alienation from U.S. Civil Courts (2021) 13 Geo. J. L. & Mod. Critical Race Persp. 1 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[404] Judicial Council of Cal., Advisory Com. on Racial and Ethnic Bias, Final Report on the California Judicial Council Advisory Committee on Racial and Ethnic Bias in the Courts (1997) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[405] Id. at p. 4 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); see also Judicial Council of Cal., Advisory Com. on Racial and Ethnic Bias, Fairness in the California State Courts: A Survey of the Public, Attorneys, and Court Personnel (1993) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[406] Gov. Code § § 12264-12271; see also Assembly Bill No. 1241 ("Ban the Box Housing Act") (2021-2022 Reg. Sess.) (Mar. 25, 2021) which may change the law (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[407] See generally Judicial Council of Cal., Clean Your Record (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[408] Pen. Code § 1170.18.

[409] Cal. Const., art. 1, § 32.

[410] Pen. Code § 851.93, § 1203.045.

[411] Gov. Code § 12952.

[412] Pen. Code § 851.91.

[413] Pew Charitable Trusts, Rickard, Many U.S. Families Faced Civil Legal Issues in 2018 (2019), Pew (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[414] Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857) 60 U.S. 393.

[415] Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) 163 U.S. 537.

[416] The Civil Rights Cases (1883) 109 U.S. 3.

[417] The Slaughter-House Cases (1873) 83 U.S. 36.

[418] See, e.g., The Civil Practice Act, Stats. 1851, ch. 1, § 394, p. 113; The Criminal Act of 1850, Stats. 1850, ch. 99, § 14, p. 230.

[419] Greene, supra, at pp. 1266–67.

[420] DeVito, Of Bias and Exclusion: An Empirical Study of Diversity Jurisdiction, Its Amount-in-Controversy Requirement, and Black Alienation from U.S. Civil Courts (2021) 13 Geo. J. L. & Mod. Critical Race Persp. 1, 3 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[421] See generally Podgers, In Defense of the Courts: A Symposium Finds Consensus on the Need, but No Easy Path to Restoring Court Funding (2011, ABA Journal 97, no. 11, 56–57 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Greenberg and McGovern, An Early Assessment of the Civil Justice System After the Financial Crisis: Something Wicked This Way Comes? (2012) RAND Corporation, pp. 5-12 (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Graetz, Trusting the Courts: Redressing the State Court Funding Crisis Daedalus, 143 (3), 96–104 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[422] Legal Services Corporation, The Justice Gap: Measuring the Unmet Civil Legal Needs of Low-income Americans (2017), LSC, p. 60 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[423] Id. at 21.

[424] Id. at 30.

[425] See generally Corbett, Stunted Growth: Assessing the Stagnant Enrollment of African-American Students at the Nation's Law Schools, (2008) 18 Temp. Pol. & Civ. Rts. L. Rev. 177; Weatherspoon, The Status of African American Males in the Legal Profession: A Pipeline of Institutional Roadblocks and Barriers, (2010) 80 Miss. L.J. 259, 264.

[426] See, e.g., Pearson v. Murray (Md. 1936) 169 Md. 478; State of Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada (1938) 305 U.S. 337; Sweatt v. Painter (1950) 339 U.S. 629.

[427] American Bar Association, 1912- ABA Restricts Membership to White Lawyers ABA (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[428] National Bar Association, History: National Bar Association (as of May 31, 2023).

[429] American Bar Association , 1912 - ABA Restricts Membership to White Lawyers ABA (as of Apr. 26, 2022); see also Shepherd, No African-American Lawyers Allowed: The Inefficient Racism of the ABA's Accreditation of Law Schools (Mar. 5, 2001) 53 J. Legal Educ. 103 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[430] Taylor, The Marginalization of Black Aspiring Lawyers (2019) Florida International University L. Rev. Vol. 13 No. 3 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[431] American Bar Association, ABA National Lawyer Population Survey (2022), p. 4 (as of May 31, 2023).

[432] American Bar Association, ABA Profile of the Legal Profession (2020), p. 33 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[433] American Bar Association, Summary Bar Pass Data, p. 1 (as of May 31, 2023).

[434] U.S. Census Bureau, Quick Facts: U.S. (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[435] American Bar Association, Model Rules Prof. Conduct: Preamble: A Lawyer's Responsibilities (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[436] State Bar of California, Rule 1.0 Purpose and Function of the Rules of Professional Conduct, Comment 5 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[437] See Shepherd, No African-American Lawyers Allowed: The Inefficient Racism of the ABA's Accreditation of Law Schools Journal (Mar. 5, 2001) 53 J. Legal Educ. 103 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[438] King, Race, Identity, and Professional Responsibility: Why Legal Services Organizations Need African American Staff Attorneys (2008) 18 Cornell L. Rev. 1, at p. 1 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[439] See generally Judicial Council of Cal., The Road to Independence: A History of Trial Court Funding California Courts Review (Winter 2009) (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Judicial Council of Cal., Special Rep.: Trial Court Funding,(1997) (as of Apr. 26, 2022); Trial Court Presiding Judges Advisory Committee, Memorandum of Trial Court Presiding Judges' Advisory Committee's Summary of Impacts from "Instant Survey" (March 11, 2013) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[440] Judicial Council of Cal., Judicial Branch Budget Com. Rep. COVID-19 Backlog Funding Data, Materials for January 5, 2021 Meeting, Judicial Branch Budget Committee (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[441] The State Bar of Cal., 2019 California Justice Study Gap, Executive Report p. 6 (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[442] Id. at p. 7.

[443] Id. at p. 11.

[444] See generally American Bar Association Standing Committee on Legal Aid and Indigent Defendants, Directory of Law Governing Appointment of Counsel in State Civil Proceedings: California (2016) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[445] Libgober, supra.

[446] Id. at p. 26.

[447] Judicial Council of Cal., Demographic Data Provided by Justices and Judges Relative to Gender, Race/Ethnicity, and Gender Identify/Sexual Orientation Gov. Code, § 12011.5, subd. (n))) (2020) (as of Apr. 26, 2022).

[448] State Bar of California, First Annual Report Card on the Diversity of California's Legal Profession (2020), Appendix Table 1 (as of Apr. 26, 2022)

[449] Id. at p. 7.

CHAPTER 12 Mental and Physical Harm and Neglect

COURTESY OF LIBRARY OF CONGRESS/CORBIS/VCG VIA GETTY IMAGES

I. Introduction

Scholars have stated that Europeans developed a racial hierarchy in which Black people were relegated to the bottom of humanity, and often placed outside of it altogether, in order to justify the enslavement of African people.[1] The United States is no exception to this global reality. This chapter will describe how federal, state, and local governments subjected enslaved people and their descendants to brutal and dehumanizing conditions, policies, and practices. The United States has treated African Americans as subhuman and engaged in practices harmful to the health of African Americans through forced labor, racial terror, oppression, torture, sexual violence, abusive medical experimentation, discrimination, harmful neglect, and more, as will be explained throughout this chapter. Scholars have stated that racism and enslavement are, at least in part, responsible for the fact that African Americans have had the worst healthcare, health status, and health outcomes of any racial or ethnic group in the United States.[2]

During enslavement, enslaved people were treated like animals, and physicians provided healthcare only to the extent necessary to profit from enslaved peoples' bodies.[3] After the end of slavery in 1865 and a short-lived period of reconstruction, federal, state, and local government officials worked with private citizens to segregate African American communities—damaging African American health, creating unequal healthcare services for African American people; depriving African American communities of safe sanitation and adequate sewage systems; and sacrificing African American health for medical experiments.[4] During the 20th century, federal and state sponsored corporatization of healthcare resulted in rising healthcare costs, the separation of African American doctors from African American patients, and further inequality between white and African Americans.[5]

Centuries of exposure to racism has contributed to a serious decline in African American physical and mental health.[6] African Americans die at disproportionately higher rates from preventable health problems.[7] Doctors are more likely to misdiagnose African Americans, leading to disparate outcomes in mental health.[8] African American women face high rates of maternal death and adverse birth outcomes—even Black women with the highest education attainment have the worst birth outcomes across all women in America.[9] African American children face poverty, malnutrition, and worse health than that of white American children.[10] The mismanagement of public health crises by county, state, and federal governments has resulted in an undue burden of disease and death in African American communities—particularly during the COVID-19 pandemic.[11] Despite this, in the face of overwhelming oppression, African American healthcare providers, patients, and community members, nonetheless, have worked to build healthy communities and fight for a more equitable healthcare system.[12]

Black men receiving intravenous treatment in Georgia. (1937)

Section III of this chapter discusses the racist theories developed and perpetuated by doctors and scientists about African Americans. Section IV describes the health conditions of African Americans during enslavement. Sections V, VI, and VII discuss how systemic discrimination and segregation was established and how it continues in the American health care system. Sections VIII and IX describe the history of medical experimentation on African American bodies throughout American history, and how medical research and technologies harm African Americans. Section X describes the history of racism in mental health and the effects of 400 years of racial oppression on the mental health of African Americans. Sections XI and XII discuss reproductive, gender identity-responsive healthcare, and child health. Section XIII discusses public health crises. Section XIV describes the effects of racial oppression on the physical health of African Americans.

Today, studies have found that a significant number of white medical students and residents hold false beliefs about biological differences between African Americans and white Americans, such as the belief that African Americans have a higher pain threshold than white Americans

II. Pseudoscientific Racism as Foundation of Healthcare

During the enslavement era, scientific racism defined race as an innate biological and genetic trait.[13] Pseudoscientific definitions of Blackness were based on differences in skin color, facial features, hair texture, lip size, and false beliefs about "brain size" and immunity to diseases.[14] Pseudoscientists invented "phrenology"—the baseless "science" of measuring the size of the skull as evidence of intelligence in different races.[15] This pseudoscience was influential across the United States throughout the 1800s.[16] During the slavery era, medical researchers tried to prove that African American people were biologically suited to slavery.[17]

In the 1880s and 1890s, the decades following Reconstruction, false medical theories explained the poverty that African Americans experienced as justified by their "inherent inferiority," instead of as the result of almost three centuries of enslavement.[18] Doctors published influential studies stating that African Americans' "immorality" was responsible for the syphilis and tuberculosis they suffered.[19] In 1880, the New Orleans public health agency claimed that African Americans' naturally weaker immune system and "irregular habits," were the reason that so many African Americans died, rather than inadequate access to sanitation, drinking water, food, and overcrowded uninhabitable housing due to racial segregation.[20] During Congressional debates over the establishment of the Freedmen's Bureau, a program which included government-funded healthcare for newly freed Americans, white legislators argued that healthcare assistance to free African American people would result in dependence.[21] Consequently, federal and state governments relied on racist theories to justify slavery and racist neglect in public policy.[22]

In the 20th century, the federal and state governments supported the eugenics movement, which sought to eliminate nonwhite populations, considered to have undesirable traits.[23] Eugenics is based upon the white supremacist ideology that white Anglo-Saxon people are an inherently superior race.[24] Eugenicists enacted laws resulting in the forced sterilization of undesirable "races," including African American people, to create and maintain a white supremacist nation.[25] By 1931, 30 states had eugenics laws that targeted vulnerable groups across the nation for involuntary sterilization in federally-funded programs.[26] It was not until 1979 that federal sterilization regulations required voluntary consent of the person being sterilized.[27]

Today, studies have found that a significant number of white medical students and residents hold false beliefs about biological differences between African Americans and white Americans, such as the belief that African Americans have a higher pain threshold than white Americans.[28] Black patients are especially vulnerable to harmful biases and stereotypes, including the undertreatment of their pain.[29] Physicians widely hold racist beliefs that African Americans feel less pain or exaggerate their pain.[30] These beliefs result in racial bias in pain perception and treatment.[31] Consequently, anti-Black pseudo-scientific racism that justified enslavement continues to adversely affect African American health today, as a vestige of enslavement. Despite centuries of pseudoscientific racism and anti-Blackness in the healthcare system, African American doctors, nurses, and healthcare workers have worked tirelessly to provide anti-racist culturally responsive healthcare to African American communities.[32]

California

California civic leaders were some of the most influential proponents of eugenics in the nation and around the world—including in Nazi Germany.[33] They played a key role in popularizing the eugenics movement.[34] The Human Betterment Foundation was a private think tank based in Pasadena, California that promoted sterilization from 1926 to 1943.[35] The Human Betterment Foundation shaped public policy in California by working with state officials, representing the eugenics movement to the public, and collecting data on sterilizations nationwide.[36] The foundation hoped that public support would result in state legislation that would increase the number of sterilizations performed each year.[37] The foundation's members included many prominent leaders of Californian institutions such as David Starr Jordan, Stanford University's first president; Los Angeles Times publisher Harry Chandler; Nobel Prize-winning physicist and head of the California Institute of Technology, Robert A. Millikan; and University of Southern California President Rufus B. von KleinSmid.[38]

Thousands of mental health patients were forcibly sterilized across California due to the eugenicist efforts of the Human Betterment Foundation. In 1937, one of Nazi Germany's leading eugenicists wrote to Ezra S. Gosney, the financier who started the Human Betterment Foundation, saying, "You were so kind to send...new information about the sterilization particulars in California. These practical experiences are also very valuable for us in Germany. For this I thank you."

Thousands of mental health patients were forcibly sterilized across California due to the eugenicist efforts of the Human Betterment Foundation.[39] African American patients were more likely to be sterilized than white patients.[40] Paul Popenoe, a self-trained biologist hired by the Human Betterment Foundation, stated that this was not surprising because "studies show that the rate of mental disease among Negroes is high."[41] Hundreds of thousands of studies, pamphlets, and books written by the Human Betterment Foundation were distributed to policymakers, schools, and libraries.[42] In 1937, one of Nazi Germany's leading eugenicists wrote to Ezra S. Gosney, the financier who started the Human Betterment Foundation, saying, "You were so kind to send... new information about the sterilization particulars in California. These practical experiences are also very valuable for us in Germany. For this I thank you."[43]

III. Health and Healthcare during Slavery

Scholars have stated that the institution of slavery has had a lasting legacy in the discriminatory healthcare system that would later emerge in the United States.[44] During the enslavement era, enslavers kept enslaved people in overcrowded, dilapidated living areas, which contributed to the spread of infectious and parasitic diseases.[45] Enslaved people were denied treatment in hospitals and access to mental healthcare.[46] Enslavers freely and openly tortured enslaved people, raped and abused women, and trafficked children with no legal consequence.[47] Physicians used enslaved people for dangerous experimental surgeries and procedures without repercussion.[48] Federal, state, and local governments used the law to further damage the health of enslaved people and dehumanize them, while neglecting to provide public health and healthcare services.[49] Dr. Carolyn Roberts stated during a hearing before the California Task Force to Study and Develop Reparation Proposals for African Americans that, "[t]his was a form of healthcare where medical violence against African and African descended people became an acceptable, normative, and institutionalized practice."[50]

Physical Health

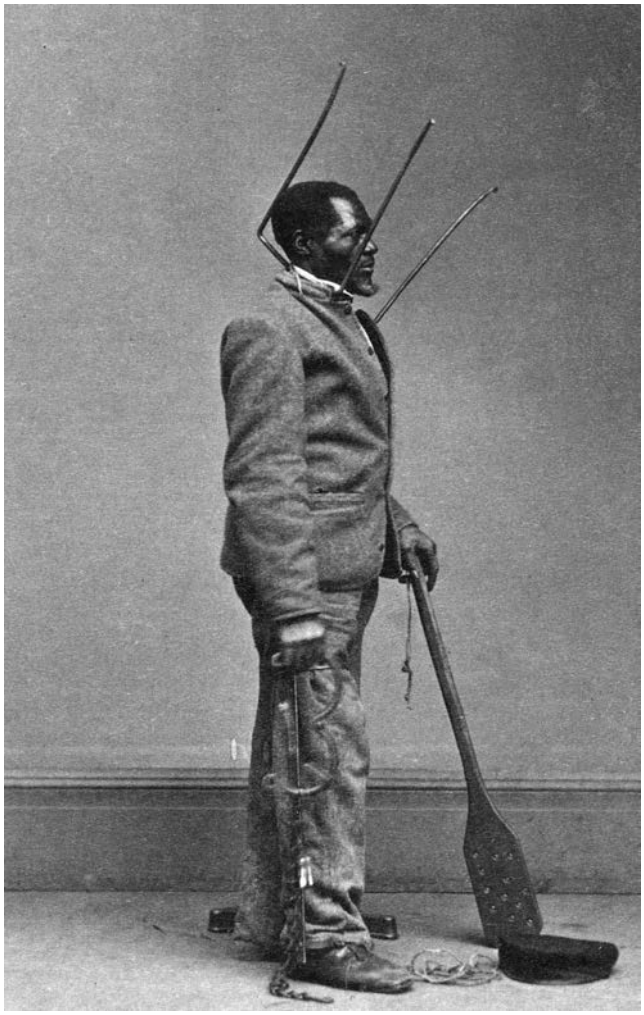
Slavery had disastrous health consequences for enslaved people due to lack of public health regulations and harsh working conditions that led to widespread infectious and nutritional diseases.[51] Infectious and parasitic diseases thrive in poor living conditions and overcrowding.[52] So, they were among the major causes of illness and death for enslaved people.[53] Worm infections were common among enslaved people due to contact with polluted food and soil.[54] Hookworm infestation resulted in low birth weights and high infant mortality.[55] Contagious respiratory diseases were prevalent in the winter months due to the overcrowded quarters and uninhabitable living conditions.[56] Malaria led to low birth weights and high infant mortality.[57]

The lack of federal or state public health regulations resulted in contaminated food and water, nonexistent sanitary facilities or sewage disposal, wastewater leakage, and poor garbage disposal, which contributed to diseases and infections that were more likely to affect enslaved people.[58] There was no government-funded healthcare, or regulations regarding water treatment, sewage disposal, or vaccination and the prevention of disease.[59] Sexually transmitted infections were major public health problems affecting the lives of enslaved people disproportionately due to forced breeding, overcrowded quarters, and lack of access to treatment.[60] Diseases, like pellagra, caused by a lack of nutrition in the diet, weakened the immune systems of enslaved people.[61]

The health of enslaved people was worse than that of white people, because there were hardly any hospitals where they could be treated for disease.[62] With few exceptions, enslaved people and free Black people were not allowed to access hospitals, almshouses, and facilities for the deaf and blind.[63] The welfare of enslaved people was left to enslavers, while free African American people were forced to fend for themselves.[64] In 1798, Congress established a loose network of marine hospitals to care for sick and disabled seamen, however, the U.S. Treasury Department did not allow African American sailors to be treated at these hospitals.[65]

White enslavers tortured enslaved people openly, inflicting cruel punishment upon them without any legal consequences and often permanently damaged their health.[66] Enslavers deprived enslaved people of food and water, whipped them to inflict serious pain, and abused them.[67] The brutal violence of enslavers and the harsh labor conditions they imposed resulted in branding, dog bites, assaults with fists and rods, burns, lacerations, mutilated body parts, and bone fractures for enslaved people.[68]

COURTESY OF ADOC-PHOTOS/CORBIS VIA GETTY IMAGES



The forehead of Wilson Chinn, a formerly enslaved person from Louisiana, was branded with the initials of his enslaver. Chinn is wearing a punishment collar and posing with other equipment used to punish slaves. (1863)

Gashes from chains and iron restraints resulted in injuries, infections, and permanent disability for enslaved people.[69] Enslaved people were routinely murdered by white enslavers and white people who stabbed, shot, and whipped them to death with impunity.[70] The lack of protections from extreme climates, in addition to harsh laboring conditions, resulted in illness, injury, and disease.[71]

Mental Health

The first public mental hospital in the United States was founded in 1773, in Williamsburg, Virginia.[72] Eventually, a few public mental asylums opened in Maryland, Kentucky, and South Carolina during the antebellum period.[73] Initially, African American patients were only admitted to the asylum in Williamsburg, Virginia—the other public mental health institutions did not allow African American patients to be admitted.[74] There, free

African American patients were funded by the state at much lower rates than whites, so patients received less care and services.[75] Some enslaved people were diagnosed with fictitious mental illnesses, as will be further discussed in Section X of this chapter.[76] Numerous "diseases" that allegedly affected enslaved people were invented by southern doctors, including "drapetomania," the "irrational" desire to run away, and "dysesthesia," a supposed laziness that caused enslaved people to mishandle enslaver property.[77] Doctors recommended torturing enslaved people as "treatment" for these false diseases.[78]

Generally, antebellum mental asylums were segregated or closed to African American patients.[79] If admitted, African American patients were housed in poorer accommodations and forced to work at the asylums under harsher conditions than white patients.[80] They were assigned the dirtiest and most difficult jobs, including meal preparation, and handling the personal hygiene of ill patients.[81] In "Central Lunatic Asylum" in Virginia, enslaved people were forced to labor, frequently on a plantation while being mechanically restrained.[82] In the North, state and local governments typically denied African Americans access to mental healthcare in asylums.[83] For mentally ill free African Americans in the North, the poorhouse and the jail were the only social "welfare" institutions open to them in the antebellum era.[84] Free African Americans did work as janitors in northern mental hospitals and medical schools, but were not allowed to work as direct caregivers.[85] Consequently, enslaved people and free African Americans were deprived of adequate mental healthcare by federal and state governments during the slavery era.

Enslaved Women and Children

Enslavers held unrestrained reproductive control over enslaved women using rape and livestock breeding techniques sanctioned by law.[86] The enslaver, President Thomas Jefferson, wrote in his journal of plantation management, "I consider a woman who brings a child every two years as more profitable than the best man of the farm. [W]hat she produces is an addition to the capital."[87] Jefferson was commenting on the enslaver's practice of using enslaved women to reproduce, like livestock. Enslavers used a variety of tactics to induce enslaved women to bear children—such as punishing and selling women who did not bear children, committing sexual assault, manipulating the marital choices of enslaved people, and forced breeding.[88] State laws stated that children born to enslaved mothers and white men were legally considered to be enslaved, leading enslaved women to be vulnerable to sexual violence inflicted by white men.[89] Furthermore, state laws did not recognize the rape of enslaved women as a crime.[90]

White enslavers were legally allowed to economically profit from raping enslaved women because rape generated a larger workforce of enslaved people—and enslavers could rape freely, without consequence.[91] White women married to enslavers often whipped and tortured enslaved women after they were sexually assaulted by white men.[92] Enslavers inflicted psychological and physical punishment on enslaved women if they did not bear children.[93] Enslavers forced enslaved women to submit to being raped by men and castrated enslaved men who were not fit for "breeding."[94]

The health of enslaved mothers and their babies was greatly damaged due to the treatment of enslaved women as objects to be raped, bred, or abused.[95] On average, enslaved women became mothers earlier than white women due to pressure to reproduce.[96] Enslavers treated enslaved women who did not bear children as "damaged goods"—pawning them off on other enslavers.[97] Southern courts even established rules for sellers of enslaved women who misrepresented their fertility, which were akin to rules governing the sale of commodities—i.e., imposing some sort of fine or consequence for misrepresenting their "merchandise."[98] Mother-child bonding was shattered as white enslavers trafficked children for labor to other plantations or sold them.[99] Records show that expectant mothers only received work relief after the fifth month of pregnancy and often returned to heavy labor within the first month of the infant's life.[100] Enslaved mothers were forced to labor in fields and to breastfeed white children, while neglecting their own.[101]

Numerous "diseases" that allegedly affected enslaved people were invented by Southern doctors, including "drapetomania," the "irrational" desire to run away, and "dysesthesia," a supposed laziness that caused enslaved people to mishandle enslaver property. Doctors recommended torturing enslaved people as "treatment" for these false diseases.

Pregnant enslaved women were whipped routinely by white enslavers.[102] Enslavers dug holes in the ground, forced women to lie face down so that their stomachs would fit inside the holes, and whipped their backs.[103]

This was done to punish enslaved women without damaging the fetus, which was legally considered to be the enslaver's future property.[104] Women became pregnant during winter months when labor was reduced, consequently giving birth during the summer—the time of highest labor demand and greatest sickness—leading to high infant mortality rates.[105] Enslaved women had rich cultural knowledge of natural birth control from their indigenous cultures, which they were forced to conceal from enslavers.[106] African American midwives assisted pregnant enslaved women with inducing and hiding abortions.[107]

Children born into slavery suffered from mortality rates that were double the free population, consumed contaminated and less nutritious food, and experienced stunted growth and health problems throughout childhood.[108] Two-thirds of infants died within their first month of life—due in part to the hard labor enslaved mothers were forced to do.[109] Children were forced to work by the time they turned seven or eight years old.[110]

Medical Experimentation

Courts neglected to protect the health and safety rights of enslaved people, who were rendered legally invisible under the institution of slavery.[111] In many hiring contracts concerning enslaved people, references to medical care of enslaved people were omitted.[112] In legal disputes concerning enslaved people hired out to others, state courts ruled that the hirers need not provide medical care to the enslaved people.[113] Because enslavers wished to avoid paying medical expenses, enslavers often only called physicians as a last resort, when the enslaved person was nearly dead.[114] Physicians actively exploited enslaved people—practicing dangerous experimental procedures on them and using their cadavers for dissection without consent.[115]

White southern doctors were hired by enslavers and insurance companies to accurately determine the market value of Black bodies.[116] Physicians used slavery for economic security and experimented on African American people using dangerous procedures that harmed them, but furthered the physician's professional advancement.[117] African American bodies filled dissecting tables, operating theaters, and experimental facilities.[118] An enslaved person named Sam was experimented on by multiple doctors; he had his lower jaw bone removed without anesthesia for medical research.[119]

James Marion Sims, the "founder of modern gynecology," and an enslaver, experimented upon enslaved women and performed vaginal surgeries upon them against their will.[120] Sims used enslaved women's bodies to perfect surgical instruments and advance his professional status.[121] Sims' enslaved patients worked as his enslaved nurses and surgical assistants, though they did not receive recognition for doing so.[122] After being experimented upon by Sims, the enslaved patients were returned to their enslavers.[123] After it was perfected through medical experimentation upon enslaved women, Sims received numerous invitations to perform the vaginal procedure for European royalty.[124]

Enslaved people were used to test experimental caesarean sections and vaccines.[125] Surgeons often used enslaved people for surgical experiments and experimentation in medication and dosages.[126] Enslaved people's bodies were dissected after death to advance medical knowledge and their remains were found at Virginia Commonwealth University in 1994—findings such as these have occurred in numerous medical schools across the country.[127]

James Marion Sims, the "founder of modern gynecology," and an enslaver, experimented upon enslaved women and performed vaginal surgeries upon them against their will. Sims used enslaved women's bodies to perfect surgical instruments and advance his professional status.

California

During the period of enslavement, white southerners flocked to California with hundreds of enslaved African American people when the Gold Rush began in 1848, forcing them to toil in gold mines and hiring them to cook, serve, and perform manual labor.[128] Some enslaved people were forced to work in the gold fields to make money for their enslavers, despite illness—and if they could not do so, would lose their chance at freedom.[129] African American newspapers described brawls between enslaved people and white enslavers across California.[130]

In 1851, the U.S. Congress created a U.S. Marine Hospital in San Francisco, which was completed in 1853.[131] Marine hospitals were set up to care for sick and disabled seamen by the U.S. Treasury Department.[132] The U.S. Treasury Department distributed strict guidelines specifying that the "Negro slaves" could not receive treatment at these hospitals.[133] African Americans were relegated to the segregated sections of state hospitals in San Francisco and Sacramento.[134]

In the 1850s, Biddy Mason, moved to California with her enslaver.[135] She lived for five years in California as an enslaved woman, until she challenged her enslaver for her freedom in court.[136] She later became a midwife and nurse, running her own midwifery business and saving enough money to purchase land and establish a church.[137] She donated to many charities, helped feed and shelter the poor, and founded an elementary school for African American children.[138]

IV. Reconstruction Era

The Civil War resulted in large-scale death, destruction, and casualties for formerly enslaved people—30,000 formerly enslaved people died from infectious diseases.[139] Sick African American soldiers died five times more often than their white counterparts.[140] After the war, African Americans lived in large, segregated refugee camps called "contraband camps" because there was nowhere else for them to go.[141] Hospitals, dispensaries, and military camps were unable to serve the masses of enslaved people, African American soldiers, and other refugees who entered the North due to the Civil War.[142] Escaped and abandoned formerly enslaved people settled near or within the Union Army's military camps and battle lines.[143] The camps did not have adequate sanitation, nutrition, or medical care.[144] One out of every four African Americans who lived in the camps died.[145]

Following the Civil War, due to segregation, African Americans were forced to live in overcrowded, unventilated tenements and unsanitary shacks.[146] Excessive mortality rates in African American communities were caused by poor living conditions, lack of access to nutritious food, and lack of access to healthcare.[147] Epidemics such as cholera and smallpox broke out often where African Americans lived.[148]

From 1865 to 1868, Congress created the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, commonly known as the "Freedmen's Bureau," to provide for the welfare of formerly enslaved African Americans, including through "issues of provisions, clothing, and fuel, as [necessary] for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen and their wives and children," according to the statute.[149] The Freedmen's Bureau included a short-lived attempt to provide medical aid to formerly enslaved people in need.[150] The Bureau was hampered by cities and counties that focused on the health of white people and refused to provide healthcare for formerly enslaved people.[151] The Freedmen's Bureau was poorly equipped to provide mental health services to formerly enslaved people.[152]

The Freedmen's Bureau dispensaries did provide thousands with annual treatment and prescriptions.[153] However, many of the white physicians affiliated with the bureau were racist to their African American patients, and sometimes refused to treat them.[154] After two years of operation, with southern legislators claiming the costs were too high, Congress ended the Freedmen's Bureau medical services—just as demand for services was increasing.[155] When the Bureau's medical services ended, formerly enslaved people continued to suffer from illness, destitution, and racial discrimination from physicians and were left with little to no access to medical care.[156] The Freedmen's Bureau failed to provide for the health and welfare of newly-freed African Americans, despite the promises made by the federal government.[157]

V. Racial Segregation Era

Following the Freedmen's Bureau's failed attempts to provide healthcare to African Americans, the Jim Crow era of racial segregation and discrimination greatly degraded the health of African American communities. White hospitals discriminated against African American doctors and nurses and treated African American patients only in "colored wings."[158] African American hospitals suffered from underfunding and resource constraints, such as struggles with licensing accreditation, and developing links with municipal hospitals.[159] In 1946, Congress passed the Hill-Burton Act, which provided federal funding to segregated healthcare facilities—further entrenching discrimination and segregation in the healthcare system.[160] The racial segregation of the Jim Crow era was a vestige of enslavement during which African Americans suffered dire health consequences.[161]

African American Patients and Medical Professionals

During the Jim Crow era, African American hospitals and segregated units within predominantly white hospitals were the only viable sources for medical services for African Americans, due to pervasive racial discrimination, poverty, and lack of geographic accessibility.[162] Some white hospitals operated small wards for African American patients, but they were in the worst areas of hospitals—in basements or crowded "colored wings."[163] These white hospitals did not hire African American doctors, and white doctors often treated African American patients with disdain.[164]

During World War I and after, millions of African Americans living in southern states migrated to the urban Northeast and Midwest in the Great Migration.[165] During this time, underfunded and under-resourced African American hospitals were not able to provide care for local African Americans and newly arriving migrants.[166] In northern cities, African American patients who sought treatment in large city hospitals were forced to compete for healthcare resources with poor European immigrants.[167] Private doctors were unaffordable for most African Americans.[168]

From the 1880s to 1964, southern states segregated African American people from white Americans in every aspect of life, including healthcare.[169] The Hill-Burton Act allocated separate funds for African American and white hospitals, resulting in a disparity in hospital beds available for African American patients.[170] African American women often could not afford to have physicians deliver babies in hospitals, and were instead treated by African American midwives in the rural regions of the South.[171] White patients refused to be treated next to African American patients and by African American doctors or nurses.[172] Most poor African Americans could not afford hospital care.[173]

White hospitals received public and private funds to establish models of care based on the newest scientific developments, while Black hospitals had to rely on their own small community of patients for funding. Black hospitals were forced to open in older, outdated hospital structures that were abandoned by prior white founders.

Some African American doctors could have their African American patients admitted to white hospitals—however, the African American doctors themselves were barred from working as physicians at those white hospitals.[174]

White doctors refused to treat Black patients—like the son of scholar W.E.B. Du Bois, Burghardt, who suffered from diphtheria.[175] Du Bois tried in vain to find a Black physician, but his son died when he was about one and a half years old.[176] Baby Burghardt's death mirrored the many deaths of enslaved children from the same disease.[177] While white public health leaders and professionals ignored the needs of the African American community, African American physicians and health leaders traveled to churches, schools, and community meetings to give healthcare education presentations.[178]

COURTESY OF RUSSELL LEE/LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

A waiting room in a Black hospital in Chicago in 1941. Black hospitals were the only viable sources for healthcare for Black Americans because many white hospitals did not admit Black patients or provided discriminatory care.

Because African Americans were denied medical education, they founded their own medical schools. The first African American medical school, Howard University Medical Department, was founded in 1867.[179] It was the first of 14 African American medical schools founded between 1868 and 1900.[180] In 1910, the Carnegie Foundation commissioned a report to evaluate every medical school in the U.S. and Canada.[181] In the wake of the report, most Black medical schools closed.[182] By 1915, five of the eight African American medical schools established in the 1880s and 1990s had closed.[183] By 1923, only two training sites were left for African American doctors and other medical professionals—Howard University in Washington, D.C. and Meharry Medical College in Tennessee.[184]

